Mahomo was awarded court costs and a sum of money for damages. Penguin will withdraw the passage about Mahomo from any future editions of the book.

The allegations against Mahomo surfaced shortly after he came to the United States to serve—first as a consultant and later as coordinator—with AALC's Program of Action in Support of Black Trade Unions in South Africa.

The Pan Africanist Congress was formed in 1959. A year later it was banned along with Mahomo and certain other members of the organization. Mahomo lived in exile in London until he came to the United States in 1981.

Mahomo has not returned to South Africa since 1961, although members of his family still reside there. He has won awards in the United States for producing films documenting the South African government's official policy of apartheid, or racial segregation.

Seafarers renew push for revival of U.S. fleet

Piney Point, Md. — Delegates to the Seafarers triennial convention here took a new look at the continuing problem of revitalizing America's merchant marine.

SIU President Frank Drozak stressed the convention theme of "jobs for America's workers" and sharply criticized the Reagan Administration for a trail of broken promises. He pressed for measures to "arrest the drastic decline" of the maritime industry and the related areas where SIU members work.

The 300 delegates, representing some 80,000 members, held their three-day convention at the SIU's training center, where aspirant Seafarers receive basic instructions and veteran members come for advanced skill training.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, himself a merchant marine veteran, told the convention that the Reagan Administration has undermined even "the minimal protections" afforded by various laws to the U.S. maritime industry.

"More than ever before, our nation is asked to depend on ships which do not fly the American flag for raw materials and oil, and virtually all our merchandise trade," he said.

Despite its talk of strengthening the nation's security, the Reagan Administration has left the country with only "a shrinking, aging fleet" inadequate for any international crisis. "The Reaganites spend billions and billions on planning for wars among the stars," Kirkland said, "but they have left us without the ships to carry men and guns and tanks to the trouble spots of the real world."

Kirkland stressed the AFL-CIO's support for cargo preference legislation and enforcement of existing laws.

Kirkland and Drozak warned of the hazards of another four years of the Reagan Administration.

Reagan's first term has brought unemployment to 30 million families, while "nearly 11 million families lost their health insurance coverage, 494,000 families lost their homes, 73,000 small businesses went bankrupt," Kirkland said.

"Against this stark economic background, this Administration has created an atmosphere of anti-unionism that has encouraged every regressive instinct of the employer class," Kirkland charged. Thus, "employers have been emboldened to force cutbacks in workers' wages and benefits, to exploit bankruptcy laws to unilaterally tear up labor contracts, to threaten workers with plant closings, and to pervert the purposes of the National Labor Relations Board."

Anti-worker policies

Drozak told the convention that Reagan has "turned his back on working people" and the maritime trades in particular.

Another convention speaker, Sheet Metal Workers President Edward Carlough, termed Reagan's defeat in November "a matter of survival for the trade unions."

The SIU's campaign for a new maritime policy was backed by the chairman of the House Merchant Marine & Fisheries Committee, Rept. Walter B. Jones (D-N.C.).

Jones reiterated his support for cargo preference legislation and continuation of U.S. shipbuilding. The merchant marine, he stressed, has an essential role in revitalization of the U.S. economy.

Bargaining saves jobs and wages at bankrupt firm

The ruling, tilted against worker rights, allows a company to tear up its union contract as soon as it files for bankruptcy —without first persuading a bankruptcy court that the action is justified.

The Revere agreement, which must be approved by a federal bankruptcy judge in the next few weeks, provides general wage increases in the second and third years totaling 30 cents an hour, and a cost-of-living adjustment capped at 20 cents an hour over the same period.

In exchange for waiving a wage increase in the first year of the pact, workers also will receive improved life, sickness, accident and major medical insurance as well as increases in pension benefits.

"We've had a 12-year tradition of coordinated bargaining at Revere," Campagna said. "This has enabled us to sit down with management and work through this problem without losing a single day of work, without givebacks, and without damaging Revere's efforts to come out of Chapter 11 proceedings in the next few months."

Revere, the nation's second largest copper and brass fabricating company, now has reached agreement with all its hourly work force.

At House hearings on OPM plot to split unions, Saul Stein of Metal Trades Dept. testifies with NAGE's Edward Murphy, left, and AFGE's George Hobt.

George A. Hobt, AFGE's director of pay and classification, along with other witnesses, testified that Devine told them that the government would have to classify all jobs under the same pay-grading system if the legislation were enacted, and that he showed charts in which four blue-collar jobs were depicted with downward arrows pointing to the lower pay of salaried jobs held primarily by women, such as nurses.

The union representatives, who weren't told in advance of the purpose of the meeting, said they were puzzled by Devine's assertions, and they questioned his interpretation of the Oakar bill.

A Washington Post story the next day—quoting sections of the Byrnes memo—"removed any doubts from our minds as to the real reasons" for the meeting, Hobt testified.

The Reagan Administration "really scraped the bottom of the barrel" in coming up with such "tawdry tactics," Hobt said.

Solid agreement

The NFFE representative, Legislative Director David Gusky, said he concurred fully with Hobt's testimony. NFFE is the only union among the five not affiliated with the AFL-CIO.

Saul S. Stein, research and education director of the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept., said unions are long familiar with "divide and conquer" tactics of employers who try to set one group of workers against another.

Stein told the House panel that he was not surprised to find Administration OPM officials proposing to manipulate a pay equity study "for partisan political purposes in this election year."

So far as the metal trades unions are concerned, he said, any form of pay discrimination is wrong and should be remedied—including inequities based on predominantly male or female job classifications.

Stein termed the actions of Devine and Byrnes "a clear violation of the Hatch Act," which bans partisan political activity by government employees. He called for the resignation of both officials.

Move to mislead

The general counsel of the National Association of Government Employees, Edward Murphy, termed Devine's remarks at the meeting an attempt to mislead the union representatives as to the provisions of the Oakar bill.

Murphy said that NAGE, which is an affiliate of the Service Employees, is deeply concerned over the "impropriety" of Devine's action. It shows an "utter disdain for federal workers and unions," he asserted.

Louis Elesie, director of the industrial division of the Laborers, said he had no doubt that the OPM officials were deliberately trying to pit blue-collar and white-collar unions against each other.

That plot hasn't worked, Elesie told the subcommittee. "On this issue, we're going to be united."

Oakar said at the start of the hearing that the memo and Devine's remarks misstated the provisions of the bill she introduced.

The measure, which had been approved by the subcommittee, was cleared for the House floor by the full Post Office & Civil Service Committee the day following the hearing.

The bill specifically bans any reduction in pay as a result of the pay equity study, she stressed. It would be impermissible to reduce anyone's wages to remedy sex discrimination, Oakar made clear.

But the disclosure of the memo, Oakar said, raises a real question as to the objectivity of any study the government's personnel agency would conduct.

NLRB says 'bah, humbug'

Scrooge—that curmudgeon who took the spirit of joy and gladness out of Christmas—would be delighted with a ruling the National Labor Relations Board just handed down.

The NLRB said that it's okay for an employer to eliminate traditional Christmas bonuses where a bargaining agreement with workers does not specifically provide for them.

In a case involving members of Electrical Workers Local 1466, the board reversed the decision of one of its administrative law judges and held that a "zipper clause" in a contract with an Ohio utility company allowed the employer to drop the bonuses.

The Columbus & Southern Ohio Electric Co. had been paying cash bonuses to its employees every year but one since 1942 even though they were not spelled out in the collective bargaining agreements with Local 1466.

Then, in 1982, the utility and IBEW agreed to a "zipper clause" which provided that the current contract would "supersede all prior agreements and understandings" between them and "shall govern their entire relationship and . . . be the sole source of any and all rights which may be asserted."

In December 1982, the company told its workers it was discontinuing the Christmas bonus because of its "fast-deteriorating financial condition." Even though the administrative law judge upheld the union's unfair labor practice charge, the board held that the zipper clause constituted a "clear and unmistakable waiver" of the workers' right to bargain over issues not contained in the agreement and ruled in the utility's favor.

In another case involving a similar issue, the NLRB held that an employer which unilaterally ended its practice of providing Christmas dinners and hams for employees did not violate federal labor law.

The board's Reagan-appointed majority said that since Benchmark Industries, Inc. of Burnsville, Miss., gave them to all its employees regardless of seniority, work performance, or other employment-related factors, the dinners and hams were "merely gifts." Benchmark employees are members of the Clothing & Textile Workers.

NLRB Member Don A. Zimmerman observed in a dissenting opinion that the employer's "consistent practice" of giving the dinners over a period of years constituted a term or condition of employment and that eliminating them was a violation. However, Zimmerman joined in the board's Christmas bonus decision with Chairman Donald L. Dotson and Member Robert P. Hunter.

Martin retires as editor of California labor paper

San Francisco—Glenn Martin, editor of the California AFL-CIO News for 22 years, retired May 11.

Martin, 60, was a writer with the Oakland Tribune before joining the state federation's staff in 1962. He has been a member of the San Francisco-Oakland Newspaper Guild since 1951, and he was instrumental in organizing the Guild unit at the Tribune.

Martin has also served as a vice president of the International Labor Press Association and the Western Labor Press Association.

Doug Barrett has been named editor of the state federation's paper. He was formerly administrative assistant to State AFL-CIO Executive Sec.-Treas. John F. Henning.

Distillery Workers President George Oneto, left, and Sec.-Treas. George Orlando after their re-election to new four-year terms.

Distillery Workers vote rise in per capita, minimum dues

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The Distillery Workers convention approved an 85-cent increase in monthly per capita tax and a four-step increase in minimum dues and initiation fees.

In stressing political action in this election year, the 135 delegates endorsed the bid of Walter F. Mondale for the Democratic presidential nomination and sharply criticized the Reagan Administration for its destructive social and economic policies and its anti-labor bias.

The union's monthly per capita payments will rise from the current $3.45 to $3.90 effective June 1, 1985, and by an additional 40 cents on June 1, 1986.

Minimum local dues were increased from $12 a month to $13 effective June 1, 1984, with $1 increases each June 1 through 1987 to a total of $16 monthly.

In other constitutional changes, the delegates voted to increase minimum initiation fees from $50 to $75 June 1, 1984, and by $25 each June 1 through 1987 to a maximum of $150 with no more than $50 sent to the international union.

Political action

DWU President George J. Oneto, in his keynote address to the convention, urged the delegates to step-up political and legislative action programs, including support for Mondale's candidacy.

Oneto denounced the Reagan policies for "riveting on the American people an intolerable, unconscionable and unacceptable economic burden."

He urged support for the Senate-passed version of an increased excise tax on alcoholic beverages in preference to the House-passed measure, which are now in conference.

The Senate bill provides for "an increase we can live with," while the House version "could well be the final straw that breaks the camel's back," Oneto told the delegates.

COPE Director John Perkins stressed that a key to ousting the Reagan Administration lies in "aggressively and intelligently . . . projecting Reagan's anti-labor, anti-poor, anti-minorities and anti-youth policies to our members."

Stacked deck

Organization & Field Services Director Alan Kistler blasted the Reagan Administration for "stacking the deck" at the National Labor Relations Board and the Labor Dept. with anti-labor partisans.

In his speech to the delegates, Robert F. Harbrant, president of the Food & Allied Service Trades Dept. stressed that Mondale has earned labor's support throughout his career in public life and as "an eloquent spokesman for the concerns of working people."

In key resolutions adopted at the five-day convention, delegates voiced unanimous support for enactment of a wine equity bill that would provide for reciprocity in tariffs in trade between the United States and the European Economic Community, for amendments to the bankruptcy law to safeguard union contracts and legislation to protect beet sugar workers through stable prices and import quotas.

Oneto and Sec.-Treas. George Orlando were re-elected to new four-year terms as were 10 incumbent vice presidents and three international auditors. Earlier, the delegates voted to decrease the number of vice presidents from 11 to 10.

Court upholds provisions

Medical records rule under fire at OSHA

The Reagan Administration is still considering a proposal to weaken the Occupational Safety & Health Administration's medical records access rule, even though the regulation was upheld by the U.S. 5th Circuit Court of Appeals.

The appellate court decision affirmed a lower court ruling on key sections of the medical records access rule.

The decision confirms labor's position that workers and their unions have a fundamental right to data on substances they are exposed to on the job and have access to results of medical tests, said Margaret Seminario, associate director of the AFL-CIO's Dept. of Occupational Safety, Health and Social Security.

"Unfortunately, this rule, like many other OSHA standards, is unnecessarily and unwisely being revisited by the Reagan Administration," she said. "There is still an outstanding 1982 proposal to weaken the rule and make it meaningless."

Seminario said the changes OSHA is proposing are in the same areas that were reviewed by the courts and firmly upheld. These areas include the definition of a toxic substance, union rights to access and trade secret provisions.

Workable regulation

"We would hope that this court decision would end any thoughts OSHA has of weakening the access rule. In fact, the four years the rule has been in effect have shown it is basically sound and workable," she said.

"If they still decide to proceed," Seminario said, "it is just another confirmation that this Administration has no regard for the law and its obligation to protect workers on the job."

The appeals court said the "district court has correctly decided all contentions raised upon appeal by its memorandum ruling of Nov. 5, 1982."

The court challenge to the medical access rule was made in July 1980 by the Louisiana Chemical Association. The manufacturers group questioned OSHA's right to require employers to provide their workers, OSHA and unions "access to records voluntarily created by the employers which contain information relating to medical exposure histories of employees exposed to toxic substances or harmful physical agents."

Privacy protection

It also challenged internal OSHA procedures in protecting the privacy interest of employees in personal medical information released to the agency.

The district court held that the "records access rule is quite directly related to the goals of assuring 'safe and healthful working conditions' and 'preserving our human resources.' "

The rule will serve to establish a primary data base regarding long-term exposure to toxic substances, the court said, and that will aid in medical/industrial research in the isolation and identification of occupational diseases.

The rule provides for access only to records made at the employer's initiative, absent any regulatory prompting. In effect, the court said, "LCA complains here because OSHA imposed less of a regulatory burden than it was authorized to."

The court held that OSHA had the authority to issue the rule and that there was no indication that OSHA would not respect the Fourth Amendment rights of employers in enforcing the rule. It also determined the agency had ample security measures to protect sensitive medical information and trade secrets.

LCA's contention that OSHA's main goal in issuing the rule was to "gain a benefit for employees and unions which they have been unsuccessful in securing through the NLRB" was soundly rebuffed by the court.

Arizona convention presses state, national election goals

Scottsdale, Ariz.—The 175 delegates to the annual Arizona AFL-CIO convention called for increased political activity by the state's unionized workers to counter the state's "very anti-labor legislature" and to help elect Walter Mondale as President.

The convention also received a first-hand report on the 11-month-old strike against the Phelps Dodge Corp. from Angel Rodriguez, president of Steelworkers Local 616 in Clifton, Ariz. Delegates passed the hat and donated $1,036 to the strikers' relief fund.

Arizona AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Darwin Aycock, who chairs the legislative committee, told delegates that the most recent session of the state's Republican-controlled legislature was "very anti-labor." He stressed the need to elect representatives who support labor's positions.

Aycock pointed to constitutional proposals on November's ballot in Arizona that would outlaw strikes by public employees and block state agencies and political subdivisions from requiring prevailing wages to be paid on public works projects.

Rodriguez said political pressure needs to be brought on Phelps Dodge to force it back to the bargaining table. "The unions are ready, but it can't happen unless Phelps Dodge is forced back to the table with a new attitude—not a union-busting attitude."

Strikers' plight

Rodriguez showed the convention a film depicting the plight of the workers from 13 unions who struck the company in July 1983.

Larry Spitz, retired from the Steelworkers and president of the Sun City Union Club, stressed the need to make new members aware of the benefits and heritage of unionism.

House Minority Leader Art Hamilton, speaking on the Phelps Dodge strike, attacked "the raw corporate power that seeks to punish people who try to raise the standard of living for themselves and their families."

Arizona State University Professor Jim Byrkit gave a slide presentation depicting the Bisbee deportation in 1917, when Phelps Dodge deported 1,186 strikers by train to Columbus, N.M. from Bisbee, Ariz.

Sweden sets example in child care

Swedish workers won major gains in child care services over the past decade thanks to the large number of working women and their highly unionized workforce, Swedish officials reported in a seminar contrasting government programs and employee benefits available to American workers.

While comprehensive child care legislation was being vetoed by President Nixon, and existing child health, education and welfare programs slashed by President Reagan—Swedish laws were improved to provide for shortened workdays for parents, day care, free school meals, education and tax benefits for families and "parental insurance" that guarantees both mothers and fathers benefits and leave allowances for child care.

Representatives of U.S. and Swedish unions, businesses and government agencies attended the seminar cosponsored by the Swedish Embassy and the Coalition of Labor Union Women.

Swedish Undersecretary for Labor Berit Rollen told the group that her nation's labor movement was instrumental in achieving the programs designed to help both men and women combine work with raising families.

She pointed out that eight of every 10 Swedish women hold jobs outside the home. The majority were mothers, and many have small children. Nearly 90 percent of all workers in Sweden are union members, Rollen said.

Women in the workforce

In comparison, in the United States 45 million women—53.3 percent of all women—are in the labor force, according to the Labor Dept. Of the nearly 20 million working mothers, some 59 percent have children under 18 and about 50 percent have children of pre-school age. Nearly 10 million women maintain families with no spouse present, and of them, about 72 percent participate in the labor force. About one-third of the 13.4 million members of AFL-CIO unions are women.

Soren Kindlund, director of the Swedish Ministry of Social Affairs, told the participants that Sweden's child care law provides for day nurseries and care for the pre-school age children of working parents or full-time students, as well as before- and after-school recreation centers for children ages seven to 12.

The law also includes provisions for pre-school education for the children of parents who do not work outside the home.

Kindlund explained that Sweden's parental insurance program is paid for by government funds and contributions to the plan made by employers, based on a firm's total payroll.

The law provides for 180 days of paid childbirth leave for mothers or fathers of newborn infants as well as an extended care allowance that enables both parents to remain at home to care for a newborn child—either full- or part-time.

Extended aid cut off in high jobless areas

Cutting off extended unemployment insurance benefits to long-term jobless workers in West Virginia and Puerto Rico—jurisdictions with the highest unemployment rates in the country—is "unconscionable," the AFL-CIO declared.

"Denying unemployment insurance benefits to long-term jobless workers is outrageous anywhere and at any time," said Director Bert Seidman of the Dept. of Occupational Safety, Health & Social Security. "But this goes a step farther." West Virginia's jobless rate in March was 16 percent; Puerto Rico's was 21.6 percent.

"This means that in both of these jurisdictions workers who have been unemployed for a very long time will have their benefits cut off even though they have no other source of income."

Only about 3 million of the nation's 8.8 million unemployed workers were drawing jobless benefits in April, according to government statistics.

Lowest in nine years

In announcing the benefits cutoff, the Labor Dept. noted it was the first time in nine years that Puerto Rico's unemployment rate among workers covered by unemployment compensation was low enough to make it ineligible for the extended benefits. Extended benefits had been paid there since Feb. 23, 1975. In West Virginia, payments had been made since Feb. 19, 1984.

"The crazy formula the Reagan Administration has insisted on, based on the so-called 'insured unemployment rate (IUR),' is responsible for the denial of extended benefits in these two highest unemployment jurisdictions," Seidman charged.

Extended benefits in West Virginia and Puerto Rico triggered off when the average statewide insured unemployment rate for the 13-week period ended Apr. 28 was less than 6 percent. Payment halted on May 19.

The IUR is a measurement that is always significantly lower than the overall unemployment rate in the jurisdiction. It is based on the number of people covered by unemployment insurance who are currently claiming regular state benefits.

Workers who are now no longer entitled to extended benefits will still be able to collect up to 14 weeks of additional benefits under the Federal Supplemental Compensation program in West Virginia, and 11 weeks in Puerto Rico.

Reduced coverage

With extended benefits dropped, the maximum duration—regular benefits plus FSC benefits—workers are entitled to has gone from 55 to 42 weeks in West Virginia and from 44 to 31 weeks in Puerto Rico.

Only two states, Idaho and Alaska, now provide extended benefits. The FSC program, however, operates in every state and territory. Even so, only 400,000 jobless workers were drawing FSC benefits in April.

West German trade unionists demonstrate in Bonn in support of a 35-hour workweek.

Germans strike to spur job growth

Bonn—West German metalworkers are on strike for a reduced 35-hour workweek as a remedy for the country's high unemployment.

IG Metall, the largest union in Germany, is seeking a five-hour cut in the standard 40-hour workweek. The union estimates that the shorter workweek would generate one million new jobs to help bring down the nation's extraordinarily high 9.1 percent jobless rate.

As negotiations between the industry and the 2.6-million member union resumed, Volkswagen, the nation's largest car maker, closed all its domestic plants, laying off 95,000 workers. The VW shutdown left Ford Motor Co. in Cologne as the only auto firm in operation, and it swelled the number of workers off the job to about 300,000.

More than 200,000 workers rallied May 28 in Bonn in support of the union's campaign. IG Metall called the demonstration to protest the government's decision denying unemployment pay to non-striking workers idled by the dispute.

Locked-out workers

Employers have locked out thousands of workers—some 65,000 in the Stuttgart area alone—to retaliate for the metalworkers' strike in the region. Thousands more have been laid off.

The strike began May 14, and spread to the major car makers, including Mercedes Benz, Audi, BMW, Porsche, and the General Motors' subsidiary, Opel. The West German Labor Federation said it expected 75,000 workers to take part in a scheduled solidarity demonstration with locked-out workers.

Management has stiffened its posture in the negotiations, saying it would not give way to the 35-hour workweek. Workers in West Germany's printing, banking and insurance industries also are seeking the shorter week.

A statement of support for IG Metall's stand was signed in February by affiliates of the International Metalworkers' Federation, the trade secretariat of which IG Metall is a member. U.S. signatories included the Steelworkers, Auto Workers and the Machinists.

seen their workforce shrink drastically," he testified.

Textile quota agreements the United States negotiated with exporting nations in the 1970s stabilized the market and allowed companies to make the major investments needed to modernize, Sheinkman noted. The experience is applicable to the auto industry, he suggested.

● Electronics Workers President William H. Bywater pointed to the ripple effect of the auto industry's production levels—on payrolls spent in communities and on taxes paid to government.

"When a U.S.-built small car is sold in this country," Bywater testified, "federal, state and local governments collect a total of $1,550 in taxes. But when a small import is sold here, they collect only $250." Last year, he estimated, the loss in U.S. tax revenue came to over $3 billion.

Latin council hits 'meanness' factor

A slur against Hispanic Americans made by a high-ranking Administration official reflects an "attitude of meanness" toward people, particularly the poor, on the part of the Administration, the Labor Council for Latin American Advancement charged.

LCLAA asserted that remarks made in a newspaper interview by Under Sec. of Housing & Urban Development Philip Abrams "are not merely the isolated comments of an insensitive official."

Abrams told a Washington Post reporter that overcrowded housing in the Hispanic community is a "cultural preference" unrelated to poverty, and he suggested that Hispanics "prefer doubling up."

Those remarks "express . . . an attitude betrayed almost weekly by Administration representatives who try to blame the poor for being poor, the homeless for being without shelter, the hungry for being without food," LCLAA said.

"If the poor are to blame for their own poverty, or if the homeless are homeless because they prefer to be homeless, then the Administration's policies that take from the poor to give to the rich are justified.

"So goes the twisted self-serving logic of the White House and its supporters," LCLAA charged.

Administration insults, derogatory remarks, and ethnic slurs are part of a pattern of anti-Hispanic, anti-black, anti-poor, anti-women utterances that marks the Reagan tenure, LCLAA charged. Abrams's comments were in a tape-recorded interview with the Post writer.

"These remarks that slander an entire people go beyond political rhetoric and beyond the boundaries of rational social dialogue," LCLAA said. "We call upon all fair-minded persons in this great democratic nation to support us in our demand for decency and fairness."

Randolph Institute denounces Reagan's anti-worker policies

Hollywood, Fla. — The Reagan Administration has been "a disaster" for all workers — black workers in particular — and the election of a more compassionate President in 1984 must be the number one priority for working people, the A. Philip Randolph Institute national conference was told.

APRI President Norman Hill charged that the Reagan Administration "offers no programs that would serve to retrain black and white workers displaced by the deep recessions which hit steel, auto and manufacturing. It offers no concrete initiatives to deal with the rising rate of black and white poverty. It offers no solutions to the flood of foreign goods which are coming into our country."

"The principal task for blacks—and the principal task for all workers—must be to work for the defeat of Ronald Reagan and for the election of a pro-worker, pro-civil rights and therefore, pro-black administration," Hill asserted in his keynote speech to the more than 750 black trade union participants.

COPE Director John Perkins told the unionists that the idea that Ronald Reagan is an "invincible" candidate for re-election is only "a myth."

Impact on election

"You cannot dump on millions of people—on workers, the needy, on minorities, on women, on the elderly—and strengthen your claim to re-election."

On the candidacy of Rev. Jesse Jackson, Hill stressed that there is "no fundamental rift" between trade unionists black or white supporting either Jackson or Walter Mondale for the Democratic presidential nomination.

"Pro-Mondale blacks and pro-Jackson blacks have found themselves temporarily on different sides of the political fence. Yet their differences are far smaller than the principles and interests which unite them," Hill said.

He urged the APRI leaders to increase the efforts in their unions to motivate black members to vote on Election Day.

"Only if we vote in numbers greater than ever before will we get rid of Reaganism and replace it with a humane, pro-worker Administration," Hill declared.

Much of the conference included a series of workshops on voter registration and get-out-the-vote programs, methods for building coalitions with other community organizations, dealing with the news media and the history of black trade unionism, including the pivotal role played by A. Philip Randolph, first president of the Sleeping Car Porters and a leading civil rights leader.

Report on apartheid

Conference participants also heard reports on the South African black trade union movement and the horrors of the apartheid segregation system in that country from Donsi Khumalo of the Pretoria-based General Workers' Union and Longway Kwelimthini, president of the Council of Unions of South Africa.

The institute presented its achievement award to AFL-CIO Vice President Frederick O'Neal, president of the Actors & Artistes, in honor of his "outstanding contributions to the causes of civil rights and trade union freedoms."

Black choreographer Alvin Ailey received the 1984 A. Philip Randolph Freedom Award for his "use of art to raise important social and political issues."

A special recognition award was presented to Mrs. Rosina Tucker, the 102-year-old former national secretary-treasurer of the Sleeping Car Porters Ladies' Auxiliary.

Other speakers at the conference included APRI Chairman Bayard Rustin, Postal Workers President Moe Biller, AFL-CIO Civil Rights Director William E. Pollard, Laborers' Vice President Robert Powell, Florida AFL-CIO President Daniel J. Miller, Teachers Human Rights Director Barbara Van Black and Velma Hill, executive director of AFL-CIO United Black Labor for '84.

Memphis, Tenn.—The 39th Union-Industries Show featured more than 300 colorful exhibits prepared by AFL-CIO unions and organized employers, each stressing the key role played by unions in business and industry.

The free exposition, produced annually in a major city by the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept., drew visitors from a three-state area for its run May 11-16.

Many exhibits presented live craft and skill demonstrations by union members working at their jobs, and each display underscored the ways union members contribute to producing quality goods and services.

A popular highlight of the show was the array of free gifts and samples given away to every visitor as well as the many drawings for valuable prizes — among them groceries, free air travel, boats, lawnmowers, kitchen appliances, tools, watches, tires, clothing, toys and more.

For many show visitors, the demonstrations provided an opportunity rarely available anywhere else to see workers in action on the job, and to learn how many products are made. A number of union booths included apprenticeship, training and employment information.

Caught Red-Handed

NOT SO LONG ago, a frequent tactic of employers trying to defeat union organizing drives was to stir up racial suspicions in an effort to divide workers by setting blacks against whites. Indeed, as many a union organizer can verify, such tactics have not disappeared. They've just become less blatant.

Now we see the Reagan Administration caught red-handed in a variation of that ugly game, and for a self-confessed political reason.

The memorandum outlining this sleazy strategy comes from the top levels of the Office of Personnel Management, the agency that is supposed to run the federal civil service on merit principles.

Is "sleazy" too strong a word? Hardly. How else to describe the blueprint prepared for OPM Director Donald Devine?

The bluntly stated goal is to make a study of pay inequities in the federal government based on sex serve the Administration's divide-and-conquer strategy.

"The political possibilities of this situation should not be underestimated," the OPM memo advises. "We could create disorder" among Democrats, "pitting union against union" and isolating what it terms "radical feminist groups." The radical feminists, presumably, are people who don't think paychecks should be based on sex.

Unfortunately, it is hard to avoid the conclusion that OPM differs from some of the other Reagan Administration agencies taken over by hard-line ideologues only in that such outrageous concepts were put on paper.

The Silver Lining

ONE REASON for the severity of the Reagan Recession was the Administration's calculated decision to choose unemployment as a means of holding down inflation.

Toward that end, millions of Americans were thrown out of work, businesses and stores went bankrupt, and paychecks shrunk.

Now we are told that the record trade deficit the United States is experiencing has a silver lining.

If it were not for the rise in imports, a high-level government economist explains, there would have been a lot more upward pressure on prices. "What we got was more imports and less inflation."

What will happen when nothing is produced in the United States because everything is being imported?

Why then, presumably, so many people will be out of work that prices will stay low.

Of course, without a paycheck, a lot of people won't be able to buy the things they need at any price. Or is that too simple a concept for the Administration's economists to understand?

The Hard Lessons

THIS ADMINISTRATION has created an atmosphere of anti-unionism that has encouraged every regressive instinct of the employer class.

With a friend in the White House and a surplus labor market, employers have been emboldened to force cutbacks in workers' wages and benefits, to exploit bankruptcy laws to unilaterally tear up labor contracts, to threaten workers with plant closings, and to pervert the purposes of the NLRB.

We have learned some hard lessons over the last three years. We have learned that everything we have gained through a century of struggle can be stripped away by raw political power in the hands of the forces arrayed against working people.

We have learned that we cannot afford to be onlookers when the hard political decisions are being made. We have an obligation to ensure the maximum participation of working people in every stage of the electoral process.

Cut-rate youth minimum won't relieve jobs crisis

By Press Associates, Inc.

Until its recent resurrection by President Reagan and his Labor Secretary, the youth subminimum wage issue seemed destined for the scrap heap of bad economic ideas.

As reincarnated, the two-tier wage floor would be limited to five months of the year, May 1 to Sept. 30, at least for now. Employers could legally pay workers under 20 an hourly wage of $2.50, about 25 percent below the $3.35 minimum wage.

In a recent Saturday radio message, Reagan touted that his "youth employment opportunity wage," as he calls it, "can create more than 400,000 new summer jobs for youth." He gave no basis for that lofty figure, but then his radio talks are now paid political broadcasts.

Reagan correctly identified that overall youth unemployment exceeded 19 percent in April with the jobless rate among black teenagers at nearly 45 percent. But he failed to add that black teenage unemployment has risen about 20 percent since he took office, in part because of his attack on job programs like CETA.

Youth subminimum wage proposals go back to President Nixon, whose campaigns received generous contributions from the founder of the McDonald's fast food chain. Since then, the proposal has worn the tag of the "McDonald's bill."

Acknowledged bad idea

But Nixon and his Labor Secretary, George Shultz, dropped the idea after a study concluded that minimum wage levels have almost no impact on job loss or creation. As the study noted, employers don't create jobs because they cost 85 cents less an hour. They create jobs when demand for their product or service requires it.

Yet this fact didn't prevent Reagan, in sending his youth wage proposal to Congress, from claiming that "studies over the past decade have repeatedly demonstrated that the minimum wage has reduced job opportunities for large numbers of our youth, especially minority youth." Again, no documentation was offered.

Critics of a lower youth wage have charged that it will serve as an opening wedge to push down wage levels generally and weaken federal wage-hour protections.

Reagan, expressing his disdain for the minimum wage, once said that it "should be repealed; it has caused more misery and unemployment than anything since the Great Depression."

Earlier attempt

When Senate Labor Committee Chairman Orrin Hatch (R-Utah) held hearings in early 1981 on his proposed year-round youth subminimum wage, business officials were conspicuously absent.

Even Labor Sec. Raymond Donovan declined to endorse Hatch's youth wage bill in 1981. Donovan said he wanted to "carefully review" a forthcoming report by the Minimum Wage Study Commission. The commission's report concluded that a lower wage for teenagers conflicts with the purpose of the Fair Labor Standards Act and contradicts the principle of equal pay for equal work. But at a recent news conference, it was Donovan who kicked off the Administration's campaign for a youth subminimum wage.

While it wouldn't create any new jobs, the lower youth wage likely would result in the displacement of low-paid adult workers, most of them women and minorities. Despite the Reagan bill's legal prohibition against replacing workers by youths at the subminimum wage, enforcement would be very difficult.

The Administration's new-found enthusiasm for a youth subminimum wage appears to have much to do with election-year politics.

The kind of program that is needed is represented by the Hawkins-Kennedy Youth Incentive Employment bill. That bill would provide $2 billion to create 1 million jobs for teenagers at or above the minimum wage.

MEMO FROM COPE

MORE STILL on how genteel Mondale-Hart exchanges are when compared to the "good old days" when candidates would stop at nothing to smear an opponent. Rutherford B. Hayes was falsely accused of shooting his mother. Grover Cleveland's wife had to issue a formal statement denying opponents' charges that he beat her. A Connecticut paper wrote of Thomas Jefferson, with his election "murder, robbery, rape, adultery and incest will be openly taught and practiced." Now, that's invective.

SPECIAL TREATMENT for big GOP contributors—those who kick in $10,000 or more to party. Staff at GOP National Committee stands ready to smooth way for them if they need access to federal agencies or to members of Congress. Not that Democrats have been above such things; it's just that GOP makes more of a point of it, has substantially more big-money donors. That's one reason in 1981-82 election cycle GOP National Committee and House and Senate campaign committees raked in $180.4 million compared to only $28.5 million for Democratic counterparts. That's more than 6-1, a margin they're expected to maintain this year.

Numbers

The Census Bureau estimates 173,936,000 Americans are eligible to vote this year, up nearly 10 million from 1980, most of that in the 25-44 age group, which constitutes 41.5 percent of all eligibles.

Women outnumber men in the voting-age population by 8 mililon, in percentage terms 52.3 to 47.7.

Blacks will comprise 11 percent of the electorate at 19 million, with 9 million Hispanics, 2.5 million Asians, and 865,000 American Indians eligible.

By region, the South has the most voting-age citizens at 59.1 million, followed by North Central states, 43 million; the Northeast, 37.5 million; the West, 34.3 million.

Haleem Saddic Votes

Voting doesn't mean much of anything to you?

You figure, "Why bother?"

That's not how Haleem Saddic of Philadelphia feels.

He was in California visiting a daughter. He cut the visit short to fly home and vote in the recent Pennsylvania Democratic presidential primary. He declines to use absentee ballots and insists on going to the polls in person.

Another daughter with whom he lives in Philadelphia explains it this way: "He feels it's his duty to vote. He feels people aren't exercising their duty when they don't vote. They criticize government after the election, but they don't vote."

But Haleem Saddic votes.

He's 103 years old, and his vote in the Pennsylvania primary, election board records show, marked the 69th consecutive year he's participated in an election since he became a citizen in 1915.

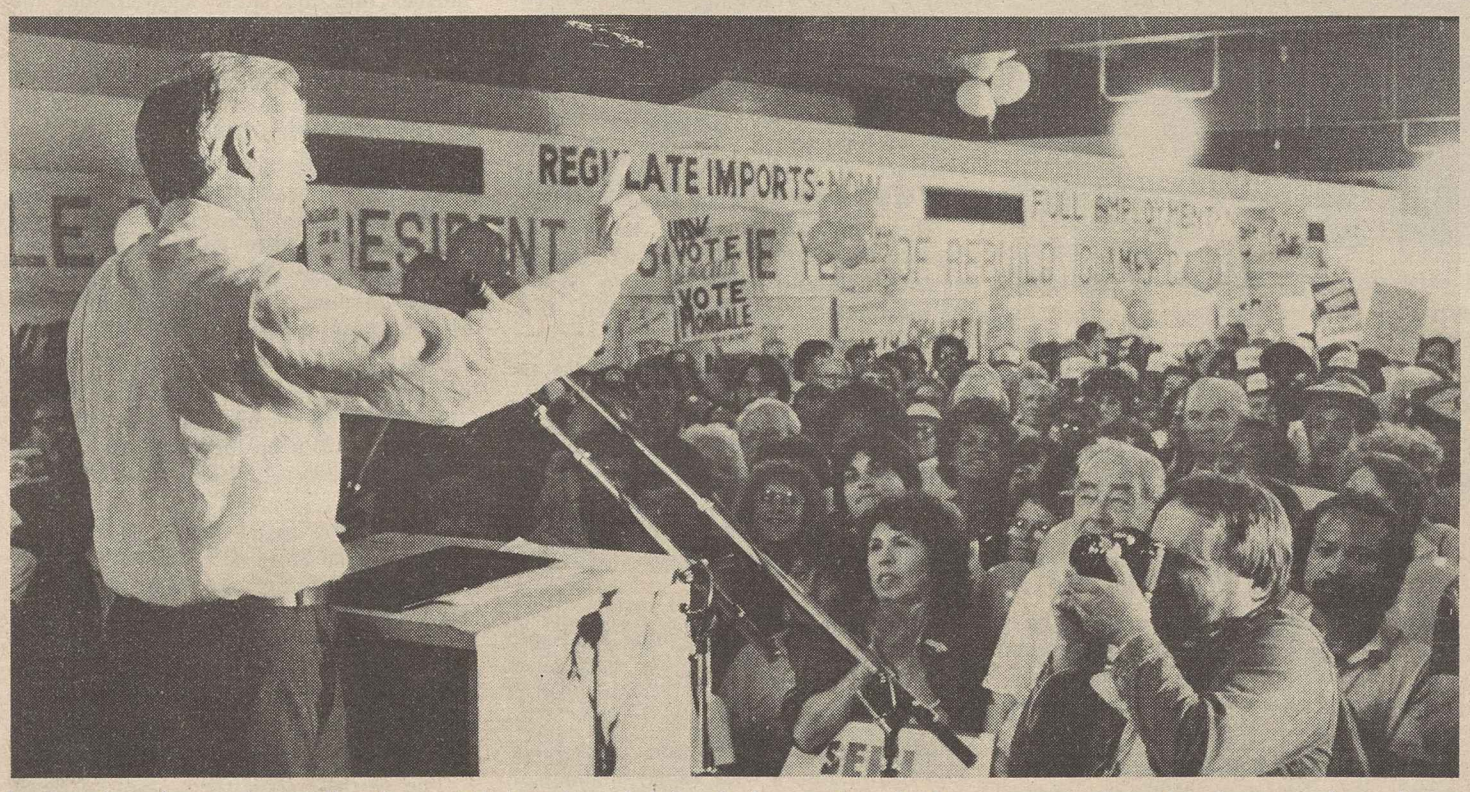
Mondale bids for election unity



In Los Angeles, union rally cheers Walter Mondale's pledge to "undo Reaganomics" and adopt trade policies "fair to American workers and business" when he is elected President in November.

Delegate tally assures win at convention

By David L. Perlman

Walter F. Mondale looked to his defeated rivals in the hard-fought battle for the Democratic presidential nomination to join in forging the strong party unity that will be needed to beat Ronald Reagan in November.

Mondale was assured of a first-ballot victory at the Democratic convention next month after the final round of primaries on June 5 brought his delegate count within a handful of the majority required. Declarations of support from previously uncommitted delegates the next day quickly put him over the top.

The victories scored by Mondale June 5 in New Jersey and West Virginia thwarted Sen. Gary Hart's faint hope of closing with a momentum strong enough to stampede the uncommitted delegates. Hart won California, New Mexico and South Dakota that same day, but he ended up too far back from the finish line.

In popular votes cast in primaries and caucuses, as well as in pledged delegates, Mondale was clearly the party's choice.

If Hart had swept the final primaries, campaign sources told reporters, House Democratic Caucus Chairman Gillis Long (La.) was prepared to lead what was supposed to become a bandwagon of new support for Hart. Instead, Long issued a call for party unity behind Mondale's candidacy.

Jackson delegates

Jesse Jackson, whose impressive strength among black voters held down the margin of Mondale's victory, will go into the convention with 367 committed delegates, based on a June 6 count. But Jackson was unable to put together the "rainbow coalition" he hoped would demonstrate a broad spectrum of support.

Hart ended the primary season with 1,212 delegate commitments—a stronger showing than non-aligned political observers could have anticipated last February, when the delegate selection process began with eight declared candidates. At that time, Ohio Sen. John Glenn was considered Mondale's chief competitor.

Mondale topped the 2,000 mark in committed delegates on June 6, with 1,967 needed for nomination. He is certain to pick up additional support from more than

Senate minority stalls bankruptcy law vote

Needed changes in the federal bankruptcy court system are being held up because Senators doing the bidding of the Chamber of Commerce are trying to block a labor-supported amendment, the AFL-CIO charged.

The amendment, cosponsored by Senators Bob Packwood (R-Ore.) and Dennis DeConcini (D-Ariz.), is intended to prevent companies from using bankruptcy proceedings as a pretext to tear up union contracts. It is a modification of a bankruptcy law amendment passed by the House earlier this year.

All indications are that the Packwood-DeConcini amendment will pass the Senate when it gets to a vote. But opponents have been unwilling to let the Senate act.

Denison noted in a letter to Senators that most business groups have indicated their willingness to have the labor-backed amendment included in the bankruptcy court bill. But the Chamber of Commerce has insisted in Senate testimony that "if the labor provisions are not deleted, the entire package should be defeated."

The legislation is needed, Denison said, and the Senate shouldn't allow the bankruptcy system to be held hostage because of "the stubbornness of a few."

The House, meanwhile, veered erratically in a series of votes on issues of concern to the AFL-CIO.

On the plus side was passage of a housing bill that included new public housing construction the Administration opposed.

Endowment funds deleted

On the minus side was defeat of funding for the Endowment for Democracy program inaugurated last year to help fund private sector programs to encourage democratic institutions abroad—including programs operated by the AFL-CIO, the Chamber of Commerce, and both the Democratic and Republican Parties.

The combination of no-strings government funding with private efforts to promote democracy has had support and opposition that crosses party lines. An amendment by Rep. Richard L. Ottinger (D-N.Y.) to delete the funding carried by a 226-173 margin.

If the Senate retains funding for the en-

Shoe unions hit panel's refusal of import relief

Leaders of two unions representing shoe workers branded as "outrageous" a decision by the International Trade Commission that the import-battered American footwear industry has "adjusted" to the flood of foreign-made shoes and deserves no new relief from cutthroat foreign competition.

Food & Commercial Workers President William H. Wynn, Clothing & Textile Workers President Murray H. Finley and Sec.-Treas. Jacob Sheinkman, in a joint statement, called the ITC's June 6 ruling "simply an anti-worker decision."

The five-member commission voted unanimously to reject a plea from the unions and domestic shoe manufacturers for emergency relief from rapidly increasing shoe imports.

The commission acknowledged that shoe imports have now taken over 69 percent of the domestic market and are still marching on, but it said that since employers had been "generally" profitable, they would recommend no further relief measures.

Copper strikers fight evictions

Morenci, Ariz. — Phelps Dodge Corp., the copper firm that forced more than 2,000 workers out on strike last July, now wants to evict them from their homes.

The company is seeking court approval to force families of strikers it claims to have "permanently replaced" to leave rented homes in the company towns that adjoin the copper facilities.

Attorneys for the Steelworkers and other unions in the bargaining coalition have countered with court action seeking to bar evictions.

As the strike passed its 11th month, the company widened the gap at the bargaining table by toughening its position.

Initially, it had brought on the strike by refusing to settle with the 13 cooperating unions representing Phelps Dodge workers on the same terms agreed to by other major companies. Because of a generally depressed industry outlook, the unions had agreed to pass up any general wage increase in a three-year contract, but a cost-of-living clause would remain in effect.

Sought concessions

Phelps Dodge, however, insisted on a rollback in pay scales and benefits, plus elimination of the COLA provision. It reopened with supervisors and imported strikebreakers, but the company's pre-strike profit turned into heavy losses.

Now, Phelps Dodge management declared, it can't afford the "offer" it had made to the unions before the strike and was pulling it back from the bargaining table. It promised to submit a new—presumably worse—contract proposal for the unions to consider.

Earlier this year, after the House Subcommittee on Labor-Management Relations undertook a study into the circumstances of the strike, Subcommittee Chairman William Clay (D-Mo.) said Phelps Dodge had put forth contract proposals that it knew the unions couldn't accept, and its "insistence upon those terms" made a strike inevitable.

Unions representing strikers at four Phelps Dodge facilities in Arizona and one in Texas include the Steelworkers, Boilermakers, Carpenters, Chemical Workers, Machinists, Operating Engineers, Painters, Plumbers & Pipefitters, Railway Carmen, United Transportation Union, the Morenci-Clifton Metal Trades Council and the unaffiliated Teamsters.

Newly installed Steelworkers President Lynn Williams and Sec. Edgar Ball, right, at the USWA legislative conference in Washington.

Williams, Ball assume office at Steelworkers conference

The Steelworkers installed a new leadership team at the union's legislative conference in Washington with the inauguration of USWA President Lynn R. Williams and Sec. Edgar L. Ball.

Williams was certified by the union's board of tellers as the winner of a special Mar. 29 election over Treas. Frank McKee. Williams, secretary of the union for the last seven years, had been serving as acting president since the death of Lloyd McBride last November.

The final step of the election process came with adoption of the tellers' report by the union's executive board.

The 29-member board then elected Ball to fill the post of secretary vacated by Williams. Ball, 57, had been director of USWA District 37 based in Houston since 1977 and had served as a vice president of the Texas AFL-CIO.

International Rep. Jack R. Golden was appointed director of District 37. Golden has been on the USWA staff since 1965 and previously was an organizer for the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.

Because McBride's death occurred several weeks short of the second anniversary of his election to a four-year term, constitutional provisions required a special referendum to elect a successor.

Both Williams and McKee were nominated for the post. Williams topped McKee by a vote of 192,767 to 136,264, according to the tellers' report.

The five tellers examined some 20 challenges to the election, and reconfirmed the results in the final report acted on by the board.

Williams, 59, is a native of Springfield, Ontario. He joined the union in 1947, and later was an organizer for the Canadian Labor Congress, a staff representative for the Steelworkers and director of the union's Canadian region.

He was elected USWA secretary in 1977 and was re-elected in 1981.

USWA votes loan

Dioxin victims' suits aided by union funds

The Steelworkers executive board voted to lend up to $1 million to finance lawsuits by 149 USWA members against the Monsanto Co. involving worker exposure to dioxin, a highly toxic chemical.

USWA President Lynn Williams said the move would send a message to companies that the union will be "tough and determined to fight the whole question of exposure to toxic substances."

He said it underscores "our willingness to fight any corporation that shows evidence of willfully violating job safety and health laws."

The loan will be made to attorneys representing USWA members who worked at the Monsanto plant in Nitro, W.Va., where dioxin was manufactured from 1948 to 1969.

The USWA said it was extending the loan—the first ever action of this type by the union—to assure that the lawyers, who have already invested $2.5 million worth of time and services in the multi-million dollar legal battle, could continue the fight. St. Louis attorney Paul Pratt is leading the effort for the workers.

Trial set

Each of the workers is suing Monsanto individually, and trial of the first seven cases begins June 18 in federal district court in Charleston, W.Va.

Dioxin is a highly toxic substance known to cause a wide range of illnesses, including skin disorders, liver abnormalties, birth defects and cancer.

It has been used as an herbicide, and during the Vietnam war was used in a jungle defoliant known as "Agent Orange."

The Monsanto workers, members of USWA Local 12369, were exposed to the substance in 1952 following a major explosion in the Nitro, W.Va., plant, according to USWA District 23 Director Paul D. Rusen.

Within a few months, he said, they began to experience allergic reactions including skin rashes and acne.

The disorders continued to plague the workers, and the company called in researchers from the University of Cincinnati to study the reactions to the chemical exposure and make recommendations.

Rusen said the company told the employees that the study showed that the only after-effects they would experience were the skin problems, but the results of the study were never made public.

Ongoing problems

But when the health problems continued over a period of years, the union's safety and health department—which was growing increasingly concerned over exposure to toxic substances in the workplace—obtained a copy of the University of Cincinnati report.

Although many of the results outlined in the report were inconclusive, Rusen said, the union became convinced that the company had been negligent in dealing with the workers' exposure to the substance.

The USWA asked Dr. Irving Selikoff of Mt. Sinai Hospital in New York to investigate. Selikoff, an expert on workplace health issues, found that problems cited in the original report had continued to affect the workers and their family members. A number of them have experienced high rates of cancer, miscarriages and children born with birth defects.

The workers took their cases to court in 1982, and the trial of the first group of cases—likely to set the precedent for all the others—is expected to take several months.

Agent Orange settlement

Earlier this year, seven chemical companies including Monsanto, settled out of court a class action suit by some 15,000 Vietnam veterans who were exposed to dioxin in Agent Orange.

Dioxin also forced the evacuation of Times Beach, Mo., in 1983 after the entire community was found to be contaminated with the chemical.

Jobless rate dips after 3 months of no change

By James M. Shevis

The nation's unemployment rate dropped to 7.5 percent—the level it had reached when President Reagan took office—after three months of no improvement.

The decline of three-tenths of 1 percent reflected a rise in employment over the month, but the number of jobless was above 8.5 million by official count and substantially higher if "discouraged" jobseekers were counted.

"When the President took office, he said he had policies and programs to improve the jobless situation in America," AFL-CIO Research Director Rudy Oswald observed. "He's had nearly four years in office, and the jobless rate is still where it was when he was inaugurated—at a very high historical level."

Employment during May, as measured by the Labor Dept.'s survey of households, jumped by a seasonally adjusted 883,000. But many analysts questioned the accuracy of the figure, noting that a separate survey of employer payrolls showed employment up only 232,000 during the month.

Even Commissioner Janet L. Norwood of the department's Bureau of Labor Statistics was skeptical of the figures.

Changes 'overstated'

"Seasonal adjustment of employment—as well as unemployment—is especially difficult at this time of year," she told the congressional Joint Economic Committee. "The changes reported in the household survey may be somewhat overstated."

While differences in the scope of the two surveys may explain some of the variations, she suggested that factors such as the influx of young people into the job market in summer and the increase in outdoor employment may not have been fully accounted for.

The May figures showed gains throughout the economy, except for manufacturing, with reduced jobless rates for all major categories of workers: adult men, adult women, teenagers, whites, blacks, and Hispanic workers.

For the first time, more than half of all adult women in the United States held jobs in May. BLS said that 50.5 percent of all women 20 years or older held jobs last month, up from 49.9 percent in April. The ratio for men was 4.8 percent.

The trend of increasing participation in the workforce by women has been going on for some time as creeping inflation has forced them to take jobs to make ends meet.

The May decline in unemployment was accompanied by a big growth in the labor force. The total civilian workforce increased by 558,000 to 113.8 million. Civilian employment, measured by the household survey, was 105.3 million in May, up from 104.4 million the previous month.

'True' unemployment

By BLS's count, the number of unemployed Americans last month was 8.51 million, but if the 1.3 million so-called discouraged workers — those who have given up looking for work because they think there are no jobs for them—and the 5.4 million on part-time work who can't find full-time work are factored in, "true" unemployment was 11 percent, with 12.6 million out of work, the AFL-CIO's Dept. of Economic Research estimated.

On the employment side, BLS said that adult women accounted for two-thirds of the 883,000 rise in jobs in May, while adult men accounted for the other one-third. The jobless rate for men fell four-tenths of 1 percent to 6.5 percent. For women, the rate declined two-tenths of 1 percent to 6.8 percent.

Teenagers' jobless rate dropped four-tenths of 1 percent to 19 percent. The rate for blacks fell a full percentage point, to 15.8 percent, while the rate for whites dropped three-tenths of 1 percent to 6.4 percent. Hispanics saw their rate decline a full percent to 10.5 percent.

The average number of hours worked by nonfarm employees in the private sector fell two-tenths of 1 percent to 35.3 hours and overtime in manufacturing dropped from 3.7 to 3.4 hours a week.

BLS's survey of employers showed employment rose by 230,000 to a seasonally adjusted 93.7 million in May, mostly in services and construction.

Bankruptcy, immigration bills await action

dowment in its version of the State Dept. appropriations bill, the issue will be resolved in a House-Senate conference.

The housing bill, passed by a 282-110 vote, expands an experimental voucher system the Administration supports but not at the levels proposed in the President's budget.

Under the voucher system, low-income families would in effect be given a sum of money based on their income and average costs for rental housing in their communities. If they found a cheaper unit, their out-of-pocket costs would be less. But if their apartment rented for a higher price, they would have to pay the added amount.

The Administration wanted this program to replace the older subsidy program under which the government pays a portion of the rent in eligible housing, based on income.

Neither of the programs directly increases the supply of low-cost housing.

10,000 new units

In changing the Administration's priorities, and adding some $3.8 billion to the budget request, the House voted funds to construct 10,000 new public housing units. It also provided more direct subsidies and fewer vouchers than the Administration asked.

Ahead on the House calendar is an immigration reform bill that the AFL-CIO has urged be improved with amendments.

In a letter to House members, the AFL-CIO reiterated its support for sanctions to deter employers from hiring persons not authorized to work in the United States, and a forgery-proof work-related identification system. The letter stressed the federation's support also for "the most generous, practical legalization program for those undocumented persons who have become settled, contributing members of their communities."

The federation is supporting amendments by Rep. Augustus F. Hawkins (D-Calif.) to toughen safeguards against discrimination in employment and an amendment by Rep. George Miller (D-Calif.) to put stronger restrictions on the import of temporary farm workers.

Labor presses Congress to mend tax bills

The AFL-CIO has urged a House-Senate conference committee to reconcile differences between tax bills passed by the two chambers in a way that will combine the goals of increased revenues and a fair tax structure.

Some revenue-losers that Legislative Director Ray Denison said should be dropped from the final version of the tax bill are:

- Senate-passed provisions giving special tax breaks and regulatory exemptions to firms locating in so-called urban enterprise zones. No new jobs would be created, but billions of dollars of tax revenue would be lost, Denison wrote conferees.
- A phaseout of the 30 percent withholding tax on interest paid to foreign investors, which would invite non-productive speculative "hot money" investments.
- Extension of the so-called targeted jobs tax credit which has been a source of windfall gains for employers without generating new jobs or significantly helping the target groups.
- A proposed new program of tax preferences for export promotion.
- A decrease in the length of time securities must be held before taking advantage of long-term capital gains tax rates.
- Expansion of the individual retirement accounts program that benefits primarily upper-income households.

More equity urged

Denison also urged adoption of various provisions passed by the House or the Senate, including limitations on certain types of tax-exempt industrial development bonds and clarification of the tax-exempt status of various fringe benefits.

Excise tax increases that fall heaviest on workers should to the maximum extent possible be replaced by more equitable tax law changes, Denison urged.

What Donovan overlooked

Labor Sec. Raymond J. Donovan was greeted by some of his own employees when he arrived at an industrial relations conference to speak on labor-management cooperation. Members of Local 12 of the Government Employees protested that Donovan "has presided over the destruction of any semblance of cooperation" between the Labor Dept. and the union that bargains for its employees. In his address to the conference, Donovan contended that labor and management are experiencing an "increased sense of mutuality in their relationship."

Contempt citations sought for ITU-Teamster mailings

San Francisco—Six Typographical Union members who sued in April to block an ITU-Teamsters merger referendum are back in federal court here seeking a contempt citation against ITU officials on charges of illegally using union funds to promote the merger.

U.S. District Court Judge Thelton E. Henderson scheduled a hearing for June 18 on the motion for contempt. It was his May 1 ruling that stayed the merger referendum until the executive board officers have been determined by a re-run election.

The Labor Dept. will monitor the election, and will mail out ballots to ITU members on June 22. The results are to be announced by July 31.

Judge Henderson's earlier ruling forbids ITU officers from spending union funds or using the services of the ITU staff to promote merger with any organization.

The subsequent publication of the union's own journal and a special mailing of a letter from Teamsters President Jackie Presser—along with the May issue of International Teamster—to all key officials of the ITU were the central issues in the request for a contempt of court citation. The Teamsters journal included articles urging a merger.

Publication misuse

Court documents, filed by the six ITU members, charged that by allowing the mailings, the ITU board attempted to "convey to all union members the unmistakable message that each of the officers continues to support merger with the Teamsters" through articles that were prepared for publication. The May issue of the Typographical Journal contained nearly blank pages where the officers' reports appear each month.

The petitioners also charged that the mailing of Teamster materials "accomplished through access to the ITU mailing list and through the efforts of ITU employees at ITU facilities" violates the spirit of the court order.

Robert McMichen, a candidate for president and winner of last November's union election, asserted that the Labor Dept. is permitting the Teamsters to interfere with the new election by allowing the mailing of the Teamster materials.

NLRB certifies Paperworkers after long delay

Fayetteville, N.C.—The National Labor Relations Board, after a four-year delay, upheld a representation election victory for the Paperworkers and certified the union as bargaining agent for more than 800 Purolator Products employees.

In March 1980, workers at the plant voted for UPIU representation. But because of ballot challenges and filings of unfair labor practice charges, the NLRB did not issue a certification.

The NLRB ruled, after deciding to disregard 68 votes cast by ineligible "manufacturing supervisory assistants," that the union had won the election.

The unfair labor practice charges were based on the firing of one worker and the three-day suspension and job transfer of another for union activity.

In its decision, the NLRB ordered the firm to reinstate the fired employee and give both workers back pay expected to total more than $50,000. The Purolator plant manufactures automotive filters.

UPIU President Wayne E. Glenn commended the workers for their endurance and hard-earned victory, and observed:

"Fighting for rights that should be guaranteed to all workers has been a part of organized labor from the beginning. Purolator was trying to deny certain rights to the 800 employees at its plant here.

"It is heartening to know their rights have been upheld and that we can now provide the representation the workers asked for four years ago."

Denver boycott coalition set to cut off Coors beer sales

Denver—Black, Hispanic and student organizations are stepping up labor's boycott of Coors beer through a coalition coordinated by the Denver chapter of the A. Philip Randolph Institute.

Coors beer sales have dropped sharply in several western states as a result of the seven-year-old boycott. The Adolf Coors Co. is headquartered in Denver's backyard of Golden, Colo.

The alliance was sparked by racist remarks that the beer company's chairman, William Coors, uttered earlier this year. Coors questioned the "intellectual capacity" of blacks and suggested they had been done a favor by slave traders who brought their ancestors to America "in chains."

Black support

At a forum called to launch the coalition, APRI President Norman Hill stressed that the organization of black trade unionists has been a strong supporter of the Coors boycott since it began in 1977, and he urged black community leaders to intensify efforts in the action against "one of the worst anti-union, anti-worker companies" in the nation.

Lonnie R. Haynes of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers headquarters staff called for an expansion of the labor-led boycott "to all black communities around the country where Coors beer is sold." Haynes is project coordinator for the Denver APRI chapter.

Sharon Stewart, representing the community-based Northeast Denver Coors Boycott Committee, said the coalition will also publicize the connection between the Coors family and a number of ultra right-wing political groups.

Tammy Williams, head of a black college students association, reported that Coors's remarks were spurring support of the boycott on area college campuses.

Representatives of the Labor Council for Latin American Advancement and Frontlash, the labor-backed youth organization, also outlined a boycott agenda for the Hispanic community and youths.

AFL-CIO Field Rep. David Sickler, national coordinator of the boycott, told the participants that Coors sales have slumped in every state where the beer was being sold when the boycott began.

Sickler said that in 1979 Coors brewed about 14 million barrels of beer sold in only 13 western states—and it was the number one seller in nearly all those markets. Today, he pointed out, Coors is making about 13.7 million barrels but it is trying to sell it in 28 states, and the beer is no longer the top seller in virtually all of its original market.

In a separate development, the NAACP renewed its national boycott of Coors. The civil rights organization had been attempting to urge the company to provide funds for improvement programs in black communities and to do more business with black distributors.

The AFL-CIO launched the Coors boycott in July 1977, after the company provoked a strike by union members and then called in strikebreakers.

Federation ends boycott against Tyson Foods

At the request of the Food & Commercial Workers, the AFL-CIO has removed Tyson Foods Co. from its boycott list.

UFCW President William H. Wynn said the union was ending the boycott as part of a settlement of outstanding issues with the company which markets poultry products. The company's brand names include Tyson, Tyson Rock, Greenwich Rock and Patty Jean Rock.

The UFCW initiated the boycott in January 1983.

Unions assail trade decision on effects of shoe imports

As the unions see it, the ITC has concluded that the industry has "adjusted" to the siege of imports, but all workers get is "to adjust to unemployment."

To stay profitable, "the industry can turn to imports, but what can the workers turn to for their livelihoods?" the union officers said.

The ruling, they said, has left them with a sense that "if you are a big, rich industry you can get import relief; if you are small and poor, you are expendable. And more than this, the whole credibility of the import relief process has been destroyed."

Wynn, Finley and Sheinkman stressed that the outcome of the decision "leaves us with no other option but to seek a complete change in the process. We will continue to fight for our shoe workers."

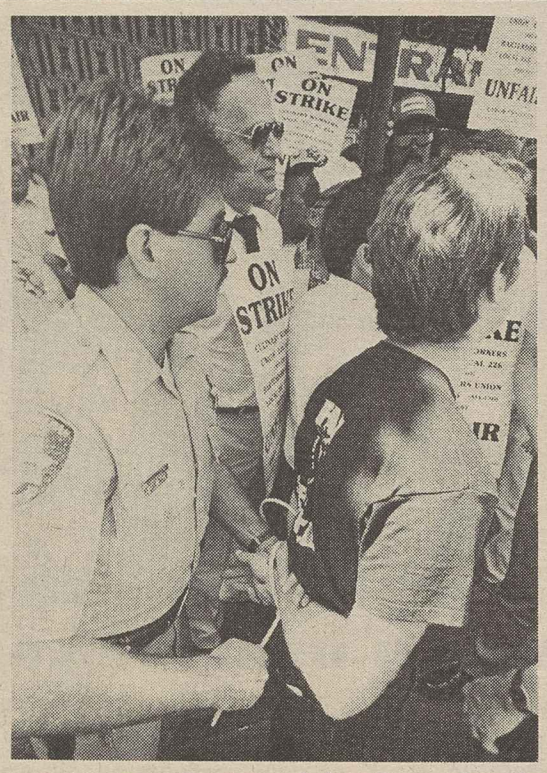
George Langstaff, president of the Footwear Industries of America, said he was "appalled" by the ITC ruling in the face of clear evidence that the domestic market over the years has been captured "by an avalanche of low-wage foreign shoes."

Langstaff said the employer-union coalition is not giving up on attempts to win relief and will meet to consider alternative action. He pointed out that the FIA will also press for adoption of federal legislation to impose quotas on non-rubber footwear imports.

Earlier this year, the shoe unions were joined in their effort to get the ITC to recommend relief by AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland who warned then that the commission's decision "could mean life or death to an entire industry."

Previous ITC decisions have documented the erosion of jobs in the U.S. shoe industry and recommended that President Reagan impose quotas and marketing agreements to limit imports. Action to save the industry was pursued by the Carter Administration, but in 1981, although imports held 51 percent of the domestic market, the Reagan Administration rejected recommendations for continued import curbs.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland walks line with strikers at the Four Queens casino.



Despite peaceful nature of picketing, local police arrest a striker.

New settlements isolate holdout hotels in Vegas

Las Vegas, Nev.—The marathon strike of hotel workers edged closer to the finish line as agreements were reached between three of the four striking union locals and four more major hotel-casinos. But the walkout continues at several other properties, and the unions are stressing that "the strike is not over."

Picket lines came down at the MGM Grand, Desert Inn, Sands, Tropicana and Frontier hotels on the Strip after Musicians Local 369 reached tentative agreements with the resorts. Two Hotel Employees & Restaurant Employees unions, Culinary Local 325 and Bartenders Local 165, had reached settlements with the hotels, two weeks ago, but in a continuing pledge of solidarity that includes Stage Employees Local 720, the unions agreed to keep picket lines up until all unions have settled. The Musicians and IATSE have not reached terms with the Sands.

In the case of the most recent settlements with the other three unions, however, the Stage Employees agreed to drop their lines for two days as "an act of good faith" toward the employers in hopes of quickly getting a new pact. The unions agreed, as well, that if Local 720 does not settle, the lines will go back up, but HERE members will continue to go to work. The Musicians—who work in the hotel night clubs with the Stage Employees—said they will not cross if picket lines go back up.

Solidarity on the line

While the most recent settlements were being hammered out, hotel workers continued to rally around brothers and sisters still on strike in the action that brought some 17,000 hotel workers off their jobs Apr. 2.

At a mass rally last week, 6,000 hotel workers cheered AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland when he pledged the continued financial and moral support of the AFL-CIO to the unions and told the workers that the strike is "not just your struggle but the struggle of the entire labor movement."

The same day, Kirkland joined some 100 marchers on the picket line outside the Four Queens Hotel and that evening participated in a special "Harmony Night" show for strikers at the Aladdin Hotel that was headlined by singer Wayne Newton who donated his services. HERE said Newton had also been a strong supporter of the unions during a 1976 walkout that lasted for two weeks.

On the picket line, when four marchers were arrested, Kirkland admonished police for their harsh treatment of the strikers. He denounced the violations of constitutional rights suffered by peaceful pickets throughout the strike. Three of those detained were HERE international representatives.

The unions reported that nearly 1,000 strikers—as well as about 20 bystanders, including tourists and reporters—have been arrested over the nearly 70-day course of the strike.

In an address to strikers, Kirkland was sharply critical of hotel owners who he said had purposely created an "adversarial relationship" to force the strike.

He scored management for its "economic greed and injustice" throughout the dispute, and charged that the use of "rent-a-cops" as private security forces had given a "violence-prone" cast to the dispute.

Strikers praised

"The workers who steadfastly walked the picket line, undismayed by private armies and public jails, have written a shining new chapter in the labor-management history," Kirkland stressed.

"They were never alone. Beside them, every step of the way, were 14 million members of an aroused national labor movement."

The strike has cost the city more than $300 million, not including substantially reduced gambling revenues to the casinos and lost tax income to the city and state.

About 4,000 workers are back on the job at the hotels where the most recent pacts were reached.

At presstime, talks were scheduled between the Musicians and the Sands. Although the Stage Employees still have not reached agreements with any of the five resorts, the union said it hoped its "good faith" removal of pickets for two days, and its willingness to bargain, will smooth the way for settlements.

Key issues still blocking progress are management demands for cuts in guaranteed work and the use of taped music.

About 3,000 HERE members are still on strike at other major resorts including one Strip hotel, the Marina, and five others in downtown Las Vegas or outlying parts of town. They include two Holiday Inns, Golden Gate, California Club, Four Queens and Sam's Town.

Among the unresolved issues are demands by management to retain scabs hired during the walkout.

Buttons are in

A government agency can't issue a blanket prohibition against the wearing of political buttons at work, a federal court ruled.

The Veterans Administration tried to do so, and VA supervisors ordered workers to take off "AFGE for Mondale" buttons distributed by their unions.

The Government Employees challenged the agency's policy and District Judge Harold H. Greene ruled that the VA had overstepped its powers. He told the agency that its across-the-board ban on political buttons was out. He gave the agency the option of proposing a more limited restriction on political buttons and spelling out the justifications for its proposal. If the AFGE disagrees, it will be free to challenge the revised policy.

Conferees urged to reject Senate cuts in Medicare

The National Council of Senior Citizens has called on a House-Senate conference committee to reject the severe Medicare cutbacks called for in the Senate-passed version of a deficit reduction bill.

Most of the $9 billion in Medicare "savings" to be achieved by fiscal 1987 would come through higher charges to the elderly, NCSC Executive Director William R. Hutton stressed.

Among the changes Hutton said would raise costs are:

- Lifting the present ceiling on premiums now charged the elderly for Part B of Medicare, which covers non-hospital medical insurance. The present $14.60 a month could more than double by 1990 under the Senate formula.
- Raising from $75 to $86 the deductible that patients must pay before receiving any medical payments.

Hutton pointed out that the proposed cuts come on top of the heavy reductions already made in the Medicare program under the Reagan Administration.

Seminar cautions local unions on reporting pitfalls

Baltimore—The Internal Revenue Service and Labor Dept. are stepping up audits and investigations of local union activities, and labor groups can be well-prepared in advance by following a full-time policy of accurate bookkeeping, careful recordkeeping and prompt reporting, participants in a union financial seminar were told.

The one-day session, sponsored by the Baltimore AFL-CIO, drew some 140 representatives of 66 Baltimore area local unions. Speakers from the federal agencies and private accounting firms discussed government reporting requirements, federal laws covering union elections, protection of union assets and methods of accounting.

Baltimore AFL-CIO President Henry Koellein, Jr. stressed that local union officials "have a tremendous responsibility to make sure the union's finances are in order." He warned that "the IRS is cracking down on enforcement and compliance," and unions must "act responsibly" to protect their right to tax-exempt status.

Arthur Bronfein, a certified public accountant, told participants that every union should have an independent, professional audit of its finances annually. He recommended that every local also set up an audit committee as a method for internal control of the safety of the union's assets. The committee, he suggested, can also oversee the filing of all government reporting documents to make sure they are accurate and filed on time.

Keep records

Participants were also urged to keep accurate minutes of all union meetings, maintain copies in their own records of all reporting forms sent to the government, keep careful and separate accounts for dues and voluntary political action contributions, and assign specific responsibility to an official for filing reports with the government.

Dennis Brose, an IRS field auditor, told the conference that the government is now actively assessing penalties against unions that fail to file required IRS documents on time. Local union officers can be held responsible for the penalties, he said.

Cement Workers strike Lehigh, get pact at Lone Star

Chicago—The Cement, Lime, Gypsum & Allied Workers division of the Boilermakers approved a new three-year agreement with Lone Star Industries, the nation's largest cement maker, but was forced to strike another major producer resisting long-established pattern bargaining.

The strike against Lehigh Portland Cement Co. came a week after the union settled with Lone Star on a contract providing wage and benefit improvements for some 1,500 workers at plants across the country. The agreement was ratified by a vote of more than 5 to 1, said Richard Northrip, the union's cement divsion director.

Lone Star employees will receive a wage increase of approximately 2.5 percent in each year of the contract. Pensions were improved, and the employer agreed to additional contributions to the supplemental unemployment benefits plan. The workers agreed to changes in the insurance plan in recognition of higher medical and health care costs, and to relief for the company in the areas of vacations, holidays and productivity.

Northrip noted that union concessions come on the heels of record worker productivity levels last year when labor costs were the lowest in the industry in over 30 years.

He said the strike against Lehigh, now in its fourth week, resulted from company tactics to break a 25-year-old pattern bargaining arrangement in the industry.

"We offered Lehigh the same settlement we negotiated with Lone Star," Northrip said, "but they want more."

Twelve-hundred workers are involved in the Lehigh dispute, with about 12,000 affected by the industry bargaining.

Marathon primaries end

Mondale over the top in delegates' support

200 delegates still uncommitted or elected as supporters of candidates no longer in the race.

In the end, the labor support and the strong backing of other elements of the traditional Democratic Party constituency proved an asset, not the liability that Hart had sought to make it.

Hart generally did best in the states in which persons not registered as Democrats were allowed to take part in the Democratic primary. He sought to show that this made him more "electable" than Mondale, and to picture himself as the candidate of "new ideas" running against a representative of "old" politics who was tied to "special interests" such as organized labor.

But Mondale challenged Hart with a "where's the beef" campaign that stopped the momentum Hart had achieved with his early string of New England victories. And as the campaign moved into the big-population industrial states, the groundswell was clearly with Mondale.

Big union vote

Exit polls by television networks and newspapers repeatedly found high support for Mondale among voters from union households. And get-out-the-vote efforts among union members were spurred by resentment over what AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland termed "labor baiting" by the Hart campaign.

At a rally for Mondale in Los Angeles before the primary, Kirkland said he anticipates that Republicans will likewise try to tie a "special interest" label to labor's support of Mondale. "That's a sure crowd-pleaser in the citadels of the right wing and causes the knees of big business to jerk in unison," Kirkland commented.

Mondale sounded a November campaign theme at the Los Angeles labor rally, accusing Reagan of viewing the country through "Rose Garden-colored glasses" and ignoring high unemployment, soaring trade deficits and huge federal deficits.

Labor's role was clearly a factor in Mondale's one-sided victory in highly organized West Virginia, where polls showed him receiving close to 70 percent of votes from union members. The unaffiliated Mine Workers, as well as the AFL-CIO, had endorsed Mondale.

Mondale preferred

In New Jersey, the New York Times/CBS News Poll showed voters from union households accounted for almost one-third of the primary turnout and chose Mondale by close to a two-to-one margin. Other polls showed Mondale with pluralities over Hart among virtually every group measured, including independents who had been assumed to be part of the Hart constituency.

Post-primary endorsements of Mondale ranged from Atlanta Mayor Andrew Young to Alabama Gov. George Wallace.

It was Mondale, himself, who gave the epilogue to the grueling primary campaign.

Speaking to his home-state supporters in St. Paul, Minn., as the June 5 primary results were being tallied, Mondale recalled that he had predicted three months ago that "this would be a marathon." But, he added, even in a long, hard race, there is always a finish line and a winner. "This is it and here I am."

Democrats pick strong crop of congressional candidates

Voters across the country have been picking candidates for Congress as well as the presidency, and there has been some good news for the Democrats in recent primaries.

In Mississippi, two conservative Republicans in Congress will face strong Democratic opponents.

A House contest in Mississippi's 2nd District is a rematch between Republican Webb Franklin and State Sen. Robert G. Clark, a highly regarded black legislator who is a veteran of the civil rights movement. Clark narrowly lost to Franklin two years ago, but a realignment has given the district a black majority. Franklin's first-term COPE record has been one right, 16 wrong votes.

In the Senate race, incumbent Republican Thad Cochran will face a strong Democratic opponent, former Gov. William Winter. It's one of the six seats the Democrats need to give them control of the Senate.

Texas contest

A Texas runoff for the Democratic senatorial nomination produced a hair-thin victory for a labor-endorsed liberal, State Sen. Lloyd Doggett, subject to a possible recount. He edged out Rep. Kent Hance, a leader in the conservative "boll weevil" bloc in the House. Incumbent Republican Sen. John Tower is retiring and the GOP has nominated Rep. Phil Gramm, the former boll weevil Democrat who switched parties.

In Iowa, Rep. Tom Harkin was unopposed for the Democratic Senate nomination to run against a clearly vulnerable Republican incumbent, Roger Jepsen, whose career COPE record was 89 wrong, nine right. Harkin had 128 right, 42 wrong votes in the House.

West Virginia Gov. John D. Rockefeller IV was the easy winner for the Democratic nomination to succeed retiring Sen. Jennings Randolph. He faces a wealthy businessman, John Raese.

In some other Senate primaries in states with Republican incumbents, Democrats picked George Cunningham, an aide to former Sen. George McGovern, to run against Larry Pressler in South Dakota; in New Mexico, State Sen. Judith Pratt won the nomination and will face Pete V. Domenici in November.

Incumbents of both parties generally had little trouble winning renomination. One House race watched with interest was the renomination bid of Judiciary Committee Chairman Peter W. Rodino, Jr., in a district that is now predominantly black. But Rodino, a strong civil rights ally, won with 77 percent of the vote.

In New Jersey's 4th District, Democrats nominated James C. Hedden, who is state political director for the State, County & Municipal Employees.

ACTWU Local 643 union hall, damaged by tornado, served as regional disaster relief headquarters of the Red Cross in nothern Mississippi..

Union leads relief efforts in tornado-devastated town

Water Valley, Miss. — Clothing & Textile Workers Local 643 earned a vote of appreciation from this small community when the union helped lead emergency aid efforts after the town was devastated by tornadoes and flooding.

On a Saturday afternoon in late April, twin funnel clouds zig-zagged their way through the town of 4,500. In less than five minutes, sections of the community were leveled, seven persons were killed and scores injured. Property damage exceeded $25 million.

Among the active and retired members of Local 643, there were 28 families who lost everything they owned and 27 more whose homes were heavily damaged. Another 450 local members were suddenly out of work when the storm destroyed the Big Yank Manufacturing Co. plant.

Then, as the town set about the task of rebuilding, the community was inundated by flood waters caused by a fierce storm that dumped six inches of rain in two hours. The business district was hit hardest with water levels reaching five feet, and a number of Local 643 members again were victimized by the weather.

Shortly after the tornadoes raked the area, the American Red Cross set up its 12-county disaster headquarters in the Local 643 union hall. Chuck Johnson, coordinator of the Coastline Disaster Project, arranged with the Mississippi ACTWU Joint Board and the local for the Red Cross's use of the building. The union hall itself sustained about $20,000 in damage and is still undergoing repairs.

The Coastline Disaster Project is a unique partnership between the Red Cross and labor in which union halls along the Gulf and Atlantic coasts are used as administrative disaster headquarters in emergencies. Although Local 643 was not part of the project, the union is considering joining.

Through the efforts of the Communications Workers, emergency telephone lines were installed to the local's union hall, and Electrical Workers restored power there on a priority basis. Within 24 hours, the disaster headquarters was in action.

The Red Cross effort will remain in place at Local 643 until July to aid the town's victims.

In many instances, the Local 643 members who escaped both disasters assisted individually in the recovery efforts.

Food distributed

The local and its retirees' club distributed canned goods to the victims and organized two mass feedings for the devastated neighborhoods. The retirees plan another dinner later this month.

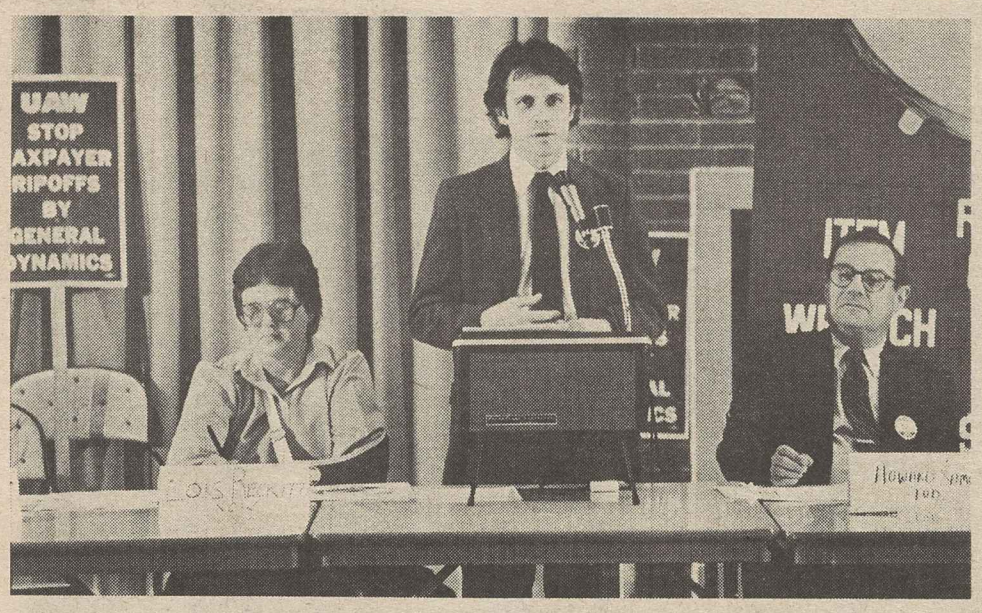
Of prime assistance to the local members was the disaster assistance fund set up by the ACTWU executive board shortly after the tornadoes struck.

The ACTWU board started a fund-raising drive among union's joint boards and locals with an initial $10,000 grant. Since then, another $20,000 has been contributed.

Danny Forsyth, an ACTWU organizer, is a resident of the town and one of four international staffers sent in to aid the local members.

"You see this kind of thing on TV all the time and you don't realize it could happen to you," Forsyth said.

Destruction of Local 643 member Sadie Johnson's home typifies scene in Water Valley after tornadoes hit.



Stockholder dynamics

Anti-worker and anti-taxpayer activities of General Dynamics Corp. are detailed at a "Concerned Shareholders Meeting" in St. Louis attended by some 200 labor, community and religious leaders. At the podium is Bob McIntyre of Citizens for Tax Justice with Lois Reckitt, executive vice president of the National Organization of Women, and President Howard D. Samuel of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.

Canadian Labor Congress sets shorter workweek goal

Montreal—The Canadian Labor Congress went on record at its 15th biennial convention in favor of a shorter workweek with no loss in pay as a way of generating needed jobs.

Similar to efforts in West Germany and Britain, the reduced workweek is the linchpin of a "Jobs and Justice" action plan adopted by the CLC as a response to Canada's "phantom" economic recovery.

The 2,350 delegates reaffirmed support for Canada's social democratic New Democratic Party. "Let's have a new slogan," said CLC President Dennis McDermott. "Let's make it, 'Collective balloting is as important as collective bargaining.'"

In addressing pressing social concerns, the CLC executive board sponsored an accelerated move to open the governing body to more leadership positions for women.

The convention approved the board's recommendation to increase the number of vice presidents at-large from eight to 14. The six new positions must, by constitutional amendment, go to women.

Women's rights

Delegates approved an affirmative action program for women in all areas of union activity from collective bargaining proposals to local union administration.

The convention also adopted a comprehensive policy statement in support of nuclear disarmament, including a call for a ban on all testing of cruise missiles in Canada.

The AFL-CIO fraternal delegate, Steelworkers President Lynn Williams, told the convention he welcomed the "opportunity to report on the renewed spirit of courage and determination" within the federation.

Cites problems

Williams reviewed the casualty toll that right-wing policies have created in the United States, citing crippling unemployment and the accompanying declines in union membership. He criticized the misuse of technological change to hurt, rather than help, workers. And he said international trade should be "a boon to mankind" rather than a point of friction that might again lead to war.

"Let us be thankful that we have had the labor movement during this period," said Williams. "It is not hard to imagine how much worse things might have been," he said. All it takes is a look at those places where there are no such institutions as trade unions, he added.

Allan Sapper, the fraternal delegate representing the British Trades Union Congress, recalled for delegates the 150-year history of trade union militancy in his country.

Today's trade unionists in Canada, South Africa and Britain "are not made of lesser stuff than those who went before us," Sapper said. "We owe it to them to keep the trade union flag flying."

U.S. fleet concerns

Seafarers convention spotlights policy issues

Piney Point, Md.—A call for a coordinated national maritime policy with job security for the crews of American-flag ships was the keynote of the Seafarers triennial convention here.

Delegates adopted a resolution prodding the Reagan Administration to assist the industry in meeting the competition of maritime nations that heavily subsidize their fleets.

The convention called for programs to insure the "maintenance and retention of an adequate, efficient and modern fleet sufficient to satisfy America's national and economic security needs."

It also strongly supported the Jones Act, which stipulates that cargoes between U.S. ports must be carried on American-flag ships.

SIU President Frank Drozak, re-elected to a second three-year term, told the 300 delegates to the three-day convention that the last four years "have been the most detrimental to the working man and women of this country because of the anti-maritime and anti-labor Administration in the Oval Office.

"If we have four more years of Reaganomics, the American trade union movement will not be as we know it today," Drozak warned.

The delegates approved 51 resolutions aimed at rebuilding the industry and protecting the jobs of the union's 80,000 members.

A major resolution on the national economy strongly opposed President Reagan's economic policies and called for redirecting them toward full employment and revitalization of the nation's industrial base.

Another resolution called on the Administration and Congress to formulate an industrial policy to achieve balanced and equitable economic growth.

Grass-roots politics

Other key measures committed the union's energies and resources to a grass-roots political campaign to educate political candidates on the need for strengthening the U.S. merchant marine.

Another pointed out the vital role of the U.S. fishing industry in the economy, and stressed that it should be protected against the predatory practices of other fishing nations.

The delegates also re-elected Sec.-Treas. Joseph DiGiorgio and 18 vice presidents.

Among the speakers were Rep. Walter Jones (D-N.C.), chairman of the House Merchant Marine Committee; AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, Sheet Metal Workers President Edward Carlough, Operating Engineers Vice President Stephen Leslie, Longshoremen's Vice President Frank Lonardo, Executive Vice President Raymond McKay of the Marine Engineers and Executive Sec.-Treas. Jean Ingrao of the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept.

Sen. Paul Sarbanes (D-Md.) warned that there are "strong economic interests in this country that want to use foreign-flag ships for short-term profits." He called for election of a President this fall "who will put people to work."

Stresses cooperation

Admiral Harold E. Shear, maritime administrator with the Dept. of Transportation, expressed optimism over the industry's future provided there is cooperation among all its elements.

Pamela Harriman, chairman of the board of directors of Democrats for the '80s, called for Reagan's defeat this fall. She termed Reagan "the most reactionary President of modern times," and decried his "endangerment of the U.S. maritime industry."

Other speakers were Representatives Joseph M. Gaydos (D-Pa.) and Tom Harkin (D-Iowa) and Kentucky Labor Sec.-John Wells.

Food Workers score plan to use poultry pesticide

The Environmental Protection Agency's proposal to legalize the use of the pesticide Larvadex in chicken feed is a "blatant attempt to circumvent the law" which could expose millions of Americans to a potentially cancer-causing chemical, the Food & Commercial Workers charged.

UFCW President William H. Wynn said in a letter to the EPA that the proposal violates the Federal Food, Drug & Cosmetic Act's Delaney clause which prohibits the use of food additives shown to cause cancer in humans and animals.

The UFCW represents about 330,000 workers involved in the processing and retail sales of meat and poultry products.

Wynn noted that Larvadex would be used as an additive to chicken feed to control flies that hatch in chicken manure. But the pesticide also breaks down into a byproduct, melamine, which leaves residues in eggs and chicken meat. He pointed out recent studies suggest that melamine may cause cancer in laboratory mice.

The UFCW leader said that consumer confidence in the products they buy is related to employment of the union's members. "If the quality of safety of the products are questionable, then sales will decline and the jobs of our members are in jeopardy. Our current unemployment rate constitutes a national tragedy, and we cannot afford to add to the numbers of jobless," he said.

The environmental agency has proposed approval of the pesticide on a conditional basis until the end of 1985, when the permissible residue levels would be re-evaluated. Wynn observed that the "cancer-causing potential of Larvadex has not been fully and adequately assessed." Last August, it was removed from the market after studies raised the possibility that it caused cancer in laboratory animals.

Interest rate rise begins to take toll

Signs of a slowdown in the economy bubbled up in government and private reports reflecting the impact of generally higher interest rates.

The new evidence included:

- A slight five-tenths of 1 percent rise in the Commerce Dept.'s key index of leading economic indicators for April—much smaller than the gains that were typical of much of last year.
- A 3.6-percent drop in factory orders in April, the steepest in four years. Some analysts see the dip as a sign that higher interest rates are beginning to take their toll on capital spending.
- Spending on new construction in the United States edged up just two-tenths of 1 percent last month, a much smaller gain than in the previous three months on the Commerce Dept.'s index.
- A survey of the nation's purchasing managers showed a dip in its index of various economic activities, which is based on an analysis of new orders, production, employment, vendor performance and inventories.

The leading indicators index, published monthly by the Commerce Dept., is the government's main economic forecasting measure. It had slipped one-tenth of 1 percent in March, the first decline in a nearly two-year upward trend.

The biggest factor contributing to the modest April rise in the index was an increase in the average workweek to 41.2 hours, from 40.6 hours in March.

Also rising were formation of new businesses, building permits for new home construction, the nation's money supply, stock prices, and the prices of sensitive raw materials.

Negative signals included a decline in contracts and orders for new plants and equipment, an increase in first-time claims for unemployment benefits, a drop in orders to manufacturers for consumer goods, and a decline in companies reporting business deliveries.

The plunge in factory orders—the first since last July—was due mainly to a large drop in military orders. Still, economists noted, there would have been at least a modest decline in total orders even if the military spending figures had not been a factor.

Although spending on new homes rose 1.3 percent in April, spending for overall residential construction fell 1.1 percent, the Commerce Dept. reported.

T. P. Kenny dies at 60, top official of Musicians

Sacramento, Calif.—Thomas P. Kenny, Musicians vice president and executive secretary of the Sacramento AFL-CIO, died at his home here May 23 of heart disease. He was 60.

Kenny, who was also president of AFM Local 12 here, was active in labor, community and political organizations throughout his life, and he had been editor of the Sacramento Valley Union Labor Bulletin. He is survived by his wife Mary and six children.

The AFM executive board has elected Mark Tully Massagli to complete Kenny's unexpired two-year term as one of the two international vice presidents. Massagli is president of AFM Local 369 in Las Vegas, Nev., and has been a member of the union's executive board for the past 10 years.

Gilbert Phillips, president-secretary of AFM Local 116 in Shreveport, La., was elected to fill the seat vacated by Massagli on the board.

Musical Artists sign New York opera pact

New York—The Guild of Musical Artists and the New York City Opera reached agreement on a new five-year contract covering soloists, stage directors, dancers and opera chorus.

Alan D. Olsen, the union's associate executive secretary, who led the negotiations, called the new agreement "extraordinarily good from our point of view."

Terms of the agreement were not released, but Olsen said that it includes substantial improvements in wages and benefits. It runs through May 28, 1989.

Too Blatant to Ignore

THE FACTS are not in dispute. The American shoe industry has been devastated by imports, which now account for more than two-thirds of all shoe sales in this country and have cost more than 100,000 jobs.

In 1977, when imports accounted for 47 percent of shoe sales, a marketing agreement with Korea and Taiwan temporarily stabilized unemployment. But three years ago, President Reagan rejected the unanimous recommendation of the International Trade Commission for a continuation of import restrictions. Since then, another 20,000 U.S. jobs have been lost.

Surely, the ITC would again recommend the relief sought by the shoe industry's unions and employers—and in terms so strong that the President could ill afford to ignore it.

The case was compelling. These are not high-wage workers, but the shoe factories still operating are often the principal employer in their communities. Already, past closings have left a trail of ghost towns.

As AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland testified at the trade hearings, the ITC's decision "could mean life or death to an entire industry."

The verdict is in. Unless it is overturned by congressional action. the verdict is "death."

THE REASONING expressed by various ITC members is incredible, outrageous.

Explaining their verdict, two of the commissioners acknowledged that import penetration has increased, that there have been heavy layoffs and plant closings. But the industry has "adjusted" to a shrunken role and is making "reasonable profits."

As indignant union representatives pointed out, this is saying in effect that workers jobs can be sacrificed and that imports don't do any damage unless they interfere with profits.

An Associated Press account of the decision suggests at least the possibility of another factor.

A ruling that the shoe industry had been seriously injured by imports, a prelude to a recommendation for government action, "could have been embarrassing to President Reagan at the economic summit conference opening in London," AP noted.

Congress has been reluctant to remedy the deficiencies of the existing trade law mechanisms for relief from import injuries. But in this case, the injustice is too blatant to ignore.

Seeds of Conflict

THE CONFLICT now drawing to a close here in Las Vegas did not begin just last month.

It began nearly three years ago, when President Reagan misused the might and majesty of his office to break the Air Traffic Controllers strike, destroy their union, and vindictively punish the strikers with wholesale firings and blacklistings.

By encouraging other employers to follow his example, and by fostering among them the seductive dream of absolute power over working people, Mr. Reagan has done great harm to the economic and social fabric of the United States. By perverting federal agencies in support of a massive, nationwide assault on the democratic institution of collective bargaining, he has put democracy itself at risk.

So it is good news—the best kind of news—that here in Las Vegas, democracy as embodied in the democratic institution of trade unionism has been successfully defended. I believe that the considerable improvement that is taking place in the labor-management weather here will, sooner or later, have its effect in improving the labor-management climate of the whole United States.

The news is that American working men and women, when pushed to the wall, will defend themselves with resolution and tenacity that no power on earth can overcome in the long run. And this labor movement is built for the long run.

Canadian health care plan hale, hearty and efficient

By Press Associates, Inc.

The fast-rising cost of medical care in recent years has affected all Americans, except the rich.

It has meant skyrocketing health insurance premiums and out-of-pocket medical expenses, looming insolvency for the Medicare program, and pressure for more Medicare and Medicaid cutbacks. In view of the crisis, it is worthwhile to look at the health care approach of other industrial democracies.

The House Select Committee on Aging did just that. The committee's study concluded that the United States has much to learn from the experiences of other nations—both in controlling health care costs and expanding coverage of quality care to all citizens. The report centered on Canada, Britain, Sweden, West Germany and Japan.

Canada's experience warrants prime attention since Canada is the most similar to the United States in history, culture, politics and size.

In 1960, Canada and the United States were spending less than 6 percent of their gross national product on health care. Today Canada spends less than 8 percent of its GNP while the United States spends nearly 11 percent, or $350 billion a year, for health care.

Canada, however, is getting a lot more for its money. In the late 1950s, Canada introduced a system of national health insurance which now provides comprehensive coverage to virtually 100 percent of its population.

U.S. coverage lacking

In the United States, by contrast, more than 23 million people, or 11 percent of the population, still lack any form of health coverage despite the establishment of Medicare for the elderly and Medicaid for the poor nearly 20 years ago. This figure doesn't even include the nation's unemployed who lost their health insurance.

Due mainly to Reagan's budget cutbacks, more than a fourth of America's poor don't qualify for Medicaid, including nearly 6 million children. About a million families have had at least one member refused medical care for financial reasons.

In the other major industrial nations—all of them providing various forms of universal, comprehensive health insurance except for South Africa—out-of-pocket health expenses range from 12 percent in West Germany to 8.4 percent in Sweden to 5.8 percent in Britain.

Canada's federal government sets minimum standards for the health system and splits the cost with the provincial governments. The provincial governments administer the program and negotiate fee schedules with physicians' associations.

Services include not only treatment but a wide range of preventive medicine, including checkups, immunization and infant care. There are no deductibles or upper dollar limits.

Quality care

In addition to regulating doctor and hospital fees, Canada holds down health costs without sacrificing quality in other ways. These include:

- Nurses and physician assistants are allowed to handle many routine procedures, saving the expense of a doctor's time.
- Unnecessary costs which accompany physician overspecialization are avoided through financial and other encouragements to family practice.
- Most treatment is delivered in community health centers, avoiding when possible more costly hospitalization. Expensive specialized care is offered only at a few large teaching hospitals. Through this "three-tier" delivery system, costly duplication of services is avoided.

National health insurance was inaugurated in Canada more than 25 years ago over angry howls of protest from the medical establishment. Today, even the president of the Canadian Medical Association calls it "a success story for Canadians."

For Americans, the Kennedy-Gephardt bill to control doctor and hospital fees and provide other savings offers a good alternative to rampant health care inflation and further cuts in Medicare.

LEGISLATIVE ALERT!

Updates on Bankruptcy, Immigration, NLRB, Subminimum Wage

AFL-CIO URGES SENATE TO OK PACKWOOD-DECONCINI AMENDMENT TO STOP CORPORATE BANKRUPTCY ABUSE

Legislation to stop corporations from misusing bankruptcy law to break their union contracts is pending in the Senate and may be brought up at any time. An amendment to be offered by Sens. Robert Packwood (R-OR) and Dennis DeConcini (D-AZ) would strike an even balance between favorable legislation already passed by the House and the unfair Bildisco decision by the Supreme Court.

Because union contracts are at stake, this is the most important labor issue in Congress since the labor law reform battles of the 1970s.

The Packwood-DeConcini amendment has the support of more than 50 of the 100 Senators, but is being kept from a vote by a few anti-worker obstructionists.

Action, however, is likely before June 21, because that is the deadline for bankruptcy court reform. The Packwood-DeConcini amendment is pending to the bankruptcy judges bill.

WHAT YOU CAN DO: Urge your Senators to support the Packwood-DeConcini amendment on corporate bankruptcy, and to allow this amendment to come to a vote on the Senate floor.

IMMIGRATION REFORM BILL MAY REACH VOTES ON HOUSE FLOOR THIS WEEK

Long-awaited House floor action on immigration reform legislation is scheuled for this week. The Senate already has passed an immigration bill. Among the issues to be debated are:

- Employer sanctions. Should penalties be imposed on employers who hire workers who lack legal eligibility for employment in the United States? The AFL-CIO believes that fines or other sanctions would be the most effective way to stop hiring of illegal workers. And if we are serious about regaining control over our borders, we should remove the lure of illegal employment. This would be far more effective than any increase in border patrols, etc.

- Temporary agriculture workers. To what extent should agricultural companies be allowed to hire temporary workers who otherwise lack legal eligibility? The AFL-CIO supports strict limitations on temporary worker programs.

- Legalization program. To what extent should people who entered the United States illegally many years ago be given legal status? The AFL-CIO supports a liberal legalization program.

WHAT YOU CAN DO: Urge your Representative to support the Hawkins and Miller amendments to H.R. 1510, the immigration bill. These amendments would strengthen sanctions against employers who hire those without legal status, and would limit temporary foreign worker programs.

And urge your Representative to oppose the Panetta "bracero" amendment.

SENATE PANEL TO VOTE ON REAGAN'S NOMINEE FOR NLRB GENERAL COUNSEL

A close vote is predicted as the Senate Labor Committee votes this week on President Reagan's nominee for general counsel of the National Labor Relations Board.

The AFL-CIO opposes confirmation of Rosemary Collyer for this key position, because she has virtually no labor law experience, and her experience in mine safety law shows an anti-union bias. She has participated in only nine cases before the NLRB (all on behalf of management). In only one of these cases did she play a leading role.

As head of the Mine Safety and Health Review Commission, Collyer has voted to restrict coverage of the mine safety law, to reduce penalties against employers found to have violated health or safety rules, to apply safety and health standards in a narrow fashion, and to restrict worker involvement while enhancing management's role in administering the mine safety law.

It also appears that Ms. Collyer tried to mislead Senators about the extent of her experience.

WHAT YOU CAN DO: Urge your Senators to oppose the nomination of Rosemary Collyer for NLRB general counsel.

HOUSE-SENATE PANEL TO CONSIDER MINIMUM WAGE, SUBMINIMUM PROPOSALS

On June 27 the Joint Economic Committee will hold hearings on the minimum wage and on attempts to subvert it with a "subminimum" wage for teenagers. The AFL-CIO opposes wage discrimination on the basis of age. The minimum wage has been eroded by inflation and should be increased, not undermined.

WHAT YOU CAN DO: Urge your Senators and Representative to oppose subminimum wage legislation.

3½ Years Under Reagan Produce Harder Times for Working People, Boom Times for the Wealthy

REAGAN ON JOBS: LET THEM EAT WANT ADS

Reaganomics produced the worst recession and highest unemployment since the 1930s. President Reagan now points to the recovery which has cut the jobless rate to the 7.5 percent rate he inherited. But he says nothing about the four million Americans who lost their jobs and suffered through the recession.

And while the overall jobless rate has come down from its peak of nearly 11 percent, the numbers hide a shift in the kinds of jobs Americans are faced with. Skilled, well-paid jobs in manufacturing are vanishing, and in their place we have minimum-wage jobs in service industries such as restaurants:

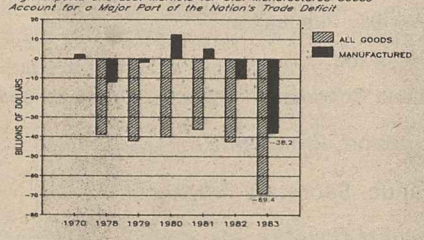
LOSS OF WELL-PAID JOBS: MARCH 1984 vs. JULY 1981

Manufacturing:	-807,000 jobs	Mining	-122,000 jobs
Transportation, utilities:	-113,000 jobs	Construction:	-9,000 jobs

REAGAN ON TRADE: MUSTN'T OFFEND THE JAPANESE

The United States gives foreign nations wide-open access to U.S. markets, even though our toughest trade competitors such as Japan put strict limitations and high tariffs on U.S. products--if they allow them at all. This is what President Reagan calls "free trade"--and it is costing the United States millions of jobs.

As the chart below shows, the Reagan "free trade" nonsense has worsened the trade deficit (the excess of imports over exports), especially in manufacturing industries, where the jobs are most skilled and well-paid.



NOTE: Last year the trade deficit was $69 billion. This year it will go even higher. EACH $1 BILLION IN EXCESS IMPORTS COSTS THE UNITED STATES APPROXIMATELY 50,000 JOBS.

REAGAN'S INDUSTRIAL POLICY: WHO NEEDS AN AUTO INDUSTRY? WHO NEEDS STEEL?

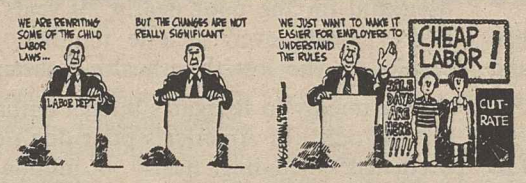
President Reagan opposes efforts by Congress to strengthen U.S. industries. Instead, he promised that his tax cuts for corporations would provide money to modernize plants for higher productivity.

Unfortunately, it hasn't worked out that way. Corporations' spending on new plant and equipment has declined since the Reagan tax cuts went into effect. They're using the money to buy out other companies and to boost profits.

REAGAN ON LABOR STANDARDS: IF WE CAN'T GET RID OF THEM, WE WON'T ENFORCE THEM

Reagan Appointments Give NLRB a Union-Busting Bias: President Reagan has made four appointments to the National Labor Relations Board--all management lawyers. The first was such a blatant union-buster, he couldn't get the GOP Senate's approval. Reagan's second choice, Donald Dotson, was, unfortunately, confirmed. Dotson said unions are "the major cause of industrial decline." Thus recent NLRB decisions which weaken unions are not surprising.

Child Labor Laws, Untouched Since 1938, Targeted by Reagan: Under a Reagan proposal, 14- and 15-year-olds would be allowed to work 36-hour weeks whenever a holiday resulted in less than a full school week. And even on school nights they would be allowed to work until 9 p.m., leaving little time for homework. Fortunately, the Administration was not allowed to put its plan into effect.



Minimum Wage Law Also a Reagan Target: In 1980 Ronald Reagan said "The minimum wage has caused more misery and unemployment than anything since the Great Depression." In case that remark doesn't make sense to you, Reagan thinks the minimum wage is too generous. The minimum wage is $3.35 per hour--or $6,968 per year.

Reagan proposed a $2.50/hour subminimum for those age 16-22.

REAGAN ON OSHA: ABOLISH IT? "AMEN!"

Ronald Reagan once said "Amen!" when someone suggested abolishing OSHA.

Under Reagan, OSHA has sought to weaken standards for cotton dust, lead and cancer agents. Inspections have been cut and penalties have declined 74 percent. For example, after a fatal accident on a $98 million construction job, OSHA cited the company for failure to provide adequate safety nets. The fine: $300.

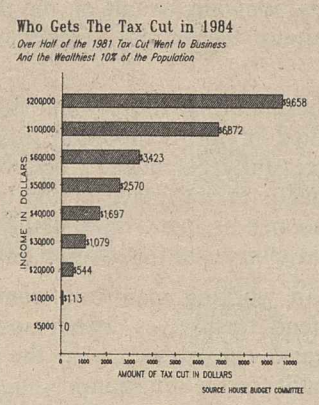
REAGAN ON CIVIL RIGHTS: ONLY IF CONGRESS INSISTS

Schools that Discriminate: The Reagan Administration tried to grant tax-exempt status to schools that discriminate against blacks.

Voting Rights: When the Voting Rights Act came up for renewal, President Reagan said it was "pretty extreme" and asked Congress to water it down. Congress refused and passed the bill by large margins. Reagan saw that Congress had more than enough votes to override a veto, so he belatedly jumped on board and used the bill-signing ceremony for political gain.

Martin Luther King Holiday: Reagan opposed legislation to create a national holiday in honor of Martin Luther King, Jr. Reagan even suggested at a press conference that King was a Communist. When Congress passed the bill by veto-proof margins, Reagan put on his "moderate" mask and reversed position to support it.

REAGAN ON TAXES: TAXING PEOPLE ACCORDING TO THEIR ABILITY TO PAY IS 'MARXIST, SOCIALIST'



Not long ago President Reagan said he thinks the corporate income tax should be abolished. (His tax legislation of 1981 has nearly accomplished that.) He also said that our progressive income tax--under which rates increase as income level increases--was designed by Karl Marx "as the prime essential of a socialist state."

Thus it is not surprising that the Reagan tax legislation does not tax people according to their ability to pay. Instead the biggest cuts go to the rich (see chart).

President Reagan's generosity to the rich is a major factor in the $200-billion-per-year budget deficits.

REAGAN ON DEFICITS: SURE THEY'LL HURT--BUT NOT UNTIL AFTER NOVEMBER 1984!

Ronald Reagan made a career of saying that federal budget deficits wreck the economy. But now that his tax cuts for the rich have pushed deficits to a new order of magnitude, he is silent.

Economists say that the economy may absorb one or two years of the Reagan deficits, but fear that eventually they will cause another recession. But that probably won't happen until after the November 1984 elections, so Reagan is willing to risk it.

To put the Reagan deficits in perspective: President Carter's budget deficits for four years totalled $181 billion. President Reagan's deficit for one year--1983--was $195 billion. Under the new Reagan budget, the government will have to spend $116 billion this year just to pay interest on the national debt.

REAGAN RIPS 'SAFETY NET'; 3 MILLION CHILDREN SLIP BELOW POVERTY LEVEL

President Reagan tries to justify his cuts in anti-poverty programs by saying that private charities will pick up the slack. But in 1981 the Reagans' biggest charitable contribution was Mrs. Reagan's used dresses, given to a fashion museum.

Since 1979 more than three million children have fallen into poverty. Infant death rates increased in 11 states between 1981 and 1982. Poverty rates have increased:

POVERTY RATES	1979	1982
Total	11.7%	15.0%
Blacks	31%	36%
Families headed by women:	35%	41%

Steel imports found hurting U.S. industry

By John R. Oravec

Union and industry representatives welcomed an International Trade Commission finding that a major portion of America's steel industry is being seriously hurt by surging imports.

President Lynn R. Williams of the Steelworkers and Donald H. Trautlein of Bethlehem Steel Corp. commended the ITC majority for its decision that U.S. steelmakers need relief from imports. They termed the commission's action "a positive step."

In a 3-2 vote, the commission found nearly three-quarters of the steel products imported last year, accounting for $4.3 billion of the $6.2 billion in total steel imports, should be in line for relief. The list includes plates, sheet and strip, wire and wire products, structural shapes and semi-finished steel.

But the commission rejected a portion of the union-industry petition for relief on pipes and tubes, bars, wire rods and railroad products, which Williams and Trautlein called "disturbing."

These items are under severe import competition, Williams and Trautlein stressed, and "without import relief, the damaging trend of increased imports of these products will continue."

The rising tide of imports currently engulfs more than 25 percent of the U.S. steel market.

First step

The ITC's finding of injury is the first step in responding to the union-industry petition. The next step under the Trade Act of 1974 is for further ITC hearings to determine an appropriate remedy—tariffs, import quotas or a combination of both—to recommend to the President by July 24. President Reagan will then have 60 days to accept, modify or reject the ITC's recommendations.

Regardless of what degree of relief the ITC recommends, Williams said the USWA will continue to press for legislation now before both chambers of Congress that would limit steel imports to 15 percent of the U.S. market and require steel firms to modernize their mills. The House bill has more than 200 cosponsors.

Trautlein expressed hope that the ITC ruling would spur action on the import quota legislation.

In testimony before the Senate Finance Committee prior to the ITC action, Williams pointed out that 210,000 American steelworkers have lost their jobs over the last seven years.

And although steel consumption in 1984 has edged up over last year's levels, imports have captured 40 percent of the increase, he told the panel.

Jobs, fairness key issues for Democratic platform

Reporters are briefed on the labor proposals AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland presented to the Democratic Platform Committee.

Kirkland bids party affirm liberal goals

By James M. Shevis

The Democratic Party must speak to the needs of ordinary people—particularly the need of American working men and women for jobs and fairness—as it prepares to do battle in the November elections.

This is the heart of the political agenda presented to the party's platform committee by AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, who warned that the Reagan Administration's philosophy of government is dividing the country along class lines.

American workers are looking to the Democratic Party to restore faith in a government that serves all the people, and not just the wealthy and the powerful, Kirkland said in submitting the federation's detailed platform proposals.

"They look to the Democratic Party to reaffirm its historic commitment to equal rights, equal justice and equal opportunity by adopting as its platform a set of economic policies that advance the moral and social goals of a democratic society," he said.

Jobs and fairness

"Such a platform should aim to enhance the lives, living standards and prospects of all the people, without exceptions or exclusions. Its themes should be jobs and fairness for the future."

Kirkland was among some 200 witnesses, including other labor representatives, who testified in final hearings before the platform committee. A 15-member subcommittee, to be chosen by the committee chairman, Rep. Geraldine A. Ferraro (D-N.Y.), will draft the final platform in about a week for delivery at the Democratic National Convention in San Francisco, July 16.

In his presentation to the committee, Kirkland charged that ever since President Reagan took office, his Republican Administration has systematically implemented policies designed to benefit the rich at the expense of the poor.

The Administration's "willingness" to support employers who seek to exploit workers has been demonstrated, Kirkland

Supreme Court upholds bona fide seniority plans

By Susan Dunlop

The Supreme Court decision that bona fide seniority systems are legal under the 1964 Civil Rights Act parallels a long-standing AFL-CIO view, Federation President Lane Kirkland said in a statement.

Kirkland stressed that such legitimate, nondiscriminatory systems "are a valuable source of protection for all workers regardless of race or sex."

The Supreme Court overturned a lower court decision which bypassed the seniority system negotiated by the city of Memphis and Fire Fighters Local 1784. The local and the city carried the case to the high court.

The 6-3 majority opinion by Justice Byron R. White said that the Civil Rights Act of 1964 specifically protects "bona fide" seniority systems that were not put in place with the intention of discriminating. The ruling addresses the issue of legitimate seniority systems, but does not overturn affirmative action programs—such as the one in place in Memphis—that require the hiring and promotion of women and minorities to achieve fairness.

Kirkland emphasized in his statement that the AFL-CIO's support for legitimate seniority systems "in no way conflicts with our strong and constant support for affirmative action programs developed to overcome historic discrimination and employment barriers which have held back minorities and women in America from their rightful place in our society."

There is nothing in the Supreme Court's decision, Kirkland said, that will stop organized labor "from waging our battles" to open up employment opportunities, create training programs, press for upgrading and promotions for women and minorities and "to take every necessary affirmative action to insure equity in the workplace."

Reynolds scored

He denounced indications by Assistant Attorney Gen. William Bradford Reynolds that the Reagan Administration would use an extremely broad reading of the Memphis decision to meddle in other existing affirmative action programs.

There is nothing in the decision that justifies the Reagan Administration's "all-out attack upon civil rights" by Reynolds, Kirkland said. He called it "an insult to the court as well as to the victims of discrimination" for Reynolds to claim that his long-announced intention to roll back the civil rights gains of the past 20 years "has now been endorsed by the Supreme Court."

MEMO FROM COPE

Immigration bill meets cross fire

The immigration bill being debated in the House has run into a cross fire of amendments that could substantially alter its substance.

One key labor-supported amendment offered by Rep. Augustus Hawkins (D-Calif.), was voted down early in the debate, but the final shape of the bill was still undetermined as the AFL-CIO News went to press.

The Hawkins proposal was one of the keys to AFL-CIO support for the basic legislation introduced by Sen. Alan Simpson (R-Wyo.) and Rep. Romano Mazzoli (D-Ky.). It would have strengthened the sections of the bill calling for penalties against employers who knowingly hire foreign workers who have entered the country illegally and would have made it clearly illegal for any employer to discriminate in hiring practices on the basis of a worker's national origin.

The amendment also would have provided for a swift and effective judicial and enforcement process to deal with charges of discrimination.

Guest workers

Still to come among the 69 amendments scheduled for debate is another critical labor-sought proposal offered by Rep. George Miller (D-Calif.). It would sharply restrict and control the use of temporary or "guest" workers from foreign countries, known as H-2 workers.

Also in the wings is an amendment strongly opposed by the AFL-CIO that would create a new and potentially disastrous "bracero" program that would allow virtually an unlimited and unrestricted influx of foreign workers for farm labor. The measure, proposed by Rep. Leon Panetta (D-Calif.), would provide no protection from exploitation for those foreign workers.

Earlier in the year there was doubt that any immigration bill would be considered because of the wide range of views over sanctions against employers who hire illegal workers, amnesty for illegal aliens already in the United States, and fears

Solidarity march

Furniture Workers Local 382 members, on strike against Frankline Furniture, received strong support from local civil rights and community groups as well as nearby UFWA locals. More than 400 persons carrying signs saying, "Marching for Justice and a Living Wage," paraded through Hernando, Miss., adding the pressure that resulted in a new three-year contract that boosted wages, provided fully-paid health insurance for the first time, and improved seniority rights and grievance procedures for the 150 workers.

Kirkland presses jobs and fairness as basis for Democratic platform said, in the advocacy of a subminimum wage for youths, repeal of the ban on industrial homework, elimination of prevailing wage laws, and by its appointments to federal courts and regulatory agencies "of people chosen to enforce low-wage standards far into our nation's future."

"If such destructive policies were to proceed to their logical conclusion, the United States would inevitably be reduced to two classes of citizens: those who control production and administer markets, prices, and wages and those who are controlled by them," he said.

Favoring the rich

He accused the Administration of deliberately adopting a high-unemployment policy in its pursuit of enriching the few at the expense of the many. It cares little about the toll this policy has cost the ordinary working American, he said. And yet it persists in robbing the nation of its most important asset, the vitality and well-being of its people.

A job is the foundation of a good life and the rewards of work are the criteria by which Americans measure themselves and others as members of the society, he observed.

"We propose, therefore, that full employment should be not a plank but the foundation of the 1984 Democratic platform," Kirkland stressed.

In the detailed program which will also be presented to the Republican platform committee later this summer, the AFL-CIO pointed out that despite more than a year of recovery in the business world, recovery is not even in sight for the 8.5-million Americans reported still without jobs by the Labor Dept. And for those lucky enough to have a job, average "real"—or inflation-adjusted—wages are 3.5 percent lower than they were four years ago.

The AFL-CIO also called on both parties to include in their platforms measures demonstrating concern for the poor, working and non-working, who have been written off and deprived of help from their government during the Reagan years.

"The hallmark of the Reagan Administration is its unfairness," the federation charged.

Anti-worker moves

Budget cutbacks in social welfare programs have left thousands of unemployed workers without jobless insurance benefits, proper health care, housing, and protection against job hazards, the AFL-CIO declared.

"Fairness requires that the next Democratic Administration return the agencies of government to their proper functions, and restore the humane and necessary programs that have been dissolved," Kirkland said. "Fairness is a central issue in the elections of 1984."

High on its agenda for reform is the federation's call for measures to restore justice and efficiency to enforcement of the National Labor Relations Act, including repeal of Section 14(b) that permits states to outlaw the union shop.

Americans also are looking to the Democratic Party to put their government "back in the business of fighting discrimination and inequality," the AFL-CIO said. That calls for early passage and ratification of the Equal Rights Amendment and enactment of federal legislation promoting wage equity and equal pay for comparable work.

It also calls for laws prohibiting discrimination in insurance and pensions, and legislation correcting current inequities in social security benefits for homemakers and women with interrupted careers.

Among other areas of pressing national need cited in the federation's proposals are public education, mass transit, reindustrialization, foreign policy, and national defense.

Promotion of human rights must be at the core of U.S. foreign policy, the AFL-CIO proposals declared.

"In weighing our government's relations with another country, primary consideration should be given to the extent to which the people of that country have the right to band together in their own institutions to protect their rights and interests as they see them," the federation stressed.

"Without this right—this freedom of association—all other human rights wither."

On the defense issue, Kirkland said organized labor believes in a strong national defense that is not mounted at the expense of the well-being of the American people.

Social sacrifice

"The Reagan Administration, by financing its defense buildup through massive cuts in social spending, has placed the defense on working people, the poor, and others least able to bear it, while exempting the most privileged among us from sacrifice," he said.

"This is not only unfair; it threatens to destroy the consensus for a strong national defense that this Administration exploited in its quest for power."

Democrats insist that whatever increases in defense spending may be required should be fairly financed through a progressive surtax on corporate and individual income taxes, Kirkland noted.

He wrapped up his presentation with this comment on the AFL-CIO's role in the 1984 elections:

"Although the American labor movement is the property of no party, we know that most workers have historically looked to the Democratic Party for a government that is responsive to their deepest concerns, and we know that their support has been essential to every Democratic victory.

"In advancing these platform proposals, the AFL-CIO calls upon the Democratic Party to continue and to deepen its role as a party of working men and women, and thereby to enhance its own prospects and advance the nation's in November."

Several AFL-CIO departments and affiliates also testified before the panel.

The Industrial Union Dept., represented by President William H. Bywater of the Electronics Workers, stressed the urgent need for a coherent national policy to restore America's industrial base.

Bywater, an IUD vice president, pointed out that jobs in the manufacturing sector are declining as the nation falls victim to ballooning trade deficits and a dwindling share of the world market.

"Our society cannot thrive if our industrial base is crippled," he said. "The service sector—financial, communications, computing, and other services—depends directly or indirectly on the industrial base."

True recovery needed

President Robert A. Georgine of the Building & Construction Trades Dept., said the United States is still a long way from what could reasonably be considered true economic recovery, pointing to the 15 percent unemployment rate in the construction industry.

"Putting these people back to work—and putting them back to work in productive jobs—must be our highest national priority," he said.

Other labor officials who testified before the platform committee included Teachers President Albert Shanker, Postal Workers President Moe Biller, Sheet Metal Workers President Edward J. Carlough, Machinists President William W. Winpisinger, Seafarers President Frank Drozak, Executive Vice President John Sturdivant of the Government Employees, Gus Tyler, assistant president of the Ladies' Garment Workers, and Railway & Airline Clerks Vice President Jack Otero.

Also testifying were President Jacob Clayman of the National Council of Senior Citizens, Chairman Douglas A. Fraser of the Health Security Coalition, and Linda Tarr-Whelan of the Save Our Security Coalition.

As a result, Williams testified, domestic steel companies have not shared in the cyclical upturn, and employment is still mired at close to all-time lows.

"The current recession in the steel industry is the most severe since the Great Depression," he stressed. "Though precise data on layoff duration are not available, we do know that some 100,000 steelworkers have been on layoff so long they have exhausted state unemployment compensation and contractual supplemental unemployment benefits."

For many, he pointed out, "there is no return, since their mills are shut down."

In a statement submitted to the Senate subcommittee on trade, the AFL-CIO said a strong domestic steel industry is essential to national security and the country's economy.

"Steel production provides the necessary foundation for a strong and growing America," the federation said. "If steps are not immediately taken, the dismantling of the steel industry will accelerate, and the United States by default will be at the mercy of foreign suppliers."

In calling for Senate approval of steel import limits, the statement said that the legislation provides a positive solution for American steelworkers and the industry.

Boon to industry

In their joint statement on the ITC decision, Williams and Trautlein said that with the approval of import relief, "the domestic steel industry will be able to increase and stabilize employment as well as generate sufficient cash flow to finance the remaining portions of the modernization efforts needed to maintain the industry's competitive position."

In its split decision, the ITC aired conflicting views on the industry's problems. Chairman Alfred Eckes was joined by Commissioners David Rohr and Seeley Lodwick to find injury in five import categories while Commissioners Paula Stern and Susan Liebler ruled against all nine categories in the union-industry petition.

The key affirmative ruling was on sheets and strip, which accounted for 42 percent of the imports last year valued at $2.6 billion.

The most disappointing finding was the rejection of the petition for relief on pipes and tubes, which accounted for 19 percent of last year's imports valued at $1.2 billion.

In explaining his vote, Eckes said the rapid expansion of imports to 26 percent of the market this year is a "substantial cause" of the industry's declining position.

A week earlier, the ITC in a 5-0 vote flatly rejected a petition from the shoeworkers' unions and the footwear industry, even while acknowledging that shoe imports have taken over 69 percent of the U.S. market.

The commission is now considering a petition for import relief filed by U.S. copper producers.

Reagan, Trudeau scored

Clothing-Textile union focuses on job needs

Hollywood, Fla.—In a stinging attack on both the Reagan Administration in the United States and the Trudeau Government in Canada, Clothing & Textile Workers President Murray H. Finley told delegates to the union's third constitutional convention that unemployment and rising imports are still problems.

"We must rely on ourselves and our union to gain the wages we deserve, the safe working conditions we deserve, the health and welfare benefits we deserve, and ultimately the happiness we deserve," Finley told the more than 2,000 delegates and alternates.

He pointed out in his keynote address, that while the Reagan Administration was turning its back on workers, the "members of our union were reaching down into their pockets to help support their unemployed brothers and sisters."

A year ago, he noted the union established a sweeping program to aid thousands of jobless members, involving counseling, training, and other assistance to jobless members.

Health efforts

Finley also described the union's efforts to protect members from the dread effects of cotton dust, in spite of the attack on standards by Reagan's Occupational Safety & Health Administration, and pledged continued efforts in this direction.

A major part of Finley's address dealt with imports and the union's effort to stem the tide from low-wage countries.

"We need to give our workers and our industries the chance to compete at the top level on the world market, or else we forsake our dreams of a better tomorrow," he observed.

Finley noted that other gains had been made "in the face of a hostile Administration and economic turmoil." He cited improved wages and benefits for ACTWU members in men's and boy's suits, textiles, shoes, headwear, and other industries.

On the political picture, he concluded:

"I believe that after four years of record-breaking unemployment, after four years of dismantling virtually every social service program that helps people, after four years of international tension with an itchy finger on the nuclear trigger, the decision of the American people will be to vote for Walter F. Mondale as the next President of the United States."

In an address to the convention, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland lauded ACTWU's fight to preserve the jobs of its members against the flood of imports.

"The social and economic future of all the American people hinges on the outcome of the fight to restore and enhance America's industrial position in the world and to expand job opportunities," Kirkland observed.

"The erosion of that position has been going on for a long time and your members were among the first victims. For shoeworkers, textile workers and clothing workers, the noose has been tightening for decades. Now, in 1984, nearly every industrial job in America is a target for slow or sudden strangulation."

Kirkland told the cheering delegates that "the goal of the American labor movement in this election year is to change that prospect by helping to restore the government of the United States to its proper role as an instrument of, by and for the American people—all the people."

Labor's duty

He called the AFL-CIO decision to support a candidate who can defeat Ronald Reagan "a further affirmation of the duty we accept and the right we have earned to play that role."

He said the labor movement has "every reason to be proud of our effort" on Mondale's behalf.

"From coast to coast, our movement is united as never before and the spirit of solidarity is surging in our ranks," Kirkland declared. "That is the real source of our strength—and of our confidence that, whatever the odds, we shall prevail."

ACTWU's top officers—Finley, Sec.-Treas. Jacob Sheinkman and Executive Vice President Scott M. Hoyman—and 33 incumbent vice presidents were re-elected to three-year terms by acclamation. Earlier the delegates had unanimously adopted an amendment to the union's constitution reducing the number of vice presidents from 40 to 33.

Defense of workers' rights keynotes '84 ILO conference

Geneva—Worker, government and employer delegates were urged at the outset of the International Labor Organization's annual conference to rally to the defense of trade union rights and freedom of association.

These basic rights of workers are being "eroded more and more, whether for ideological or other reasons," Swedish Labor Minister Anna-Greta Leijon warned in accepting the presidency of the ILO's annual assembly of its 151-member nations.

"It is vital that the three parties that make up the ILO make a common stand in their defense," Mrs. Leijon said. The Swedish minister is the first woman to be elected assembly president since the ILO was founded at the end of World War I.

The Soviet Union sent out early signals that it intends to continue assaulting the ILO machinery for monitoring how governments live up to their pledges to apply the ILO standards on trade union and other human rights.

Soviet resolution

It has submitted, with the support of other communist countries, a resolution calling on the conference to appoint a working party to examine "those problems that give rise to the most serious divergencies of views" in the formulation of the ILO's standard-setting conventions, or treaties, and the supervision of their application.

U.S. Worker Delegate Irving Brown, who is director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of International Affairs, saw this as a renewal of the Soviet bloc's stillborn attempt last year to set in motion procedures that would still ILO criticism of its violations of human rights.

The communist governments repeatedly complain that the ILO fails to take into account the "realities" of their political, economic and social systems and seeks through the monitoring machinery to intervene in purely domestic affairs.

Polish boycott

This contention was invoked by Poland's communist regime in boycotting the conference for the second year because of the ILO's inquiry into the government's outlawing of the Solidarity free trade union movement and persecution of its leaders.

The West European governments have countered the Soviet bloc move by proposing a resolution calling for the "universal implementation in all fields" of the ILO conventions. They urge that particular attention be given the standards on human rights because of their "fundamental and overriding importance for workers throughout the world."

While the rival drafts on standards will be examined in the resolutions committee, the conference will focus its attention on the same issues in the general debate.

ILO Director Gen. Francis Blanchard introduced the subject in his report to the conference by calling for an in-depth review of the organization's standard-setting work in order to give it maximum effectiveness.

At a news conference on the eve of the three-week assembly, Blanchard stressed the importance of the ILO's watchdog committee. He said that without the authority to call on governments to answer "precise and indiscreet questions," the ILO's "whole action to protect workers' rights would be senseless."

Reagan trade plan hit as open door to Mexican imports

The AFL-CIO warned that American jobs would be jeopardized by the Reagan Administration's plan for an open-door policy on subsidized imports from Mexico.

"The implementation of a subsidies agreement with Mexico will not benefit domestic industry, and may in fact speed its decline by making relief from imports much more difficult to achieve," Research Director Rudy Oswald said in a letter to United States Trade Representative William Brock.

Trade problems between the United States and Mexico are increasing, Oswald noted, with the United States experiencing a merchandise trade deficit of more than $8 billion in 1983 and this year's red ink already totaling $2.8 billion through the end of April.

'Disastrous' impact

Mexico, unlike the United States, is not a signatory to the General Agreement on Tariffs & Trade subsidies code, which stipulates that member nations will not subsidize industries that export goods.

Mexico's subsidy of steel, cement and other industries has had "a disastrous impact" on American industry and its workers, Oswald wrote. The practice has continued despite numerous petition filings by U.S. industries.

Since 1982, the Administration has sought to negotiate a separate subsidies agreement with Mexico "substantially" similar to the GATT subsidies code which contains an "injury test" on the importing country to prove that a foreign subsidized industry is harmful to its workers.

"In giving Mexico the benefit of the injury test, you would be adding tremendously to the burden of workers seeking the relief promised by their government against competition from subsidized products," Oswald said.

Pilots ask Continental safety probe

The Air Line Pilots accused the Federal Aviation Administration of ignoring safety problems at Continental Airlines and called for an independent federal investigation.

"Continental is an accident waiting to happen, and I can only hope that it does not take a fatal accident to make the FAA act forcefully and thoroughly," ALPA President Henry A. Duffy told a House subcommittee on government activities and transportation.

Duffy said that either the National Aeronautics & Space Administration or the National Transportation Safety Board should look into Continental's safety practices because FAA investigations of the struck airline have been "shoddy in methodology, shallow in depth and riddled with errors."

He cited numerous safety problems the airline has encountered, including a mid-air near-collision last November.

As of the end of May, Duffy said, ALPA had reported 152 Continental safety incidents to the FAA. Of these, 66 were verified by the union through air traffic control tapes and other evidence.

He attributed the safety problems to Continental's inexperienced pilots, lack of training and mental lapses by pilots operating under stressful conditions.

On another front, striking pilots challenged Continental Chairman Frank Lorenzo on a number of issues at the company's stockholders' meeting in Houston.

They accused Lorenzo of gross corporate greed for taking millions of dollars in concessions from Continental employees and then claiming that labor costs drove the company into bankruptcy.

After filing for Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection last fall, Continental suspended operations for two days, then called back one-third of its workforce at half pay and longer hours before resuming flights.

A picket line outside the shareholders' meeting was spearheaded by the Harris County AFL-CIO and made up of striking pilots, Machinists, flight attendants.

After the rallies, striking pilots traded picket signs for proxies to attend the stockholder sessions of Continental and its parent firm, Texas Air.

A coalition of strikers and dissident stockholders brought a strong challenge to a management proposal against divesting Continental. ALPA reported 43 percent of the stockholders failed to supports the management proposal.

Sheet Metal Workers refute Reaganite emblem

The Sheet Metal Workers accused the Washington Times of grossly distorting the union's political position in a May 24 cartoon suggesting that the SMW supports the re-election of President Reagan.

In a sharply worded letter to the Times editor, SMW President Edward J. Carlough said, "We positively do not support in any way, shape or form the anti-labor policies" of Reagan or his Administration.

Although the union did not participate in the AFL-CIO's pre-primary endorsement of Walter F. Mondale, "we admire him and his record on behalf of working people," Carlough said.

"Ronald Reagan is not a friend of America's working men and women, nor a candidate SMW could support," he said.

Asbestos exposure test

Active workers, their family members and retirees of the Naval Shipyard at Norfolk, Va., are examined for the effects of long-term exposure to asbestos on the job. The program was sponsored by the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept. and its Tidewater Virginia Council. The three-day project was conducted by a team of medical experts from Mount Sinai School of Medicine headed by Dr. Irving J. Selikoff, widely recognized authority on asbestos-related diseases. Asbestos can cause several types of cancer and lung ailments, all of which can be fatal. The project focused on workers exposed to the carcinogenic fibers at least 20 years. There have been numerous cases of family members affected by asbestos that workers carried home on their clothing.

OSHA blasted for stalling on two pesticide standards

The AFL-CIO has charged that the Occupational Safety & Health Administration, in rejecting petitions for emergency standards on the pesticides ethylene dibromide (EDB) and methyl bromide, has failed in its legal duty to protect workers on the job.

Margaret Seminario, associate director of the Dept. of Occupational Safety, Health & Social Security, said labor simply asked OSHA to give workers the same protection offered to consumers:

"The bottom line is that it doesn't want to take the time to protect workers."

She stressed that OSHA has stalled action on EDB to the point where it "is doing nothing. There has been no explanation of why it hasn't done anything and why it is late."

Petition for action

The agency was petitioned for the emergency standards early last February by the AFL-CIO and its Food & Allied Service Trades Dept., and the Grain Millers. Former OSHA Administrator Thorne G. Auchter replied then that the agency was holding hearings on the proposed rule and "will not be able to make a decision on your request until the hearing record has been examined."

Acting OSHA Administrator Patrick Tyson denied the petitions on May 31, contending that issuance of an emergency standard for EDB would delay the development of a final standard, as "the only major steps remaining are final analysis of the record and the drafting of the final rule." He said OSHA found no information "to support the conclusion that EDB, as it is currently used in the workplace, poses a grave danger to employees."

EDB is a colorless liquid pesticide which has been shown to cause cancer and reproductive disorders. The chemical was widely used on grain and citrus until its presence as a residue on those products drew heavy media attention last fall.

Missed deadline

At that time, the Environmental Protection Agency banned most uses of the pesticide. But workers continue to be exposed to the pesticide by handling and transporting grain products which were sprayed. OSHA then introduced its proposed rule on EDB exposure, and after the hearings earlier this year said a final rule would be published by May. Now it is merely hopeful of getting the rule out by "late summer or early fall," according to an agency spokesman.

The current OSHA exposure limit for EDB is 20,000 parts per billion parts of air. The AFL-CIO's petition sought a limit of 45 ppb. OSHA's proposed standard would set the limit at 100 ppb, but until that level is approved, workers can still be exposed to extremely high doses in the workplace.

Methyl bromide was substituted by many growers when EDB was banned, and for this reason, labor petitioned OSHA for an emergency standard aimed at establishing safe work practices, setting monitoring requirements, and providing training and respiratory protection for workers.

In denying the petition, Tyson said a "preliminary review of limited information available on methyl bromide does indicate that it is a highly toxic substance." But because the material available on the chemical is limited, OSHA would not be able to establish the "feasibility or necessity" for the rule," he said.

Boris Shishkin, retired AFL-CIO economist, dies

Boris B. Shishkin, who retired in 1972 as secretary of the AFL-CIO Housing Committee, died at a Bethesda, Md., hospital June 12 after a long illness. He was 77.

Shishkin began his career with the labor movement in 1933 as an economist for the AFL after graduate work at Columbia University and a fellowship at the Brookings Institution. He later served as AFL research director and AFL-CIO civil rights director.

In a message to his wife Hildegard, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland said that many trade unionists have been inspired by Shishkin's example and enriched by his friendship.

"Of all of Boris's many contributions to the labor movement," Kirkland observed, "the greatest and most lasting was his pioneering work as the merged federation's first civil rights director. No man did more to break down the barriers of discrimination on the job, in the union hall and throughout the land."

While serving as the AFL's research director from 1947 to 1955, Shishkin also was secretary of the federation's housing committee and secretary of the social security committee. He headed the AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights in the 1955-64 period and was secretary of the Housing Committee from 1955 until his retirement.

He also served in a number of consulting roles with the federal government from the mid-1930s until his retirement.

In addition to his wife, Shishkin is survived by a sister, Mrs. Tamara Poliakoff. Services were held June 15 at St. Nicholas Russian Orthodox Cathedral in Washington, and interment was June 16 in New York.

House nears final vote on immigration that employer sanctions might lead to discrimination against all Hispanic-Americans.

But when increasing concern over the problems of illegal immigration built up, the House voted to act on the Simpson-Mazzoli bill. The Senate version was approved last year.

The House agreed June 11 to take up the bill under a rule permitting unlimited debate on each of the proposed amendments. Consequently, provisions adopted or defeated at one point in the debate may be changed later as other amendments are voted on.

The basic bill provides for a legalization program for illegal aliens who entered the United States before Jan. 1, 1982. It also calls for some form of penalties for employers who knowingly hire illegal aliens and requires employers to examine identification documents of prospective employees to make sure applicants are U.S. citizens or legal aliens.

Labor's concerns

While those provisions generally square with labor's concerns, the AFL-CIO is apprehensive about the potentially job-destroying provisions for creating a new guest-worker program for agricultural labor. The federation also wants a strong but workable system of penalties as well as potent anti-discrimination protections.

In other developments in Congress:

- The House Energy & Commerce Committee approved a labor-supported bill that will make lower-cost "generic" drugs more widely available.

In a letter to the committee's chairman, Rep. John Dingell, (D-Mich.) AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison said the federation "strongly supports" the bill that would make as many as 125 prescription drugs available to consumers in generic form—and save them as much as $1 billion—over the next 12 years.

- The AFL-CIO urged the Senate Appropriations Committee to provide for the full $31.3 million in funding authorized for the National Endowment for Democracy. Funds for the newly created agency include $13.8 million for the AFL-CIO's Free Trade Union Institute to continue overseas projects aimed at helping workers form and maintain free, democratic unions. The House voted down funding for the endowment last week. (Rollcall, Page 6).

- The House leadership pledged that the deadline for consideration of bankruptcy legislation will not be extended beyond June 21. The House has already passed crucial legislation to stop companies from using the bankruptcy law as a tool to bust unions, but Senate Republicans have delayed consideration of a similar measure. A firm House deadline is aimed at forcing the Senate to act.

Flight Attendants okay accord with Frontier

Flight Attendants at Frontier Airlines ratified a 32-month agreement that includes an 11-percent pay cut. Frontier operated in the red last year and posted only a $17,150 profit in 1982.

The contract covering 800 attendants was approved by a 59-percent majority just hours before a June 2 strike deadline, AFA reported. An earlier contract proposal had been rejected by better than 2 to 1.

The new agreement provides for starting pay for new employees at $930 a month and an early retirement plan for attendants with 13 years' service.

The AFA said improvements over the rejected contract include full insurance coverage for retirees, granting permanent status to employees who had been hired as temporaries, a profit-sharing plan and a pending employee stock ownership plan.

The Air Line Pilots and the Air Line Employees also have reached agreements for the rule, he said.

IUD plans legal fund for job disease victims

New York—The AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. announced plans to create an Occupational Disease Legal Defense Fund to aid workers who have been exposed to toxic substances.

IUD President Howard D. Samuel, speaking before the International Conference on Disability Compensation for Occupational Disease, explained the two-fold purpose of the fund:

"It is our hope that this fund will, first, help underwrite some of the more difficult cases to be brought on behalf of workers who could not otherwise bring action, and second, reduce the legal costs of litigation so as to increase the net award to workers and their families."

The conference, attended by more than 400 representatives of labor, industry, government and the academic community, was cosponsored by the New York State Workers' Compensation Board and the Collegium Ramazzini, an international organization on occupational disease whose president is Dr. Irving J. Selikoff of Mount Sinai School of Medicine in New York.

Doubled troubles

Samuel charged that the state systems of workers' compensation have failed to adequately compensate occupational disease victims. "It is important to recognize that workers are the victims both of toxic exposure and of the failed compensation system," he said.

The decision to establish a legal defense fund is a reversal of IUD policy, Samuel noted.

"We are going to protect our members' right of access to the judicial system" by opposing any legislation aimed at limiting that access and by supporting "the radiation, asbestos and Agent Orange type cases," he said.

"In other words, we have chosen a two-track system to achieving the certainty, speed and adequacy of compensation to which workers are entitled. We haven't abandoned the original program (of compensation for occupational injury and disease), because it never truly existed. We haven't abandoned our efforts for a national workers' compensation system. We have abandoned the illusion of justice."

A cost factor

Samuel said too many employers regard workplace disease as "simply another cost factor, interfering needlessly and unproductively with profit maximization." The no-fault nature of the state compensation systems generally exempt employers from legal action, and state laws often limit the time in which a victim can file a compensation claim.

This has resulted in victims suing the manufacturers of the toxic or harmful substances, usually with a large portion of any court award going for legal fees.

Samuel told the conference participants a federal solution is needed to the problem of compensation for occupational disease.

The IUD plan was criticized by Prof. John Burton of Cornell University who said Samuel had "clearly condemned" the tort liability system for eating up claimant awards, while at the same time calling for a wider use of the right to sue.

Only recourse

President Dominick D'Ambrosio of the Allied Industrial Workers defended the IUD plan noting that while the tort system has many flaws, "it's the only recourse we have," and "until we get the legislation we need, we must have some recourse."

Anthony Mazzocchi of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers told the conference that the multiple causes of an occupational disease could be cleared up if chemical companies would release "definitive" data to allow conclusive studies to be done.

He said the type of data the oil companies release under the terms of their OCAW contracts is useful only for prospective epidemiological studies, "so workers in (the year) 2030 will know why they're dying."

New York AFL-CIO President Edward J. Cleary expressed his support for a pair of bills in the state legislature to amend the current statute of limitations on filing compensation claims and on filing of personal injury suits.

Morris Pizer dies at 80, led Furniture Workers

New York—Morris Pizer, president emeritus of the Furniture Workers, died recently at the age of 80.

Pizer, who was president of the UFWA from 1946 to 1970, began his career by organizing his fellow workers at an upholstery shop here in 1931. He became an organizer for the UFWA's predecessor union, Furniture Workers Industrial Union, and headed the organizing committee of the UFWA when it was founded in 1937.

He served as secretary-treasurer of New York Local 76 and as an international vice president before being elected to head the union in 1946.

He is survived by his wife and a son.

Loyola honors

An honorary doctor of laws degree was conferred on AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue by Loyola University of Chicago. Officiating at the ceremony were Loyola President Raymond C. Baumhart, S.J., center, and Edward Marciniak, president of Loyola's Institute of Urban Life and a former vice president of the Newspaper Guild.

Social security study finds merit in independent agency

A congressionally appointed study panel says that creation of an independent social security agency outside the Health & Human Services Dept. could lead to "major improvements" in the retirement program.

The panel's finding squares with the AFL-CIO's position that a separate agency is needed to "improve the operation of the program and restore public confidence in the integrity of the social security system."

The Social Security Administration enjoyed independent status from 1935 to 1946.

Associate Director Lawrence Smedley of the federation's Dept. of Occupational Safety, Health & Social Security told a congressional panel last February that maladministration and political manipulation of the agency had resulted in "bad experiences" for an untold number of eligible beneficiaries.

"Tens of thousands of beneficiaries, who made social security contributions throughout their working lives, have received unfair treatment or improper handling of their benefit claims which probably would not have happened had SSA been able to make independent decisions free from the pressures of political appointees," Smedley said.

The study panel, headed by former U.S. Comptroller Gen. Elmer B. Staats, found that HHS cannot give the attention to the social security program that is required because of the complexity of the system, and its size.

Staats said at a June 12 news briefing that he personally favors creation of the separate agency, but stressed that the panel's task was simply to study the feasibility of giving it independent status and leaving it up to Congress to decide on making such a changeover. Other members of the study panel are Martha Derthick, professor of government and foreign affairs at the University of Virginia, and Arthur Hess, former deputy commissioner of SSA.

Currently it is a subdivision of HHS, and its commissioner is subordinate to HHS Sec. Margaret Heckler. The Staats panel noted that the agency has suffered from having nine different commissioners in the past dozen years, a deteriorating computer system, reorganizations that have upset workforce stability, and difficulties in administering its programs, notably its disability claims program.

Disability reviews

The agency's review of the disability claims program has caused thousands of truly disabled persons to lose benefits.

"These beneficiaries did not receive the fair, accurate, and humane reviews to which they were entitled," Smedley testified before the Staats group — Congressional Panel on Social Security Organization — in February. "It seems unlikely that an independent SSA would have handled the program in this manner."

The study panel also recommended to Congress that any newly created agency be relieved of the responsibility that the SSA now has for administering certain programs, including Aid to Families with Dependent Children and Child Support Enforcement. Under the panel's plan, these programs would remain with HHS.

Advisory board

The Staats group recommended a "strong administrator" appointed by the President for a four-year term coinciding with the President's term of office. It also suggested creation of a permanent nine-member advisory board to "oversee management and assess policy issues in social security, and to advise the social security administrator, the President, and the Congress."

Meanwhile, Rep. Edward Roybal (D-Calif.) announced that he and several other House members are introducing a bill that would give independent status to the agency. The Roybal proposal, however, would establish a five-member governing board named by the President.

In February, the AFL-CIO urged that an independent, nonpolitical agency should be under the direction of a five-member board appointed by the President with no more than three members from any one political party.

Court upholds seniority systems

The AFL-CIO is confident the courts will reject the Administration's program to reopen "old cases and old wounds," Kirkland declared. He said the federation looks forward to "close and vigorous cooperation" with its traditional civil rights allies in "the continuing struggle to preserve and advance affirmative action."

The Memphis case grew out of the settlement of a 1977 discrimination suit brought by black workers. The city agreed to substantially step up its hiring and promotion of black fire fighters.

Memphis and the IAFF local had in place a memorandum of understanding that layoffs, if any, would be based on seniority.

When the city began to lay off fire fighters in 1981, black employees sought a court injunction based on their concerns that a "last-hired, first-fired" policy would wipe out the gains of black fire fighters. A federal district court agreed, and that decision was upheld by the U.S. 6th Circuit Court of Appeals in Cincinnati.

As a result, several white fire fighters with seniority were laid off or demoted briefly along with a smaller number of black fire fighters. All were rehired or promoted within a period of six months.

The AFL-CIO and its Public Employee Dept. filed a friend of the court brief supporting the position of the Fire Fighters local. The federation said that while victims of discrimination should be assured their rights, other innocent employees—not responsible for the employers' wrongdoing—should not be harmed in the process.

In other Supreme Court actions:

- The justices let stand an appeals court ruling that the National Labor Relations Board does not have the authority to order remedial bargaining in cases where a union has never obtained majority support from employees—even where the company's unfair labor practices have been "outrageous."

NLRB opposed review

The Reagan NLRB, which recently said it was not going to issue such remedial bargaining orders anyway, argued against the review.

The case grew out of a 1977 attempt by the Ladies' Garment Workers to organize employees at Conair Corp. in Edison, N.J. After a hard-fought campaign, the ILGWU lost a December 1977 election and filed charges with the board. The NLRB ordered Conair to bargain with the union, partly on the grounds that the firm's "outrageous and pervasive" violations of labor law would make a fair rerun of the election impossible. But a decision by the District of Columbia Circuit Court of Appeals blocked the bargaining order.

The case stemmed from a suit brought by several members of Local 82 of the unaffiliated Teamsters.

- The question of whether the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission has power to enforce the Equal Pay Act and the Age Discrimination in Employment Act was left murky as the justices refused to review a lower court decision denying the agency enforcement authority.

But the case revolved around the issue of the so-called legislative veto power written into the law rather than substantive civil rights issues. About 200 other federal laws are also affected.

Last year, the Supreme Court struck down as unconstitutional attempts by Congress to enact veto power for one or both houses to nullify actions of the Executive Branch. The Equal Pay Act contains the forbidden language, and the EEOC wanted the court to clarify whether the unconstitutional language could be separated from the rest of the measure.

House rollcall on endowment funding

The National Endowment for Democracy was established last year to support activities of private groups, including the AFL-CIO, to encourage democratic institutions in other countries. The House voted 226-173 on May 31 to stop funding the program.

As the AFL-CIO views it, wrong votes (W) to end funding were cast by 139 Democrats and 87 Republicans. Voting right (R) were 106 Democrats and 67 Republicans.

Looking to the Democrats

AMERICAN WORKERS are looking to the Democratic Party to restore faith in their government as an instrument for the advancement of all the people. They look to the Democratic Party to reaffirm its historic commitment to equal rights and equal opportunity through a platform that calls for jobs and fairness and looks to the future.

Democrats must stand for a massive reinvestment in America—in our human resources and in our decaying infrastructure. Let others rant about "getting government off our backs." Such demagogery will not build a single classroom, retrain a single worker, repair a single rotting bridge, or take us one step closer to security in a dangerous world.

Life in America revolves around work. Exactly as a good job is the foundation of a good life, full employment is the foundation of a good society, the key to stable family life, wholesome neighborhoods, and a self-reliant citizenry.

We propose, therefore, that full employment should be not a plank but the foundation of the 1984 Democratic platform.

Because multinational corporations have shipped America's productive capacity overseas, because business bankruptcies are mounting, because 8 million Americans are unemployed and paychecks are shrinking, we have a lower inflation rate than we might otherwise have had.

But what a price we have paid. Massive unemployment has taken a heavy toll on the working middle class. Working families have always supposed that life would be better for their children. Now they are not sure.

THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY must speak to their needs if it is to win in November.

We need a reasoned industrial policy, incorporating the views of labor, management, government and the public, dedicated to making the most of the nation's physical and human resources.

We need a trade policy which insists that all nations play by the same rules.

We must repeal those unfair and irresponsible Reagan tax giveaways and that array of credits, deductions and exclusions which have increased the proportional tax burdens of low- and middle-income people and lightened the tax load of business and the wealthy.

We must halt the flow of "supply-side" giveaways to corporations which were supposed to invest in jobs-producing industry but instead used their booty to buy and sell each other in an orgy of corporate cannibalism.

Fairness is a central issue in the elections of 1984.

Fairness requires that the next Democratic administration return the agencies of government to their proper functions, and restore the humane and necessary programs that have been dissolved.

AMERICAN WORKING men and women are looking to the Democratic Party to put their government back in the business of fighting discrimination and inequality.

That calls for early passage and ratification of the Equal Rights Amendment and for enactment of federal legislation promoting wage equity and equal pay for comparable work.

Although the American labor movement is the property of no party, we know that most workers have historically looked to the Democratic Party for a government that is responsive to their deepest concerns. And we know that their support has been essential to every Democratic victory in modern times.

In advancing these platform proposals, the AFL-CIO calls upon the Democratic Party to continue and to deepen its role as a party of working men and women, and thereby to enhance its own prospects, and advance the nation's in November.

—From AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland's presentation to the Democratic platform committee, Washington, D.C., June 11, 1984.

Elderly most vulnerable to medical quacks, fraud

By Press Associates, Inc.

The elderly—often lonely and with meager resources—remain perhaps the most vulnerable group in American society.

That much seems clear after a House hearing revealed that medical quackery is a major growth industry, with the elderly its chief victims.

In 1965, a Senate committee estimated that medical quackery cost the nation $1 billion a year. Today, a conservative estimate puts the cost at more than $10 billion.

Rep. Claude Pepper (D-Fla.), vigorous spokesman for the nation's elderly, emerged as the prime force behind a four-year investigation into the impact of quackery on the elderly.

In releasing the 250-page study, Pepper said it proves that "quackery is a national scandal," and added:

"Billions of dollars are being ripped off. Thousands of people are being harmed. Many of our most vulnerable citizens have the last few precious moments of their lives stolen from them or suffer needlessly, and no one seems interested in doing anything about it."

"Some of the phony products being promoted by these crooks and quacks," Pepper said, "include cancer cures like a compound composed of ground-up diamonds, a tonic made of warts of horses suspended in sour milk, and serums drawn from human urine and fecal matter.

Bogus remedies

"We found promoters who advised arthritics to bury themselves in the earth, sit in an abandoned mine, or stand naked under a 1,000-watt bulb during the full moon.

"These suffering souls have been wrapped in manure, soaked in mud, injected with snake venom, sprayed with WD-40, bathed in kerosene, and made to pay for the privilege."

The House Committee on Aging got into the problem by conducting hearings on frauds perpetrated against the elderly. It found that, while senior citizens make up 11 percent of the population, they account for 30 percent of all crime victims. Surveys showed that fraud was the largest category of non-violent crime, and health care fraud was the most important, with the elderly making up 60 percent of the victims.

The elderly are vulnerable because they have very real health problems, the study said. They are sick three times as often and three times as long as younger people. Their medical bills are triple those of younger people and they have half the income.

Phony cures

The Pepper report said phony cancer cures make up the largest share of health care frauds, at up to $5 billion a year. Questionable arthritis cures cost the nation $2 billion and anti-aging remedies the same or more.

To deal with the problem, the Pepper report said that, first, there must be greater public awareness. Next, the states, with primary authority for enforcing criminal laws, must become active; unfortunately, two-thirds of the states lack criminal sanctions against health care fraud.

On the federal level, the Pepper study had praise only for the U.S. Postal Service as aggressively trying to enforce the law. But it urged more inspectors and tougher criminal penalties. Other agencies, such as the Federal Trade Commission, the Food & Drug Administration, and the FBI and Justice Dept., have been asleep on the job, the report charged.

One hopeful response from Congress has been the sudden bipartisan movement in both House and Senate to create a National Institute of Arthritis. The disease costs the nation $25 billion a year, yet only $80 million is being spent on research this year.

Finally, the Pepper report said Congress should create an agency to impartially test new drugs and unproven remedies. A public clearinghouse can then respond to citizen inquiries as to whether alleged remedies are legitimate.

MEMO FROM COPE

Pundits, Schmundits . . . Let's Hold Election, Anyway!

Why even bother to hold the presidential election?

A whole bunch of commentators and columnists already have conceded it to President Reagan.

But maybe we should conduct it anyway, simply to permit the people to ratify the decision of the pundits—or, on the other hand, in case the pundits are wrong. It wouldn't be the first time.

Following are some of the arguments these seers raise to explain their re-election of Reagan this far in advance of November 6:

► What with a gee-whiz recovery (the President's appraisal of it), the economy is taken away from the Democrats as a major issue.

► The Democrats have so bloodied themselves in the primary/caucus process they won't be able to bind the self-inflicted wounds sufficiently to mount an effective presidential campaign.

Each of these conclusions floats on quicksand and could be sucked under any time between now and November 6.

1. Reagan's personal popularity—It is high. He seems as widely liked as Smokey the Bear. But his person is much more popular than his policies. In virtually all polls, he shows up with a rating almost twice as high in personality as in program. On issues like health, nutrition, education, and the environment, for example, the 65 percent figure of voters who like Reagan personally turns topsy-turvy to 65 percent who oppose what he's done. The percentages change even more radically on foreign policy issues.

Then, too, in the polls Reagan's personal standing apparently does not translate into much pulling power in terms of voter support for his candidacy.

There's been constant reference since 1980 to the Reagan "landslide" of that year, so much that it's hardly recalled anymore that the "landslide" was strictly in electoral votes. Reagan got just 51 percent of the popular vote.

Those in the media who prematurely have re-elected him seem not to be paying attention to their own polls. Consistently, when pitted in surveys in recent months against credible prospective Democratic challengers, Reagan has failed to expand much beyond the 51 percent that elected him.

When the Democratic nomination becomes official, that percentage will fluctuate with the ebb and flow of the campaign. But it should be sobering to Republicans (though there's no evidence of it—they're on a real high) that there's been practically no growth in Reagan's political support since 1980.

A further point: In recent months, Democratic presidential candidates have been going at one another. For the most part, Reagan's been out of the line of fire. The focus now shifts to him. His record will be openly and forcefully debated. He'll have to defend it—all of it. And much of it, the public does not approve.

2. The economic issue—A couple of things can be said about this: (a) There is a lot of residual grief— and plenty of long memories—from the first Reagan Recession, and (b) there is a lot of fear that a second one is on the way unless current policies (and by inference, the President responsible for them) are traded in.

After 3½ years under Reagan, unemployment is finally back down to the range it was when he arrived. In the interim, more than 30 million working Americans suffered one or more periods of joblessness. Hundreds of thousands are still out, and many will never get back to the jobs they had unless steps are taken to help revive the industries that once employed them.

Meanwhile, such as the recovery is, it has made no dent in the number of Americans living in poverty. Indeed, the number has ballooned under Reagan. And the recovery restores none of the food, medical or housing assistance taken from millions of the needy by Reagan policies.

For these millions, the economy remains an issue.

And it's an issue for millions of others who see an increasing number of headlines and reports warning of a second Reagan Recession not far down the pike. Many economists see it as more devastating than the first one.

If it were only labor or Democratic or "liberal" economists making such predictions, they could be shrugged off by the Reagan campaign perhaps as politically inspired sour grapes. But economists of a wide variety of viewpoints—including conservative—are in the chorus, warning that Reagan deficits could be the economy's undoing.

Only the President himself, and his head pom-pom person, Treasury Secretary Donald Regan, seem unphased by the Pikes Peak-like deficits. Strange for a couple of persons who entered office hell-bent on balancing the budget, promising to do it by 1983, and deploring Carter-era deficits only one-fourth the size of the ones they've produced.

Almost every economist predicts dire events stemming from the deficits, among them continued high—and increasing—interest rates, which could turn the economy onto a fast downhill slope.

So the economic issue is not all peaches and cream for the President.

3. The Democrats have done themselves in—Not that Democrats are incapable of spilling their own blood by the gallon, but it's a bit much to describe the recently completed primary/caucus cycle in such gory terms. Yes, the two leading candidates threw some heavy leather and opened cuts on one another.

But there is far more uniting than dividing them, and the adhesive that will bind them together is their common goal and their party's of retiring Ronald Reagan from office.

It might be a while before togetherness arrives—indeed, the convention itself might be testy—but there are too many with too much at stake in a unified campaign in the fall to think that any one of the primary candidates or any segment of the party will throw a monkey-wrench into the works.

Certainly, Reagan would benefit from a divided party. They know this, and won't give him that edge.

It turns out not one of the major arguments advanced to make Reagan seem a sure bet is solidly based. So—pundits, schmundits—let's hold the election November 6 anyway.

You never know: The voters might have something else in mind.

Odds 'n Ends

NICE COMPLIMENT from Howell Raines, writing in New York Times, June 10: "While few doubted the importance of the AFL-CIO endorsement (of Walter Mondale) perhaps no one suspected its absolute indispensability. Labor deserves the major credit for engineering the massive turnout of union and elderly voters that helped Mr. Mondale overcome the drain on his electoral base caused by the Rev. Jesse Jackson's ability to capture huge majorities among black voters."

JOE McCARTHY SYNDROME spreads out from U.S. House—where right-wing Republicans hurl "soft on communism charges" at Democrats—right into the middle of campaigns. Conservative Alliance, headed by National Conservative PAC's Terry Dolan, plans $500,000 independent expenditures campaign against incumbent Democratic House members in seven states. Theme: "Soft on Communism." Opening guns fired in Maryland at Reps. Mike Barnes and Clarence Long. Weapons are direct mail, radio/TV ads reminiscent of smear stuff that broke on the scene in a big way in 1980 Senate races with great success, but flopped badly in 1982.

SENATE STILL 'IFFY' on who'll hold reins as of next January. GOP confident it won't lose control, though present 55-45 margin not expected to hold up. Democratic seat in Massachusetts previously thought safe now questionable after recent announcement of Sen. Paul Tsongas that he's stepping down. GOP candidate is Eliot Richardson, popular in Bay State, and no mossback, holder of many elective and high appointive offices. Progressive Rep. James Shannon (92 percent "right" on AFL-CIO voting record), received state Democratic Party endorsement, but still must win nomination in September primary.

Got a Better One-Vote-Counts Story Than This?

If his lead holds up through the recount, and if he goes on to win in November, labor-supported Lloyd Doggett's victory in the recent Texas Democratic Senate primary could be one of the great one-vote-counts stories of them all.

Doggett topped conservative Democratic Rep. Kent Hance in the state's run-off primary with a pre-recount edge of only 467 votes out of 979,309 votes cast. That's 50.02 to 49.98 percent.

This close battle in the run-off follows a cliff-hanger first primary on May 5 in which Doggett ran second to Hance by only 273 votes but ahead of former Rep. Bob Krueger by a little less than 1,000—the three of them separated by less than a percentage point and barely more than 1,000 votes out of 1.5 million votes cast. (Earlier figures on the first primary, carried in the May 19 Memo, differed and were based on incomplete returns.)

But this is just the beginning. Should Doggett's victory be confirmed by the recount, he'll head into the general election against Rep. Phil Gramm, the GOP Senate nominee. Should Doggett then defeat Gramm, four ultra-conservatives would have left office in this election for one Senate seat.

It starts with the incumbent, Sen. John Tower (R), who voluntarily decided not to seek re-election. He leaves behind a 91 percent "wrong" AFL-CIO voting record.

En route to the GOP nomination, Gramm ousted right-wing Rep. Ron Paul in the primary, so Paul will be out of office come January. Paul's AFL-CIO voting record is 93 percent "wrong."

Again, if Doggett after the recount remains the primary winner, he will have bumped a "Boll Weevil" Democrat, Hance, whose AFL-CIO record is 67 percent "wrong."

Finally, should Doggett make it all the way and win election in November, in dumping Gramm he'll take out an 89 percent "wrong" voting record.

In aggregate, the four—Tower, Paul, Hance, Gramm—have cast 68 "right" votes and 464 "wrong" votes on the AFL-CIO record, just shy of 7-1 "wrong."

What a parlay it would be to see these four sent out to pasture as a consequence of one race.

And all this could flow from a few votes in the first primary and another few in the run-off.

Does one vote count? You bet it does!

Speaking of one vote, in the GOP run-off primary for Phil Gramm's House seat in Texas, Max Hoyt edged his opponent by only 18 votes—4,630 to 4,612. In an even closer race, Rosemary Thakar took the GOP House nomination in California's 7th District by only 12 votes out of 38,040 cast—19,026 to 19,014.

Reagan plan to cut youth pay branded 'unfair, deceptive'

By James M. Shevis

An Administration plan for a subminimum summer wage for youths is a scheme whose benefits would accrue to predatory employers and not to workers, the AFL-CIO charged in testimony before a Senate committee.

The federation is "unalterably opposed" to the plan, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison told the Senate Committee on Labor & Human Resources, because its passage would lead to "exploitation of Americans of any age, any sex, any color, any religion, any national origin."

Under the proposal, introduced by Sen. Charles Percy (R-Ill.), employers would be allowed to hire youths 16 to 19 years old at jobs paying $2.50 an hour for the five-month period between May 1 and Sept. 30. The federal minimum wage is now $3.35 an hour.

The Administration claims the Youth Employment Opportunity Wage, as the proposal is called, would expand job opportunities for young people. The plan is a more limited, experimental version of a White House proposal that was shot down by Congress last year.

Actually, Denison charged, the subminimum wage plan is "an unfair and ineffective deception hiding behind the noble purpose of creating jobs for young Americans."

Defenseless youths

"Its true effect will be to serve up hundreds of thousands of young defenseless workers to employers most willing to exploit them," he said. "The American custom has been to pay workers for their contributions and experience, not according to their age or group unemployment rate."

The AFL-CIO has warned that any step backward from the current minimum wage standard eventually would be expanded, and that this would particularly hurt entry-level workers, the untrained, and the uneducated.

"To the extent that preference is given to workers under 20 in obtaining jobs," Denison said, "the result of a subminimum wage will simply be to transfer unemployment to others who will be struggling for the same minimum wage jobs—those over 20, finished with school trying to start working careers—or those frozen in low-wage jobs.

"The idea of experimenting with discrimination based on age or unemployment rates is simply offensive, particularly as it is clear that idea will not and has not created new employment in the past."

Appearing for the Administration in support of the plan, Labor Sec. Raymond Donovan contended that the subminimum wage could create as many as 400,000 new jobs this summer, an estimate quickly challenged by Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), a member of the committee.

Kennedy attacked the proposal as "a shopworn idea." He challenged Donovan to show how he arrived at his figure and to explain how the Labor Dept. could

House version opposed

Battle on immigration shifted to conference

The congressional battleground on immigration reform shifted to a House-Senate conference after the House narrowly adopted a jerry-built measure by a 216-211 vote.

Although the Senate has twice passed similar bills by better than 4-1 margins, the legislation will face several hurdles when conferees meet to reconcile major differences.

Labor and Hispanic leaders are rallying support to eliminate a House-adopted amendment introduced by Rep. Leon Panetta (D-Calif.) that would permit employers to continue to use large numbers of foreign agricultural workers to harvest crops.

Unions are also pressing for stronger sanctions against employers who knowingly hire illegal aliens.

The AFL-CIO withdrew support for final passage of the bill following adoption of the Panetta amendment on a 228-172 vote.

Exploiting workers

In calling for the defeat of the bill, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison warned that "with the inclusion of the Panetta amendment, the agricultural industry has been given a free hand to continue to employ—and exploit—undocumented workers to their detriment and the detriment of U.S. domestic workers."

The legislation, which had the backing of the Reagan Administration, sharply divided Democrats and Republicans. Democrats voted against final passage 135 to 125, while Republicans favored the bill 91 to 73. (Rollcall, Page 8.)

Passage of the bill came after a week of often heated debate and votes on more than 60 amendments.

Surprising opposition

The chief sponsor of the House bill, Rep. Romano Mazzoli, (D-Ky.), expressed surprise over the large number of negative votes. He initially introduced the legislation in March 1982 with Sen. Allan Simpson (R-Wyo.), chairman of the Senate subcommittee on Immigration.

House conferees have not yet been named. Senate members of the conference committee will be Simpson, Strom Thurmond (R-S.C.), chairman of the Judiciary Committee, and Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), ranking minority member of the Judiciary subcommittee on Immigration.

Both the House and Senate must approve any changes made by the conferees.

The key features of the legislation include amnesty for certain undocumented persons already in the country, and sanctions on employers for illegal hiring practices.

Both the House and Senate versions would impose fines up to $2,000 on an employer who knowingly hires an illegal

Bankruptcy bill labor protections put to conferees

The issue of strong worker protections when a company declares bankruptcy is now up to a Senate-House conference committee which will seek to reconcile differing measures to reform the nation's bankruptcy laws.

Strong safeguards for workers and their unions were part of the bankruptcy reform measure approved by the House last March. But by agreement, the Senate version omitted the labor provision.

Organized labor had been supporting an amendment by Sen. Robert Packwood (R-Ore.) that would require court approval before a company could abrogate labor agreements during a corporate reorganization under the bankruptcy laws. Before giving approval, a judge would have to rule that the company was near collapse.

The AFL-CIO will press for inclusion of the House language in the bill that emerges from the House-Senate conference com-

Defense firm earns its workers' ire

By John R. Oravec

General Dynamics Corp.—the nation's largest defense contractor—is rapidly becoming a rotten place to work, union witnesses testified at House hearings.

They cited deteriorating collective bargaining relations and worsening job safety problems for workers at plants of the giant conglomerate.

For such a high ranking corporation, General Dynamics could do much better for its 85,000 employees, the panel of union representatives stressed at joint hearings of the House Labor subcommittees on Labor-Management Relations and Safety & Health.

Leadoff witness Owen Bieber, president of the Auto Workers, branded General Dynamics "a tough, arrogant management which is more concerned about short-range profits and rewards for executives than with the long-range health of the corporation and its workers."

Bieber charged that the company is being abetted in its abuse of workers by several federal agencies, including the Defense Dept.

Year-old strike

Alluding to a year-old UAW strike at the company's Electric Boat Division at Groton, Conn., Bieber said:

"Here is a conglomerate which draws its strength and support from the deep pockets of the U.S. defense establishment. Instead of playing a constructive role and encouraging the company to reach an equitable settlement with its employees, the Dept. of Defense makes bargaining more difficult."

Others on the union panel included President Howard D. Samuel of the Industrial Union Dept. and representatives of the Machinists and Marine & Shipbuilding Workers.

More than a dozen IUD affiliates represent General Dynamics workers, Samuel noted, "and they share the concern of the UAW about the anti-labor tactics and anti-community attitudes of this corporation."

Samuel charged that the corporation is shirking its obligation to its workers, communities where it has plants, and the nation, particularly since it gets most of its income from the federal government.

In 1983, General Dynamics rang up a net profit of $286 million, more than double its 1982 gains.

"Despite a year of unprecedented profits, the company has insisted on major wage concessions by its workers and refuses to consider ending a number of inequities which currently exist," Samuel testified.

OSHA reporting change hit for skewing inspection data

The AFL-CIO charged at a House subcommittee hearing that statistics collected by the Occupational Safety & Health Administration on worker illness and injury are "often misrepresented and misapplied."

OSHA was scored for its plans to revise its medical access rule, for its unannounced changes in inspection reporting, and for its widespread exemptions of manufacturers from general duty safety inspections.

Margaret Seminario, associate director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Occupational Safety, Health & Social Security, told members of the House Subcommittee on Manpower & Housing that the federation is concerned that the agency's plans to weaken the medical access rule "will seriously erode existing exposure and medical information making future evaluation of occupational disease more difficult, and impede worker and union access to this important information."

She pointed out at the oversight hearings that the medical access rule was established in 1980 to require employers to maintain records on worker exposure to toxic substances and make those records available to OSHA, the employees and their representatives.

Major provisions of the rule were recently upheld by the 5th Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals. The court rejected industry arguments that the rule's definition of a toxic substance is too broad, that the unions should not be provided access to the data, and that the trade secret provisions allowing worker and union access to chemical identities were not sufficiently protective.

Seminario pointed out that it was precisely those sections which OSHA in 1982 proposed to change by reducing the number of toxic substances covered by 90 percent, by allowing destruction of chemical identity records needed to establish historical exposures, and by precluding worker access to chemical identities claimed by manufacturers as trade secrets.

Switch of purpose

She charged that in making changes in its inspection activity, apparently "OSHA has decided that it is more important to have favorable statistics for public relations purposes than it is to have valid data for meaningful program evaluation."

Under the Reagan Administration, the agency's enforcement activity has shown "drastic declines," she said. In 1982, OSHA began including "records inspections" in its reports. These "records" inspections never evaluate workplace hazards and by policy, cannot result in citations for violations.

Seminario said that last February OSHA changed its enforcement reporting "to put a more favorable face on its dismal enforcement record." The agency began including records checks in its individual inspection totals and for the first time listed them as general schedule inspections.

The result, Seminario said, has been a skewing of the agency's inspection activity. For fiscal year 1983, the reporting change increases the number of workers covered by inspections from slightly over 2 million workers to nearly 3 million, while the claimed inspections grew from 48,745 to 59,351.

Seminario charged that this new practice "misrepresents enforcement activity." She noted that using the new rules, the agency recently claimed that it conducted more inspections in FY 1984 than any year since 1976.

On the use of widespread safety inspection exemptions, the AFL-CIO charged the program "by design exempts 75 percent of all manufacturing firms from OSHA general schedule safety inspections." Further, more than 50 percent of the manufacturing inspections result only in a records check.

OSHA's "targeting" program aimed at high-hazard industries is actually finding fewer violations under the Reagan Administration than under previous administrations, Seminario pointed out to the subcommittee.

Convention action

All-out political effort pledged by ACTWU

Hollywood, Fla.—Organizing, imports, job safety and political action dominated the discussions of the Clothing and Textile Workers' third constitutional convention here.

Calling for an all-out political drive, the 2,000 delegates pledged that 1984 will be "the year of our greatest registration and get-out-the-vote effort" to defeat Ronald Reagan and elect Walter F. Mondale as the next President.

The delegates also stressed the importance of electing "our friends" to the U.S. Senate and House. In a unanimous resolution, they declared that "only through effective political involvement will we achieve a program that will end the terrible human tragedy and national waste of high unemployment, rebuild our industrial base, establish a fair trade policy" and guarantee rights for women and minorities.

Recognizing the obstacles to organizing and the climate of apprehension felt in many shops, the convention emphasized the need for political change to encourage organizing. Delegates crowded to the microphones to urge more effort from the ACTWU staff and increased volunteer assistance.

All responsible

"We shouldn't blame the head table for anything," said a delegate from Paris, Ont. "We should make use of our best resource —our members—to get the job done."

In addressing the problem of imports, delegates from many states and Canadian provinces described the devastating effects of foreign-made goods on their jobs and their communities.

Another issue that aroused emotional support was occupational safety and health. The dangerous and unhealthy conditions brought about by failure of the authorities to enforce the standards already in place, were movingly depicted. Delegates commended the union leadership in fighting for standards and denounced the "blatant, reprehensible efforts of the Reagan Administration to severely weaken the Occupational Safety & Health Act."

In other actions, the delegates approved the creation of an ACTWU civil rights department, and took strong stands in favor of child care, education, environmental protection, consumer protection and foreign policy. The convention urged an end to the nuclear arms race, calling on the U.S. government to take new initiatives in the arms limitation talks, and demanding an end to military aid to El Salvador and to "any country found violating basic human rights."

Common struggle

In his address to the delegates, ACTWU Sec.-Treas. Jack Sheinkman cited the struggle for better wages, conditions and security as the "special interests" of all workers and told the delegates that "we know from hard experience that we either advance together or suffer apart."

Sheinkman described "full employment, a decent minimum wage, the health and safety of working people" as some of the special interests of organized labor.

He said that a key element needed for labor's recovery from the ills created by the Reagan Administration is political activity that "conducts year-round voter registration campaigns and encourages our members into the political process and utilizes their enormous potential strength."

Executive Vice President Scott M. Hoyman called for broad trade union cooperation in combatting corporate management that is taking advantage of workers' economic problems "for opportunistic, concessionary bargaining."

He said unions must work together to face the challenge of technological change, foreign imports and non-union products.

Near the closing of the convention, Mondale stirred the delegates with a closed circuit television address from Houston where he was meeting with Texas delegates to next month's Democratic National Convention.

Greeting his "old friends" in ACTWU, Mondale described his agenda for health programs, better educational facilities, productive jobs in both the public and private sectors and the regulation of imports.

J. Albert Woll dies at 80, AFL-CIO general counsel

J. Albert Woll, general counsel for the AFL-CIO since its formation in 1955, died of cancer June 19 at Georgetown University Hospital.

Woll, who was 80, had served as general counsel for the AFL from 1947 until the merger with the CIO eight years later.

At the time of his death, he also was general counsel of the Operating Engineers and the Bricklayers and chairman of the board of Union Labor Life Insurance Co.

In a message to his family, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue said that "it would be impossible to say how many millions of workers and how many families have benefited directly from his skill and dedication to their interests in the realms of law and insurance. The whole United States is a better place because he lived."

J. Albert Woll

During the 1940s and '50s Woll worked closely with the late George Meany, president of the AFL and later the merged federation, in efforts to rid the union movement of communist and corrupt influences. Woll also had been general counsel of the Teamsters until the union was expelled from the federation in 1957.

He was the son of the late Matthew Woll, an AFL-CIO vice president and president of the International Photo-Engravers Union.

Chicago roots

Woll was a native of Chicago. After earning a law degree from the University of Illinois in 1927, he went into private practice. He later served as a prosecutor for Cook County and in 1934 was appointed a special assistant to the U.S. Attorney General in Washington.

In 1940, President Roosevelt named him U.S. attorney for northern Illinois. He held that post until 1947 when he became general counsel of the AFL and the Teamsters. Woll was a member of a number of bars, including that of the U.S. Supreme Court.

He served on the Prison Reform Commission headed by Chief Justice Warren Burger and was a director of the American Bar Association and a director of Catholic Charities in Washington.

His wife Genevieve died in 1974. Survivors include two children and 15 grandchildren.

Services were held at Our Lady of Mercy Church in Potomac, Md.. June 22. Burial was at Gate of Heaven Cemetery in Silver Spring, Md.

Texaco, Sunoco strikes pressed by Oil Workers

Denver — Management demands for sharp wage reductions and other givebacks are causing strikes against Texaco and Sunoco to drag on, the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers charged.

"These two prosperous companies, which are immensely profitable in spite of current economic conditions, are using the present day anti-labor climate to rewrite work practices and standards," OCAW President Joseph Misbrenner said.

The Sunoco strike by 1,400 OCAW members at Marcus Hook, Pa., and Toledo, Ohio, began Mar. 21. Instead of agreeing to a pattern industry settlement, the company is sticking to its demand for wage cuts of up to $4.70 an hour and weakening of the seniority system at the two refineries.

OCAW accused Texaco of insisting on slashing wages up to $5 an hour, tearing up the seniority clause and eliminating craft lines. The Texaco strike by 700 workers at Wilmington and Long Beach, Calif., and Anacortes, Wash., began Feb. 24.

OCAW said negotiations have been at a standstill because of the hardline position taken by both companies.

In an effort to get talks moving, the union's executive board has called for a consumer boycott of Texaco and Sunoco until a fair settlement is reached.

Trade panel backs copper import relief

The American copper industry sorely needs relief from the onslaught of imports, the International Trade Commission agreed unanimously.

In the 5-0 ruling, the ITC held that U.S. copper producers are being seriously injured by the flood of refined and blister copper coming primarily from Chile and to a lesser degree from Canada, Peru, Zaire and Zambia.

Imported copper has taken over 26 percent of the U.S. market, the ITC found, resulting in economic setbacks for the industry and job losses for American workers.

In earlier action, the commission voted 3-2 for relief for the domestic steel industry because of a 26-percent import penetration. But it rejected 5-0 a union-industry petition for relief from foreign-made shoes even though footwear imports have marched off with 69 percent of the U.S. market.

The copper industry is requesting quotas for five years limiting imports to about 350,000 metric tons a year. In 1983, imports of refined copper ingots and blister copper (slightly less pure than refined copper) surged 48 percent over 1982 to 528,000 tons.

Chile's tonnage in the U.S. market has more than tripled since 1979, according to industry data. Last year, Chile accounted for more than 55 percent of the imports.

Chilean cap

In their petition, 11 major copper producers asked the commission to cap the Chilean imports at 100,000 tons a year. They have been pouring into the country at an annual rate in excess of 250,000 tons. The petitioners also want Canada to hold its exports to the United States at current levels.

While unions representing copper industry workers were not signatories to the petitions, they expressed strong support for the ITC action.

The commission will meet later this month to determine an appropriate remedy to recommend to the President by July 9. Under provisions of the 1974 Trade Act he will have 60 days to accept, reject or modify the ITC recommendations.

In summing up the domestic copper industry's problems, ITC member David B. Rohr noted that "significant numbers of mines, smelters and refineries have closed, many permanently. Employment and hours worked have dropped dramatically at all stages of processing. The industry is running at substantial levels of losses."

Following the copper decision, ITC member Alfred Eckes's two-year term as chairman expired. The White House named commission member Paula Stern, a Democrat, to the position. Under the law that set up the ITC, the new chairman cannot come from the same political party as the predecessor. And since Eckes is a Republican, Stern was the only member to qualify.

While Stern supported relief on copper imports, she opposed the earlier petitions on steel and shoe import remedies.

ILO rebuffs Soviets on bid to curb rights monitoring

Geneva — A Soviet-sponsored draft aimed at undermining the International Labor Organization's ability to review implementation of labor and human rights standards by member nations was swept aside in the early stages of the ILO's annual conference, handing the Soviet bloc a major setback.

The Soviet effort was rejected when the resolutions committee failed to accord priority consideration to any of the five technical draft proposals submitted by the USSR and other Soviet-bloc nations. The Soviets had called for establishment of a working party to discuss revision of the ILO supervisory machinery for monitoring the way governments implement the standards they pledge to observe.

The communists asserted that present ILO standard drafting and monitoring procedures fail to take account of the "realities of the social, economic and political systems" of their countries.

But many western delegates view the communist campaign as aimed at the eventual dissolution of the ILO's unique tripartite structure that assures trade unions and employer organizations of member states a voice independent of their governments.

Elections

In other action, free trade unionists scored heavily in the election of worker members of the ILO's Governing Body.

All 13 nominees of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions were elected to the executive body by their fellow worker delegates.

The long-established ICFTU practice of not contesting one seat enabled the Soviet "worker" delegate, Alexander Soubbotine, to squeak through with the smallest vote of the 14 elected representatives.

Employer delegates also hold 14 seats on the Governing Body while the 28 seats assigned governments round out the executive body's total membership of 56. Elections are for three-year terms.

Irving Brown, the U.S. worker delegate and director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of International Affairs, was re-elected to the Governing Body. Also chosen to new terms were Gerd Muhr of the West German Confederation of Trade Unions, Alfonso Sanchez Madariaga of the Mexican Trade Union Federation, and Shirley Carr of the Canadian Labor Congress.

Brown hailed the election of the 13 ICFTU candidates because of the discipline demonstrated by the free workers in this ballot and its confirmation of their predominance in the ILO.

Soviet setback

This was confirmed by the fact that for the first time in a council election the Soviet candidate was relegated to the bottom rung in the key ballot.

The only disappointing development for free workers was the failure of Gideon Ben-Israel of Israel's Histadrut to be returned as a deputy worker member of the Governing Body despite ICFTU endorsement.

The Israeli labor representative lost out in the secondary balloting for the Governing Body because of an apparent slippage in free worker cohesion. This is believed by many delegates to have been due to the votes that went to Wang Jiachong, the first worker representative to appear on the ballot from Communist China, which took over China's ILO membership only last year.

Application of international labor standards is the focus of this year's conference. Bricklayers President John Joyce is the representative of the U.S. worker delegation in the committee where new guidelines are being readied for adoption by the conference.

Service Employees President John Sweeney is on the committee that is taking a preliminary look at new standards for protecting the lives and health of workers against on-the-job hazards.

UAW passes test

Romeo, Mich. — Test drivers and mechanics at the Ford Motor Co. proving grounds here voted for representation by the Auto Workers. They are the largest unit of U.S. salaried employees at Ford to join the union.

The 166-member unit, peeved about unresolved grievances and no pay increases since 1980, decided it had a "better idea" for gaining respect and dignity from the company.

In 1983, Ford's top executives received increases of 13 to 17 percent, plus large bonuses, while the company's profits failed to trickle down to the general salaried workers. UAW Vice President Stephen P. Yokich said the union would let the company know of the frustration and anger of the unit—which includes test drivers, performance test drivers and driver mechanics—and that it deserves a fair and equitable contract.

Scheme to slash youth pay called 'unfair, deceptive' monitor compliance with the plan in view of the Administration's huge staff and budget cutbacks.

In his testimony, Denison pointed out that the current $3.35 minimum wage is a subminimum wage in terms of purchasing power.

"In fact, if the real value of the minimum wage is to be restored to the January 1978 level it would have to be increased to $4.31 per hour in April 1984 terms," he noted.

Denison said there is a pressing need to increase the minimum wage for the 10 million American workers employed at or near the current $3.35 level.

Rarely does the AFL-CIO agree with the National Chamber Foundation, he observed, but on two points in that organization's recent study on minimum wage regulation it agrees: one, that the current $3.35 minimum wage is low, and two, that there is no need for a youth subminimum wage.

A youth subminimum is the wrong way to deal with the problems of youths seeking education, training, and employment, Denison stressed.

"The right approach must include improvement and expansion of education, training, work experiecce and employment opportunities for young people, with special emphasis on stay-in-school programs and earnings opportunities for disadvantaged youth with school-and-work programs," he said.

Legislation along these lines has been proposed in Congress by Kennedy and Rep. Augustus F. Hawkins (D-Calif.), which the AFL-CIO supports.

Bankruptcy bill put to conferees

mittee. The target date for final action on the bill is June 27.

The measure is designed to overturn the effects of a recent Supreme Court ruling that a company seeking relief under the bankruptcy laws could cancel its union contracts if it found them "burdensome."

In the Senate, anti-union lobbying against the Packwood amendment was led by the U.S. Chamber of Commerce. While there appeared to be enough votes to pass the labor safeguards, opponents threatened to use filibuster tactics to kill the entire bankruptcy measure if necessary to block the amendment. Sen. Robert Dole (R-Kan.), chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, who negotiated the agreement to bypass the labor guarantees, made it clear to the federation and concerned unions that the labor issue would be taken up by the conference committee.

In what has been the most intense business-labor dispute on Capitol Hill this year, Senate debate on the measure ranged over a variety of issues. Among other things, the bill would create 85 new federal judgeships to relieve clogged federal courts.

Other protections

The Senate bill also incorporates provisions to protect shopping centers whose tenants go bankrupt and owners of time-shared condominium developments that fail.

The issue of whether a company can walk away from its labor contract arose in February when the Supreme Court, in a case involving a New Jersey building supplies concern, Bildisco & Bildisco, said that employers may discard their collective bargaining agreements when they file for reorganization.

In that decision, the court noted that a company could abandon its labor contract even before a bankruptcy judge had considered its financial plight.

Before the House acted in March, Kirkland had expressed the AFL-CIO's alarm over the court's ruling in a letter to union activists across the country.

"No issue confronting the trade union movement is more important than the corporate abuse of bankruptcy to break collective bargaining agreements," he said.

Vegas strike brings victory at most hotels

Las Vegas, Nev.—Stagehands and Musicians ended a 75-day walkout with contract victories at world-famed showrooms in this gaming center, clearing the way for all but 1,400 of 17,000 original strikers to go back to work in the resort's hotel-casino industry.

Still walking picket lines at six properties were members of Culinary Local 226 and Bartenders Local 165. At one of them, the Marina Hotel, Stagehands also continued to strike.

The key issue remaining was management's insistence on retaining scabs hired during the dispute which started Apr. 2.

But the bulk of the industry was back at work under a five-year agreement which carried significant health and welfare gains.

A guaranteed 40-hour work week and job rights were protected in the new package for Culinary and Bartender members. Musicians and Stagehands will continue to get a 12-show weekly guarantee, in addition to other protections.

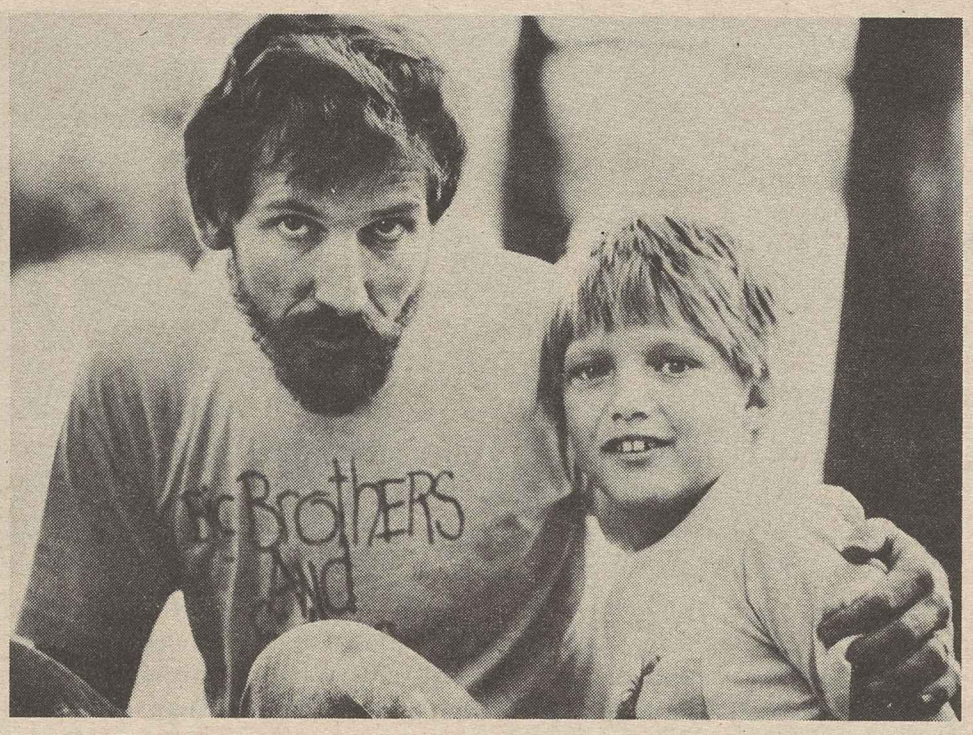
The five-year package is worth $1.91 an hour in wages and fringe benefits over the term to Culinary and Bartender members. Stagehands and Musicians took a five-year wage freeze to keep their show guarantees and other job protections.

"The hotels were only offering something less than 5 percent more in wages over the five years, so we chose job security rather than the small improvements in wages," said Mark Tully Massagli, president of both Musicians Local 369 and the Nevada AFL-CIO. He said Las Vegas showroom musicians were the highest paid in the United States in their category.

Stagehands Local 720 President Dennis Kist, arrested four times as he led demonstrations during the record 75-day dispute, also hailed the new agreement for its job-saving features.

Culinary and Bartender members of the Hotel Employees & Restaurant Employees had refused to return to work for some three weeks despite reaching agreement with about a dozen hotels so that Stagehands and Musicians could get satisfactory contracts.

Besides the Marina, the strike continues at the Four Queens, a member of the Hyatt chain, two Holiday Inn properties, Sam's Town and the California Hotel.



Big Brother of the Year

Paul Otradovec of Communications Workers Local 3105 in Gainesville, Fla., is the 1984 Big Brother of the Year. Otradovec, who "adopted" Damian Adams two years ago when he was age 7, was honored at the Big Brothers/Big Sisters of America national conference in Memphis, Tenn. Otradovec is active in union community services programs and has been chairman of CWA's United Way campaign at Southern Bell for five years.

Senate urged to vote funds for democracy endowment

Senate approval of full funding for the National Endowment for Democracy was urged by AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland in a letter to U.S. Senators.

Kirkland said denial of the funds would be tragic: "Plans laid would have to be withdrawn and friends made in the international labor movement would have to be turned away from a common effort to create democratic institutions."

Created last fall

Congress created the Endowment last fall to support the activities of private groups, including the AFL-CIO, in encouraging the development of democracy in other countries.

The Senate Appropriations Committee on June 12 approved the full $31.3 million in funding authorized for the Endowment. The funding measure, which is part of a larger appropriations bill to fund the Commerce, State and Judiciary departments, is awaiting Senate floor action.

Funds for the newly created agency include $13.8 million for the AFL-CIO's Free Trade Union Institute to continue overseas projects aimed at helping workers form and maintain free, democratic unions. The House voted 226-173 on May 31 to stop funding the program.

A two-year authorization for the Endowment was passed last fall and partial year funding of $18 million was appropriated for the current fiscal year that ends Sept. 30.

"For labor, this has already meant an opportunity for the AFL-CIO to expand significantly its international work at an important moment in history," Kirkland said in his appeal to the Senate to restore the funds eliminated by the House from fiscal year 1985 appropriations.

American presence

Without public funds necessary for such projects as those undertaken by the federation's Free Trade Union Institute, he said, "these efforts will not be made and the American presence will continue to be characterized solely by government to government contacts."

He urged Senate members to vote for the full $31.3 million funding and reject any efforts to cut back or otherwise substantively change the Endowment.

With the current funding, the Free Trade Union Institute already has begun a number of initiatives to help foreign unionists protect human and other trade union rights, Kirkland observed.

"We are responding to requests to help them build organizations that democratically represent workers. We also plan to support trade union exiles trying to preserve an independent voice for those facing suppression inside dictatorial or totalitarian regimes," he said.

Threats to freedom

"We are told by our trade union allies that these activities will help stave off serious, heavily financed threats to freedom and democracy. It would be tragic if this effort that has barely gotten off the ground were ended."

American labor has considerably widened its international scope in the past few years, Kirkland pointed out. In 1982, the AFL-CIO rejoined the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions and is now participating in that organization's efforts to help struggling democratic unionists.

Three years ago, the United States returned to the International Labor Organization where promoting trade union rights is part of labor's agenda for expanding the number of free governments in the world, Kirkland observed.

NLRB judge hits hotel-casino for 10-year failure to bargain

Reno, Nev.—Angered by a gambling resort's decade-long record of flouting U.S. labor law, a National Labor Relations Board judge has slapped it with a 14-point order to clean up its relations with the union representing about 700 employees.

In addition, the hotel-casino Nugget in Sparks, Nev., just north of Reno, was assessed the unusual penalty of paying all NLRB costs and expenses for at least the last two years, including "salaries, witness fees, transcript and record costs, and travel expenses and per diem."

HERE local

Administrative Law Judge Richard J. Boyce of San Francisco said he imposed the severe penalty because for nearly 10 years the Nugget and its owner, John Ascuaga, "evaded its statutory obligation to recognize and bargain in good faith with the union," Local 86 of the Hotel Employees & Restaurant Employees.

"Traditional forms of relief would not sufficiently effectuate the policies of the (National Labor Relations) Act and serve the public interest," Boyce's decision said.

The ALJ said the Nugget "flouted the board and the courts . . . sorely testing the board's ability under the Act to deal effectively with an employer determinedly opposed to the collective bargaining principle."

It was the second refusal to bargain case won by the union at the Sparks Nugget since late 1974. Ascuaga defied the first order.

Boyce held the Nugget guilty of a long list of transgressions including: undermining the union, coercively questioning workers and threatening them with firing if they "get involved" with the union, unlawful surveillance of workers, promising to pay employees if they engaged in anti-union picketing, and barring union representatives from engaging in "the protected activities of picketing and distributing handbills."

Boyce noted in his 54-page decision that Ascuaga and the Nugget kept up the war with HERE despite action by the courts, including the U.S. Supreme Court, upholding earlier NLRB rulings directing the gambling resort to bargain in good faith with the union.

The ALJ said that he found company witnesses "quite unencumbered by scruple" with "their stories flawed by superficiality and incompleteness." He said the chief spokesman in management's case, an underling in the Reno Employers Council, "exhibited all the glibness and mien of a born storyteller."

In contrast, said Boyce, the union's key witness, HERE Organizing Director Vincent J. Sirabella, "projected an earnestness, a dignity and a professionalism that were most impressive."

alien. The Senate measure would also establish a criminal penalty for reported violations, calling for additional fines of $1,000 and up to six months in prison. The House bill carries no criminal penalties.

Under the labor-opposed Panetta amendment, which Denison said would "bring back all the evils of the disastrous 'bracero' program abuses," farm employers could import temporary workers for up to 11 months a year to harvest crops.

There is concern that the influx of temporary workers could swell to 300,000 a year.

On amnesty, the Senate bill would offer permanent resident alien status to all immigrants who have resided in the United States since 1977 and temporary status for those in the country since 1980. The more generous House version would offer legal status to all those who established U.S. residence before 1982.

A primary concern of Hispanic groups is over the discrimination they fear may develop as a consequence of employer sanctions. They warned that employers, in their eagerness to avoid penalties, would be reluctant to hire persons with dark skin or foreign accents. The House adopted an amendment which would provide an administrative procedure for those who seek relief from discriminatory actions by employers.

Chicago—William A. Lee, president of the Chicago AFL-CIO, died of heart failure June 11 at Northwestern Memorial Hospital. He was 89.

An active trade unionist for nearly seven decades, Lee began his career as a member of the Teamsters in 1916 when he went to work as a driver of a horse-drawn bakery wagon. He ran for the Presidency of the Teamsters in 1957 against James R. Hoffa.

In a message to his wife Pamela, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue said, "Bill was widely admired for his skill and resourcefulness in finding fair and peaceful solutions to conflicts between unions and managements, especially in public employment."

People on both sides of the bargaining table respected his "personal integrity and seasoned judgment," Kirkland and Donahue said.

SEIU, Teamsters member

Lee became business representative of Teamsters Local 734 in 1925 and was elected president and chief executive officer of the local a year later. He was elected a trustee of the IBT in 1935 and a vice president of the international in 1950. After withdrawing from the Teamsters in 1957, Lee became a member of Chicago's Service Employees Local 1.

He became president of the Chicago Federation of Labor in 1946 and president of the AFL-CIO city central body after the 1962 merger with the Cook County Industrial Union Council.

Lee also served as head of WCFL, a leading Chicago radio station, which the central body owned and operated from 1946 until 1979, when the station was sold.

A political workhorse, Lee was a delegate to all but two Democratic national conventions from 1928 through 1980. For many years he maintained close relaitons with City Hall from the time of Mayor Richard J. Daley to the current administration of Mayor Harold Washington.

A funeral mass was said June 19 at Holy Name Cathedral. Burial was at All Saints Cemetery in DesPlaines, Ill.

General Dynamics hit

Labor airs charges against defense firm

An example of this hardline attitude was cited in a statement by Machinists Rep. William Weigand dealing with contract negotiations at the corporation's Convair aircraft division in San Diego.

Weigand said the company is insisting on downgrading some 500 IAM members who earn as little as $6 an hour—$3 less than workers are paid by other aircraft manufacturers—and even have to pay $25 each week out of their own pockets toward company-provided insurance. The company pays the premiums for salaried employees, he noted.

"The company has continued to 'stonewall' negotiations by tying unpalatable demands onto the items they agree to," he said. As a result, the union has filed unfair labor practice charges against the firm.

Weigand said that General Dynamics workers are embarrassed by the continuing allegations of the company's overcharges on government contracts and kickbacks to management employees.

"Our members feel that the company is, in effect, stealing from them both as taxpayers and as employees who are not receiving a fair share of the corporate pie," he stated.

Taxpayer ripoff

Earlier this year, government whistleblowers accused the company of a long list of taxpayer ripoffs, such as charging the Air Force $9,600 apiece for Allen wrenches worth about 12 cents and billing $7,417 for three-inch pieces of wire worth less than 3 cents.

President John Brandow of Shipbuilders Local 5 at the General Dynamics shipyard in Quincy, Mass., accused the company of torpedoing labor relations. He said management has created an atmosphere of "abuse, harassment and constant threats that is hard to describe to the rational outsider."

Dr. Franklin E. Mirer, director of the UAW health and safety department, testified that the company has strongly resisted union efforts to eliminate occupational hazards at its facilities. He also accused the Occupational Safety & Health Administration of being reluctant to enforce federal safety laws at the plant.

He cited the problem of highly toxic freon solvents being used at the company's tank plant in Michigan over which the union filed complaints with OSHA in August 1982.

Safety hazard

OSHA permitted the company to continue using the solvent even though a number of workers had been overcome by the toxic vapors.

The federal job safety agency did not cite the company for a violation until Nov. 29, 1983, two weeks after UAW member Harvey Lee died from the vapors. But OSHA's citations were for non-fatal violations unrelated to Lee's death. The company is still contesting the charges, Mirer noted.

He told of another worker's death at the company's proving grounds in Aberdeen, Md., where UAW member Russ Joyner died three weeks after his body was crushed by a tank tread. The company is vigorously fighting the OSHA citation in Joyner's death, Mirer told the congressmen.

In an appeal to the panels chaired by Representatives William Clay (D-Mo.) and William Gaydos (D-Pa.), Lee's widow, Mariann said, "the death of my husband was absolutely preventable," and she added:

"I am here today in the hope that something can be done so that no other families of workers at General Dynamics will have to suffer the pain of the loss of a husband and father."

Bieber called on Congress to make federal agencies effectively enforce labor laws so as to assure General Dynamics workers their basic rights.

"We are not out to destroy General Dynamics," Bieber stressed. "Rather, we want its operations improved so that it will deserve to get needed defense contracts even after the Reagan Administration is gone."

Montana's Emma Lohrlein dies after lifetime of service to COPE

Billings, Mont.—Emma Lohrlein, a woman who had more volunteer hours for COPE than any other person in America, died June 2 at the age of 89.

Mrs. Lohrlein started working with the Yellowstone Valley Central Labor Council's COPE program in the Billings Labor Temple back in 1955.

"I started out registering voters and keeping card files up to date. Somehow I just never managed to get out of it," she told the Billings Gazette in a 1978 interview. At that time, she modestly estimated she'd put in about 25,000 hours at her non-paying, no-expense-account job.

Her brothers and sisters from the Labor Temple, however, maintain that more than 48,000 hours can be chalked up to Mrs. Lohrlein's unique record of volunteer service. And that's not counting evening hours or weekends.

She was born in West Kewannee, Wis., on Feb. 1, 1895, but told reporters she didn't get interested in the labor movement until her marriage to Frank Lohrlein, a union carpenter. In 1930, they moved to Billings and built the home Emma lived in until her death.

Her only daughter died in 1964 and her husband died in 1968. But Mrs. Lohrlein always maintained that the people she worked hard for and with in the labor movement were her family. "Some people belong to churches and clubs," she once said. "My family belongs to labor unions—but mostly they belong to me—and I belong to them."

She never missed an election from 1920—when women got the right to vote—until she died, and she was fond of saying, "I usually vote for the Democrats—the COPE-endorsed ones." She believed that the working people could change things for their betterment—by working hard and voting right.

Her funeral drew trade unionists from all over Montana. State AFL-CIO Executive Sec. Jim Murry urged them to continue the struggle Emma Lohrlein worked, fought and voted right in support of. "To do less," he said, "would be an injustice to one who gave so much to us."

New OSHA standards draw heavy fire from union groups

The Occupational Safety & Health Administration's newly issued standard on ethylene oxide (EtO) has already come under fire as several unions petitioned this week for judicial review of the standard.

Earlier, the agency's proposed standard on grain dust was assailed in labor testimony as being "farcical" and "ineffective."

The OSHA standard on EtO was announced on June 15, the final day of a court-ordered deadline, and was scheduled to be published in the Federal Register June 22.

On June 18, the Service Employees, Clothing & Textile Workers, and the State, County & Municipal Employees joined the Public Citizen Health Research Group in petitioning the U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia for judicial review of the standard.

Short-term exposure

The unions expressed concern over OSHA's failure to include a definite short-term exposure limit (STEL). The agency indicated the rulemaking record will be kept open while it gathers additional scientific information "which might support a STEL. . . ."

The new standard provides a 50-fold reduction in the exposure limit, to 1 part EtO per million parts of air, averaged over an eight-hour day. But without limiting short-term exposures, a worker could be exposed to 96 ppm for one 5-minute period per day.

OSHA had included a 10 ppm STEL in the proposal it sent to the White House's Office of Management & Budget which reviews all new regulations. OMB strongly protested the inclusion of a STEL, citing industry testimony against it, and it refuted the reliability of studies done on the health effects of EtO.

EtO, a colorless gas used as a sterilant in hospitals and by firms that manufacture medical products, is used by more than 140,000 workers on the job. It is a carcinogen and is linked to reproductive and neurological disorders.

Compliance deadline

The new standard will go into effect 60 days after being published. Employers will have to comply with its provisions within 180 days and have engineering controls installed within a year.

At OSHA hearings on the proposed standard for grain handling facilities, the AFL-CIO called it "farcical" and "a testimony to the inability of this Administration to truly represent the interests of the public at large."

Margaret Seminario, associate director of the Dept. of Occupational Safety, Health & Social Security, said years of hard work that went into the development of an adequate standard have been "derailed by the 'special interests' operatives of this Administration." She noted that in the past eight years, 111 workers have been killed and 327 injured in grain dust explosions.

The Reagan Administration's response "has been a craven capitulation to the greed of this industry," she charged. The OMB, in its regulation review, pressured OSHA into weakening the standard by making the installation of engineering controls to reduce dust an employer option.

Robert F. Harbrant, president of the AFL-CIO Food & Allied Service Trades Dept., testified that for six years grain workers "have watched closely as the government's promise to set safe protective rules for their industry has ended in a cruel game of special interest politics" that has cost many workers their lives.

Worker deaths

Harbrant cited the deaths of two workers at the Blue Valley Co-op grain elevator in Tamora, Neb., on May 30, and asked whether the new standard, which requires "hot bearing sensors" could have prevented these deaths. The town's "fire marshal seemed to think so," he said.

Dr. Kenneth Miller, an occupational health physician with the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers, cited the fear of explosions with which workers must live.

Miller scored the proposed regulation for not following the National Academy of Science's call for a limit of 1/64th-inch of grain dust on surfaces in the working environment.

Payments deficit hits $19.4 billion quarterly record

The nation's balance of payments deficit in the trade of goods and services hit a record $19.4 billion in the first quarter of the year despite a drop in oil imports, the Commerce Dept. announced.

The report on the balance of payments, or current account, was no surprise since monthly reports on merchandise trade alone have established new records for red ink every month so far this year. The current account is the number which governments compare with each other to see who ends up with more income and who loses.

The government's trade report showed that net receipts for services increased $3.1 billion to reach $8.4 billion in the first quarter. The increase was due largely to a rise in income on direct investment abroad because of improved economic activity overseas and a shift to small capital gains from large capital losses in the fourth quarter. the Commerce Dept. said.

"While the services surplus should rise this year, the deterioration in the merchandise trade deficit evident in the second quarter means probable further increases in the current account shortfall," Commerce Sec. Malcolm Baldrige said.

The current account deficit for all of last year was $41.6 billion and threatens to double this year.

Services and merchandise trade have been hurt by the strong value of the American dollar, which makes imports relatively cheaper than U.S. goods and exports less price competitive with goods abroad.

Labor's agenda

Critical issues before Congress that affect transportation industry workers are spelled out by President Richard I. Kilroy of the Railway & Airline Clerks at the BRAC legislative and political education conference in Washington. The 500 delegates also heard AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland underscore the need for a strong union vote in November to elect Walter F. Mondale.

Economy continues to gain, but signs point to slowdown

All signs pointed to a further slowing of the nation's economy as interest rates began to curb business expansion.

Economic growth in the current quarter is estimated to be running an above-average annual rate of 5.7 percent, but this compares with the 9.7-percent rate of the first three months of 1984.

The projection of current economic growth, called the "flash" estimate, is based on partial data for the quarter collected by the Commerce Dept's Bureau of Economic Analysis.

A string of government reports on various aspects of the economy confirmed the slowdown:

- Industrial production rose only four-tenths of 1 percent in May, the slowest increase in nearly a year and a half, the Federal Reserve Board announced. Consumer goods manufacturing did not increase at all; business and defense equipment makers reported a sharp boost in production.
- Production of construction supplies fell one-tenth of 1 percent in May, an indication of trouble ahead in the housing industry.
- Confirming the housing slowdown, the Commerce Dept. reported that new home construction last month dropped 10.5 percent. Commerce Sec. Malcolm Baldrige acknowledged that higher interest rates had at least partly stifled home building, noting that an increase of one percentage point in interest rates since February had raised monthly payments by about 7 percent for new home loans.
- Overall factory capacity utilization rose only two-tenths of 1 percent in May, reaching 81.9 percent, the Federal Reserve Board said.

Savings decline

- Americans' personal income climbed a moderate six-tenths of 1 percent, the same as in April, while spending rose a strong 1.1 percent, the Commerce Dept. said. With spending strong but income up only moderately, the nation's savings rate continued to erode, dropping to 5.2 percent in May from April's 5.7 percent of disposable income.

Increases in income generally depend the most on increases in the number of jobs. The May employment report by the Bureau of Labor Statistics showed no increase in factory jobs.

- Retail sales rose a slight two-tenths of 1 percent in May, after jumping a strong 3.1 percent in April. Sales of U.S.-made cars in early June were nearly flat compared with a year earlier.

The only favorable economic sign was a Labor Dept. report showing wholesale prices unchanged in May for the second month in a row as falling food prices canceled out rising fuel costs.

Meanwhile, home mortgage interest rates moved up during the past month to their highest level since the fall of 1982, with lenders quoting an average interest rate of 14.29 percent on conventional fixed-rate mortgages.

A Wall Street Journal survey of four dozen economists found a general expectation that interest rates will edge slightly higher across the board through 1985. The analysts predicted that the high rates eventually will slow the economy more dramatically than has been seen so far this year.

Most cited the huge Reagan budget deficits to explain the continuing high level of interest rates. With the federal government taking such a large portion of the nation's savings pool, the price of the remaining available credit is inevitably high.

At AFSCME convention

Mondale opens attack on Reagan's record

San Francisco—This nation needs a President who is in touch with the concerns of Americans and who will "stand up and fight for the American dream and the American future," former Vice President Walter Mondale told the 2,700 delegates at the State, County & Municipal Employees convention.

"A people's President, who didn't get out of touch, would realize that our nation can't keep going along with a $200-billion deficit," Mondale said. "A President who's in touch would know what's going on and would fight for clear air, clean water, and against toxic waste dumping," he added.

Mondale also attacked President Reagan for saying that the present tax system is fair. "Where has he been?" Mondale asked incredulously.

Mondale was introduced to the delegates by AFSCME President Gerald W. McEntee as "the next President of the United States." It was the candidate's first personal appearance before a union body since he went over the top in the number of delegates needed for the Democratic presidential nomination.

Many of the concerns expressed by Mondale in his address were reflected in resolutions passed by the AFSCME delegates, who declared themselves opposed to the Reagan budget, the present federal tax code, and "excessive military spending and the failed program of supply-side tax cuts for the wealthy."

The delegates also passed resolutions calling on their union to "continue to lead the fight to end discrimination based on sex in the workplace and in society" and to press for passage of the Equal Rights Amendment.

Leading the way

In his "state of the union" address, McEntee told the delegates that AFSCME has led the way "in organizing, in the fight for pay equity, in the drive for bargaining rights, and in the political arena." He also reported that AFSCME has more than 100 members who are delegates or alternates to the upcoming Democratic National Convention and promised that the union would remain "on the point" as a leader in the battle to elect Mondale President.

McEntee was elected by acclamation to his first full term as AFSCME president; he has held office since the death of Jerry Wurf in 1981. AFSCME Sec.-Treas. William Lucy was elected, unopposed, to his fourth full term.

The growth of AFSCME—with current membership above 1 million — led to changes approved by the convention to expand the number of vice presidents. Additional officers were added for two recently affiliated Ohio associations and for AFSCME's largest state group in Manhattan and upstate New York.

Policies scored

Several other speakers at the convention blasted President Reagan and his policies.

Chicago Mayor Harold Washington told the delegates that "Reagan's plan for the minorities is to get rid of the Voting Rights Act." And, he added, "for women he suggests its time to have children."

Edward Asner, president of the Screen Actors, told the delegates, "We must be willing to struggle against an Administration that would have us believe that all is well with America; that the economy is healing; that the military budget is more important than food, clothing and shelter; and that there's a commie in every bed and that human rights are alive and well in El Salvador."

Cotton dust exposure study scored on risks to workers

The Clothing & Textile Workers endorsed the finding of the National Institute for Occupational Safety & Health that variances granted to Dan River, Inc., under federal job safety laws were improper.

Dan River was granted variances by Virginia and South Carolina to allow it to expose workers to high levels of cotton dust as part of a study on the cause of brown lung disease. By doing the study, the firm will be able to delay installing $7.5 million worth of dust control equipment required under the cotton dust standard.

NIOSH Director J. Donald Millar, in a letter to Patrick Tyson, acting administrator of the Occupational Safety & Health Administration, said, "I do not consider it appropriate to permit workers to be subjected to unnecessary hazards while the merits of this research project are considered" for federal funding by NIOSH.

Eric Frumin, ACTWU safety and health director, said that "NIOSH's action confirms the illegitimate and immoral nature of the allowances given to Dan River with the blessing of federal OSHA, by Virginia and South Carolina."

Former OSHA Administrator Thorne B. Auchter had endorsed the study proposed by Dan River. Concern for the federal endorsement centered on the letter from Auchter to Virginia Commissioner of Labor & Industry Eva S. Tieg, which had been drafted by Leonard Vance, OSHA director of health standards. Vance was formerly Virginia assistant attorney general under Marshall Coleman, who now represents Dan River.

Frumin expressed hope that OSHA "will finally recognize its responsibility to enforce the nation's job safety laws, and not cooperate in human experimentation projects designed to obstruct enforcement."

ACTWU filed a complaint with federal OSHA last month asking it to overturn the variances granted by the two state agencies.

The company's case

Under the variance granted by Virginia, Dan River would have until Nov. 1 to obtain NIOSH funding for the experiment and until Oct. 15 to submit a study that corroborates the company's theory that bacteria in cotton dust produces the lung ailments.

Millar, in his letter, indicated "this evaluation process could not possibly be completed by Oct. 1, 1984, regardless of the scientific merit of a grant proposal such as that envisioned in the case of Dan River."

He pointed out the scientists proposing the study indicated it "could be done successfully without exposing subjects to cotton dust levels above the new permissible exposure level. If this is correct, the investigator's request for an experimental variance would appear to be inappropriate."

Stabilized dollar termed essential to save U.S. jobs

The AFL-CIO pressed for congressional enactment of a measure to lower and stabilize the value of the American dollar in overseas money markets to protect the national economy and save jobs.

"A 30-percent overvaluation of the dollar effectively imposes a 30-percent tax on goods produced in the United States, and provides a 30-percent subsidy to competing foreign imports," observed Rep. Berkley Bedell (D-Iowa). He is the author of a proposed joint resolution that would commit Congress, the President, and the Federal Reserve Board to take certain actions to reduce the inflation of the dollar.

Henry Schechter, deputy director of the federation's Dept. of Economic Research, noted that "while no one knows exactly where exchange rates 'should' be, the fact is the dollar costs 55 percent more today than it did in 1980."

"This has deprived perhaps three million Americans of jobs," Schechter told a Capitol Hill news conference called by Bedell. The Iowa congressman is chairman of the House Committee on Small Business.

The Bedell resolution, which is now before the House Banking Committee, calls on Congress to restore fiscal soundness by reducing the huge federal budget deficits drawn up by the Reagan Administration. It also directs the President and the Federal Reserve Board to strengthen U.S. cooperation with the central banks of other western countries to achieve an equilibrium among exchange rates.

The measure, which has the support of the National Association of Manufacturers as well, also calls for a "more pragmatic" approach to exchange market intervention to stabilize the value of the dollar.

Schechter said that while the resolution will not by itself resolve the problem of the overvalued dollar and its impact on American jobs, "it does point out some actions that can be taken to mitigate the problem under existing authority."

The U.S. trade deficit hit a record $69 billion in 1983, and is currently running at an annual rate of $125 billion, or nearly twice as much as last year's. Estimates for the 1985 deficit are in the range of $150 billion.

A Challenge for the Nation

THE MOST profound challenge of 1985 and beyond will be to reverse the backward steps of the past four years and move America forward. The agenda ranges from the critical need to rebuild blighted communities, restoration of the fading dream of homeownership, and providing health care and education to creating a healthy environment, guaranteeing a safe workplace and prohibiting energy blackmail. A top priority must be ending the erosion of our nation's middle class.

The nation's infrastructure of essential public facilities, the economic health of its cities, and the environment are keys to the quality of life in America.

Under this Administration, public assets have been transferred to private control on behalf of the narrowest and wealthiest segment of the population. Valuable oil, mineral and timber rights have been turned over to exploiters at fire-sale prices.

The nation's roads, bridges, airports, railbeds, ports, waterways, water supply and wastewater treatment systems have deteriorated. The federal government must assume its share of responsibility for reversing this trend by establishing standards to ensure the public's general welfare and safety and providing funds for research and development.

To strengthen the maritime industry, the AFL-CIO calls for the enforcement of existing laws and regulations and backs shipbuilding legislation and measures to increase the proportion of cargoes generated by U.S. trade carried on U.S.-flag vessels.

To restore order to the airline industry, the AFL-CIO calls for immediate repeal of the Deregulation Act of 1978. In the interim, regulatory procedures are urgently needed to protect workers suffering the adverse effects of deregulation.

BECAUSE railroad companies have diverted revenues needed for maintenance, repair and new investment in the railroad network to such other uses as the purchase of non-rail companies, the AFL-CIO urges the federal government to step in to ensure that the railroad system is adequately maintained and efficiently operated.

The compelling transit needs within our nation's cities require an expanded federal commitment for both the capital and operating assistance grant programs. These programs are essential to the rebuilding of a strong public transportation infrastructure in our nation's urban centers to give citizens mobility and access to jobs.

This federal aid program for mass transit should remain premised on the continuation of labor protections for all transit employees affected by such aid, including the continuation of collective bargaining and dispute settlement rights, prevailing wage standards, first opportunity for employment in newly created jobs, and a strong "Buy America" requirement governing the manufacture of necessary components, materials, supplies and equipment.

We believe the country's mass transit needs are national concerns which should be cooperatively funded and directed under a working partnership of all levels of government.

PUBLIC EDUCATION faces the challenge to raise standards, improve teaching and maintain equity and access for the minorities and the disadvantaged. The cost for continuing education beyond high school has risen, straining family resources.

The AFL-CIO has consistently endorsed federal aid for elementary and secondary schools to provide the resources for quality education, which requires adequate teacher salaries. The labor movement strongly endorses a federal leadership role in providing programs of compensatory education for the economically disadvantaged, the handicapped and the non-English speaking students.

We have always believed that everyone has the right to pursue individual education goals regardless of economic circumstances. We oppose tuition tax credits to reduce the cost of private school at the expense of the public system. Federal, state and local legislation is needed to assure that qualified young people are not denied the opportunity for further education because they cannot afford it.

Big oil company mergers bad for economy, nation

By Press Associates, Inc.

The public in recent months has been treated to a dazzling spectacle of corporate takeover battles, usually involving giant oil companies.

High finance jargon like "leveraged buyouts" and "hostile takeovers" and "white knights" and "golden parachutes" is becoming increasingly familiar to the average citizen.

News reports, however, seldom address the broader implications and consequences of these "megamergers," so named because of the collossal size of the companies involved.

So far this year, Standard Oil of California raised $13.4 billion to buy Gulf Oil, the biggest corporate merger in history; Texaco forked up more than $10 billion for Getty Oil, and Mobil paid $5.7 billion for Superior Oil.

During the first four months of 1984, banks lent about $30 billion to finance major corporate takeovers. This was three times the amount borrowed to buy other companies during the same period in 1981, another merger boom time.

What's behind the merger mania?

One reason is the Reagan Administration's permissive interpretation of the nation's antitrust laws. Under Reagan, the two agencies charged with preventing monopolies—the Justice Dept. and the Federal Trade Commission—have let the big takeovers proceed with scarcely a whimper.

Decontrol at fault

Another reason oil companies are grabbing for acquisitions is that they have more money than they know what to do with. This is largely because oil price decontrol transferred billions of dollars from consumers to the companies.

In lobbying Congress for decontrol in the late 1970s, oil company officials claimed they needed the extra profits to explore for more oil to make the nation self-sufficient in energy. However, between 1981 and 1983, the nation's 16 largest oil firms increased their spending on exploration and production only 115 percent while boosting their spending on acquisitions by 600 percent.

Mergers are encouraged by the U.S. tax code, which often provides tax benefits to the combined company and allows a firm to deduct from its taxes the interest of the loan used to buy up another. Thus the taxpayer is forced to subsidize this high-stakes game of monopoly.

Dwindling competition

This game is bad for the consumer, bad for the economy, bad for national security, and bad for what remains of free competition in the United States.

The current unprecedented merger boom has been a major factor in driving up interest rates in recent months, according to a report by the National Council for Low Interest Rates. This is because the billions of dollars borrowed to finance takeovers or to fight unwanted mergers makes credit less available for productive uses.

Further, money spent by oil firms on acquisitions is money not available for exploration and future production. This means increased dependence on imported oil.

Increased monopolization of oil production, refining and marketing means more control over price. This means consumers will pay even more for gasoline, heating oil and other products.

Earlier this year a Senate bill to impose a six-month moratorium on mergers was defeated following a lobbying and media blitz by the oil companies and strong opposition from the White House.

In introducing a bill to give the FTC more power over mergers, Rep. James Florio (D-N.J.) argued, "It is time to stop the games of dice and blindman's bluff in which the government is allowing a few giant companies to map industrial policy and dictate the future of energy and national security policy for the American people."

At right are the House roll-call votes on immigration that the AFL-CIO considered most crucial. See page 1 for information about passage of the immigration bill.

Vote # 1: Hawkins Amendment

Issue: Tough Penalties for Employers Who Hire Undocumented Workers

The AFL-CIO is concerned by the United States' lack of control of its own borders. Labor standards for U.S. workers are difficult to enforce when there is a supply of undocumented workers who work for sub-standard wages at the whim of unscrupulous employers.

No amount of fence-building can stop illegal immigration. The only solution is to remove the lure of employment. And the only way to do that is to impose tough penalties on employers who hire persons unauthorized to work in the United States.

H.R. 1510 included criminal penalties which would be difficult to enforce. Injunctions to stop illegal employment would not be obtainable, and enforcement would be slow and ineffective.

An amendment by Rep. Augustus Hawkins (D-CA) sought to replace this cumbersome plan with civil penalties and easily obtainable cease-and-desist orders. If an employer hired a worker without checking for proof of eligibility, the employer would be considered aware of the employee's lack of eligibility.

The Hawkins amendment also provided a way for victims of racial discrimination to seek justice in a simple administrative process. But the House voted it down, 166-253.

Vote # 2: Miller Amendment

Issue: H-2 Temporary Worker Program

The H-2 program is based on the premise that employers should be allowed to bring in temporary foreign workers if U.S. workers are unavailable to do the work. It has been used in small numbers by agricultural companies in the East who hire foreign workers to pick crops.

The AFL-CIO endorsed Rep. George Miller's (D-CA) amendment to put reasonable controls on the temporary worker program. The Miller amendment would have limited foreign workers' length of stay and required employment standards as effective as those now in existence.

The House rejected the Miller amendment 164-256.

Vote # 3: Panetta Amendment

Issue: Should the U.S. Bring Back the Scandal-Ridden "Bracero" Plan?

Expanding the H-2 program was bad, but the House then made things worse by approving Rep. Leon Panetta's (D-CA) amendment to create a "bracero" temporary worker program.

Scandalously inhuman treatment of foreign agricultural workers in the early 1960s resulted in legislation prohibiting bracero programs. The AFL-CIO was among those who lobbied at that time for reforms.

Twenty years later the battle was fought again and lost in the House. The House voted 228-172 in favor of the Panetta amendment. The AFL-CIO will work to remove the bracero program during House-Senate conference on the immigration bill.

Vote # 4: Final Passage of H.R. 1510

The AFL-CIO position was that if the three votes above were favorable, it could endorse the bill.

All three votes went the wrong way. Sanctions against employers who hire undocumented workers are weak and difficult to enforce, and the H-2 and bracero programs threaten to bring a new harvest of shame.

So the AFL-CIO opposed final passage. But in a narrow 216-211 vote, the House approved the immigration bill.

The AFL-CIO and its affilitates will work to achieve improvements in the immigration bill when House and Senate conferees meet to iron out differences between their respective bills.

Accord reached on bankruptcy

Postal union solidarity

Two thousand local union leaders of the Postal Workers and the Letter Carriers came to Washington to back their negotiators and demonstrate their solidarity in resisting management demands for contract rollbacks. AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue told the rally that a united labor movement stands behind them, and that their battle is the same waged by private-sector workers dealing with "an employer who thinks the time has come to display his dominance." Union contracts with the Postal Service expire July 20.

Bargaining required to modify pact

By David L. Perlman

Congress broke a months-long deadlock and moved towards final passage of legislation to stop employers from using bankruptcy proceedings as a device to tear up union contracts.

The labor-sought legislation was approved by House and Senate conferees as part of a "must" bill needed to keep the nation's bankruptcy courts functioning.

It would compel employers to enter into good-faith bargaining over any contract changes that are necessary to allow the bankrupt firm to reorganize in order to stay in business.

If an employer couldn't convince the union, he would have to persuade a bankruptcy court of the necessity of contract modifications and the fairness of the company's proposal.

The legislation would largely nullify a Supreme Court ruling earlier this year that turned the federal bankruptcy law into a license to nullify union contracts.

"Overall, we're pleased with the measure," AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison commented.

The legislation is "a vast improvement over what the Supreme Court left us with. This should return collective bargaining to the negotiating table and keep it out of the courts."

Grave implications

The Supreme Court ruling, which AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland warned at the time had "the gravest implications" for the collective bargaining system, held that a company could abrogate its union contract as soon as it filed for bankruptcy.

Then it would merely have to show that it had made "a reasonable effort" to reach a voluntary agreement. The Supreme Court majority asserted that holding the employer to too strict a standard of justification would be at odds with the "flexibility" intended by the bankruptcy law.

House Judiciary Committee Chairman Peter W. Rodino, Jr. (D-N.J.) promptly introduced a bill to reverse what he and others considered the Supreme Court's misreading of the intent of Congress. The AFL-CIO Executive Council, then in session, committed the federation to an all-out effort to reverse the Supreme Court position.

House restores full coverage to anti-bias laws

The House voted 375-32 for a labor-supported civil rights bill needed to repair the damage done by a Supreme Court decision earlier this year.

At issue is whether the array of federal anti-discrimination laws will be narrowly interpreted, as the court ruled in its Grove City College decision, or given the broader scope that most members of Congress assert was the original intent of the laws.

President Reagan had criticized the House bill as "too broad," but the one-sided vote was easily sufficient to override any veto. The Administration is expected to make a stronger effort to trim back the legislation in the Senate.

The Supreme Court's 6-3 decision had held that a ban on sex discrimination in education applied only to the particular programs that receive federal funds and not to the entire institution.

By the same reasoning, the decision put in jeopardy laws barring discrimination on the basis of race, sex, religion, national origin, age or handicap in programs or institutions receiving federal funds.

Unions score perversion of labor law's purposes

Workers can no longer rely on federal labor law or the National Labor Relations Board to protect their right to organize, union witnesses charged at House hearings.

"Labor-management relations is back in the jungle," Food & Commercial Workers President William H. Wynn testified. He and Electronic Workers President William H. Bywater spoke from first-hand experience with scofflaw employers who have been emboldened in their union-busting tactics by the ideological tilt of the NLRB under the Reagan Administration.

A panel of law professors made similar charges.

Employers fighting union organization can still rely on legal delaying tactics and illegal reprisals that bring only "slap-on-the-wrist" penalties—defects in the National Labor Relations Act that the labor reform legislation pushed during the Carter Administration sought to remedy.

But the Reagan-appointed NLRB "has made the situation go from bad to worse," Stanford University Prof. William H. Gould testified. "The fact is that union-bashing appears to be in style politically in 1984," he said.

University of North Carolina Prof. Daniel H. Pollitt said the remedies for employer violations of the law are so weak as to justify the label of "a license fee for union-busting."

Federal labor law, he testified, "has indeed failed in protecting the promise made to American working men and women."

Wynn, who is also chairman of the AFL-CIO Standing Committee on Organization, said the NLRB is no longer the "neutral body" that Congress intended.

His union, Wynn testified, is prepared to "strike for recognition" and when employers fire workers for union activity.

"We'll get justice for workers any legal way we can," he said, "through strikes, through picket lines, through corporate campaigns, through all forms of economic pressure."

Wynn agreed that "there should be a better way." But as things stand now, employers might as well fire union-busting

Democratic platform sets jobs goal

Delegates to the Democratic National Convention will be asked to approve a party platform that sets full employment as a central goal of economic policy and proposes clearcut alternatives to four more years of Reaganomics.

The election-year blueprint recommended by the 184-member Democratic Platform Committee commits the party to the revitalization of basic American industries and to the repair of the nation's neglected infrastructure—its roads, ports, transit systems, railroads, highways and bridges.

It pledges restoration of fairness in tax policies and labor law, in the administration of government programs and in the enforcement of federal laws.

It rejects — unequivocally — President Reagan's reliance on "deliberate high unemployment" to curb inflation, "coupled with a relentless assault on the collective bargaining power and rights of working men and women.

Party principles

The platform draft that will be acted on by the convention reaffirms a Democratic Party commitment to equal opportunity and to opening new opportunities for those who have been shut out—supporting affirmative action goals and timetables but rejecting quotas.

Its foreign policy declaration stresses support for freedom's cause against all forms of dictatorships, and denounces the continued suppression of Poland's Solidarity trade union federation.

"We will make support for democracy, human rights, and economic and social justice the cornerstone of our policy," the platform draft proclaims.

The platform committee is headed by Rep. Geraldine A. Ferraro (D-N.Y.); AFL-CIO Vice President John H. Lyons, the president of the Iron Workers, is a co-chair. Sixteen other committee members are from AFL-CIO unions. Sam Dawson, political action director of the Steelworkers and a convention delegate from Texas,

Bankruptcy bill conferees agree on labor rights

The legislation, with the labor provisions intact, passed the House on Mar. 21. Employer groups, spurred by the Chamber of Commerce, made a stand in the Senate. But a bipartisan majority lined up in support of an amendment by Sen. Bob Packwood (R-Ore.), which had the AFL-CIO's endorsement.

Only by filibustering to prevent a vote was the pro-employer bloc of senators able to block its passage.

The deadlock was finally broken by an agreement to pass other provisions of the bankruptcy legislation, leaving the shaping of the collective bargaining provision up to the House-Senate conference.

There, in a session that ran until nearly 3 a.m., the final language was worked out. It emerged close to the Packwood version, but would not be retroactive. Thus, the strict collective bargaining requirements apply only to bankruptcy proceedings initiated after the bill is signed into law.

Unions, farmers hit 'aggressive' big bank tactics

The AFL-CIO and the National Farmers Union joined in a statement of concern at the spread of conglomerate-type banks and the resultant displacement of community banks.

Under the policies encouraged by the Reagan Administration, the statement noted, banking laws have been interpreted to allow banks to engage in previously prohibited activities. The "aggressive policies" of large banks have brought them into "unsound and speculative transactions all over the globe."

The two groups warned that such policies force up interest rates, make farm and home loans more difficult to obtain, and create jobs "outside our borders" instead of in the United States.

Earlier, in a related area, the AFL-CIO had testified before the House Banking Committee in support of legislation to curb some of the loopholes. The bill, by Chairman Fernand St Germain (D-R.I.), won the committee's approval, 32-16.

Henry B. Schechter, director of the AFL-CIO Office of Housing & Monetary Policy, warned in his testimony against the concentration of economic power that is threatened when banks are allowed to become financial service supermarkets.

He expressed concern that expansion of banks into such fields as insurance would result in "subtle pressures" on borrowers to take out insurance handled by the bank.

Brown assails Soviet move to undermine ILO machinery

Geneva—AFL-CIO International Affairs Director Irving Brown denounced attempts by Soviet bloc countries to undermine the International Labor Organization's watchdog role over workers' rights as a "camouflage for their systems of oppression."

Addressing the 151-member ILO's annual assembly as the U.S. worker delegate, Brown said that the Soviet campaign against the ILO's monitoring machinery was meant to conceal the "lack of any really effective labor standards" in the communist world.

"No worker can be considered free as long as he is not protected by these basic and natural rights to choose his own trade union organizations and officials," Brown said, referring to the ILO standard-setting conventions on freedom of association.

Implementation vital

Ratification of ILO conventions is "meaningless unless there is implementation," he continued in a pointed allusion to the failure of communist governments to pay more than lip service to the ILO standards they pledge to apply.

Brown, the spokesman for American workers in the ILO, stressed that no economic system can automatically guarantee workers basic rights as the communists claim for their state-run economies.

"The criterion," he said, "is whether trade unions can continue to exist and defend the economic and social interests of the workers, irrespective of the nature of the ownership of the means of production."

"The standard-setting procedures of the ILO cut across all the economic and social factors which affect man's condition in the world," Brown reminded the nearly 1,800 worker, government and employer delegates and their advisers taking part in the three-week session.

The extent to which the ILO, a United Nations specialized agency, can assure that its standards are applied worldwide will determine the importance of the organization as the "intergovernmental body for the protection and advancement of workers everywhere," Brown said.

He cautioned against all attempts to downgrade the uniqueness that the participation of trade unionists and employers with governments gives the ILO.

"Any weakening or erosion of this system would render the ILO meaningless and ineffective," he said.

Czechoslovakia's communist government refused to submit to ILO procedures as it rejected a request to appear before the assembly's committee on the application of standards.

The Czech government said in a letter that it would not answer questions concerning western trade union complaints that dissidents were denied jobs because of their political convictions in contravention of ILO rules. The letter asserted that the complaints constituted interference in Czechoslovakia's purely "internal affairs."

The so-called worker delegates from the Soviet bloc walked silently out of a workers' caucus when Jerzy Milewski of Poland's banned Solidarity trade union organization was given the floor amidst loud applause.

Message from Walesa

Milewski, who heads the office that exiled Solidarity members maintain in Belgium, read a message in which Lech Walesa, the Solidarity leader, denounced the Polish government's non-observance of the ILO freedom of association conventions.

Walesa urged the ILO worker delegates to give all possible support to Solidarity's "peaceful struggle for our inalienable rights."

Poland did not send a delegation to the ILO conference because its treatment of Solidarity is under ILO investigation.

Real pay drop dulls outlook for economy

The economic outlook for workers was clouded by a government report that real average weekly earnings dropped sharply in May and the announcement of another boost in the prime lending rate of major banks.

Another Bureau of Labor Statistics report showed that retail prices rose a relatively modest three-tenths of 1 percent in May, as measured by the consumer price index for urban wage earners and clerical workers (CPI-W).

Rate continues up

Key banks and lending institutions ratcheted their prime rate from 12.5 to 13 percent, and some bankers predicted their rates will continue to climb this year and next. The continuing surge in interest rates is expected to send home mortgage rates even higher and further dampen housing construction.

In its report on real average weekly earnings, the BLS said preliminary data showed a decline of 1.3 percent from April to May, wiping out most of an increase in the previous month.

Average hourly earnings, also adjusted for inflation, fell four-tenths of 1 percent. Over the year, average weekly earnings were up 4.9 percent, using current dollars, BLS said.

According to BLS data, real weekly earnings of non-supervisory workers on private, non-farm payrolls, expressed in constant, uninflated 1977 dollars, averaged $173.67 in May compared to $174.71 in April and $170.55 a year earlier.

But real wages remain well below 1979 levels.

The increase of three-tenths of 1 percent in the CPI-W, a seasonally adjusted figure, followed a rise of two-tenths of 1 percent in April and no change in March. The index is the basis for cost-of-living adjustments in social security and other federal payments and for COLAs in many union contracts.

In other economic developments:

- Factory orders for durable goods rose 3.3 percent in May after a 6.5 percent plunge in April. While orders for most items measured by the Commerce Dept.'s index were up, orders for military goods fell 10.9 percent on top of a 45.9 percent drop in April, and orders for primary metals, such as steel, were down 9.5 percent.

Orders for capital goods, such as machinery and equipment. were up 10.6 percent. But the increase is tempered by data indicating that industries are placing substantial amounts of new orders for machine tools and other items with foreign companies.

- The U.S. dollar soared to new highs against foreign currencies including the British pound, the Canadian dollar, the Swiss frank and the Japanese yen. Continued over-valuation of the dollar makes it harder for U.S. manufacturers to export goods for sale overseas and makes imports cheaper in the U.S. market.

23.8 million felt the pain

Joblessness struck 23.8 million adult Americans—nearly 20 percent of the workforce—at some time in 1983, according to a study released by the Labor Dept.

The Bureau of Labor Statistics reported that the 1983 figures were a slight improvement over 1982 when 26.5 million persons 16 years or older suffered at least some unemployment, or about 22 percent of all those who worked or looked for work during the year.

AFL-CIO Economist Markley Roberts pointed out that the latest figures confirm that there are "still too many people suffering joblessness," and the number is still significantly higher than figures from four years ago which were considered excessive then.

BLS figures show that in 1981, 23.4 million persons or 19.5 percent of those who wanted to work, experienced unemployment. The figures for 1980 were 21.4 million or 16.9 percent of the eligible workforce; for 1979, 18.5 million or 14.8 percent.

The BLS study found that the median length of unemployment periods in 1983 was 14.9 weeks, down slightly from 15.4 weeks of joblessness in 1982.

The report said that 84 percent of workers who suffered unemployment in 1983 held a job some time during the year, but 16 percent looked for work and could not find it. Among blacks who sought jobs, nearly one-third were unable to find any work during the year.

The agency also reported that a large proportion of those who experienced some unemployment were hit by two or more spells of joblessness, 32.4 percent in 1983 compared to 33.6 percent in 1982.

There they go again

NLRB's latest switch lends support to scabs

In another reversal of existing policy, the Reagan appointees to the National Labor Relations Board ruled that a union cannot restrict a member from resigning during a strike and crossing the union's picket line to scab.

The board voted 3-1 to reverse a 1982 decision—involving the Machinists—that upheld the union's right to place certain reasonable restrictions on resignations, including an advance notice rule and a continued obligation not to cross an existing picket line.

In a new decision, also involving the IAM, Chairman Donald L. Dotson and members Robert P. Hunter and Patricia Diaz Dennis said "a union may not lawfully restrict the right of its members to resign from membership," and held that it is an unfair labor practice for a union to impose a fine on a worker who drops membership during a strike and goes to work as a scab.

IAM President William W. Winpisinger called the ruling "one more in a string of decisions based on tortured logic and legal misinterpretation by the Reagan appointees to the board."

Winpisinger said the IAM "will pursue a reversal of the decision in the courts." But "the real remedy is the defeat of Ronald Reagan so that fairness can be restored to the NLRB," he stressed.

The NLRB majority decision was opposed by Don L. Zimmerman, the lone holdover appointed during the Carter Administration. Zimmerman pointed out in his dissent that while restrictions on resignations must be reasonable, the lack of any union power over resignations—and scabbing — tips the balance too far toward employers and against a union's need to protect the right to strike as its "ultimate economic weapon."

The case involves the decision of IAM Local 1414 in Burlingame, Calif., to impose a $2,250 fine on a member who resigned in the middle of a six-month-long strike against a local car dealer and then returned to work.

The IAM constitution calls it "improper conduct" for a member to go to work for a firm being struck by the union. It also specifies that resignation "shall not relieve a member of his obligation to refrain from accepting employment at the establishment for the duration of the strike or lockout if the resignation occurs during the period of the strike or lockout or within 14 days preceding its commencement."

Resignations made within 14 days of establishment of a picket line will not become effective while the line is up, or relieve the member from an obligation not to cross that line, the union's bylaws state.

Breach of promise

The IAM constitution's restrictions on resignations during strikes were upheld by the U.S. 9th Court of Appeals earlier this year. That ruling, which conflicts with what the board has now held, said members who dump a union during a strike are "breaching a promise" to other employees.

The board contended that resignation restrictions of any kind "impair" an employee's right, under federal labor law, "to refrain from union or other concerted activities.

The board's ruling which included an order to Local 1414 to "expunge" the restrictions from its "governing documents"—could make it harder for unions to discipline members who become strikebreakers, and that could weaken a union's bargaining power in a dispute. Most unions have some constitutional provisions that apply to members' resignations.

The NLRB order, however, pointed out that it could not in this case order the international union to change its constitution since it was not directly a party to the case.

The board also required Local 1414 to rescind the fine, and to post a notice of the decision and orders at its union hall, as well as to provide the car dealer with copies of the notice for posting at the employer's discretion.

Unions denounce perversion of U.S. labor law's objectives

"labor consultants," he suggested, "because the NLRB is doing the job for them."

Two House subcommittees, one headed by Rep. William Clay (D-Mo.) and the other by Rep. Barney Frank (D-Mass.), joined in the three days of hearings on the question, "Has Labor Law Failed?"

Clay noted in an opening statement that the National Labor Relations Act adopted in the New Deal era was intended to bring about stability in industrial relations, but confidence in the fairness of the system has been shattered.

It now takes an average of nearly three years from the filing of an unfair labor practice charge to the court enforcement of a remedy, Clay said. Increasingly, workers who support unions face reprisals. And laws requiring reporting and disclosure of the activities of management consultants go unenforced.

Delay mechanisms

IUE President Bywater testified about a case before the NLRB involving three workers who were fired during a union organizing drive in Blackville, S.C., in 1980. An NLRB administrative law judge found that they had been unlawfully fired for union activity, but the case is still before the labor board. "If and when we win," Bywater said, "the company will undoubtedly appeal to the U.S. 4th Circuit Court of Appeals and there will be another year's delay."

Because of such tactics, he said, and the failure of the present NLRB to carry out its mission, the IUE and other unions are increasingly forced to "alternative means such as strike, boycotts and corporate campaigns to secure workers' rights."

Presidents of two unaffiliated unions—Richard L. Trumka of the Mine Workers and James L. Kane of the United Electrical Workers—reiterated labor's loss of confidence in the fairness of the NLRB and the adequacy of federal labor law.

Corporate actions

"Corporate America has reignited the labor war which prompted the passage of the National Labor Relations Act," Trumka said.

A meat packinghouse worker who supported the UFCW during an organizing campaign in Grand Island, Neb., testified that he was fired in November 1982 but his case didn't get to a hearing until early this year, and "we're still waiting for the decision."

Meanwhile, Dennis D. Nelson testified, he has been blacklisted by other employers after he was fired by the Nebraska packinghouse. "During a job interview, one employer actually told me to my face that he doesn't need any union people working for him." His unemployment insurance has run out, and he faces foreclosure of his home mortgage.

A panel of former NLRB officials now in private practice as management attorneys took a different view of the labor board's anti-union tilt under the Reagan Administration. The changes made by the board's new majority, they contended, merely restored "balance" to the enforcement of the law.

IUD council calls '84 elections key to restoring rights

Hollywood, Md. — Organized labor's antidote to a National Labor Relations Board packed with anti-labor Reagan appointees is to elect an Administration and Congress "dedicated to protecting the rights of workers and the principles of free collective bargaining, the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. declared.

In a resolution adopted at its meeting here, the IUD executive council charged that the Reagan NLRB has deliberately altered long-standing interpretations of federal law, and warned that its anti-labor bias may force unions to seek new ways to win collective bargaining rights.

The resolution called on the NLRB to "cease its lawless emasculation of the rights" assured to workers under federal law including the right to organize, bargain and enjoy a fair contract.

Even before the 1980 elections, federal labor law clearly had "serious defects" that needed correction, but "the Reagan appointees to the NLRB have reduced the effectiveness of the Act and the fairness of its enforcement to a new low," the IUD asserted.

The resolution charged that the Reagan appointees "have made clear their single-minded dedication to the needs and desires of employers who are flouting the law with alarming and increasing frequency."

Victimizing workers

The IUD said the NLRB's overturning of decisions intended to help and protect workers and its failure to enforce rules which it cannot overturn have victimized both union and non-union workers alike.

Before the passage of the national labor law, unions still found ways to establish collective bargaining despite employer hostility, and the record of the Reagan board "may force us to return to our earlier methods of self-help," the IUD warned.

The IUD also called on Congress to monitor the NLRB's activities and to take "remedial legislative steps" to assure that the goals and principles of the nation's basic labor policy are met and enforced.

House acts to bolster anti-bias laws

With bipartisan support, the labor-civil rights coalition pressed for remedial action and two House committees with jurisdiction over the bill ignored the Administration's "go-slow" request and cleared the measure for floor action.

The House-passed bill amends pertinent provisions of the 1964 Civil Rights Act, the 1972 Education Amendments, the 1973 Rehabilitation Act and the Age Discrimination Act of 1975.

Its leading sponsors included Representatives Don Edwards (D-Calif.), Claudine Schneider (R-R.I.), Patricia Schroeder (D-Colo.) and Paul Simon (D-Ill.).

In a letter to House members, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison urged passage of "this simple and straightforward bill" to restate the "original legislative intent" of the civil rights laws passed by Congress over the last 20 years.

In a related area, the House completed debate on a union-supported bill to provide an independent study of sex-based pay inequities in the federal service and was preparing to vote on the issue as the AFL-CIO News went to press.

The original bill, sponsored by Rep. Mary Rose Oakar (D-Ohio) called for the study to be done by the federal Office of Personnel Management. But a "dirty tricks" memo prepared by an aide to OPM Director Donald J. Devine outlined a strategy to manipulate the pay study in order to sow political mischief.

The memo proposed to picture pay equity as threatening blue-collar wage levels so as to cause "disorder" in Democratic ranks and pit the labor movement against the women's movement.

Pay equity

To head off sabotage, Oakar expressed her intent to amend the bill to have the study done by an independent consultant. The AFL-CIO and unions representing both white-collar and blue-collar federal workers supported the measure.

Congress gave final approval of a mixed package of tax changes and spending cuts designed to reduce the projected deficit in President Reagan's budget by about 10 percent.

The package includes both tax reforms urged by the AFL-CIO and labor-opposed provisions that would add to inequities or adversely affect various groups of workers.

Congress was scheduled to adjourn not later than June 29 for the Independence Day holiday week and the Democratic convention. It will reconvene July 23.

A number of issues of concern to the AFL-CIO were pending as Congress edged closer to adjournment.

The Senate Appropriations Committee restored funds cut by the House from the National Endowment for Democracy—an innovative program in which the AFL-CIO participates to encourage democratic institutions in other countries. The funding bill awaits full Senate action.

A House-Senate conference on the immigration bills passed by both bodies may get under way during the congressional recess. In a letter to the conferees, 44 House members declared that elimination of the controversial "guest worker" program adopted by the House is essential to final passage of a bill.

Adoption of the grower-supported amendment to allow the importation of large numbers of foreign workers resulted in withdrawal of AFL-CIO support from the measure. It passed the House by only four votes and Rep. Fortney H. Stark (D-Calif.), who initiated the letter to the conferees, said its removal from the final bill is necessary to achieve "a fair and effective national immigration policy."

AFL-CIO Vice President J. C. Turner testifies on proposed asbestos standard at OSHA hearings, with federation job safety specialist Margaret Seminario and George H. Cohen, labor attorney specializing in safety issues.

OSHA proposal faulted

Stricter curb sought on asbestos exposure

By Arlee C. Green

The Reagan Administration's proposed standard on asbestos "has nothing to do with worker protection, but is merely a public relations gimmick," the AFL-CIO charged.

The federation and more than a dozen affiliates called on the Occupational Safety & Health Administration to adopt a 20-fold reduction in the exposure limit for the cancer-causing mineral.

AFL-CIO Vice President J. C. Turner stressed at OSHA hearings the federation's support of a 1980 federal report that said the ultimate goal of asbestos regulations "must be to eliminate exposure to asbestos where feasible."

Also testifying were representatives of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers, Service Employees, and the Building & Construction Trades Dept. which included speakers and testimony from more than a dozen BCTD affiliates. The Auto Workers and the Steelworkers will testify later.

Needed provisions

Turner, who is president of the Operating Engineers, outlined needed provisions in a new standard:

- Reduction of the permissible exposure level for an eight-hour shift from the current limit of 2 million fibers per cubic meter to 100,000 fibers.
- An "action level" at 50,000 fibers to trigger medical surveillance coverage.
- A separate standard for the construction industry.
- Engineering and work practice controls as the primary means to limiting exposures.

Turner told the OSHA panel that workers in many industries are exposed to asbestos, and by conservative estimates, 200,000 workers will die by the end of the century from past exposure.

Recounting the history of the asbestos standard, Turner charged the agency "has consistently failed to address the known hazards of this toxic substance."

OSHA's proposal for asbestos would lower exposure levels to either 500,000 fibers or 200,000 fibers, based on testimony presented at the hearings.

OSHA first proposed a 500,000-fiber limit in 1975, but scientific evidence since then has urged a maximum limit of 100,000 fibers, Turner pointed out, noting that an emergency standard OSHA issued last fall still called for the 500,000-fiber limit. That temporary rule was overturned by federal courts.

Turner expressed concern that OSHA, for the first time, is allowing widespread use of respirators to achieve reduced exposure levels, noting that the "only rationale offered by OSHA is the endorsement by numerous industry groups of a compliance strategy which allows greater flexibility in control measures."

Construction coverage

BCTD President Robert A. Georgine scored OSHA's general industry standard as "completely inadequate to protect construction workers." He said other speakers —international and local union officials, staff members, and health care professionals—would address the various segments of the asbestos proposal that BCTD made to OSHA last fall.

The BCTD proposal calls for a 100,000-fiber exposure limit, along with engineering controls and work practices to reduce exposures, establishment of regulated areas, worker training and certification, decontamination and emergency procedures, monitoring requirements, recordkeeping, medical surveillance, medical removal protection and employee notification requirements.

Dr. Kenneth B. Miller, an occupational health physician with OCAW, charged that the OSHA proposal "leaves us with the unmistakable impression that this regulation will do little more than turn back the regulatory clock in this area.

Benefits negated

He stressed that any benefits of reducing exposures will be negated by the "unjustifiably overbroad reliance on respirators" and by the "halving of the number of workers who would be covered by the medical surveillance program."

Miller noted that "the common thread which ties these two provisions, as well as some others, together is the significant compliance costs that industry will save by not having to adequately protect the health of exposed workers."

William K. Borwegen, director of occupational safety and health for the SEIU, pressed OSHA to include in the standard requirements for identifying flaking asbestos in all buildings, along with notification of workers of such hazards, establishment of regulated areas during abatement work, and training requirements for building maintenance workers.

Ohio labor draws up plans for major campaign effort

Cincinnati — The key role organized labor in Ohio will play in the defeat of President Reagan and the election of Walter Mondale in the November presidential election was the recurring theme of the State AFL-CIO's 14th biennial convention.

Nearly 1,000 delegates heard from a dozen prominent speakers and adopted 78 resolutions during the three-day convention.

Noting that organized labor has come under some criticism for involving itself in the presidential primary politics, Ohio AFL-CIO President Milan Marsh said, "Those self-righteous politicians should be apologizing to us for what they've allowed Reagan to do to the working people of this country the past four years."

In his keynote speech to the convention, Marsh observed that "Ronald Reagan tells us he stands for all the American virtues—God, motherhood and apple pie. Yet, he cuts pre- and post-natal care programs, puts college beyond our children's reach, undermines worthy social programs, makes mortgages unaffordable and tells our grandmothers they better get used to the idea that poverty and old age go hand in hand."

Primary role

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue congratulated the convention on the role played by the state federation in the primary election that secured Ohio's 80 Democratic convention delegates for Mondale.

"The record now is clear," Donahue said. "Where our members were fully informed and turned out in substantial numbers, they chose Walter Mondale, and they made a difference—a big difference."

He called Mondale "a candidate who will challenge Ronald Reagan head-on, all the way—who will fight, as Harry Truman did in 1948, for the solid principles that his party stands for, for the values and hopes and dreams, not of some fabricated, affluent "new generation" but of all generations in America—young and old and in between."

Donahue said the November election will be crucial for organized labor and the nation.

"What we do now or what we fail to do," he said, "will largely determine where America is going for the remainder of this century."

Other speakers urged the delegates to dedicate themselves to the task of registering thousands of trade unionists as voters and participating in this fall's get-out-the-vote campaign.

Gov. Richard Celeste, in an address to the delegates, said there is no excuse for anyone even thinking that Ronald Reagan has deserved another four years in the White House. And COPE Director John Perkins said if Reagan is to be defeated in November, it will be the American trade union movement that will supply the necessary soldiers and energy to complete the task.

Convention speakers

Other speakers who spurred Ohio trade unionists for a major campaign effort included U.S. Senators John Glenn and Howard Metzenbaum, State Senate President Harry Meshel, AFL-CIO Regional Director Walter Waddy, Ohio Supreme Court Chief Justice Frank Celebrezze, Electronic Workers Sec.-Treas. Ed Fire, Ohio House Speaker Vern Riffe and NAACP Executive Director Ben Hooks.

The late David Fitzmaurice, who was president of the IUE and an AFL-CIO vice president at the time of his death in 1982, was memorialized, and former Carpenter President William Konyha received a standing ovation during ceremonies marking his recent retirement. Both had been vice presidents of the Ohio AFL-CIO.

Clinton Wood dies at 61, retired staff member

Richmond, Va.—Clinton Wood, who retired last year after 28 years' service as an AFL-CIO field representative, died here on June 11 after a heart attack. He was 61.

Wood helped to organize Federal Labor Union 23114, a directly affiliated local of the AFL and served as its president for nearly a decade before joining the federation's field staff.

Funeral services were held here on June 15. His survivors include his wife Dorothy and a son.

Coca-Cola pact won in Guatemala

Embattled unionists occupying a Coca-Cola bottling plant in Guatemala City, Guatemala, have signed an agreement with the company that marks a key victory in their long trade union and human rights struggle there.

Representatives of the union, known as STEGAC, signed an agreement May 27 with the Coca-Cola Co. and its subsidiary, Coca-Cola Interamerican Corp., guaranteeing the workers recognition of their union, bargaining rights, job security and continued recognition of the existing contract at the plant, known as EGSA.

STEGAC members have been occupying the plant since Feb. 18, when management claimed EGSA was bankrupt and announced an immediate plant closing.

Coca-Cola is now looking for someone to buy EGSA from its current owner.

The 350 STEGAC members, under the agreement, will remain in the plant until it resumes operation and be paid to care for and maintain the building and equipment.

With the signing of the agreement, reached after two days of virtually around-the-clock negotiations in San Jose, Costa Rica, the International Union of Food & Allied Workers said it would end its global boycott of Coke's products.

The IUF, the international trade secretariat with which STEGAC is affiliated, was instrumental in bringing Coca-Cola to the bargaining table and in hammering out the agreement.

At its May meeting, the AFL-CIO Executive Council was sharply critical of Coca-Cola's attitude toward the plight of workers in the Guatemala City plant. The council called on the Atlanta-based multinational company to meet with the workers and live up to its four-year-old agreement to help end years of management-instigated labor unrest at EGSA.

The Canadian Labor Congress and a number of European, Asian and African unions also protested Coca-Cola's actions.

Worker deaths

Although Coca-Cola does not own EGSA, the company agreed in 1980 to finance a change in ownership in an effort to end management-directed violence against union members that had included the killing of eight workers over a period of several years. Coca-Cola also promised to exert control over the new owners, insist on the security of the union and aid the families of the murdered unionists.

But when EGSA's owners claimed bankruptcy—on grounds disputed by the IUF —Coca-Cola disclaimed any further responsibility.

A fact-finding mission of North American trade unionists visited the plant in March and its report on the situation of the EGSA workers bolstered world wide concern. Under these pressures, Coca-Cola agreed to come to the bargaining table with STEGAC in late May.

The new pact commits Coca-Cola to help find a new buyer for EGSA and to guarantee continued recognition of the union. Coca-Cola will also back recognition of the current contract and the employment of the 350 remaining workers. Some layoffs would be permitted 60 days after re-opening if sales volume is not up to specified levels, but laid-off workers will have recall rights.

The IUF credited "international solidarity" of the labor movement with STEGAC as a key factor in bringing Coca-Cola to acceptance of responsibility for EGSA. But the trade secretariat stressed that "continued vigilance" is essential to make sure the company lives up to the agreement. If Coca-Cola fails to observe the terms, the boycott will be renewed, the IUF said.

In addition to the STEGAC executive committee, participants in the meeting on the union side included Food & Commercial Workers Executive Vice President Thomas G. Whaley; IUF Gen. Sec. Dan Gallin; Sally Cornwell, IUF regional secretary for North America; Stanley Gacek, UFCW assistant director for international affairs, and Marta Torres, a Guatemalan labor lawyer.

Court rules labor law applies to illegal aliens

By Susan Dunlop

The Supreme Court ruled that illegal aliens are protected by federal labor law, and an employer who "turns in" undocumented workers in a union-busting scheme is guilty of an unfair labor practice.

In a 7-2 decision, the justices upheld a National Labor Relations Board decision that an employer who reported illegal aliens to the Immigration & Naturalization Service the day after a union election in his plant was guilty of discrimination against employees for union activity.

The court found that nothing in current federal labor or immigration statutes denies illegal workers the full protections of law. The justices agreed with the AFL-CIO's friend of the court brief which noted that without those protections, illegal workers are at the mercy of employers who use the threat of deportation to thwart their workers' rights, including the right to form a union. The brief also contended that leaving illegal aliens without protection would encourage employers to hire exploitable illegal workers at the expense of other workers.

The case involved a Chicago leather tanning firm, Sure-Tan, Inc., which was organized by the Meat Cutters in 1976. Despite an intensive anti-union campaign by the employer, the workers voted for the union, and on Jan. 19, 1977, the National Labor Relations Board certified Local 431 as their bargaining agent.

The next day, Sure-Tan, which admitted it knew months before that about half its employees were Mexican nationals in the United States illegally, called the INS. The INS raided the Sure-Tan factory in February, and arrested five workers who agreed to return voluntarily to Mexico.

In a ruling upheld by the U.S. 7th Circuit Court of Appeals, the NLRB found that Sure-Tan violated federal labor law since through the belated whistle-blowing it had "constructively discharged" the employees for union activities.

Justice Sandra Day O'connor pointed out in the majority opinion that while ordinarily reporting of violations of the law "should be encouraged," such public-mindedness is an unfair labor practice when it is clearly done "in retaliation for the employees' protected union activity."

Back pay denied

In another part of the decision, the justices struck down the appeals court's order for six months' back pay and expanded reinstatement for the workers, ruling that the lower court exceeded its authority when it altered the NLRB's narrower remedy. The high court remanded the case to the board for determination of an "appropriate" remedy, conditioned on the workers' legal re-entry to the United States.

In another key decision, the Court upheld the retroactive application of a provision in 1980 amendments to the federal pension law covering multiemployer funds that increased the liability of companies withdrawing from such plans.

The unanimous decision reversed a U.S. 9th Circuit Court of Appeals ruling that imposing a liability on an employer who withdrew from multiemployer pension funds during the retroactive period, Apr. 29 to Sept. 26, 1980, violated the employer's rights under the due process clause of the 5th Amendment.

The case involves the Oregon-Washington Carpenters-Employers Pension Trust Fund, a multiemployer plan, which attempted to collect a withdrawal liability of some $201,000 from R. A. Gray & Co., an Oregon construction firm which had pulled out of the fund on June 1, 1980.

The Supreme Court ruled that Congress had a legitimate reason for forcing the retroactive payments under the Multiemployer Pension Plan Amendments Act.

"Withdrawals occurring during the legislative process not only would require that remaining employers increase their contributions to existing pension plans, but also could have ultimately affected the stability of the plans themselves," Justice William Brennan wrote for the court.

The MPPAA amended the Employee Retirement Income Securty Act of 1974 and increased the liability of firms that withdraw from multiemployer pension plans. Before that, the liability for withdrawing from such funds was limited to 30 percent of the company's net worth. Under MPPAA, the liability is the difference between the present value of vested benefits and the current value of the plan's assets.

In other cases:

- The court refused to review a lower court ruling upholding a racial desegregation order in Buffalo that requires the school board to hire one minority teacher for every white teacher hired and to insure that layoffs are not allowed to set back the employment gains made by minority teachers. The Buffalo Teachers Federation had requested the review out of concern that it might alter seniority protections.

EPA cases

- The justices ruled 8-0 that under certain conditions, chemical companies cannot prevent the Environmental Protection Agency from releasing health and safety data the firms had supplied on pesticide products when seeking the right to market the products.

- In a separate ruling, the court upheld an EPA regulation that permits states to classify entire plants as single sources of pollution when enforcing pollution standards. Plants will be considered as operating under a single "bubble" so that firms may add a facility, such as a new furnace, that exceeds federal standards as long as the added pollution doesn't push the plant's total pollution level over the limit.

State-County delegates draft rights, health, safety agenda

San Francisco—The State, County & Municipal Employees convention adopted a program calling for stepped-up efforts in the areas of affirmative action in hiring and promotions, job safety, and health care cost containment.

The 2,700 delegates also voiced deep concern on international issues, focusing on the need for human rights guarantees.

Donahue urged the delegates to "make no small plans."

Changes needed

"The challenge before us," he said, "is enormous—to change and improve a nation, to change and improve the trade union movement, to create a society where fairness and decency are the concern of everyone."

Part of that challenge, Donahue declared, is to overcome the attacks on public employees launched most often by office-seekers and occasionally by office-holders looking for a "scapegoat" to obscure their own faults and failures.

He also called for continued efforts to bring order to "the crazy-quilt pattern of state and local laws affecting public employee rights." Those rights are still not fully recognized in many states, Donahue noted, and if that resistance continues federal legislation may be needed to mandate union recognition and collective bargaining rights for all public employees.

"On top of those issues," Donahue continued, "you and all our other public employee affiliates must unite as never before against the staunch and rising anti-union attitudes of public managers. You have to carry on the fight to offer to every public employee the possibility to join a union, to be represented on the job, and to enjoy the kind of dignity on the job that a union card insures."

McGovern stressed that "this is a fateful election year because the man who is now in the White House is on a dangerously mistaken course both at home and abroad." He added that he believes the Democrats can win with a strong platform "based on strong, clear, common sense programs."

High on the list of domestic issues that concerned the delegates were health care costs and workplace health and safety. A resolution called on the international union to "continue to develop strategies for containing health care costs and for improving the health care available to AFSCME members and their families."

The resolution spells out a number of possible mechanisms for cost control: use of health maintenance organizations, regulation of insurance carriers, laws requiring cost disclosure, statewide hospital rate-setting programs, and improved delivery and utilization patterns.

The convention called on AFSCME to redouble its efforts to respond effectively to the "burgeoning problem of office worker safety and health." It urged more communication on the issue, surveys, development of a health and safety clearinghouse, workshops, and lobbying for increased research on health and safety. Other resolutions called for strict procedures to deal with infectious disease in workplaces and removing pregnant women from jobs with video display terminals.

The convention opposed "any and all laws authorizing workfare programs." It also expressed opposition to "computer home work that is unilaterally proposed by management" and urged "care to protect members against exploitation and unrealistic work schedules" involving such work.

The delegates expressed their dissatisfaction with the pace of affirmative action to counter employment discrimination. They reaffirmed their commitment to such action and urged AFSCME locals and councils to monitor their employers' affirmative action performance and "insist that meaningful progress be made."

Reagan policies hit

In the area of international concerns, the convention condemned the actions of the Reagan Administration in Central America, calling on the Congress "to demonstrate its responsibility and to thwart the Administration's efforts to impose a military solution" there.

In a separate, related resolution, the delegates "specifically opposed the provision of military and economic assistance to any nation that oppresses its people by denying them the basic human rights, including the rights of trade unions to organize and represent their members."

The AFSCME delegates came out for a negotiated "mutual and verifiable United States-Soviet Union freeze on the testing, production, and deployment of anti-satellite weapons, nuclear warheads, missiles, and other delivery systems."

Oregon labor spurs campaign to oust Reagan, elect Mondale

Portland, Ore.—The need to defeat Republican President Ronald Reagan in the Nov. 6 general election and replace him with Democrat Walter Mondale was the dominant theme emerging from the Oregon AFL-CIO's 29th convention.

The adverse effect Reaganomics has had on the Oregon labor movement was reflected by the low attendance of 315 delegates and 148 honorary delegates and guests. In good economic times, those figures were sometimes doubled.

The convention approved a number of internal changes in the operation of the state labor federation as delegates acted on proposals drafted by a Committee on the Future. The committee was established by the 1983 convention to promulgate ways to streamline the federation with an eye toward cutting costs. Per capita tax revenues have dropped sharply as Reagan's economic policies have produced unemployment as high as 80 percent in some locals.

The federation now has about 75,000 members, down by 31 percent since Reagan took office. Oregon's jobless rate runs well above the national average.

A major change voted by delegates was to make the post of political director an appointive rather than an elective position. This will take effect Oct. 1, 1985, when the present director, Nellie Fox, plans to retire.

Another change would reduce the cost of executive board meetings by requiring local unions and councils to pay lost time and expenses for their board members instead of letting the federation bear those costs.

The convention endorsed Margie Hendriksen, a Eugene lawyer, Democratic state senator and former member of the State, County & Municipal Employees, in her campaign for the U.S. Senate seat held since 1967 by Republican Mark Hatfield.

Democrats backed

The delegates endorsed a slate of Democrats for statewide, congressional and state legislative offices except for one Republican legislator.

Delegates took time out to march from the convention hotel to a nearby downtown building where the union-busting Louisiana-Pacific Corp. has its headquarters. Delegates swarmed around the building with picket signs urging a consumer boycott of the firm's lumber products. Members of two timber unions have been on strike at 17 L-P mills in the West for nearly a year.

State AFL-CIO President Irvin Fletcher and Sec.-Treas. Robert C. Baugh, other officers and board members are in mid-term and were not up for election. Fletcher and Baugh told the convention the priority task facing labor is to get rid of Reagan and elect Democrats so that the nation's economy can be turned around.

Newspaper Guild votes funds to step up organizing effort

San Juan, P.R.—The Newspaper Guild's 51st annual convention voted overwhelmingly to finance a vigorous, new organizing program by raising three-quarters of a million dollars through a pair of special dues assessments, one each in July and August.

At the same time, calling the incumbent U.S. Administration "bad news" for workers and their unions, the economy, women and minorities, the convention warned that Ronald Reagan's re-election would be "double trouble" for newspaper unionists.

"After showing them where he stands on labor, Reagan tramples on their professional sensibilities by trying to stifle freedom of information and dealing reporters out of the Grenada invasion," the convention said.

In the process, delegates rejected by decisive margins attempts to restrict the right of the union's leadership to endorse or take other actions on behalf of candidates for public office.

While Guild endorsements may generate controversy among some members, it is "a small price to pay for the exercise of our responsibilities as a union to assure the present and future well-being of our members and the industry they serve," the convention declared.

Improving climate

The expanded Guild organizing effort will be built around additional organizers to be hired with the new funds. It will enable the union simultaneously to respond to the improving organizing climate in the newspaper industry and to meet "challenges from other unions," delegates pointed out.

A few hours before the convention's action, delegates heard a leader of the newly organized news room employees of the Milwaukee Journal and Milwaukee Sentinel describe the circumstances that led to a successful representation vote there on June 1.

The Journal Co. is employee-owned and extremely profitable, but "there is a vast difference between being employee-owned and employee managed," said Jack Norman, the business news reporter who subsequently was elected president of the newly chartered Milwaukee Guild.

The convention's reference to "challenges from other unions" was based for the most part on the pledge by the president of the unaffiliated Teamsters that "we at the Teamsters are going to represent that (newspaper) industry," whether the Typographical Union merges with his union or not. Jackie Presser made the pledge while inviting the Typographical Union last August to reject merger with the Guild in favor of joining the Teamsters.

In urging delegates to approve the special organizing levies, TNG President Charles A. Perlik, Jr., pointed out that the Guild's "thin, brave line" of international representatives possesses "more than enough experience and savvy" for any contest with the Teamsters but is "too few" against "the platoon . . . the Teamsters can turn loose."

Assessment formula

The assessments, based on members' wages, add amounts ranging from $2 to $27.35 a month to dues, with the high amount applying to those making $895 a week or more.

Convention-enacted revisions in the Guild's union-wide bargaining program included, among other things, raising wage-bargaining goals to $1,000 a week for experienced persons in such jobs as reporting, ad sales and computer programming and to $500 a week for others, such as secretaries and janitors.

The convention also called upon all locals to bargain guarantees of a pregnant employee's rights to transfer without reduction in pay or benefits from a job the employee believes may be hazardous to the unborn child or the employee, a safeguard now applying under several contracts to employees working on video display terminals. There have been widely scattered and unexplained clusters of miscarriages and birth defects among VDT workers in several industries in recent years.

The convention also elected Gene Turner as a vice president to fill a vacant position.

Rights of workers

Democratic platform supports labor goals

served on the 15-member drafting committee.

Most of the drafting committee's proposals were adopted intact, but some of the sections were made more specific.

The "right of workers" section of the platform that will be presented to the convention for approval includes support for labor law reform legislation, construction site picketing law, repeal of the "right-to-work" Sec. 14(b) of the National Labor Relations Act and bankruptcy law changes "to prevent the circumvention of the collective bargaining process and the destruction of labor-management contracts."

It calls for increased funding for the Occupational Safety & Health Administration, vigorous enforcement of job safety and health standards, and affirms the right of workers to know what hazardous materials and chemicals they may encounter on the job.

The platform draft calls for effective enforcement of federal labor standards, including the Davis-Bacon Act, and rejects the concept of a "subminimum wage."

It backs reform of the Hatch Act, curbs on polygraph testing in employment and seeks protection of pension rights of communications workers affected by the AT&T divestiture. And it calls for a comprehensive maritime policy, keyed to the "realities" of today's world.

Industrial strategy

"We will not allow our workers and our industries to be displaced by either unfair import competition or irrational fiscal and monetary policies," the platform draft asserts.

It terms a healthy U.S. auto industry "essential" and said foreign automakers with substantial sales in the United States should "invest here and create jobs where their markets are."

The platform draft advocates an industrial strategy mechanism along the lines urged by the AFL-CIO, based on a commitment by labor, industry and government.

It supports action to avert plant closings wherever possible. "Where plants are nonetheless closed, we will help workers and communities to adapt."

On housing, the platform proposal reaffirms the Democratic Party's commitment to "adequate shelter at reasonable costs" for all Americans, with a responsibility for government action to meet the needs of low-income households not served by the private market.

The platform draft stresses the need for "sufficient revenue to finance our defense and allow for investment in our future" and asserts that this can be achieved "without increasing the burden on average taxpayers."

Tax equity goal

The key, it suggests, is reversal of Reagan policies that "gave huge breaks to wealthy individuals and to large corporations." Faced with a huge budget deficit, "there must be a return to a fair tax on corporate income."

The Platform Committee adopted a strong stand against both a constitutional amendment requiring a balanced federal budget and the convening of a federal constitutional convention to initiate such an amendment.

Other sections of the draft platform, all of which will be acted on at the Democratic convention in San Francisco starting July 16, stress the importance of an expanded federal investment in education and job training, and reject firmly cuts in social security protection.

In Medicare, "the real problem is the growing cost of health services." To meet that problem, the platform draft calls for both effective cost controls and encouragement to innovative alternatives in health care delivery. It reaffirms a "commitment to the long-term goal of comprehensive national health insurance."

Most of the provisions in the platform draft were endorsed by committee members who are supporters of all three presidential candidates. But minority reports or amendments may be proposed when the document is considered by the full convention.

South Dakota labor adopts five-cent boost in per capita

Rapid City, S.D.—Delegates to the annual convention of the South Dakota AFL-CIO voted to increase the monthly per capita payment by five cents to close the gap caused by rising costs and declining revenues. The new rate of 65 cents is to take effect July 1.

The 68 delegates also approved a constitutional change extending the term of office for the state federation's top post from two years to four. Jack Dudley was re-elected to his fifth term as president and financial secretary.

Doris Mowry of the Communications Workers, second vice president for the past 11 years, retired from that post and was succeeded by John E. Hansen of the Steelworkers. Sandra Mohr of the CWA was voted into the vice presidential post vacated by Hansen. All other vice presidents were re-elected to two-year terms.

Wendell Olson, Food & Commercial Workers Region 13 director, a key speaker at the convention dinner, told the delegates that the labor movement can't stand another four years of a Reagan Administration. The key to Ronald Reagan's defeat in November, Olson said, will be for local unions to make sure their members are registered and that they vote on election day.

Olson pointed to Mondale's record in support of labor and liberal causes as a "record that speaks for itself" that should attract the votes of working people.

Other speakers included Gov. William J. Janklow (R); Lee Swinson, prseident of the South Dakota Farmers Union, and AFL-CIO Region II Director L. D. Porter.

Among the 25 resolutions passed by the delegates was one urging that state public employees be given fixed across-the-board pay raises rather than percentage increases, to break the pattern which has lengthened the range of salaries paid state workers, with meager increases going to the lowest paid group.

The convention also voiced support of the postal worker unions in their current negotiations and called for rejection of the Administration's revived effort to gain a youth subminimum wage.

Studies Center schedule for July, August

The George Meany Center for Labor Studies will offer five institutes during July and August. The schedule:

Advanced Editing Skills, July 15-20—Workshop for experienced union editors focusing on layout and makeup, picture editing, headline writing and production problems. Cosponsored by the International Labor Communications Association.

Labor Law, Aug. 12-17—Course for non-lawyers examining legal issues arising from bankruptcies, plant closings, movement of plants and transfer of ownership, and an analysis of the enforcement of Landrum-Griffin Reporting & Disclosure Act.

Newswriting & Editing, Aug. 19-24—For union editors and would-be editors on the basics of newswriting and editing for readability. Cosponsored by ILCA.

Organizing Techniques I, Aug. 19-24—A program on the mechanics of an organizing campaign with video taping so participants can hone their skills.

Arbitration Techniques: Preparation & Presentation, Aug. 26-31—An institute on the presentation of mock cases before professional arbitrators. Participants will see themselves in action on video tape.

Candidates for bachelor of arts degrees in labor studies will be on campus July 29-Aug. 3 for their semi-annual week-in-residence. An alumni program is set for Aug. 1 and 2.

Affiliates using the campus for their own leadership training programs in July are: Union of Police Associations, July 8-10; Carpenters, July 8-13; AFL-CIO Dept. for Professional Employees, July 10-13, and the Railway & Airline Clerks, July 15-20.

The American Institute for Free Labor Development will have trade unionists from 16 Latin American countries on campus until July 20.

More information on these and other labor studies is available from Fred K. Hoehler, Jr., executive director, George Meany Center, 10000 New Hampshire Ave., Silver Spring, Md. 20903; telephone 301/431-6400.

Flawed Labor Law

EMPLOYERS long ago discovered that they can defy both the letter and the spirit of the National Labor Relations Act without risking more than a mild slap-on-the-wrist from the NLRB.

Faced with a union organizing campaign, they can stall for months with delaying tactics. And if that doesn't discourage the workers, the most active union supporters can be fired on trumped-up excuses. If the workers are ordered reinstated two years later, that's a small price to pay for what has become "a license for union-busting."

It's like starting a poker game with back-to-back aces.

Congress acknowledged this imbalance nearly seven years ago, when the House passed a labor law reform bill by an impressive 257-163 vote. Fifty-eight senators supported it, but a filibuster blocked its enactment.

Since then, the built-in weaknesses of the law have been compounded by the transformation of the National Labor Relations Board by President Reagan's appointees.

INSTEAD of a neutral body, the NLRB has become an ally of the employers. Not of fair employers, to be sure, but of firms that are unwilling to accept the right of their workers to organize and bargain through a union.

At House hearings this past week, union witnesses served notice that they are prepared to bypass the NLRB and secure recognition by other legal means—including strikes.

The National Labor Relations Act, which was supposed to provide an alternative to industrial strife, has been shown to be deeply flawed.

It may fall into disuse entirely if Congress fails to repair its structural weakness and if the Senate continues to confirm appointees who tilt the NLRB further and further against workers and their unions.

The Challenge Before Us

ALL OF US trade unionists have much work to do between now and Nov. 6 to see to it that our members and all Americans who work for a living have the best possible array of facts from which to make a judgment in the coming election.

We are told of recovery. But the fact is that if the 8.5 million Americans still out of work stood in a line 24 inches per person, that line would stretch from here all the way to New York City on the opposite coast.

Twenty-three million men and women were without jobs at some time during 1981; 27 million in 1982 and nearly 24 million again in 1983. The average duration of unemployment in those three years was 14 weeks, 16 weeks and 15 weeks. So in the first three years of the Reagan Administration, at least 30 million families have been hurt by unemployment which could have been avoided.

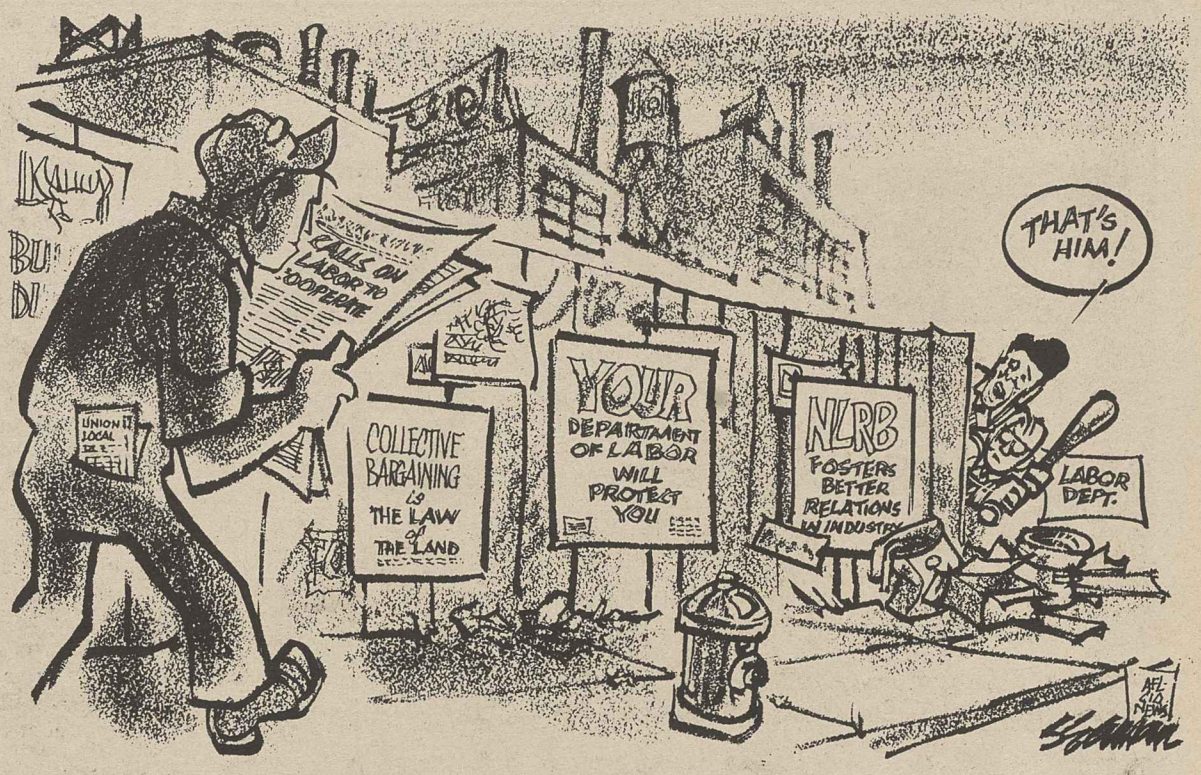
Under the Carter Administration, unemployment averaged 6.4 percent, declining to 5.8 percent in 1979. Under Reagan, unemployment has averaged 8.5 percent, including that horrible point of 10.7 percent in December 1982, the highest level since the Great Depression.

IN HUMAN TERMS, the costs were even higher. Nearly 11 million families lost their health insurance coverage; 494,000 families lost their homes through mortgage foreclosures; 72,934 small businesses were forced into bankruptcy.

The challenge before us in this election is to ensure that our members know those facts and vote to change the future.

Solidarity and your hard work are what will ensure a Mondale victory and a revitalized labor movement able to serve our members even more effectively—and to ensure the kind of America we all want so desperately.

—From address by AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue to State, County & Municipal Employees convention, San Francisco, June 20, 1984.



Physical, mental anguish

Side-effects compound trauma of joblessness

Unemployment damages the pocketbook but often inflicts even greater damage to physical and mental health, according to a University of Michigan study commissioned by Congress.

The researchers found that the financial hardships of jobs lost are compounded by increasing rates of suicide, fatal heart attacks and strokes, mental illness, and such nagging personal problems as depression, anxiety, aggression, insomnia, loss of self-esteem and marital discord.

Jeanne Prial Gordus and Sean P. McAlinden of the U-M Institute of Science & Technology conducted their study for the Congressional Research Service (CRS).

Some of their major findings:

- The suicide rate for men in their prime working years is positively and significantly related to unemployment. Higher unemployment is also connected with increased mental cases and imprisonment.
- Fatal heart attacks and strokes for working men over age 45 peak about a year after unemployment has reached its highest level.
- Job loss is strongly associated with depression, anxiety, aggression, insomnia, loss of self-esteem and marital problems.

Results of a second study at Johns Hopkins University, commissioned by the Joint Economic Committee of Congress, also show that the financial hardships of lost jobs are aggravated by mental and physical ailments attributable to unemployment.

Comprehensive review

The U-M study for CRS is a review of 46 studies on physical and mental illnesses resulting from unemployment and other business factors.

Gordus and McAlinden found that stress associated with negative life events is a predictor of subsequent illness, and that these life events correlate with the unemployment rate.

Hypertension, for example, is often made worse when job loss is anticipated.

Spouses of unemployed workers also show psychiatric symptoms subsequent to job loss, although somewhat later than those reported by the unemployed partner.

In a situation where many people have been laid off, increased responsibilities for those who remain employed are associated with gastro-intestinal problems, increased hypertension, more frequent illness, increased anxiety and insomnia.

Negative results

They suggest that the unemployment rate is the most powerful external variable explaining the difference in findings among studies. While short-term unemployment results in few negative outcomes, when rates of unemployment were high, and when re-employment took 10 months or more, studies show many more negative results for individuals.

Negative effects go beyond health manifestations. Certain types of property crime were found to be related to economic downturns.

What the researchers call the absolute income gap variable, the difference between the income of an individual and the income of his reference group, was found to be strongly related to property crime. The unemployment rate was found to be positively correlated with imprisonment.

The study indicates that some individuals adapt to job loss while others do not. Social support appears to buffer or moderate the negative impact of job loss on well-being.

Gordus and McAlinden suggest that the almost unprecedented decline of major basic industries and the rise of new nontraditional types of economic endeavor will continue to result in the traumatic displacement and uprooting of hundreds of thousands of Americans and their families.

The understanding of this process, they conclude, is necessary and crucial so policymakers can take steps to ensure that the social costs of the coming of the post-industrial society do not exceed its potential social benefits.

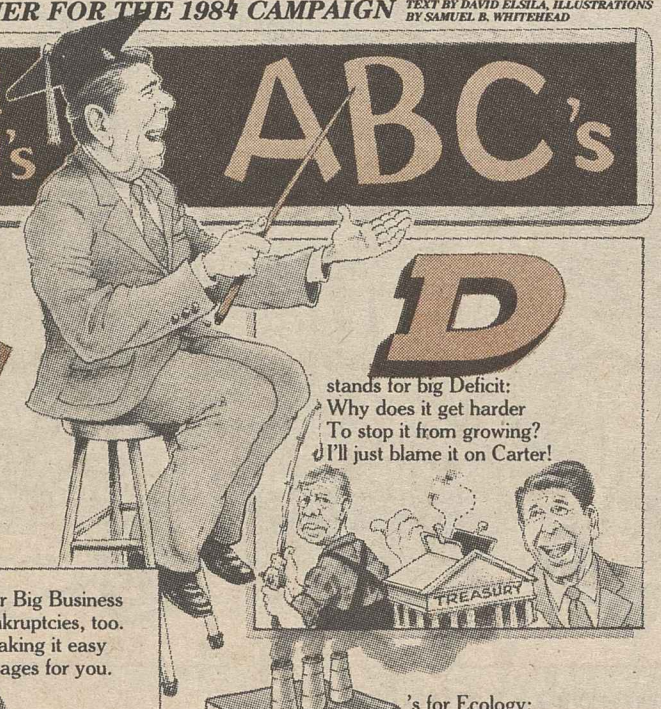
Ronald Reagan's ABC's

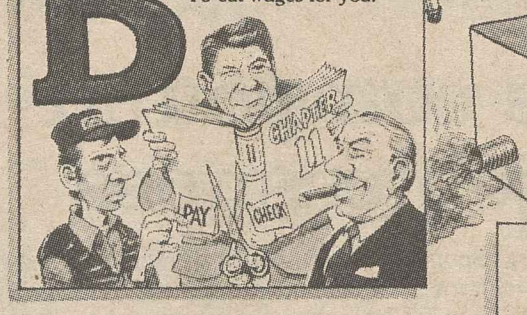
A POLITICAL PRIMER FOR THE 1984 CAMPAIGN — TEXT BY DAVID ELSILA, ILLUSTRATIONS BY SAMUEL B. WHITEHEAD



is for Auto:
As the profits rise higher,
I'll help out the bosses
Not workers or buyers.

D stands for big Deficit:
Why does it get harder
To stop it from growing?
I'll just blame it on Carter!

B stands for Big Business
And Bankruptcies, too.
We're making it easy
To cut wages for you.

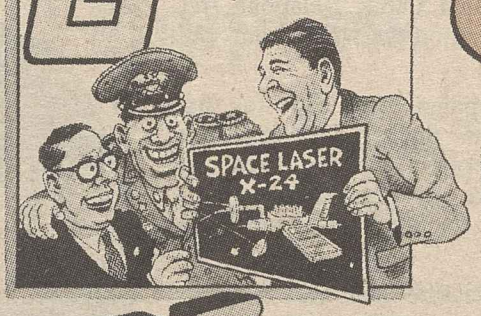


E 's for Ecology:
A liberal plot
To put shackles on industry.
Let's bring back Jim Watt!

C 's Civil Rights
And the sins of Commission.
Those equality fights,
We've put in remission.

F 's Full Employment,
A nice thought, but yikes . . .
Without lots of jobless,
Who'd we get to break strikes?

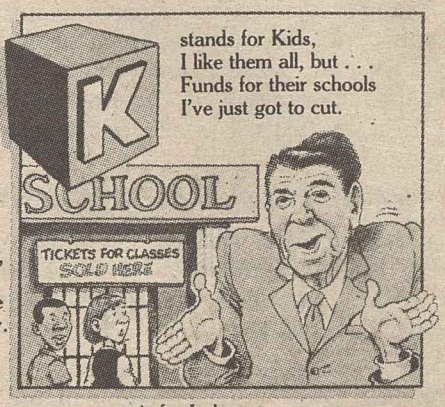
G 's for General Dynamics
And the Pentagon's frills.
They rake in profits,
And you pay the bills!



H stands for Health Care,
"No problem," I say,
As long as you're there
With the money to pay.

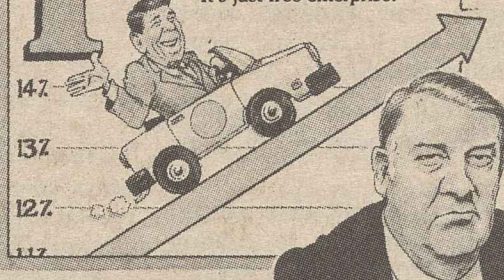
J stands for Jobs.
You'll get one some day,
As long as you're willing
To take lower pay.

K stands for Kids,
I like them all, but . . .
Funds for their schools
I've just got to cut.

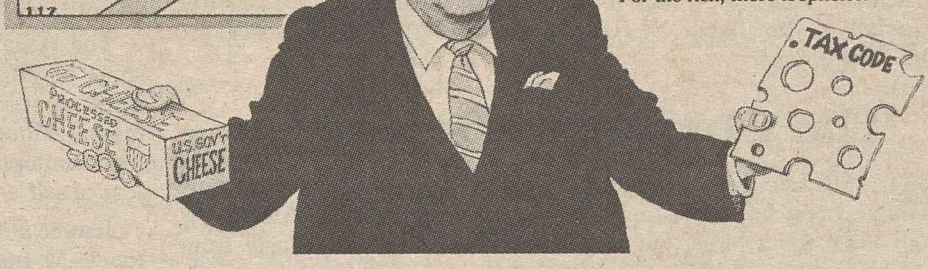


L is for Labor,
It's giving me pains.
They'll either play my way, or
I'll put them in chains.

I — watch the Imports
And Interest rates rise!
We're not selling you short:
It's just free enterprise!



M is for Ed Meese,
A misunderstood soul.
For the hungry, he's got cheese,
For the rich, more loopholes.



N 's for Nicaragua:
If they don't toe my line,
I'll shoot first and talk later,
Send the CIA to lay mines.

O is for OSHA:
It's better ignored.
To put lives before profits,
We just can't afford.

P is for PATCO,
I sure gave 'em hell.
If they'd only been Polish,
I'd have wished them all well.

Q stands for Quality
Of Life (for a few).
It's great if you're wealthy,
But we can't include you.

R is for Runaway
Plants in far lands,
Where they cut workers' pay
Because unions are banned.

S OCIAL SECURITY
It's an awful expense.
Why subsidize the elderly
With tax dollars and cents?

T 's for my Tax bill
And Trickle-down, too.
Don't worry, the rich will Pass their cuts on to you.

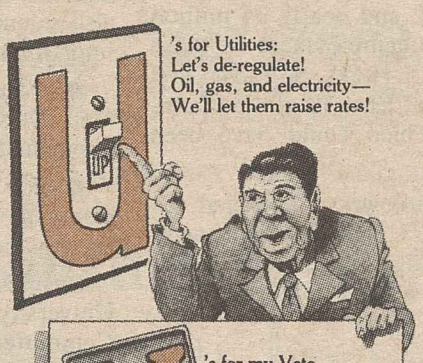
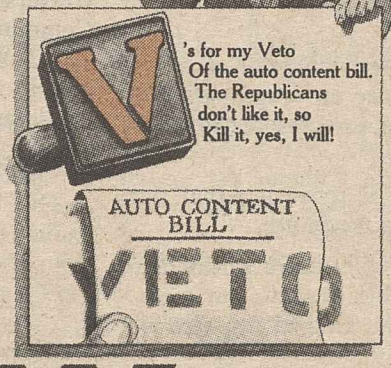
U 's for Utilities:
Let's de-regulate!
Oil, gas, and electricity—
We'll let them raise rates!

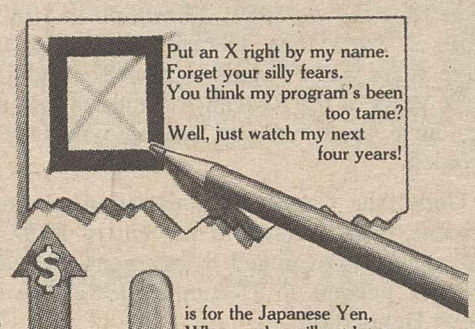


V 's for my Veto
Of the auto content bill.
The Republicans
don't like it, so
Kill it, yes, I will!



W stands for Women—
I won't give them ERA.
In our economic system,
Equality's too high a price to pay.

Put an X right by my name.
Forget your silly fears.
You think my program's been too tame?
Well, just watch my next four years!



is for the Japanese Yen,
Whose value will get lower
As I push up the dollar; watch
The imports gain more power.

Z is for my Zig-zag course:
I stay it all the while.
In foreign countries, I'll use force;
While at home, I nod and smile.

Final passage of bankruptcy bill acclaimed

Congress closed an unsavory chapter in labor-management relations by barring employers from twisting federal bankruptcy law into a weapon against unions.

Final passage of the legislation was a clear victory for American workers, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland said. The measure, hammered out in a House-Senate conference that continued almost until dawn, was cleared for the President's signature with hardly a murmur of controversy.

It passed the House by a 394-0 rollcall and then cleared the Senate by voice vote.

Kirkland said the new legislation "takes collective bargaining out of the courts and returns it to the negotiating table where these issues should be handled."

By rectifying a Supreme Court decision, "this action closes the door on the use of bankruptcy laws by unscrupulous employers," Kirkland said.

Good-faith bargaining

In the future, a company that files for bankruptcy reorganization will have to bargain in good faith with unions representing its workers over any changes it seeks to make in existing union contracts.

It can't any more unilaterally tear up its contract as soon as it files for bankruptcy —as did Continental Air and some other firms that made no secret of their intent to take advantage of bankruptcy proceedings to get rid of unions.

Under the new legislation, which takes effect with the President's signature, a firm will have to show that it has bargained in good faith before asking a bankruptcy court to modify a union contract.

The employer's proposal would have to represent only those "necessary modifications in the employees' benefits and protections that are necessary to permit the reorganization."

Before coming to the court, the employer or the bankruptcy trustee would have to meet in good faith with the union representatives, "in attempting to reach mutually satisfactory modifications" of the contract.

Then, if an agreement hasn't been negotiated, the bankruptcy court may put the employer proposal into effect only if the union representatives have rejected it "without good cause" and "the balance of the equities clearly favors" the proposed changes in the agreement.

Response by Congress

The legislative battle that led to final passage began last February as a response to the Supreme Court's Bildisco decision. In that case, the court majority said a company could abrogate its union contract as soon as it filed for bankruptcy reorganization. And it set lenient standards for eventual court review of the unilateral contract change.

The House passed labor-supported legislation sponsored by Judiciary Committee Chairman Peter W. Rodino, Jr. (D-N.J.) as part of a bill needed to reorganize the bankruptcy court system. But business groups blocked action by the Senate, and the final language had to be worked out by a House-Senate conference.

The bill was sent to the White House for the President's signature on July 6.

Voter registration drive taps army of volunteers

AFL-CIO plan for a major voter registration drive is outlined to reporters by COPE Director John Perkins. At left is Information Director Murray Seeger.

Labor effort seen turning election tide

By David L. Perlman

The AFL-CIO will undertake a massive voter registration drive among members of its affiliated unions and is counting on the worker-to-worker efforts of thousands of volunteers to transform labor's political endorsements into election victories.

National COPE Director John Perkins said the immediate goal is to get a record number of union members eligible to vote. The battering that America's workers have taken from the Reagan Administration will be reflected at the voting booths, Perkins predicted in an interview with political reporters.

Wherever state laws permit, Perkins said, local union volunteers will be seeking to register their fellow workers on the job site, in the union hall and, if necessary, in their homes.

COPE will be furnishing AFL-CIO affiliates with updated printouts identifying members whose names don't show up on voter registration rolls, Perkins said. But the actual registration effort will be keyed to fellow-worker contacts, he stressed.

Loss of support

On the presidential campaign, Perkins expressed the view that President Reagan's performance in office has already persuaded many of the union members who supported him in 1980 to switch to Democrat Walter F. Mondale this year.

Former Reagan supporters are among the 30 million hit by unemployment, he said. They have witnessed the Administration's favoritism to the wealthy. And "retired members who may have taken a look at Reagan in 1980 are now fully aware of how he's been sniping at social security."

Perkins said both AFL-CIO polls and polls taken by conservative political groups agree that Mondale has a substantial lead over Reagan among union households—even though about 20 percent of union members are registered Republicans.

In a separate interview, President Robert

'Dirty tricks' backlash aids pay equity cause

Political backlash from a Reagan Administration "dirty tricks" memo helped to bring about House passage of a labor-supported bill to advance the cause of pay equity for women.

Its key provision is an independent study to determine whether the federal government's salary structure undervalues jobs that are filled primarily by women.

If so, the bill directs, proposals to close the gap should focus on raising underpaid jobs. Plans that call for cutting pay of predominantly male occupations are specifically barred.

An amendment that sought to eliminate the pay equity study was crushed by a 395-22 vote, and the issue now goes to a House-Senate conference. The House added the pay equity study to a Senate-passed Administration bill involving merit pay raises for the higher civil service grades.

In its original version, the pay equity study was to have been conducted by the government's Office of Personnel Management. But before the measure reached the House floor, its sponsors learned of the "divide-and-conquer" memo prepared by a top aide to OPM Director Donald J. Devine.

If Congress required a pay equity study, the memo proposed, it should be manipulated so as to "divide the white-collar and blue-collar unions," pit the labor movement against the women's movement, and create "disorder" in Democratic ranks.

At House hearings, representatives of unions representing federal workers testified that a meeting called by Devine to attack the pay equity concept closely followed the scenario suggested in the memo.

Independent study

Rep. Mary Rose Oakar (D-Ohio), the bill's principal sponsor, then amended the original bill to have the study performed by an independent, outside consultant who would be chosen by OPM from a list of five prepared by an advisory council drawn from union and women's interest organizations in the federal service.

It was in that form that the legislation was enacted. But what once appeared to be formidable opposition to the pay equity concept shrunk to a small hard-core group after the OPM memo was exposed.

A second attempt to gut the pay equity study was firmly rejected by voice vote and the bill passed the House, 413-6.

$100,000 level pierced

High home prices shatter dreams

By Susan Dunlop

The average price of a new house rocketed through the $100,000 barrier in May, a historic first that could mean the home-ownership dreams of many working Americans will end in a fizzle.

The Commerce Dept. reported that the average price tag for a new single-family home is now $101,000. The six-figure threshold was crossed thanks to a $5,100 hike in prices just since April. The new high is 12.5 percent above the increase in the average price for all of 1983, the department said.

Although the national average is affected by the cost of expensive homes bought by the rich, the median price—the level at which half of all new homes are more expensive and half are less expensive—was a hefty $80,900 in May, up $1,500 over the month. In 1980, according to Census Bureau data, the median price was $64,600. In 1965 it was only $20,000.

Sales plunge

The Commerce Dept. also reported that new home sales plunged 4.4 percent in May. That drop followed seasonally adjusted declines of 6.2 percent in April and 4.2 percent in March. Sales this May were 6.4 percent under that month a year ago.

The key factor in the continuing sales decline—coupled with price—is rising interest rates. In most of the nation, the rate for a conventional, fixed rate mortgage has climbed nearly two points—from around 13 percent to about 15 percent—since January.

Henry Schechter, head of the AFL-CIO's housing policy division, warned that the steady decline in sales and a 10 percent drop in new housing starts in May are a signal that "as usual the home-building industry will be leading the economy into the next recession."

Schechter pointed out that housing "is the most interest-rate sensitive sector of

Labor art

Images of Labor, an exhibition of original paintings and sculpture based on the role of working people in America, begins an 18-month tour of Sweden in August. The exhibit, which has just finished a three-year U.S. tour under the auspices of the Smithsonian Institution, was produced by the Bread and Roses cultural project of the Hospital & Health Care Employees. A book of reproductions of the 32 art pieces and quotations — as well as a series of high-quality posters — was also prepared by the union.

New 3-year accord benefits 5,000 John Hancock agents

The Food & Commercial Workers have reached a three-year renewal contract with the John Hancock Mutual Life Insurance Co. covering some 5,000 agents nationwide. The pact is subject to a ratification vote on July 24.

The value of the package—compensation and fringe benefits—is $214.62 a week over the three-year period, said Andre Henautl, UFCW's chief negotiator for the Professional, Insurance, Finance & Health Care Division. Of that amount, $124.39 would be compensation.

The pension formula will be improved from 1 percent to 1.25 percent of the final average compensation, based on the best six of the past eight years' earnings, multiplied by the years of service.

A separate pension plan will be established under the agreement, in which the company will contribute 5.5 percent of the agent's casualty policies' earnings. The company will begin offering its own casualty insurance in September 1984 and from that time, agents will have the casualty policies included in calculating fringes.

Medical coverage

All agents would be covered under the company's comprehensive medical and dental plan beginning Jan. 1, 1985. Currently, half of the agents are under this plan, with the remainder under a basic plan. The out-of-pocket maximums were limited to $2,000 per family. The previous limit was $1,000 per individual.

The major medical supplement for retirees would be increased under the agreement from a maximum of $100,000 to $150,000.

On wages, an annual lump sum payment would be payable under the proposed contract. Agents with more than 10 years' service would receive three times their average weekly pay for the past four quarters. Those with five to 10 years' service would get two times their average weekly pay, while those with one to five years' service would get an amount equal to their average weekly pay.

The weekly salary agents receive for collecting debit accounts would be phased out over the next 10 years, as the agents no longer make debit collections.

First-year commission rates would be improved from 52.5 percent to 55 percent, while service fees—paid on accounts an agent services but didn't originally sell—would be paid on policies that are over a year old. Previously such fees weren't paid on accounts less than five years old.

The new agreement would run through June 30, 1987.

Senate votes on funds for democracy project

The Senate on June 28 rejected two attempts to eliminate funding for the labor-endorsed National Endowment for Democracy, set up last year to promote private-sector efforts to encourage democratic institutions abroad.

In terms of the AFL-CIO position, R stands for a right vote against the amendment, W for a wrong vote. Other symbols: P—present but not voting; A—absent.

Vote No. 1 shows the 51-42 defeat of an amendment by Sen. Lowell P. Weicker, Jr. (R-Conn.) to delete all funding for the endowment from a pending appropriations bill.

Vote No. 2 marks the 49-44 rejection of a similar amendment by Sen. Ernest F. Hollings (D-S.C.) that would have ended endowment funding but put some additional funds into existing foreign scholarship programs.

Grain Millers hit dust standard option

Minneapolis — The Occupational Safety & Health Administration's proposed standard for grain handling facilities, aimed primarily at preventing the often fatal grain dust explosions, is "so vague and unenforceable that many in our ranks feel it will be more dangerous than no standard at all," Grain Millers President Robert Willis testified at an OSHA regional hearing here.

Willis scored the agency's proposal for allowing employer options on the methods of reducing grain dust. He stressed that only the provision setting a limit of one-eighth inch on surface grain dust as an action level will provide the necessary "measure of safety" needed for the industry. "This is a true performance approach."

The union president noted, however, that the AFGM prefers that OSHA's final standard use the 1/64th-of-an-inch target level recommended by the National Academy of Sciences.

The OSHA proposal allows the industry the option of sweeping the facility once per shift to control dust accumulation. Willis charged that this option "gives license for all our facilities to turn off their dust control systems and simply sweep." He noted that this is by far the least costly alternative and "thus, probably the option of choice for most facilities," but he stressed that it will not prevent explosions and is "a dangerous choice."

The third proposed option is for installing highly efficient dust control systems. "We consider (this to be) 'pie in the sky,'" Willis said. "The costs of such a system will undoubtedly make this the least attractive alternative."

Vagueness cited

He charged that the three options are so vague that even the industry is unsure of what is required. Some smaller facilities have testified that they thought OSHA wanted engineering controls and additional sweeping, he noted. Those facilities had indicated their costs could reach $100,000 for equipment and housekeeping help.

AFGM Sec.-Treas. Larry R. Jackson noted at the Minneapolis hearing that the union represents some 25,000 workers in the grain handling industry.

"We want a safe working place for our members and for the employees of other grain facilities throughout this country," Jackson said. "Without a specific standard for the grain industry, we will face the agonizing results that we have had in the past when an explosion has taken place."

At another regional hearing in Kansas City, AFGM Vice President Howard Roe pointed out that six workers had died and 55 were injured in the past six years in grain explosions just within a 50-mile radius of the hearing site.

He charged that the OSHA proposal "was unfortunately gutted by the White House this (past) Christmas, rendering it ineffective." It was pressure by the Office of Management & Budget that led OSHA to give employers the cheap alternative of sweeping instead of installing effective dust control systems.

Both Willis and Roe stressed AFGM's support of the testimony given recently in Washington by the AFL-CIO Food & Allied Service Trades Dept.

Merck strike fights demand for givebacks

About 4,000 members of three unions are on strike against Merck & Co. over management demands for a wage freeze, a two-tier pay structure and health insurance benefit cutbacks.

On strike are nearly 3,000 members of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers at plants in Rahway, N.J., and West Point and Danville, Pa. The Chemical Workers have 400 members out at Elkton, Va., and 250 at Albany, Ga., while the Clothing & Textile Workers have 70 members on the picket line in Elkton, Va., and 120 at the South San Francisco, Calif., plant.

Merck & Co. is a leading, multinational pharmaceutical and chemical manufacturing firm with two dozen U.S. plants. It ranked 124th on the Fortune 500 list of industrial companies, and 35th in net profits and 7th in the net profits-to-sales ratio.

Two-tier pay demand

On May 4, the company locked out 940 OCAW members at its Rahway plant after the firm's final offer was rejected. A month later, the remaining workers went on strike after the company began implementing the rejected bargaining proposals.

The company held firm to its demands for a two-tier wage structure, denying new hires the $3.18 per hour cost of living adjustment that had accrued over the past few years. The unions' offer to phase the COLA back into the scale for new hires over three years was rejected by Merck.

The company had after-tax profits of $450 million in 1983, yet it offered its union workers a three-year package with a wage and COLA freeze in the first year and an annual increase of 25 cents an hour with COLA capped at 15 cents for the remaining two years.

The firm also proposed to boost the workers' medical insurance deductibles from $150 to $400 for family coverage and from $50 to $200 for single workers.

Bargaining for a nationwide master agreement is being coordinated through the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.

At news conference announcing new drive to organize air traffic controllers are AFGE President Kenneth Blaylock, left, and ALPA President Henry Duffy.

AFGE gears up to organize nation's air traffic controllers

The Government Employees launched a new organizing drive to represent the nation's air traffic controllers with the backing of the Air Line Pilots.

AFGE President Kenneth T. Blaylock said the union formed its new American Air Traffic Controllers' Council (AATC) in response to concerns expressed by air traffic controllers around the country over air safety, working conditions and continuing problems with management.

At a news conference to announce formation of the AATC, Blaylock said that AFGE "has the capability and the experience to effectively represent air traffic controllers in the workplace and on Capitol Hill." The nation's 13,500 controllers are employees of the Federal Aviation Administration.

Blaylock also told reporters that AFGE's organizing drive has the full endorsement of the Air Line Pilots, and ALPA has agreed to assist in the effort.

With the pilots' help, Blaylock said, "we seek to create a union that will open up a dialogue among the FAA, the controllers, the aviation industry, the pilots, academia, and the flying public."

Through cooperative efforts, the air traffic controllers' union will be able to deal effectively with public safety, controller training, economic and personnel relations problems "that now threaten the future growth of U.S. aviation," Blaylock said.

A single voice

ALPA President Henry A. Duffy said at the news conference that the pilots' union agreed to cooperate with the AFGE unit because "we earnestly believe that the controller needs a single, national organizational voice to correct the present problems of fatiguing work schedules, inexperienced work force, harmful human relations and outmoded equipment."

Duffy said the Pilots expect to work closely with the AFGE on the safety issues and in fostering "the type of environment that would encourage the FAA, the controllers and the pilots to work in harmony regarding air traffic control issues."

AFGE has filed petitions to represent controllers in New York, Atlanta, Atlantic City, N.J., and Hartford, Conn. Elections will be supervised by the Federal Labor Relations Administration when scheduled.

Blaylock said AFGE also has active organizing programs in operation in a number of other centers across the country, and that the response from controllers has been enthusiastic.

Working controllers from those centers who joined the two union presidents at the news conference pointed out that while the control system is operating safely now, controllers are being pushed to their limits because of under-staffing that means long hours and stress-creating working conditions for them.

Air traffic controllers need "one voice" to speak for them on those issues and on economic concerns, the controllers said.

AFGE's organizing drive is the first national effort to organize working controllers since President Reagan fired some 11,500 striking members of the Professional Air Traffic Controllers Organization (PATCO) in 1981.

Germans win shorter week breakthrough

Bonn, West Germany — Members of I. G. Metall, the West German metalworkers' union, won a key breakthrough in their efforts to establish a shorter workweek and ended a seven-week strike that shut down the nation's auto industry.

In a compromise settlement worked out with the help of an arbitrator, representatives of the 2.6 million-member union and Germany's metalworking industry employers agreed to an average 90-minute reduction in the workweek coupled with a package of pay raises.

I. G. Metall had sought a 35-hour workweek as a means of providing both security for existing jobs and of cutting the high rate of unemployment.

The settlement provides for an average reduction in the workweek from 40 hours to 38½ hours beginning Apr. 1, 1985. Workers will get an immediate pay raise of 3.3 percent and an additional 2.2 percent next April. The pact on reduced hours runs to Oct. 1, 1986.

Company-by-company

Union representatives agreed to a system of company-by-company negotiations over actual length of the workweek which must average 38½ hours per week over two-month periods, according to a formula worked out by the negotiators. The local negotiations provision differs from I. G. Metall's past practice of bargaining industry-wide conditions.

Hans Mayr, the union's president, stressed that I. G. Metall, "has kicked open the door to the 35-hour workweek" sought by virtually all West German unions.

As union members began voting on the settlement, expected to pass by wide margins, workers began returning to their jobs in the automobile manufacturing and auto parts industries. The approval of 25 percent of the members is needed to ratify the agreement.

Some 450,000 workers were off the job during the dispute, including 50,000 who struck May 14, and about 100,000 locked out by their employers. The remainder were laid off by employers who said they could not get parts needed to operate.

In the wake of the settlement won by I. G. Metall, agreements that include the comparable reductions in work hours have been won by the West German transport workers and woodworkers. The settlements are expected to affect negotiations in the printing trades as well.

Senate votes to retain funds for democracy endowment

The Senate insisted on continued funding for the National Endowment for Democracy, setting the stage for a House-Senate conference on the future of a unique experiment in private-sector initiatives to encourage democratic institutions throughout the world.

The endowment launched last year with bipartisan support, funds the AFL-CIO's Free Trade Union Institute as well as people-to-people programs operated by the Chamber of Commerce and both the Democratic and Republican Parties.

A House vote deleting all funding for the endowment from an appropriations bill set the stage for a Senate battle that found Democrats and Republicans, liberals and conservatives, on both sides of the issue.

Amendments defeated

Two amendments that would have killed off the program were beaten by 51-42 and 49-44 votes. (Rollcall on Page 2.) The Senate did, however, delete $10 million that would have gone for programs sponsored by the two political parties. The remaining $21.3 million that will be the subject of negotiations with the House includes the full $13.8 million authorized for the Free Trade Union Institute.

In a letter supporting the appropriation, Legislative Director Ray Denison said the AFL-CIO institute will be using its funds "to assist trade unionists in protecting human and trade union rights."

Denison noted the many requests from worker groups in other countries to help build effective organizations. "We also plan to support trade union exiles trying to preserve an independent voice for those facing suppression inside dictatorial or totalitarian regimes," he wrote. The National Endowment concept, he said, enables non-government groups to help others build democratic institutions.

In other congressional developments before the House and Senate adjourned until July 23:

- Bell System and AT&T employees obtained the pension portability protection sought by their unions, so that service credit earned will not be lost as the result of job transfers from one former AT&T subsidiary to another. The measure was included in the debt reduction bill cleared for the President's signature.
- Congress voted an additional $100 million for summer youth employment, as part of a supplemental appropriations bill that had been held up by a dispute over funds for Nicaraguan rebels. The bill was passed after the Senate agreed to drop $21 million it had earmarked for the rebels or "contras." The bill also increases funding for the Women, Infants & Children (WIC) food program.
- The House approved a Postal Service appropriations that includes the $801 million in "revenue forgone" subsidiaries to prevent a drastic rise in postage rates for non-profit organizations, including unions and their publications. The actual amount would be somewhat less, because the House voted to cut the entire appropriations bill by 1 percent.
- The House passed a renewal of the Clean Air Act that more than doubles the funding authorization for sewage systems to protect waterways from pollution. The Administration is expected to press the Senate to cut back the cost. The House bill was backed by labor, industry and environmental groups.

High interest rates send housing prices soaring the economy," and the high rates are not only holding back new home sales, but also sales of existing homes since owners can't find buyers who can qualify for loans.

Interest rates are also a factor in the jump in new home prices, Schechter said. The wide-spread use of so-called adjustable rate mortgages with a "buy-down" to give the buyer a relatively "very low" first-year rate means that builders and other sellers are paying points to lenders for such financing. Those costs are then incorporated into the price of the house, Schechter explained.

Ernesto Galarza dies, early farm union leader

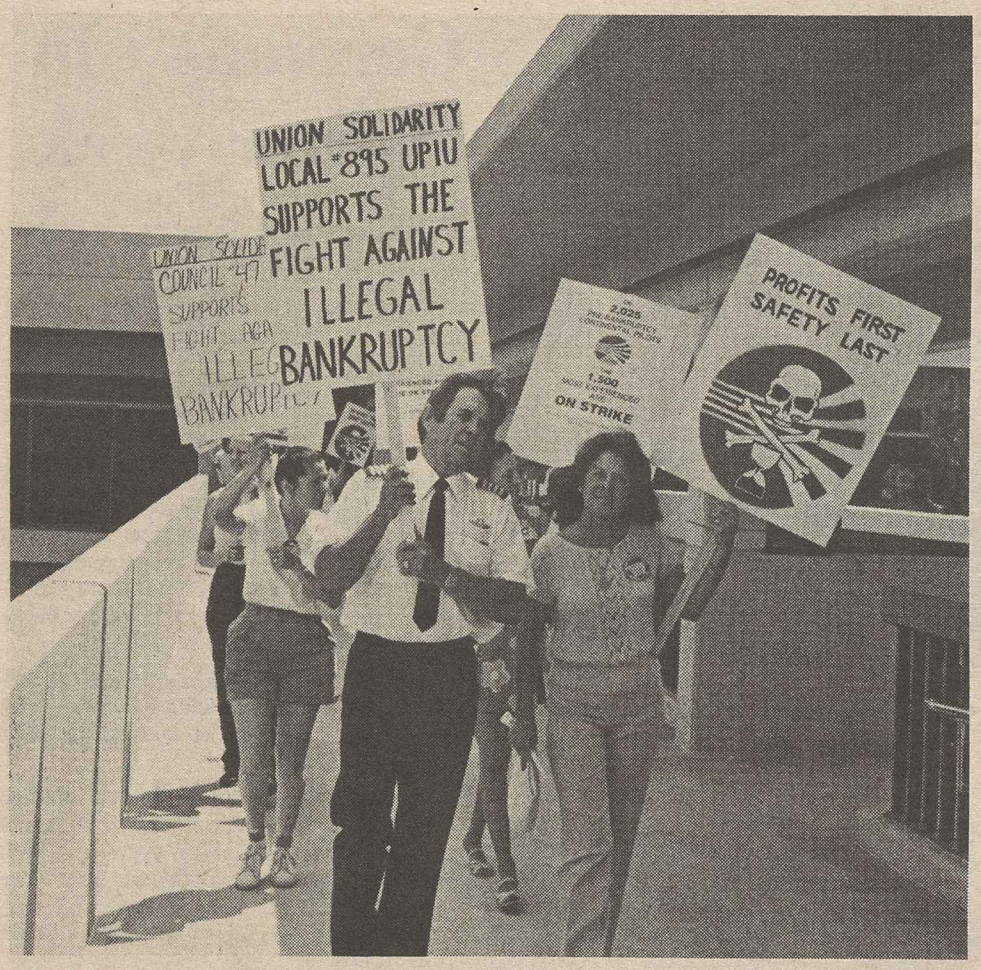
San Jose, Calif.—Ernesto Galarza, longtime union organizer and advocate of the rights of farm workers, died here June 22. He was 78.

Galarza, born in Mexico, worked as a youth on farms, and in canneries and packinghouses in Sacramento, Calif. After graduating from Occidental College, he obtained a master's degree from Stanford University and a doctorate from Columbia University. In 1947, he left teaching to become an organizer, as well as research and education director, for the National Farm Labor Union, a forerunner of the United Farm Workers, and later for the Meat Cutters' agricultural workers' division.

Through his lifetime of organizing in California and across the South, Galarza was an outspoken critic of the abuses of the "bracero" program under which workers were brought across U.S. borders as temporary farm laborers.

In addition to writing a number of books and reports on the bracero program and the struggles of farm workers, Galarza served as a consultant to several government agencies and private foundations, and held professorships at Notre Dame University, the University of California, Santa Cruz, and San Jose State University.

He is survived by his wife, Mae, and two daughters.



Continental protest

Dallas-Ft. Worth area unionists and their families joined striking Continental Airlines pilots, ground crews and flight attendants in a show of solidarity to protest the airline's re-entry into the Dallas-Ft. Worth market with scab labor. The airline filed for bankruptcy protection last August, laid off its 11,000 employees and reopened days later as a scaled-down company. The unionists were bolstered on the picket line by Texas AFL-CIO President Harry Hubbard and a group of state legislators.

Idaho delegates explore ways to ease blow of plant closings

Boise, Idaho—The impact of plant closings on Idaho workers was a major topic at the 26th annual convention of the state AFL-CIO here.

The three-day convention spent one of two workshops discussing the effects of plant closures on workers and communities, how unions can aid displaced workers in finding new jobs and retraining, and on negotiating specific contract language to protect members' rights and ease the harsh impact of a shutdown or relocation.

The workshop panel leading the discussion included Steve Eames, an ex-business agent for the Boilermakers local in Pocatello, which suffered a major plant closure. Eames is now a deputy director of the Idaho Dept. of Labor.

Other panel members were Quint Rahberger, Woodworkers Region III representative; Sam Green of the Rocky Mountain Work Project, and John Cantrell, Dave Duthie and Laurie Watters of the Workers Opportunity Network, a program funded by the Job Partnership Training Act.

At the second workshop, which focused on political action, delegates weighed the results of the court-ordered reapportionment of the state which produced new legislative districts. Attention was also given to the national elections, with an overview of Federal Election Commission regulations.

State AFL-CIO President Jim Kerns joined with Jane Adams of the national COPE staff; Barbara Griffin, state COPE director, and Teresa Raymond and Kelly Parsley of Idaho Frontlash, in presenting the program.

Per capita boosted

In a key convention action, the 138 delegates approved a 5-cent increase in the monthly per capita payment to bring it to 65 cents retroactive to June 1. A special, one-time assessment of $1 for COPE also was approved.

Among other actions the delegates adopted resolutions calling for repeal of the state's 4.5 percent sales tax on food, passage of a state law limiting work shifts in both surface and deep mining to 8 hours, collective bargaining rights for public employees, election of union members to public office, COPE coordination in each county, right-to-know legislation on toxic substances, and more wilderness areas in the state.

Noting a 10-15 year backlog in reforestation projects for the state, delegates urged that Congress fund the projects it has already approved.

The federation awarded the Robert McFarlane Memorial Award for trade union solidarity to the members of the Boise Fire Fighters local.

Former Gov. Cecil Andrus, who served as Secretary of the Interior in the Carter Administration, told delegates the nation is going through a period that is comparable only to the Depression.

Andrus urged the delegates to work for Walter Mondale's campaign for the presidency and to see that labor "gets friends elected to the state legislature."

Commission of Inquiry

ILO panel on Poland scores denial of rights

Geneva — An independent Commission of Inquiry has charged the government of Poland with denying workers their basic rights and called for an end to suppression of the free trade union movement and its leaders.

The three-member commission, in a report to the International Labor Organization, found that the Polish government interfered with workers' freedom of association, in violation of ILO Convention No. 87, and their freedom to organize and bargain collectively, as spelled out in ILO Convention No. 98.

The complaint against the Polish government was initiated by the worker delegates from France and Norway, and the Commission of Inquiry was established by the ILO Governing Body in June 1983.

U.S. Worker Delegate Irving Brown hailed the commission's findings and recommendations. Brown, who is director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of International Affairs, said "the issue of Poland remains alive at least in one institution of the United Nations family, namely the tripartite organization of the ILO."

Cooperation refused

From the initiation of the inquiry, the Polish government has refused to cooperate, calling the commission's activities an "interference in Poland's internal affairs." It has also boycotted all ILO meetings since the investigation began.

Deploring this refusal to cooperate, the commission said it had considered information either officially published or supplied to other ILO bodies, as well as testimony from representatives of other worldwide labor organizations and only from witnesses who were not resident in Poland.

The commission is the sixth such panel set up by the ILO in its 65-year history, but the first to encounter a total refusal to cooperate by the country subject to investigation.

The commission was headed by Prof. Nicolas Valticos of Greece, a former Assistant Director-General of the ILO, member of the Permanent Court of Arbitration and Secretary General of the Institute of International Law. The other two members were Andres Aguilar of Venezuela, a member of the United Nations Human Rights Committee, and Jean-François Aubert of Switzerland, professor of constitutional law at the University of Neuchatel.

Key among the commission's recommendations was that there should be "the initiation of free and unprejudiced exchanges of view between the public authorities and the representatives of free trade union trends that have arisen at various rates in the country in recent years, with a view to restoring the harmony and agreement necessary for the resumption of trade union activity based on the standards of the ILO Conventions."

That recommendation noted that such harmony would be beneficial to the trade union situation and essential "to an effective recovery of economic activity and a normalization of the general conditions of life in the country."

Grave steps

The commission pointed out that the Polish government's suspension and dissolution of existing trade unions, beginning in December 1981, were "steps of an exceptional gravity having no common measure with the occasional excesses that may have occurred. . . ." The government had justified its actions as necessary to avert a civil war, alleging that the leaders of the Solidarnosc trade union movement had directed the organization to political action.

The commission said that while some of the founding proposals of Solidarnosc did embody political ideas, most "concerned economic policies, the protection of labor, social policy, the defense of certain civil liberties essential to trade union activities . . . all of which were questions falling within the normal activities of a workers' organization . . . particularly in countries where the State is the principal employer."

In other recommendations, the commission called on the Polish government to stop jailing trade union leaders and to end the detention of workers sentenced for union activities "such as participation in strikes or demonstrations or the distribution of publications."

Violent deaths

The establishment of independent, impartial inquiries into the "violent" deaths of workers was recommended in order to establish the facts and punish the guilty. The commission concluded that "not only trade union rights, but also rights connected with life and security of persons were violated in Poland while martial law was in force." Its report noted "the number of persons whose deaths can be attributed to the (government's) security forces comes to over 60."

Enactment of new legislation by the Polish government was urged to ensure "the clear and full recognition of rights established by Conventions No. 87 and 98." Those include the right to form trade unions, freedom of association, the right to bargain collectively, and the right to organize and strike.

The Commission noted that the banned union, Solidarnosc, continues to function in Poland, despite the establishment of a number of so-called legal unions registered with the state. A large number of workers still have confidence in Solidarnosc "and even belong to it, despite the difficulties and risks to which participation in a dissolved organization gives rise," the report noted.

This, coupled with the joint statement of support for free trade unions by the leaders of all the national unions that existed prior to the imposition of martial law, "suggests that part of the working population does not identify itself with the new trade union structure" imposed by the Polish authorities, the panel found. It said the present situation does not offer workers the possibility of joining organizations of their own choosing, as required under ILO Convention No. 87.

The report and its recommendations were sent to the Polish government which has three months in which to respond. The next stage will be the meeting of the Committee of Experts in March 1985 where consideration will be given to the Polish government's response or lack of response.

UAW aerospace settlement wins major gains for 16,000

The Auto Workers ratified a new three-year agreement with the Aerospace Group of Rockwell International Corp. which "effectively halts—and reverses—a recent pattern of corporate attacks on the traditional wage progression and seniority structures covering aerospace workers," UAW Sec.-Treas. Ray Majerus announced.

The integrity of the single-wage structure at Rockwell is maintained, Majerus said. He noted that the package was ratified on July 1 with an 88 percent approval vote. The contract covers some 16,000 workers in plants in California, Ohio and Oklahoma.

Majerus called the contract's provision on health care "innovative," stressing it "heads us in the right direction toward making hospitals, doctors and other health care providers more accountable and responsible for the prices and fees they charge."

The comprehensive health care program offers active and retired UAW-Rockwell members the opportunity to choose from among three methods of health care delivery and services. The options are health maintenance organizations (HMO), preferred provider organizations (PPO) and traditional coverage with 90 percent paid by insurance. Previously, insurance covered 100 percent of claims. Second opinions on surgery will also be required.

The contract provides for lump-sum payments in August of 1984 and 1985 equal to 3 percent of the previous year's earnings. There will be a 3-percent increase in the base wage on July 5, 1986. Full cost-of-living protection will continue throughout the contract, Majerus said.

Basic pension benefits will increase more than 26 percent over the term of the agreement, rising from $15 per month per year of service to $17 on Oct. 1, 1984, and to $19 on Oct. 1, 1986.

Lump sum payments of $200 will be made to current retirees in July 1984 and in February of 1986 and 1987.

Three additional holidays were negotiated, assuring continuation of unbroken, paid Christmas through New Year's holiday shutdowns, and a four-day July 4 weekend is guaranteed for 1985.

The new agreement covers members of UAW locals in Los Angeles and Santa Susana, Calif., Tulsa and McAlester, Okla., and Columbus, Ohio.

Drop in index confirms sag in recovery

The nation's economy lost steam in May with the government's index of leading economic indicators showing a decline for the first time since late 1982.

The Commerce Dept. said its index of leading indicators—the government's yardstick for predicting the future growth of the economy — went down one-tenth of one percent in May, the first drop since August 1982. A decline of 1.1 percent in March was later revised upward to a gain of two-tenths of a percent, and a slight drop last November was revised to a change after additional indicators became available.

In other measures, while new orders for manufactured goods and non-residential construction spending were up in May, residential construction continued its downward trend, and new home sales, stymied by rising mortgage interest rates, plunged 4.4 percent.

It was the third consecutive monthly decline in new home sales.

The Commerce Dept. reported that six of the 10 leading indicators available in May contributed to the dip in the index. They were led by a decline in the average manufacturing workweek of half an hour.

Other negatives were in the number of new businesses formed, the prices of raw materials, the number of building permits issued, poor performance in 500 common stock prices, and a slowdown in supplier deliveries to companies.

Positive indicators included a decline in the weekly average of initial unemployment insurance claims, the size of the nation's money supply, new orders for consumer goods and new orders for plant and equipment.

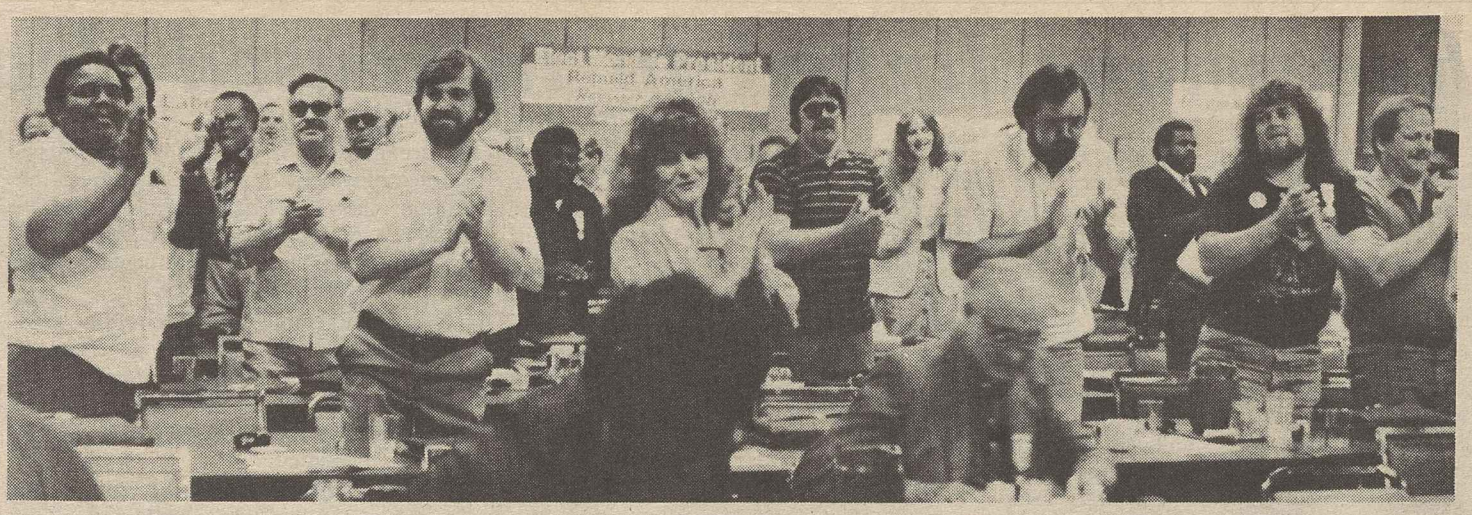
Slower pace

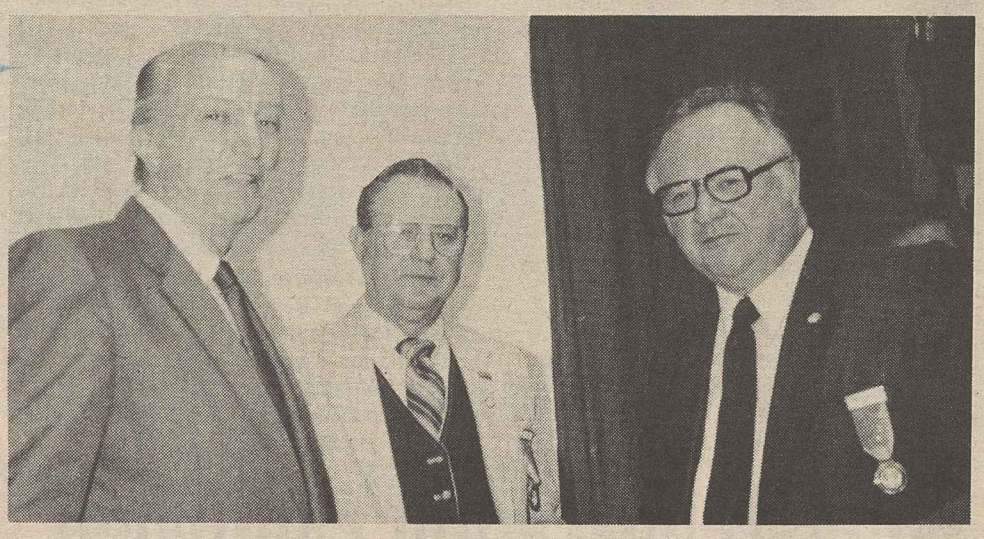
Over the past six months, the Commerce Dept. said, the leading indicators index has averaged a gain of about five-tenths of 1 percent compared to an average increase of nine-tenths of a percent in the previous six months.

The Commerce Dept. reported that new orders for manufactured goods went up 1.9 percent in May after a 3.4 percent plunge in April.

In a separate index, the department said construction spending rose 1.8 percent in May after dropping 1.5 percent the previous month.

Gains in construction were in non-residential building, up 6.3 percent over the month, while home-building construction dropped six-tenths of one percent after a 5.2 percent skid in April.





Delegates to Furniture Workers' convention in Chicago applaud action to bolster the union's organizing effort. The delegates also planned an active role for the UFWA in this year's elections. At right, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue is greeted by UFWA President Carl Scarbrough, center, and Sec.-Treas. Lowell Daily, both of whom were re-elected. Donahue told convention delegates of the need for trade unionists to work for the election of Walter Mondale as President and put an end to an Administration dedicated to government "by, of and for the rich."

Organizing, election goals stressed at Furniture Workers' convention

Chicago, Ill.—Political action and organizing were the dominant topics of the Furniture Workers' 22nd constitutional convention here. Some 200 delegates and alternates adopted a program aimed at developing membership growth and mobilizing members for the Nov. 6 election.

The convention was remarkable for the strong sense of unity among the delegates regarding UFWA's goals and programs. That was reflected in the overwhelming vote in favor of a $3 dues increase, with $1.50 to go as a per capita increase to the international union to be used for an expanded organizing program. The increase was recommended unanimously by a special committee set up to study the union's financial situation.

Delegate after delegate rose to underscore the need for the funds to continue organizing, to fight the union-busters, and to strengthen the international union.

"Ronald Reagan would like nothing better than for us to have discussions about how we won't support our international union," said Booker McCollum of Local 140 in New York, a retiring executive board member.

Hazel Kepler, representing Local 155 from South Bend, Ind., endorsed the per capita increase and challenged other delegates to invite non-union workers into their homes to discuss the importance of organizing, as she has been doing in her own local.

The delegates voted unanimously to re-elect President Carl Scarbrough and Sec.-Treas. Lowell Daily to their fourth terms. The four international vice presidents also were re-elected.

President's report

In his report to the convention, Scarbrough had pointed out that the delegates would be called upon to make decisions that might determine the survival of the union. As the meeting ended, he praised the unity, dedication, and determination displayed by the delegates as "the best guarantee we could have that our union—and the entire labor movement—will prevail. I'm confident that we'll unseat Ronald Reagan and set our nation on a new course in November."

Scarbrough pointed out that one remarkable aspect of the convention was the unusually high proportion—about 60 percent—of first-time delegates. For these delegates—many of them from small local unions in remote areas—the convention provided a rare opportunity to hear speakers from the labor and civil-rights movements. It gave them a sense of the scope of the international union and the wide range of issues that concern it.

Convention speakers described the damage the Reagan Administration has done to the economy and the American labor movement. Yet a spirit of optimism pervaded all the speeches.

"I have never seen the degree of solidarity and unity that now exists in our labor movement," said AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue. "Maybe we do best in adversity." Donahue told delegates that "Fritz Mondale is eminently electable—and Ronald Reagan is eminently beatable."

UAW President Owen Bieber pointed out that the corporations couldn't get away with their attacks on labor "if we had a full-employment economy in this country. The only way we'll achieve that, is to get rid of Ronald Reagan."

"The gender gap is real, and it is getting wider," said Joyce Miller, president of the Coalition of Labor Union Women (CLUW) and head of "Working Women for '84." Miller told the delegates that "women are the chief victims of Reagan's economic policies. Women understand that fact, they resent it, and they're going to do something about it in November."

Female factor

Women delegates to the convention met with Miller after her speech to discuss how they can involve more UFWA women in the campaign to elect Mondale.

The delegates passed a wide range of resolutions, including measures pledging full support of UFWA members involved in six different strikes.

Members of Local 800 have been on strike at R-Way, in Sheboygan, Wis., since January 12. Local 282 has been striking two Memphis motels for about the same length of time. Local 21108 is fighting union-busting efforts by the M. P. Moller organ company in Hagerstown, Md., and members of Local 136 have been fighting to save their union at Staco/Chase, in Poultney, Vt., for the last month. And the strike by members of Local 334/236 against Indiana Desk, in Jasper, Ind., is in its 28th month.

Shoe import curbs sought in Senate

Unions representing shoe workers joined industry leaders in urging Senate action to limit shoe imports to 400 million pairs a year — roughly 50 percent of the domestic market.

A bill introduced by Sen. William Cohen (R-Me.), "will give the industry what it deserved" under the 1974 Trade Act and what the International Trade Commission was unwilling to give it, the union-industry coalition said.

Cohen introduced his measure on June 6, the very day that the ITC denied a petition of Clothing & Textile Workers, the Food & Commercial Workers and the footwear industry requesting import relief. In its unanimous ruling, the commission held that the industry had "adjusted" to greater foreign penetration of the domestic market. Imports now account for 69 percent of the market, up from 50 percent three years ago.

Arthur Gundersheim, assistant to the ACTWU president, expressed the union's outrage at the assertions by one ITC commissioner who had claimed that wages in the industry had risen 35 percent in the past five years.

In testimony before the Senate International Trade Subcommittee, Gundersheim pointed out that wages increased from $4.09 hourly to $5.27, a rise of 29 percent, not 35 percent. He stressed, too, that inflation had outstripped that increase as the cost of living went up 37 percent, "so that in fact shoe workers' real wages declined substantially."

Richard Shomaker, president of the Brown Shoe Co. in St. Louis, charged that the ITC had misapplied the Trade Act provisions. He said the statute envisions preservation of the domestic industry and employment, not the preservation of profits. The ITC found that despite the shrinkage of the American shoe industry, the surviving firms were profitable.

Faulty reasoning

Thus, Shomaker noted, the commission was saying that no amount of decline in domestic production and employment levels mattered so long as the profits for the industry as a whole were within some range judged to be satisfactory.

"That to me is a kick in the teeth to the American shoe worker," the employer spokesman declared.

George Langstaff, president of the Footwear Industries of America, told the subcommittee that "production and employment in the industry are at depression-era levels while imports continue to accelerate sharply, and yet we are told that this industry is a textbook example of how an industry can 'adjust' to import competition."

Langstaff stressed that the ITC had ignored the fact that 66 shoe factories closed in 1982 and 1983 and another 24 have shut down so far this year. He noted there were 148,900 shoe workers in 1979 and just 127,400 in 1983.

Reacting to the ITC claims that workers in the industry are doing well, Langstaff cited government data showing shoe workers' wages have fallen substantially behind wages in other manufacturing industries over the past five years. The ITC suggestion that shoe workers are overpaid is "obscene," he testified before the subcommittee.

Suppliers to the footwear industry also testified on the impact of the ITC decision. Donald Stephens, president of Beatrice Foods' leather division, said, "The ITC's decision has devastating ramifications for the U.S. tanning industry," since some 60 percent of its production goes into domestic footwear.

Robert H. Slosberg, president of Ripley Industries, echoed supplier concerns, saying that "as each factory closes, we have fewer customers, less sales dollars and less capital available for research and development."

Recessions linked to increased deaths, illness

The price the nation is paying for the deep Reagan Recession includes not only financial hardship but also years of poor health, disease and death, according to two studies on economic downturns and health released by a congressional subcommittee.

A study by Dr. M. Harvey Brenner of Johns Hopkins University for a subcommittee of the Joint Economic Committee found that there is a significant increase in illness and the number of deaths in the population from three to five years after unemployment reaches its height during a recession. Brenner studied the link between America's economic and personal health over the period 1950-1980.

Brenner pointed out that the reverse is also true—better economic conditions are linked with lower mortality rates—and he asserted that one of the most important factors in improved health and longer life spans for Americans is "long-term growth in the economy."

A separate study by Jeanne Prial Gordus and Sean P. McAlinden of the University of Michigan, also released by the subcommittee, reached similar conclusions. The researchers found a clear link between high unemployment rates and higher suicide rates, hospitalization for mental disorders, and increased rates of imprisonment along with other social, individual and marital problems.

The study also found evidence of increased physical and mental health problems among spouses of jobless workers—and among those who still had jobs in situations where many other people had been laid off.

Expanded study

Brenner's current research expanded on his 1976 study of the effects of the 1973-74 recession. The newer data, he explained, improve the original results by taking into account the effects of other economic statistics in addition to joblessness — including business failures and changes in personal income. And factors such as increased use of tobacco, alcohol and animal fat over the period were also considered.

Although information from the period of the Reagan Recession is not complete enough for a full analysis of what it did to the nation's health, it is reasonable to assume that the impact will be similar to what happened during the Nixon Administration, Brenner said.

Brenner's report found that an increase in unemployment of 14.3 percent over the term of the '73-74 recession is linked to a 2.3 percent increase in the mortality rate from all causes and a 2.8 percent increase in deaths from heart attacks.

Because unemployment from July 1981 to November 1982 increased at a rate of about 48 percent, the increase in the death rates linked to the most recent recession may also be three or more times greater, Brenner estimated.

Among other results, the study also showed that after the '73-74 recession, deaths from cirrhosis of the liver (associated with heavy alcohol drinking) went up by 1.4 percent, suicides increased by one percent, the population of mental hospitals went up 6 percent as did the total number of arrests.

Brenner pointed out that the hardships caused by hard times can have a long-lasting effect.

Rates for suicide and admission to mental hospitals go up during economic recessions, while the number of deaths from heart attacks peaks three years and again 10 years after the recession ends. The effects of cirrhosis of the liver also are seen about a decade later.

Over the years, the mortality rate in general is at its height two to three years after the end of recessions.

The study also found that the stress brought on by recessions also hurts people who have managed to keep their jobs.

"Lack of promotion, competition among workers, emphasis on high productivity, work overload . . . and an atmosphere of anxiety and tension generate stress nearly equivalent to that resulting from actual loss of employment," Brenner reported.

Family ills

Families can be affected, too, since the decline in the nutrition and the use of medical care during recessions is related to rates for infant mortality and deaths among the chronically ill, the study found.

The University of Michigan study by Gordus and McAlinden noted that while short-term unemployment is not linked to major problems, many negative results are found when rates of joblessness are high and finding a job takes 10 months or more.

Both studies are available from the Publications Dept. of the Joint Economic Committee, SD-GOI, Washington, D.C. 20510.

Voter registration campaign to enlist army of volunteers

A. Georgine of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. said his soundings show "very little support" for Reagan among the building crafts. "He'll certainly get less than what they said he got last time."

The paucity of support for Reagan policies was reflected also at hearings by the Republican National Committee's Labor Advisory Council. Union leaders who had supported Reagan four years ago were among those criticizing his Administration's policies.

In response to questions about the AFL-CIO's commitment to the Mondale candidacy, Perkins said labor "went into the campaign united and we've come out of the campaign even more united."

The candidate labor supported is in line for the presidential nomination. And labor's political organization has been tuned up by the involvement in the primaries and caucuses, Perkins observed.

At last count, Perkins said, 573 delegates and 179 alternates scheduled to attend the Democratic National Convention have AFL-CIO ties—all but a handful committed to Mondale. That's the most ever, he said.

Mondale's choice

Perkins stressed in response to questions that the AFL-CIO does not plan to endorse a candidate for the vice presidential nomination because that's a decision that Mondale, as the presidential candidate, will make. If there were any floor fight, "we would obviously urge our labor delegates to support Mr. Mondale's preference," he said.

Perkins was optimistic about Democratic gains in the Republican-controlled Senate, even in states where Reagan is expected to run well.

"I don't see any shirt-tails on Ronald Reagan. He's not going to bring anybody with him," Perkins predicted.

He is especially hopeful, Perkins told reporters, of Democratic victories in Senate contests in North Carolina, Tennessee, Iowa, Mississippi and Texas—with possibilities of pickups elsewhere.

Perkins said Mondale can strengthen his campaign by choosing a vice presidential running mate who is qualified to serve as President and at the same time brings to the campaign "a national constituency" that would add to Mondale's own strength.

He considers the fairness issue a winning one, Perkins said, and he sees Reagan hurt by the "sleaze factor," as exemplified by his action in bringing Ann Burford, the discredited former Environmental Protection Agency administrator, back into government.

Mondale's candidacy would be especially helped by getting President Reagan into debates, Perkins suggested. They would be likely to reveal the shallowness of President Reagan's grasp of issues that "most of us in Washington are aware of."

While he doesn't foresee "a lot of fights" at the Democratic convention and expects the party to be united behind Mondale, "it wouldn't be a Democratic convention if there wasn't something" about which to disagree, Perkins observed.

Every little bit

The National Right to Work Committee says it spent more than $100,000 to hire private detectives to infiltrate labor's political operations, and COPE Director John Perkins is grateful.

While the hired spies were looking for violations of federal election laws, they presumably "made phone calls and licked stamps" to fit in with their cover identities as volunteers, he noted.

COPE welcomes all the help it can get, Perkins told reporters.

Per capita payment by affiliates goes up

The monthly per capita tax paid by AFL-CIO affiliates goes up two cents, from 27 cents to 29 cents, effective with the payment for July.

The increase is the first in a two-step plan adopted by the federation's 1983 convention last October. Per capita payments will rise by an additional two cents effective with the July 1985 payment.

In addition to the regular per capita payments, affiliates will pay a special one-time assessment of 10 cents per member.

Four cents of this will be payable with the normal July per capita, four cents with the August per capita, and two cents with the September per capita.

The assessment was voted by the AFL-CIO Executive Council at its May meeting to finance programs of the Labor Institute of Public Affairs dealing with issues of major concern to organized labor.

Unions score GM pre-bargaining bid as 'brainwashing'

Detroit—The Auto Workers and the Electronics Workers scored the General Motors Corp. for blatant pre-bargaining attempts at "brainwashing" GM employees and the public on the issue of wages and other compensation.

Responding to a GM press release claiming that the company's hourly labor costs rose from $19.80 in 1981 to $22.40 in 1984, the UAW said:

"It is with ill grace indeed that GM points the finger at UAW members' wage and benefit gains over the last two years after each UAW-GM worker forked over thousands of dollars in concessions since early 1982."

Recall suggested

The IUE's GM Conference Board labeled a company letter sent to the union's members "an exercise in brainwashing containing so many defects that it ought to be recalled immediately."

The UAW charged in a statement that GM's release "tells only a small part of the story."

The union stressed that UAW workers at GM don't earn $22.40. Assembly workers at GM plants are paid $12.67 an hour, including cost-of-living adjustments, it said.

The union also stressed that the rise in worker compensation must be considered in relation to unit cost and productivity, which has risen substantially.

"As GM's record profits per vehicle would suggest, productivity gains in the past several years have far outstripped the modest rise in labor costs," the Auto Workers said.

The IUE, which represents about 24,000 workers at GM, said the company's letter to its members was "blatant propaganda," condemning it as much for what it omitted as for what it contained.

Double standard

The IUE noted that "GM talks about the importance of its ability to compete against foreign manufacturers, but says nothing about its eager partnership with Japanese auto makers and its refusal to seek legislation that would make the competition fair."

The union also observed that while the company "bemoans rising health care costs," it fails to press for legislation to hold down costs and instead hopes to pass the costs on to its workers.

"The biggest defect of the letter, however, is that it says nothing about the preposterous bonuses given executives as their reward for the great profit year of 1983 that GM hourly workers made possible," the IUE conference board said.

Surge in health care costs linked to system

The rap for escalating health care costs belongs on a system that encourages unnecessary treatment, galloping inflation in doctors' fees and the growth of profit-hungry conglomerates—not on consumers—the Teachers told a Senate committee.

At hearings on a bill that would shore up the finances of the Medicare system and provide for a nationwide cost containment program, AFT Vice President Candice Owley stressed that only a comprehensive control system covering all providers and payers can bring about "the structural changes necessary to assure Medicare's solvency and to hold down costs over the long term."

Owley, a registered nurse who chairs the AFT's Federation of Nurses & Health Professionals steering committee, told the Senate Labor & Human Resources Committee that the Reagan Administration's strategy to control health care costs through so-called "competition approaches" won't work. Such measures, she said, only serve to shift more costs to consumers and workers and do little to control costs at the source.

The Senate panel held hearings on labor-backed legislation introduced by Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), and Rep. Richard A. Gephardt (D-Mo.) that would help fund the Medicare program and check rising health care costs by requiring states to implement their own effective cost containment plans based on federal standards.

Owley pointed out that the primary victims of the increase in health care prices—now costing the economy $1 billion a day—are working people, families on fixed incomes, health care employees, retirees and the unemployed.

She cited a survey of both public and private employers that showed that with the near doubling of health insurance costs from 1977-83, employers proposing "cost containment" plans at the bargaining table most often asked for increased employee-paid deductibles, higher employee contributions toward premiums, higher employee co-payments and limitations of some types of coverage.

Yet the causes of health care inflation are not "over-indulging consumers nor over-paid nurses and health care workers," Owley said.

She said the Kennedy-Gephardt bill offers "a comprehensive, fair and effective alternative" to the current health care financing system.

By including all providers and payers in the program, expenditures can be controlled while the "unfair shifting of costs" to consumers can be prevented, she concluded.

But Which Face?

VISITORS TO the Black Hills of South Dakota can see high on Mount Rushmore the famous granite carvings of the faces of George Washington, Thomas Jefferson, Abraham Lincoln and Theodore Roosevelt. It's an impressive sight, especially when illuminated at night.

The chairman of the Republican National Committee, Frank Fahrenkopf, Jr., stopped to admire the Mount Rushmore National Memorial on his way to the South Dakota Republican state convention the other day.

It seemed to him something was lacking. Then inspiration struck and he could hardly wait to share his thought with the convention delegates.

Wouldn't it be great if Ronald Reagan were to be the fifth president honored with a Mount Rushmore sculpture. "I can't think of any President more deserving," Mr. Fahrenkopf said. And with a straight face, too.

Louder than Words

THE SAME Mr. Fahrenkopf who proposes to immortalize President Reagan on the mountaintop took a more restrained approach in remarks opening hearings held by the Republican National Committee's Labor Advisory Council.

Holding out an olive branch of sorts, the Republican chairman said he is "very, very serious about mending the communications gap" that he believes exists between organized labor and the Republican Party.

Both the GOP and unions "suffer" from the estrangement, he suggested.

But is the trouble truly one of communications?

It seems to us that the Reagan Administration has communicated its views very effectively to workers and their unions.

The message it has sent is that this Administration is tilted strongly against unions.

Enforcement of federal labor law has been entrusted to management attorneys, to persons who have questioned the very premise of collective bargaining, and to staff officials from the notoriously anti-union National Right to Work Committee.

The government department set up to advance the interests of workers has sought to destroy through regulatory changes the basic worker protection laws including the wage-hour law and the Davis-Bacon prevailing wage law. Hard-won occupational health and safety standards have been rolled back or held up because they are not "cost-effective" for employers.

WHILE THE federal deficit has skyrocketed because of enormous tax favoritism to the wealthy, millions of Americans were thrown out of work by economic policies advanced as an antidote to inflation. But for Americans priced out of the ability to buy a home by the high interest costs, inflation is very much with us.

No, indeed, the problem isn't lack of communication. President Reagan, the Great Communicator, has told us where he stands by the actions he has taken during his term in office.

We've gotten his message—loud and clear.

Nor is there any lack of communication with those Republicans—regrettably, so few—who in Congress have supported many of the goals to which the trade union movement is committed.

The AFL-CIO has never had any special problem communicating with Republicans such as Pennsylvania's Sen. John Heinz, who ironically heads the Labor Advisory Council. He is aware of the concerns of the trade union movement and responded well enough to obtain substantial labor endorsements when he last ran for election.

President Reagan's problem is performance, not communication.

Union activist pays price for labor law's failures

By Press Associates, Inc.

Dennis Nelson told a House panel that he was fired from his job at a meat packing plant in Grand Island, Neb., because "I stood up for what I believed in."

Nelson, 31, explained that he had been an active supporter of an organizing effort by the Food & Commercial Workers. He said he had "a perfect work record" during the three years before his firing despite concentrated harassment from management.

Nelson was among more than a dozen others—labor officials, academics and workers—who testified before a House subcommittee inquiry into the question: "Has Labor Law Failed?"

Nelson said that for him and the organizing campaign he fought for, the National Labor Relations Act has failed. He said the consequences for him and the 1,200 workers at the meat packing plant have been grim.

Nelson still can't find a job in his home town. He's been "blacklisted" by other employers, he said. His unemployment compensation has run out and he's about to lose his home.

But Nelson still worries about his former coworkers who, he said, "really need a union." He said, "People are fired for getting sick or injured."

No protection

"Recently, one of the overhead rails broke and a whole beef, weighing about 1,500 pounds, fell on one of the workers. He is crippled now and has to shuffle when he walks," Nelson continued. "Although he's supposed to be on light duty, Monfort (the company) is pushing him hard, hassling him to move faster and faster on the slippery floor. They want him out."

Recalling the UFCW organizing campaign, Nelson said that after a long delay, a representation election was held in October 1981.

"The company announced that if we voted for the UFCW, we'd lose the bonus which we receive in December . . . We lost the election," he said.

"I believe that we'd have won the election, even with the bonus threat, if we had had the election in the beginning when the plant opened instead of after two years of delay." He said management held separate pre-election meetings for the active union supporters.

Pressure applied

Nelson recalled how "right before the election, Dick Monfort, the owner's son, came up to me and said that he knew I could influence people. He asked me to tell the workers to vote 'no union.' "

"Particularly after the election, we were harassed to death," said Nelson. "They fired one of our supporters for being out sick for two days.

"One of the very active female UFCW supporters had a daughter in the hospital. The hospital called the plant on an emergency for the mother. The personnel office gave this woman the emergency message, but refused to let her call the hospital for hours until her break. That woman was frantic, crying and upset. There was no reason to treat her that way."

"They were constantly watching me," Nelson continued. "I was the only one on the loading dock who had to get permission from the foreman to go to the rest room. I was the only one whose rest breaks were actually timed with a watch.

"After the election, I just did my job and kept a low profile. They fired me anyway. At the NLRB hearing on my discharge, the superintendent admitted that I was the only employee ever fired with an absolutely clean record."

He said an NLRB hearing on his case and the other unfair labor practice charges concerning the 1981 election wasn't held until early this year. "We're waiting for the decision now. I wonder what winning will mean, because I know the company will appeal again and again. In the meantime, I'm still out of work." he said.

AFSCME Shop Steward Cheryl Hunter and Carpenters' member Larry Hill of Springfield, Ore., will honeymoon as delegates to the convention.

At Democratic Convention

Union delegates reflect labor's infinite variety

When the first gavel opens the Democratic National Convention in San Francisco July 16, among the more than 5,200 delegates and alternates will be a record number of AFL-CIO union members, virtually all pledged to help Walter F. Mondale win the party's nomination to take on President Reagan in the November election.

AFL-CIO Director John Perkins told reporters at a July 5 briefing that a preliminary count showed more than 750 AFL-CIO union members slated to attend the convention as delegates or alternates, Perkins said the total is likely to go higher once all states complete the delegate selection process.

He pointed out that this year's delegate tally is nearly double the number of AFL-CIO members credentialed at any of the last four Democratic conventions.

The AFL-CIO convention's endorsement of Mondale for the Democratic presidential bid last October was the first time the federation had officially endorsed a candidate before the primaries. It launched a nationwide Mondale drive by union members in state primaries and caucuses.

A common spirit

It was that organizing effort that produced the record number of AFL-CIO participants in this year's convention. All the labor delegates—while they come from the broadest spectrum of jobs, trades and backgrounds—share a common spirit of active participation in their local unions, in their communities and in political action on the local, state and national levels.

The majority of the AFL-CIO contingent consists of local union rank-and-file members. Many are officers or serve on COPE committees, and many also hold office or actively participate in their city and state central labor bodies.

One indication of how vigorously union members took part in the primaries and caucuses in 1984 is the large percentage of unionists in state delegations. For example, about one-fourth of both the Minnesota and Ohio state delegations is made up of AFL-CIO union members.

Labor's all-out effort for Mondale has also meant that trade unionists are playing key roles on important committees before and during the convention.

For example, Sam Dawson, legislative and education coordinator for Steelworkers District 37, based in Texas, was tapped by the Mondale campaign to serve on the party's platform drafting subcommittee. Ironworkers' President John H. Lyons is a co-chair of the full Platform Committee.

Rose Dunleavy, secretary-treasurer of Machinists District 128 in Scranton, Pa., is among those who will serve on the convention's Rules Committee.

Among other unionists involved in key committee work are Communications Workers Sec.-Treas. Louis B. Knecht, who is a permanent member of the Democratic National Committee's credentials committee, and Marie Higenbottam, a CWA staff representative who is a permanent member of the DNC rules committee.

Getting involved

Gloria Brown, on the executive board of Service Employees Local 200, in Syracuse, N.Y., served on the Platform Committee. A Mondale backer because "he's spent his life fighting for working people," Brown said she got involved in this year's political process even though "it's easy to get discouraged in this troubled world—but it makes more sense to get involved."

Trade unionists are heading for San Francisco ready to work. Some are convinced that political action in 1984 even has to come ahead of personal concerns.

Among them are Cheryl Hunter and Larry Hill of Springfield, Ore. who will spend part of their honeymoon as delegates.

Hunter, a shop steward for State, County & Municipal Employees Local 2831-A, is a case worker for the Lane County Housing Authority, and Hill, a member of Lumber Production & Industrial Workers Local 3035, is a Democratic state legislator, on leave of absence from his job as a ripsaw operator at a door-making company. The LPIW is an affiliate of the Carpenters.

The pair are among six AFL-CIO union members in the state's delegation pledged to Mondale. Both Hunter and Hill said they have been long-time Mondale supporters because of his policies and stands on major issues.

Deep personal concerns over the "human wreckage" brought about in her hometown by the policies of the Reagan Administration convinced 48-year-old Josephine Brooks of Gary, Ind., that "it's time to get involved in the political process."

Brooks, president of USWA Local 3008, represents about 300 office workers at U.S. Steel's sheet and tin mill in Gary, and she will be one of four USWA members from Indiana attending the convention as a Mondale delegate.

Although she had not been active previously in grass-roots national political action, she plunged into the state's primary process, going door to door to win election as a district representative to the state's Democratic convention.

"I took a week's vacation to attend the state convention in June, and found myself supported as one of the endorsed AFL-CIO slate of Mondale delegates to the national convention," she said. And she's proud to be going to the convention representing working people as a Mondale delegate, Brooks stressed.

A family tradition of political involvement will be carried on by delegate John Hancock, of Concord, N.H., a descendant of the Revolutionary War patriot and a member of Service Employees Local 1984, the State Employees' Association of New Hampshire. The 29-year-old social worker licenses child care facilities for the state public health department.

Hancock is backing Mondale because he likes his "strong pro-labor, pro-consumer, pro-environment stance," and because his sponsorship of child care legislation in 1972 is "just one example of his commitment to working people."

Concerns over the future also prompted SEIU Local 47 member Mary McGinty of Cleveland to canvass door to door for Mondale throughout the primary season—with the help of her grandchildren.

She became a pledged Mondale delegate, she said, because he's "the best man running." "Mondale will get this country working again, and make it a better place for my grandchildren," McGinty declared.

A personal message

Carol Wampler, a member of CWA Local 4372 in Portsmouth, Ohio, whose husband is disabled, said she is going to the Democratic convention as a delegate "to deliver a personal message to Ronald Reagan, to tell him what it's like to be on the receiving end of all his cuts that affect the old, the sick, the poor and the young."

"I want to help Ronald Reagan out of the White House before we are all in the poor house," Wampler said.

Delegate Tommy Allen of Shreveport, La., a member of CWA Local 10411, believes this election can affect the future of the American labor movement. "Gains made at the bargaining table can be taken away if workers are not in politics," he warned.

Terrie Wilson Brady, a delegate and a shop steward of the Duval County (Fla.) Federation of Teachers, linked her support of Mondale to labor's future as well.

"It will be bad for the whole labor movement and everything we stand for if Ronald Reagan is re-elected," Brady said, contrasting the president's record with Mondale's long-standing support of education and other issues important to labor.

Brady, a 29-year-old special education teacher in Jacksonville, grew up in a union family that was always involved in political action, but her trip to San Francisco marks her first experience as a delegate to the national party convention.

Taking hold

"Somebody really had to take hold and work for Mondale. . . . I had the time, so I did," Mike Cox, retiree from Auto Workers Local 246, Platte County, Mo., said, explaining why he worked to become a delegate with the backing of "my county, my family and the UAW retirees."

First-time delegate Joanne Kloss, a UAW 889 member at a Chrysler stamping plant in Michigan, said she has spent weeks studying the issues of affirmative action, day care and the rights of handicapped so she can speak out on them at the convention.

Kloss, who also chairs the Oakland/Macomb Counties chapter of the Coalition of Labor Union Women, said she's doing her homework so she can "come forward" on the issues because they are "very important to me and to millions of men and women."

The diversity of backgrounds among union members who will serve as delegates and alternatives to the convention is exemplified by two Machinists' members.

IAM Local 733 member Patricia Lehman of Wichita is the first woman elected as chair of the Kansas Democratic Party, and Paul Eustis, a member of IAM Local 1726 of Malden, Mass., is secretary of labor for the Commonwealth of Massachusetts.

In all, labor delegates to this year's Democratic convention are expected to mirror the variety and diversity of the labor movement and its concerns. Representation will be virtually equally divided between the sexes, and labor delegates will be young and old, working and retired, black, white and brown. Nearly every job, craft and trade will be represented, and delegates will be drawn from every level of the ranks—from local shop committees to nationally elected officers.

Seniors with a message

Hundreds of delegates to the convention of the National Council of Senior Citizens in Philadelphia air their criticisms of the Reagan Administration's cuts in health care programs serving the poor and elderly in a march outside the city's Republican Party headquarters. NCSC members mounted the demonstration after GOP officials refused to meet with the senior citizens to hear their concerns (Story, Page 3.)

Choice of Ferraro for vice president praised by labor

By David L. Perlman

Walter F. Mondale turned to one of the Democratic Party's brightest new stars when he tapped Geraldine A. Ferraro for his vice presidential running mate. And the applause from the trade union movement was loud and sustained.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland said Mondale made a "superb decision" in choosing to run with Ferraro. "Her public record on behalf of the working people of America is outstanding. She will be a fine candidate," Kirkland said.

In just three terms in the House, Ferraro earned her way into the inner circles of congressional leadership, was elected to the prestigious Budget Committee, and this year was her party's choice to chair the Democratic Platform Committee.

Last October, when she was a familiar name only to Capitol Hill insiders, Ferraro won a standing ovation from delegates to the AFL-CIO convention with a fighting speech that hurled the "special interest" label back at the Reagan Administration. She spoke of women's rights from the perspective of a working woman and the daughter of a union garment worker. (Excerpts, Page 7.)

Her mother, the widow of an Italian immigrant, worked for 25 years as a crochet beader "so that her children could have opportunities that she never had," Ferraro told the AFL-CIO convention.

Identical records

In Congress, Ferraro's voting record by COPE standards has been identical to the record that Mondale compiled during his years in the Senate—93 percent "right."

She worked as a lawyer while raising a family, married to real estate developer John Zaccaro but retaining her name in appreciation of her mother, and served for four years as an assistant district attorney in Queens County before running for Congress.

A Congressional Quarterly profile noted her focus on national political issues in Washington and her political skills in her home district.

"She is home every weekend, tending to constituents at Greek-American parades, Italian festivals and Jewish senior citizen clubs," the article noted.

At the televised ceremony in the Minnesota legislative chamber where Mondale introduced her as his choice for vice president, Ferraro spoke of a recent visit to a senior center in her district and the concern of her constituents at President Reagan's attacks on social security.

She spoke of the tragedy of unemployment, of growing up among people imbued with the belief that "in America, anything is possible if you work for it."

Mondale will come to the Democratic convention with a clear majority of delegates committed to his candidacy. Custom assures that the wishes of the presidential candidate are respected in the selection of a vice presidential nominee.

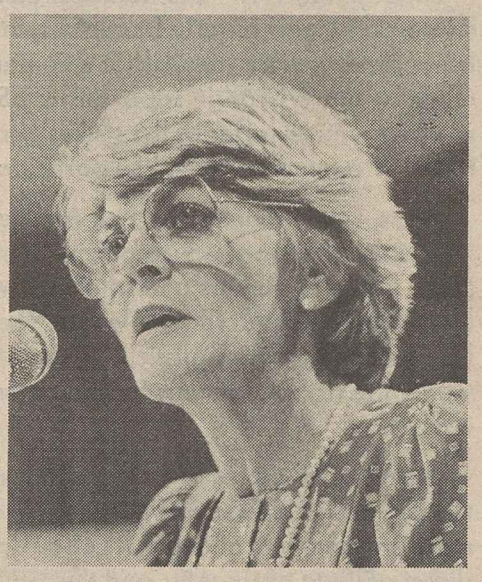
Others considered

In the widely publicized search for a vice presidential running mate, Ferraro had been a leading possibility from the start. But other strong candidates, each capable of bringing an important constituency to the ticket, were considered.

Ironically, women have served as heads of government in Europe, Asia and the Middle East, but the choice of a woman on the presidential ticket of a major party will be a first for the United States.

It made the selection—as Mondale put it in presenting "Gerry Ferraro" to the television audience—"an exciting choice."

"She's earned her way here today," he stressed.



Rep. Geraldine Ferraro addressing the 1983 AFL-CIO convention.

Trade panel proposals seek to save steel jobs

The International Trade Commission's recommendation that President Reagan impose a five-year package of quotas and tariffs on imports of certain carbon steel products was welcomed by the Steelworkers and the Bethlehem Steel Corp. which had jointly filed for relief under the 1974 Trade Act.

"We are very pleased by the majority recommendations of the ITC on our Section 201 petition," said USWA President Lynn Williams and Bethlehem Steel President Donald H. Trautlein in a joint statement.

Deadline for action

The ITC recommendations, announced July 11, will be formally sent to Reagan on July 24 and he will have 60 days in which to adopt, modify or reject the commission's recommendations.

The ITC's recommendations were made by the same 3-to-2 majority that determined a month ago that the steel industry was being seriously hurt by surging imports. The commission held that nearly three-fourths of the steel products imported last year should be in line for relief. Those products include steel plates, sheet and strip, wire and wire products, structural shapes and semi-finished steel products.

The ITC at that time rejected the union-industry petition for relief on pipes and tubes, bars, wire rods and railroad products—all items which Williams and Trautlein stressed are under severe import competition.

Williams and Trautlein said that implementation of the ITC recommendations "would be a step in the direction of providing the relief desperately needed by the industry and its workers. Our preliminary assessment of the impact of the recommended relief on employment is that over 20,000 steelworker jobs would be restored and over 40,000 jobs restored in related industries."

They expressed concern, however, that the proposal for tariffs rather than quotas on semi-finished steel and wire products "will not be effective." They said "it is a virtual certainty that the forces that have driven foreign producers to flood the

Reagan gnaws at social security

President Reagan rekindled fears of a second-term assault on social security, touching off a political firestorm that White House disclaimers have been unable to extinguish.

The President told a Texas television interviewer that his Administration will be "looking at" social security after the election. And he asserted—to the embarassment of staff aides who were unable to back up his claim—that most younger workers will never get back what they pay in social security taxes.

Just a few weeks earlier, Treasury Sec. Donald Regan had said it might be necessary to curtail social security benefits before the end of the decade.

The White House insisted, however, that President Reagan has "no plans" to tamper with social security if he is re-elected.

AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman termed Reagan's criticisms of the system "inaccurate" and "disturbing."

Congress put the program on a sound financial basis last year, Seidman noted, after it had rejected the "drastic cuts" that Reagan proposed after he took office.

Financially sound

"The system is financially sound, but politically endangered," Seidman declared.

He and other authorities on social security—including persons with ties to Republican as well as Democratic administrations—challenged Reagan's comments about younger workers, which echo views of some conservative ideologues who have proposed to make social security "voluntary."

Reagan is wrong, Seidman said. "Future retirees can expect to receive considerably more in social security benefits than they ever paid in taxes."

Seidman stressed also that social security is "a family protection plan," not just a pension system. "It provides a guaranteed income for spouse and children when a young worker dies or becomes totally disabled." These are features that can't be duplicated by any private plan, Seidman stressed.

Walter F. Mondale, the Democratic presidential aspirant, rebuked Reagan for raising fears among the elderly when in fact the system is in sound condition. The President "has been congenitally unable to leave that program alone," Mondale said.

Reagan's remarks were challenged also

IAM Convair strikers score 'stonewalling'

San Diego—Striking Machinists charged General Dynamics Corp.'s Convair division with "stonewalling" negotiations on a new contract, and continued their walkout against the aerospace firm.

Some 4,200 members of IAM Local 1125 went on strike July 1 after talks with management failed to produce an agreement. The old contract expired Apr. 29.

Workers rejected the company's latest offer by an 87 percent majority. Talks with a federal mediator have since taken place, but disagreements remain on several issues.

William Weigand, chief negotiator for the union, said these differences included the company's demand that workers pay more for health insurance and accept weekend schedules with days off during the week to eliminate overtime pay.

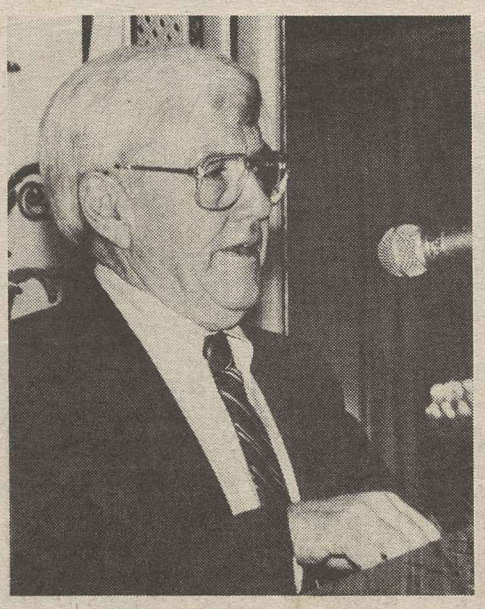
Convair, which has posted record profits recently, makes cruise missiles, Centaur rockets, and aircraft parts.

In a separate contract dispute on the other side of the country, the Machinists struck the nation's oldest and third largest bicycle manufacturer.

IAM Local 2658 set up picket lines outside the Columbia Manufacturing Co. plant in Westfield, Mass., to protest company demands for wage and benefit concessions. The walkout occurred after a 308-1 union vote against a proposed two-year agreement.

"They just wanted cuts," said Local Vice President William Phillips. Company proposals included demands for a 10-percent wage cut, a 30-percent reduction in company medical insurance payments, and elimination of two paid holidays, he said.

The union disputed the company's claim that concessions are needed because of dwindling business and profits.



AFTRA's Frank Maxwell

Emergency boards set in railroad deadlock

Two presidential emergency boards have been set up to investigate and make recommendations to resolve deadlocked negotiations between the Long Island Railroad and the Railway & Airline Clerks and the unaffiliated Locomotive Engineers.

The creation of the two boards, at the request of the unions, forestalls a shutdown of the commuter line which runs from Long Island to Manhattan. The dispute centers on the settling of initial contracts for supervisory workers organized by the unions. The question of seniority for promotion purposes has been a key bargaining item.

Appointment of the two boards starts an administrative time-clock for settling the dispute, with the possible appointment of a second board if there is no settlement within 120 days.

President Reagan named attorney Richard Kasher of Bryn Mawr, Pa., as chairman and members Margery Gootnick of Rochester, N.Y., an attorney, and Rodney Dennis, a Postal Service arbitrator.

Convention action

Frank Maxwell voted president of AFTRA

Chicago—Veteran actor Frank Maxwell was elected president of the 66,000-member American Federation of Television and Radio Artists at AFTRA's 47th annual convention here.

Maxwell, head of AFTRA's Los Angeles local, succeeds San Francisco news broadcaster Bill Hillman, who stepped down after five years in the union's top elected office. Actress Ann Loring, president of the union's New York local, was re-elected first vice president. All national officers were elected to their one-year terms by acclamation. Their positions are unsalaried.

Maxwell portrays the character of Dan Rooney on the daytime TV series, General Hospital.

For the first time in the union's history, two George Heller Memorial Gold Cards were awarded for "distinguished service to AFTRA and its members." Recipients were Hillman and Executive Sec. Sanford Wolff.

In addition to Maxwell and Loring, other national officers elected by the delegates are: Second Vice President Len Dresslar (Chicago), Vice Presidents K. T. Stevens (Los Angeles), Belva Davis (San Francisco), Shirley Diercks (Twin Cities), Shelby Scott (Boston), Peter Hackes (Washington-Baltimore), Peg Nielsen (Seattle), Lee Lawson (New York), Treas. Kenneth Roberts (New York), and Recording Sec. Sally Stevens (Los Angeles).

"In case you weren't aware of how strong we stand on the Equal Rights Amendment," Maxwell told the delegates when the election was completed, "I'd like to give you the final score: women, 8; men, 4."

The plenary session of AFTRA's 105-member National Board, which preceded the convention, created a new National News Dept. to provide greater service to network newspersons. Although they are covered by a single collective bargaining agreement, their work and travel schedules often make it impossible for their local unions to meet their needs. While they will continue to belong to their respective locals, they will now be assisted by a single department based in the national office.

The board and the convention also authorized an expenditure of funds to strengthen the national staff, in order to administer the new National News Dept., provide greater service to the locals, and intensify the union's organizing efforts, especially in the fields of cable and music videos.

Legislative actions

The convention established a national standing committee to concern itself with the needs of young AFTRA members and to recommend contract proposals to protect them. It also created a Legislative Committee to recommend legislative actions to the national board.

In other actions, the delegates voted to support the Equal Rights Amendment, directed that members be educated in the problems of sexual harassment in employment, urged AFTRA's 66,000 members not to fly on Continental Airlines until it negotiates fair contracts and back-to-work agreements with its union employees.

The convention directed that the union make a full-scale attempt to organize and represent news and sports personnel in the field of cable TV. It gave "highest priority in all negotiations" to protection and expansion of its jurisdiction in all aspects of the editorial process for broadcast journalism.

Delegates urged AFTRA members to cooperate with the local chapters of the Coalition of Labor Union Women.

Hillman, in his final address as president, noted the union's program. Five years ago AFTRA had 41,000 members; today it has 66,000, Hillman reported.

Minority employment

"That means more members are working. Pension and welfare contributions increased by one-third, but underemployment remains our single biggest concern. While there is significant improvement in the number of black performers hired by prime time and daytime drama producers . . . the percentage of minority men working in creative jobs—not just jobs held by AFTRA members—at all broadcast stations in this country is actually lower now than in 1979; down 8 percent for black men, down 3 percent for Hispanics.

"Of 17,340 creative jobs at broadcast stations in 1983, only 800 were filled by black men; less than 500 by Hispanic men . . . I am recommending to our Equal Rights committee a new campaign to fight discrimination in employment at our broadcast stations."

Hillman expressed the hope that the joint AFTRA-Screen Actors Guild merger committee will be able to present its merger plan to the national boards and the memberships of the two unions during the coming year.

He noted that merger talks with the American Guild of Musical Artists are also proceeding.

Reunion for Kohler strikers

Sheboygan, Wis.—The Kohler strikes, among the longest and most bitterly fought disputes in American labor history, were recalled at a conference organized by the Wisconsin Labor History Society that marked anniversaries of the strikes and brought together a number of the key participants.

Some 140 unionists and their families as well as historians and labor educators met here with union strike leaders, workers and attorneys who told of their experiences at the Kohler Co. The firm was as famous for the paternalistic labor policies that provoked the strikes as it was for the bathroom fixtures it made.

Joanne Ricca, president of the history society, said the conference covered events in both the 1934-1941 strike by members of Federal Labor Union 18545, a direct affiliate of the AFL, and the 1954-1960 walkout by members of Auto Workers Local 833, the local that represents Kohler employees today.

Ricca said the conference was planned as both a reunion and a way to understand "what these famous strikes were all about."

The program opened with a review of the 1934 strike which involved some 2,000 molders and foundry workers. Members of FLU 18545, they walked off their jobs when management, well-known for its fanatical hatred of unions, refused to bargain for a first contract. Dignity and decent working conditions were key issues in the strike.

The dispute was bloodied by Kohler's use of intimidation, strikebreakers and a heavily armed force of special guards. In an attack on pickets, the guards shot 47 strikers and demonstrators and killed two.

The company later countered with formation of a company union, the Kohler Workers Association, but many Local 18545 members stayed on picket lines until 1941. In that year Kohler agreed to a token settlement so as to qualify for government war contracts as a "fair" employer.

Charlie Heymanns, president of the local during the strike, and Rudolph Renn, secretary, told the conference that the company accepted the settlement only on the condition that they and another union officer waive their rehiring rights, which they agreed to do.

In the 1950s, Kohler employees affiliated with the UAW and achieved a contract in 1952. When that came up for renewal in 1954, however, the company again provoked a strike by its refusal to bargain and its insistence on maintaining degrading working conditions.

The UAW called an end to the strike in 1960 after the National Labor Relations Board found the company guilty of massive unfair labor practices, and the union eventually achieved a contract. But the company dragged the issue through the courts—which continued to find for the union—until 1966 when Kohler agreed to pay $4.5 million in back pay and pension credits.

Leo Breirather, who coordinated a boycott of Kohler products during the strike, told the conference that one of the most important victories for strikers was "human dignity."

"We won all three," he stressed, "respect, our union and the right to bargain."

Among other speakers at the conference were David Rabinovitz, legal counsel for the unions in both strikes; E. H. Kohlhagen, former officer of the Kohler Workers Association and of Local 833; George Squillacote, director of NLRB Region 30 who represented the board in legal proceedings against Kohler; Don Rand, who during the second strike was administrative assistant to the UAW secretary-treasurer, the late Emil Mazey; and William Uphoff, author of Kohler on Strike, a history of both disputes.

Bankruptcy law change effective as of July 10

The effective date of the labor contract protections in the new bankruptcy law is July 10, when the measure was signed by the President.

Firms that initiate bankruptcy proceedings after the legislation took effect must negotiate in good faith if they want changes in a union contract in order to reorganize successfully.

Only if the union rejects an equitable proposal "without good cause" can a bankruptcy judge require the change in the contract.

Employment surge leaves 15 million out

By James M. Shevis

While the nation's civilian unemployment rate declined further last month, to 7.1 percent, there remained almost 15 million Americans still suffering from joblessness.

Besides the 8.1 million officially counted as unemployed by the Bureau of Labor Statistics, "discouraged" workers accounted for 1.3 million more and 5.5 million others were forced to work part time because they could not find full-time jobs.

'True' rate

If the discouraged workers—those who want to work but are not looking for jobs because they believe there are none—plus half of those forced to work only part time were counted as unemployed, the June jobless rate would have been 10.7 percent, the AFL-CIO's Dept. of Economic Research estimated.

As it is, the official BLS figure may have been skewed by shifting labor force patterns. June is a month when the labor force usually swells as students and graduates enter the work force and many adult women put off looking for employment. BLS adjusts its estimates of employment and unemployment to take into account these usual seasonal variations.

BLS Commissioner Janet L. Norwood told the Joint Economic Committee of Congress that seasonal adjustments are difficult to make for June and that aberrations caused by these adjustments could result in later revisions.

A big drop in the unemployment rate for black teenagers last month—nearly 10 percentage points—may have been a statistical fluke. Norwood told the congressional panel that the number of black teenagers sampled was small and the statistic could be "quite volatile."

The June drop in the civilian unemployment rate was the second monthly decline in a row. The rate was 7.5 percent in May and 7.8 percent in April.

Household survey

Total seasonally adjusted civilian employment, as measured by a survey of households, rose by 460,000 to 105.7 million in June. The civilian labor force was an adjusted 113,880,000, up 80,000.

Jobless rates improved for all major groups. The rate for teenagers declined 1.4 percent to 17.6 percent. For black teenagers, the improvement lowered their rate to 34.3 percent from 44.1 percent in May.

For all black workers, the jobless rate fell eight-tenths of 1 percent to 15 percent. The rate for Hispanics dropped five-tenths of 1 percent to 10 percent. For adult women, joblessness fell four-tenths of 1 percent to 6.4 percent. The rate for adult men dipped from 6.5 to 6.3 percent.

BLS reported an increase of two-tenths of a week, to 18.6 weeks, in the average duration of unemployment. The average workweek of production workers remained unchanged at 35.3 hours, as did weekly hours and overtime in manufacturing, at 40.6 and 3.3 hours, respectively.

Oil Workers' settlement ends boycott of CENEX

Denver — The Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers have lifted their "do not buy" campaign against CENEX gasoline and petroleum products, and the AFL-CIO has removed the company from its Unfair List.

OCAW had initiated the campaign earlier this year after the company forced the 175 members of Local 2-443 at its Laurel, Mont. refinery to strike on Jan. 15. The company was put on the federation's unfair list by the AFL-CIO Executive Council at its May meeting.

OCAW reached a settlement with the company and ended the strike on June 15.

CENEX is the brand name for products made by the Farmers Union Central Exchange, Inc., which has headquarters in Inver Grove Heights, Minn.

The unemployed are still "up in the air" despite modest improvements in the overall economy, the Full Employment Action Council and other groups protested at a rally outside the Labor Dept. building in Washington.

Senior Citizens' delegates blast Medicare cost boost, benefit cuts

Philadelphia—A lot of President Reagan's fellow senior citizens don't think much of his Administration's policies on health care.

More than 2,000 of them—delegates to the 17th convention of the National Council of Senior Citizens—voiced strong concern at health care inflation and cutbacks in Medicare.

A resolution adopted by the convention protested Administration policies which have "severely penalized Medicare beneficiaries by increasing their out-of-pocket expenditures through deliberate cost shifting and budget cutting. Another resolution scored the erosion of health programs serving the poor.

Several hundred delegates took their grievances one step further—marching to Philadelphia's Republican Party headquarters and conducting a sidewalk demonstration after they were refused a meeting with GOP officials.

They sang songs, chanted slogans, and got some warm applause from the Philadelphia lunch crowds.

Kennedy speaks

At the convention hall, the keynote address by Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) urged the defeat of Reagan at the polls as a message of rejection for his proposals to slash Medicare payments.

Kennedy is co-sponsor with Rep. Richard A. Gephardt of a health care financing reform bill which both the NCSC and the AFL-CIO have endorsed.

At a "Health Care Rally" during the convention, NCSC Executive Director William R. Hutton pointed out that "older people pay a greater percentage of their incomes for health care today than they did before the passage of Medicare—an average of $1,500 a year in out-of-pocket costs.

"Health care inflation is the elderly's number one concern," Hutton said, "and health care cost containment our number one priority."

Local support

Freda Mulkern of the Massachusetts Senior Action was one of several senior leaders at the rally who discussed the ways in which their groups work at the grassroots level to support the Medicare and Medicaid programs. Other speakers included Ed Toohey, president of the Philadelphia AFL-CIO, and Julius Uehlein, president of the Pennsylvania State AFL-CIO, both of whom urged the delegates to "get out the vote" on Election Day for "candidates who support the Medicare and Medicaid programs."

Sen. John Heinz (R-Pa.), chairman of the Senate Special Committee on Aging, told the delegates that they had "no more important mission than saving both the nation and the Medicare program from runaway health costs."

"We need to cut waste, and improve the quality and affordability of care for all Americans," Heinz said.

Also addressing the convention was Gus Tyler, assistant president of the Ladies' Garment Workers, who said the nation is suffering from "the politics of scarcity which is dividing our energies and pitting one against the other.

"We are told we don't have enough for Medicare, we don't have enough to keep up with social security, we don't have enough to educate your grandchildren, we don't have enough for food stamps, and we don't have enough for housing. Yet, amidst all this scarcity, Uncle Sam dug deep into his pockets and gave billions of dollars in tax cuts to the millionaires."

George Kourpias, vice president of the Machinists, outlined the goals of the new AFL-CIO Retirees Committee which is encouraging all affiliated unions to set up retiree programs or update those that already exist.

"Seniors represent millions of votes," Kourpias said. "They can be a significant force in the fall elections."

The banquet speaker, Dr. Arthur Flemming, former Secretary of Health, Education & Welfare and former chairman of the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights, told the seniors that "there hasn't been any national election in my lifetime where the people of our nation have been called upon to confront such basic and fundamental issues as we're being called upon to confront in 1984."

The NCSC presented its Award of Merit to Rep. Paul Simon (D-Ill.), citing his outstanding record in support of legislation to aid America's elderly—100 percent by the NCSC's standard.

In making the presentation, Hutton noted that in his five terms in the House, Simon has been "an ardent supporter of social security and Medicare" and has sponsored legislation to broaden Medicare benefits.

Congresswoman cited

Another highlight was the appearance by NCSC President Emeritus Nelson H. Cruikshank, former head of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security and Counsellor on Aging to the President during the Carter Administration. Cruikshank presented an Award of Merit to Rep. Marcy Kaptur (D-Ohio) as an outstanding freshman representative. He praised her for "cosponsoring bills to expand home health care under Medicare, to prevent discrimination against women in pension benefits, to increase funding for hospice care under Medicare and to continue the Retired Senior Volunteer Program."

NCSC President Jacob Clayman and Sec.-Treas. J. Al Rightley were re-elected by acclamation to new two-year terms. Four vice presidents—Dr. Mary Mulvey, George Kourpias, Einar Mohn, and Dorothy Walker—also were re-elected. The delegates also chose at-large and regional board members for the next two years.

Chemical, energy secretariat chooses Boggs for top post

Geneva—Michael D. Boggs, assistant director of the AFL-CIO's Dept. of International Affairs, was elected secretary-general of the International Chemical & Energy Workers' Federation (ICEF) at the trade secretariat's July 4-5 congress here.

Boggs, who joined the AFL-CIO in 1966 as a program officer for the American Institute for Free Labor Development assigned to Brazil, succeeds Charles Levinson of Canada. He was elected unanimously by the more than 400 delegates from 41 countries attending the congress.

Headquartered in Geneva, the ICEF is made up of unions representing workers in the chemical, energy, and related industries throughout the free world. It was founded in 1907.

AFL-CIO affiliates include the Cement, Lime & Gypsum Workers division of the Boilermakers; the Glass & Ceramic Workers; Rubber Workers; Chemical Workers; Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers, and Flint Glass Workers.

The congress also ratified the action of the ICEF executive committee naming Pekka O. Aro of the Finnish Paperworkers Union deputy secretary-general of the organization and the appointment of Levinson as secretary-general-emeritus.

Boggs, who had been attending the annual meeting of the International Labor Organization's Governing Body here, served as the AFL-CIO associate inter-American representative from 1969 to 1974 when he became assistant director of the Dept. of International Affairs.

He has attended sessions of the ILO since 1973, and in 1977 was named deputy U.S. worker delegate to the specialized United Nations agency. He speaks six languages and holds a degree in Hispanic language and literature from American University.

Studies Center marks 15th year

The George Meany Center for Labor Studies is celebrating its 15th anniversary with the issuing of its 1984-85 catalogue offering 47 leadership development courses. The center's courses are open to full-time officers and staff of AFL-CIO affiliates.

In a foreword, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland notes that in its first 15 years the center "has earned the enthusiastic support of trade unionists and the respect of its academic colleagues."

As a school, Kirkland points out, the center is probably unique in that its greatest resources are provided by its students who bring their leadership talents and practical trade union experience to every class.

Kirkland congratulates those who have participated in the center's activities as students, as instructors and as support personnel.

Tracing the center's history, Executive Director Fred K. Hoehler, Jr., recalls: "The center opened on Labor Day, 1969 with high hopes and great expectations but with its acceptance by the labor constituency untried. Now, here we are 15 years later, with an alumni of more than 36,000 and a secure national, even international reputation."

This year's catalogue offers several new courses: Contract Administration: Life Without Arbitration; Use of Micro-Computers in Negotiations; Negotiating for Pensions; Containing Health Care Costs; and TV: the Cool Medium.

The most popular courses continue to be those on organizing, grievance arbitration techniques, and the local union's use of computers.

Of the six classes on organizing, four are on basic techniques; two are advanced courses.

On arbitration techniques, the center is offering its institute on Preparation & Presentation six times; one advanced course, and one on Fact Finding & Interest Arbitration.

The institute on computers for local unions is offered four times this year.

Five institutes are offered for personal leadership development: Advanced Skills (rapid reading, clearer writing, public speaking), the Art of Leadership, the Union Administrator, Effective Speaking, and New Staff—a two-week program to help the transition from rank-and-file leader to fulltime union officer or staff member.

Special programs, seminars and workshops are offered on civil rights, teaching techniques, newswriting and editing, occupational health and safety, union issues for women, the changing workplace and other subjects.

All but three classes meet at the center's Silver Spring, Md., campus. Off-campus classes will be offered at state universities in California, Illinois and Oregon.

Copies of the center's 15th-anniversary catalogue have been mailed to affiliates. Additional copies are available on request to Fred K. Hoehler, Jr., excutive director, George Meany Center, 10000 New Hampshire Ave., Silver Spring, Md. 20903. Telephone (301) 431-6400.

Dan River drops cotton dust test plan

Richmond, Va.—Dan River, Inc., abandoned its proposal to conduct an experiment that would have exposed textile workers to cotton dust levels that exceed the federal health standards.

The giant textile company at a meeting here withdrew its request for a variance from the federal cotton dust standard and said it would install the more than $7 million worth of ventilation equipment needed to improve air quality at its mills in Danville, Va. The company is the second largest private employer in Virginia.

The decision follows a protest from trade unions and from congressmen that the company was seeking approval to engage in "human experimentation" and that it had requested the variance to avoid installing the expensive equipment to meet the federal cotton dust standard's Mar. 27, 1984, compliance deadline.

Eric Frumin, occupational safety and health director for the Clothing & Textile Workers, hailed the company's decision and credited the continued pressure of labor unions and the media as helping to persuade the company to withdraw its proposal. He added that a letter from the National Institute of Occupational Safety & Health, which denounced the proposed study as "human experimentation," was also a key to stopping it.

Dan River Chairman David W. Johnston, Jr., was reported "very upset" by the bad publicity.

Frumin, however, criticized the federal Occupational Safety & Health Administration for recommending the study and the Virginia OSHA for permitting it. He called for further investigation of the roles played by the two agencies.

Dan River proposed the experiment last fall to test the theory that byssinosis, or brown lung, is caused by bacteria in cotton dust, and not cotton dust itself.

Test of theory

In order to test that theory, the company proposed a study that would have exposed over 200 workers to high levels of cotton dust. A letter from federal OSHA recommended the state grant the variance, which it did, allowing Dan River six months in which to obtain a study grant from NIOSH.

Now, however, the Virginia OSHA has given the firm until Aug. 15 to submit a plan for meeting the dust standard at the 10 worksites in Danville.

A mini-study involving the testing of blood samples from some employees will be conducted, state officials said. The study would test blood for anti-bodies to the bacteria that Dan River suggested might cause brown lung.

Reagan raises new threat of social security tampering by Robert M. Ball, who served as social security commissioner under three presidents, and by Alicia H. Munnell, an economist and authority on social security.

Munnell, who is a vice president of the Federal Reserve Bank of Boston, said she can't understand Reagan's purpose in "constantly raising questions in the minds of lots of people about the solvency of the social security system."

There's no cause to do it, she said. On the average, people now entering the labor force will receive social security benefits equal to "the combined payroll tax contributions of employers and employees, plus an interest rate equal to the rate of inflation over their working life."

While the White House was trying to gloss over his social security comments, Reagan was attempting to put out another political brush fire.

Reagan's appointment of Anne Burford, the discredited former Environmental Protection Agency administrator, to head a presidential advisory panel outraged environmentalists—including some prominent Republicans.

In an obvious attempt to repair the damage, the President's schedule this week included "photo opportunities" on July 11 in Chesapeake Bay marshlands in Maryland, a July 12 signing of an annual "environmental quality report" on Theodore Roosevelt Island adjacent to Washington, D.C., and a July 12 visit to Mammoth Cave Natural Park in Kentucky, followed by a speech to the National Hikers and Campers convention.

But when reporters covering his Maryland visit sought to question Reagan about Burford's appointment, White House aides ordered television lights turned off so that Reagan's answer could not be recorded.

Earlier Reagan had told reporters that his environmental support record is "one of the best kept secrets of his presidency."

Reagan choice for OSHA slot branded unfit

The AFL-CIO attacked President Reagan's nomination of Robert Rowland to head the Occupational Safety & Health Administration, charging that Rowland has an "absolute lack of comprehension of the basic principles of occupational safety and health for workers."

On June 28, Reagan announced plans to nominate Rowland, currently chairman of the Occupational Safety & Health Review Commission. He was a vice chairman of the Reagan campaign in Texas in 1980.

Margaret Seminario, associate director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Occupational Safety, Health & Social Security, said labor's main concerns center on Rowland's three-year track record at the review commission.

"His record shows he doesn't support the foundations and basic principles of the Act," Seminario said. "His positions under policy matters are really antithetical to the thrust of the Act and the whole OSHA program," she said.

Citing Rowland's numerous lone dissents on review cases, Seminario explained that he wants OSHA to provide a "degree of proof that is not scientifically possible" before he will support the standards.

'Little hope'

Rowland has "trouble acting on well-recognized hazards," Seminario charged, "so there's very little hope that he's capable of or interested in dealing with the problems that are increasingly facing workers, such as reproductive hazards, neuro-toxic effects, behavioral and ergonomic problems. His views are based on ideology and bear no relationship to the realities of providing safe and healthy workplaces."

Seminario added that "if you extend his thinking from the Commission to the top job at OSHA, one would have to predict that there will be no policies or programs put in place to protect workers."

She noted that during the agency's first 10 years, "that for all its problems, OSHA moved forward and was a world leader in protecting workers. In the last three years, it's moved backward to the point where we have reason to be ashamed of the lack of commitment and effort put toward protecting workers."

Rowland's nomination would fill the vacancy created by the resignation last Mar. 30 of Thorne B. Auchter who served as administrator for two years.

From 1958 to 1962, Rowland was an assistant attorney general in Texas, and in 1963 became a partner in the law firm of Mueller & Rowland.

Often dissented

For nearly a year, Rowland was the lone Reagan appointee on the review commission and often dissented from commission rulings, Seminario noted.

Since last winter when E. Ross Buckley was confirmed as Reagan's second appointee to the three-member commission, the number of citations vacated and the amount of penalties reduced have increased dramatically, she noted.

At the confirmation hearings for Buckley, the AFL-CIO expressed its concern at the appointment of a second commission member "who does not have experience or training in safety or health matters."

That testimony cited Rowland's reasoning for vacating a citation against the Duriron Co., Inc., for exposing workers to excessive heat that could cause brain damage or death. Rowland held "that since the employer had a medical treatment program for affected workers, limitations on heat exposure were not required."

In another case, federation testimony noted, Rowland had ruled "that cilica exposure seven times the permissible level did not constitute a serious health hazard since the outdated 1968 scientific documentation of OSHA's silica standard did not specifically state at which exposure levels silicosis (a lung disease) would occur."

No double standard

ILO assembly rejects 'flexibility' on rights

Geneva—The International Labor Organization's annual assembly affirmed that there can be no two ways of observing the human and trade union rights enshrined in the ILO's standard-setting conventions.

ILO Director Gen. Francis Blanchard noted that this affirmation had emerged from the wide-ranging debate on the application of standards that was the keynote of the three-week session.

Speaker after speaker "stressed the fact that there could be absolutely no question of flexibility in the case of standards concerning such basic rights as freedom of association, the abolition of forced labor and the elimination of discrimination," Blanchard said as he summed up the general debate in his closing address before the nearly 1,800 trade union employer and government representatives from most of the organization's 151 member nations.

"Most speakers" in the debate had underscored that an ILO convention, or treaty, set freely accepted obligations that are "exactly the same for all countries and its application should be assessed on the basis of uniform criteria," Blanchard said.

The director general referred to "most speakers" because, as he reminded the assembly, Soviet government delegate Leonid Kostine was a dissenter. Kostine and his Soviet-bloc allies had complained that the ILO standards and the organs for monitoring their observance did not make allowances for the "vast difference" in the social, economic and legal systems of member states.

Soviets blocked

But Communist complaints got nowhere at the conference. A Soviet-bloc resolution that aimed at initiating a revision of the standard-setting procedures and the weakening of the monitoring machinery was not even taken up in committee.

Instead, the resolutions committee reported out a text submitted by U.S. Worker Delegate Irving Brown, head of the AFL-CIO Dept. of International Affairs, and other free trade unionists calling on the ILO to give "high priority to technical cooperation programs and projects that benefit the least developed countries."

The only other resolution reported out, also aimed primarily at speeding Third World development, was submitted by private-enterprise employers. It was backed by the free trade unionists when their amendments to assure that productivity gains would benefit workers were accepted.

The two resolutions were adopted by the conference.

The Soviet bloc received another rebuff when the committee on the application of conventions in its report to the assembly censured the conduct of both Czechoslovakia and Poland.

Refusal to appear

The Czechoslovak government was scored for refusing to appear before the committee to discuss its denial of jobs to political dissidents.

Poland's military dictatorship was singled out because its boycott of the ILO meant that no Polish government delegate was present to face questioning by the watchdog committee.

Bowing to the obvious, the Communist countries made no attempt to prevent the assembly's adoption of the committee report without a vote.

A standard-setting recommendation fixing guidelines for governments with the aim of promoting "full, productive and freely chosen employment" was approved by the conference.

While a recommendation does not impose the treaty obligations of a ratified convention, the ILO constitution imposes on member states the duty to make every effort to observe its provisions.

President John T. Joyce of the Bricklayers represented U.S. workers on the committee that drafted the recommendation.

The committee's worker members pressed for the assembly to express "concern" over the adverse impact on employment of the belt-tightening demands that international monetary and other agencies attach to their aid to the poor countries.

Such conditions run counter to the social development that the ILO seeks to promote by its "basic needs strategy," it was stated.

The assembly completed a first reading of a projected new standard on occupational health services for protecting all workers "including those in the public sector, in all branches of economic activity and all undertakings."

President John H. Sweeney of the Service Employees was the AFL-CIO worker team member who helped draft the outlines of the proposed standard for the assembly.

Putting funds to work

AFL-CIO Vice President John H. Lyons presides at a meeting of the Executive Council's Pension Investment Committee at federation headquarters. To his right are Director Bert Seidman and Associate Director Larry Smedley of the Dept. of Occupational Safety, Health & Social Security. The focus was on job-generating investments suitable for union pension funds.

Duarte pledges full support of El Salvador land reform

The Duarte government in El Salvador has pledged its "full and unequivocal support" for the continuation of the country's land reform program despite the National Assembly's failure to vote to extend it another year.

In a reply to a telegram from AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland urging his support for extension of the program, El Salvador President Jose Napoleon Duarte pledged his government will soon present new legislation to the Assembly to "accommodate potential beneficiaries," especially those in war zones who have not had a chance to take part in the "land to the tiller" program.

Duarte also indicated that he will initiate the purchase of large land tracts that will be divided into small parcels to be sold to peasant families that did not have a fair chance to participate in the land reform program.

AFL-CIO support for U.S. aid to El Salvador is conditioned on successful completion of the program, begun during Duarte's 1980-82 administration, as well as reform of the Salvadoran judicial system and obtaining justice in the murders of two AFL-CIO staff representatives and the head of the land reform project, Jose Rodolfo Viera.

In his telegram to Duarte, Kirkland stressed the conditionality of continued U.S. economic and military assistance and expressed the AFL-CIO's "complete solidarity" with that nation's farm workers.

Despite the Assembly's rejection of the government's proposal to extend the land reform program another year, prospects for continued progress in turning land over to tenants and sharecroppers have been enhanced by Duarte's naming of trade unionists to key government positions.

Title difficulties

Under Decree 207, the land reform program, plots of no more than 17 acres are turned over to tenants who receive title to the land. Some 70,000 applications for titles have been filed, but only 8,000 applicants have been granted definitive titles. The rest have received provisional titles.

While the Assembly's failure to extend the land reform legislation means that no more applications will be accepted, reforms are still being carried out. Technical assistance and production credit are given new landholders, the job of compensating former landowners goes on, and a general consolidation process is under way.

The frustration the AFL-CIO and American officials have experienced in attempts to obtain justice in the January 1981 slayings of Viera and the two AFL-CIO staff representatives, Michael Hammer and Mark Pearlman, surfaced anew as a second Salvadoran appeals court sustained dismissal of charges against an army lieutenant, Lopez Sibrian, for his role in the killings.

The three men were gunned down in the coffee shop of a San Salvador hotel by two national guardsmen. Evidence showed they acted at the direction of Lopez Sibrian with weapons that he provided. Hammer and Pearlman were with the AFL-CIO American Institute for Free Labor Development.

"The AFL-CIO/AIFLD considers this to be a further affirmation of its previous charge of corruption within the Salvadoran judicial system," AIFLD said. "The evidence against Lopez Sibrian overwhelmingly dictated that he should be brought to trial for the murders."

Kirkland cites bond with NAACP

Kansas City — The Reagan Administration's "harsh lessons" have helped strengthen the solidarity between the trade union and civil rights movements, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland said in a message to the NAACP convention.

"We have learned that no advance is irreversible," Kirkland said, and that "gains won at great cost through generations of struggle can be swept away."

But "a democracy can correct its mistakes," Kirkland stressed, "and we shall turn this country around once again in the direction in which it was meant to go."

Registration program

Delegates to the 75th anniversary convention of the NAACP adopted a program establishing voter registration as a primary goal of the organization's 1,800 chapters and gave strong applause to speakers emphasizing election themes.

NAACP Executive Director Benjamin L. Hooks condemned the policies of the Reagan Administration as a "virus" that has hurt "black America and poor America" and has sought to make affirmative action "a dirty word."

Both Walter F. Mondale and his primary rival, Jesse Jackson, received warm ovations from the delegates. In his message to the convention, Kirkland suggested that "the great surge of political activism among black voters in the primaries and caucuses promises a greater black voice in this and all future elections."

Such a development, Kirkland said, "will be good for all Americans."

About 1,000 delegates and guests attended the traditional labor luncheon, which included the presentation of awards to unions and individuals that have worked closely with the NAACP. AFL-CIO Vice President Frederick O'Neal and Auto Workers Vice President Marc Stepp are co-chairmen of the NAACP Ad Hoc Labor Committee, which sponsors the program.

Postal Workers President Moe Biller, the principal luncheon speaker, urged the necessity "to join together" and marshal the resources of both labor and the civil rights committees to defeat Ronald Reagan at the polls.

The top A. Philip Randolph award was presented to Annie B. Martin, a member of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers who is president of the big Harlem NAACP chapter in New York. The William E. Pollard Award, named for the AFL-CIO's civil rights director, was made posthumously to Roosevelt Watts, the late secretary-treasurer of the Transport Workers.

Individuals honored with special awards included Joe Davis and Robert Cole of the UAW, Barbara Van Blake of the Teachers, Robert Atkins of the Communications Workers and James E. Keyes, Sr. of the Operating Engineers. AFL-CIO unions receiving awards for financial help to the NAACP were the State, County & Municipal Employees and the Detroit local of the Teachers. Three persons on the AFL-CIO staff, Fannie Neal, W. C. Young and Richard Womack, were given awards for special service to the Labor Committee.

Video Bulletin on industrial policy

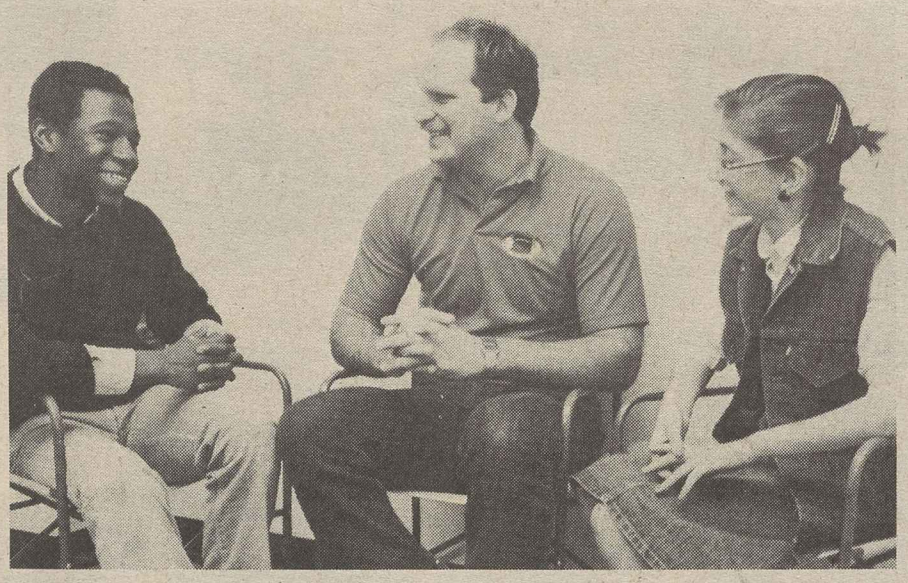
The Labor Institute of Public Affairs has released Labor Video Bulletin No. 18, a comprehensive report on the issues involved in revitalizing America's economy with a national industrial policy.

LIPA's cameras covered the debate at the 1983 AFL-CIO convention, on Capitol Hill, at meetings of the Industrial Union Dept. and in national policy forums.

The program focuses on the decline of basic industries and the impact on future generations of American workers. The Chrysler revival is highlighted as an example of how labor-management cooperation, together with government assistance, can bring a company from bankruptcy to profitability.

The opening eight minutes can be used as an overview of the national debate on the issue of industrial policy. The complete bulletin runs a half-hour.

The Labor Video Bulletin is a monthly videocassette from LIPA dealing with topics of broad appeal to the labor movement. It is free to affiliated national and international unions, state federations and regional offices. For more information, contact the Labor Institute of Public Affairs, 815 16th St., N.W., Room 406, Washington, D.C. 20006.



Washington Redskins Linebacker Rich Milot of the NFLPA is featured with junior high school students Paul Hicks and Anna Jordan in the UFCW's new labor education project materials.

Students learn of unions through organizing film

A new labor-in-the-schools program launched by the Food & Commercial Workers combines an award-winning documentary film with study materials for students, suggested lesson plans for teachers and attractive classroom visual aids published in cooperation with the National Football League Players Association.

The package helps students learn about labor history and labor laws and stresses the important role unions continue to play in American society.

The program is called "Organizing: The Road to Dignity," also the title of the 40-minute videotape that outlines the protections assured to workers under labor law and shows how workers organize their own unions and bargain in good faith with their employers.

The "actors" in the production are working UFCW members who recreate their own experiences in organizing their workplaces and bargaining for their contracts. The production won first place in the International Labor Communications Association 1983 film and broadcast competition.

Companion materials produced with the NFLPA include a poster and bulletin that explain worker protections including child labor laws, wage and hour regulations, and safety and health legislation. The materials remind students that they are protected by specific federal laws governing their hours, working conditions and pay that were hardwon by unions after years of struggle.

UFCW President William H. Wynn said the union produced the program directed at young people "because we are concerned about the lack of information, and in many cases the misinformation . . . about the trade union movement."

Trade panel proposals seek to save steel industry jobs

United States with imports of steel would cause those same foreign producers simply to absorb any increased tariffs."

They added that the four groups of steel products on which the ITC denied relief in its findings last month are the probable areas for foreign producers to divert their excess production capacity, thus increasing shipments to the U.S. in those four product groups.

"We urge the President to take effective measures to prevent these increases and this diversion from taking place," Williams and Trautlein said.

The ITC recommended quotas for three of the five areas it deemed in need of import relief. For the other two segments, it suggested a combination of quotas and tariffs.

The specific recommendations are:

● For semi-finished steel products, the first 1.5 million tons of these products annually could enter at current tariff levels, with quantities above that amount subject to an additional duty of 15 percent for the first three years, and 10 percent the last two years.

Minimum quota

● For steel plates, there would be a minimum quota of 2.1 million tons, with imports allowed to rise to 21.2 percent of the domestic market during the first three years and to 23.3 percent the final two years.

● For structural steel, a minimum quota of 2.1 million tons with the import market share rising to 28.9 percent of the domestic consumption. For the final two years, imports could increase to 31.8 percent of the market. This remedy would not cover light structural steel.

● For wire and wire products. A minimum of 400,000 tons for wire with imports permitted to rise to 24.5 percent of the U.S. market. In the final two years, imports could rise to 26.9 percent. For wire products, there would be an additional 12 percent tariff in each of the first three years, with the added tariff set at 10 percent in the last two years of relief.

Import ceiling

● For steel sheet and strips. There would be a minimum quota of 1.8 million tons on hot-rolled products with imports above that figure not to exceed 11 percent of the market in the first three years and 12.1 percent the final two years. For cold-rolled products, the minimum quota would be 1.9 million tons with imports limited to 10.6 percent of the market the first three years, and 11.7 percent the final two years. The minimum quota on galvanized steel imports would be 1.6 million tons with import penetration allowed to 21.4 percent of the U.S. market for three years, rising to 23.5 percent the last two years. The import minimum quota for all other steel sheets and strip is 400,000 tons with imports allowed up to 6.4 percent of the market for three years, rising to 7 percent the final two years.

While hailing the ITC recommendations, Williams and Trautlein made it clear at a press conference that the USWA and Bethlehem Steel "will continue to support the Fair Trade in Steel Act and work for its immediate passage."

In the days just prior to the ITC's recommendations, Williams suggested that there is strong and growing support in Congress for the legislation, which would provide comprehensive import relief to steel industry.

Labor, environment leaders sound alarm on health risks

Annapolis, Md.—A coalition of labor and environmental leaders has adopted a program to heighten congressional, legislative and public awareness of environmental health risks in the workplace and the community.

At the second annual convention of the OSHA/Environmental Network here, representatives of such groups as the Audubon Society, AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., Sierra Club, Friends of the Earth and various unions endorsed an educational campaign aimed at alerting the public and legislators in 13 key states to the dangers of the current weak or nonexistent enforcement of laws affecting air, water and chemical substances.

The states selected by the Network include California, Colorado, Massachusetts, Minnesota, Michigan, New Jersey, New York, North Carolina, Pennsylvania, Tennessee, Texas, Washington and Wisconsin.

In each of these states, representatives of the union and environmental groups will work together to develop extensive education programs to be aimed both at their own members and at the public.

IUD President Howard D. Samuel and Sierra Club Executive Director Michael McCloskey, national co-coordinators of the network, announced the joint effort.

Steelworkers President Lynn R. Williams told the convention participants that the "integral relationship between environmental and occupational health" explains why creation of this network "was ultimately inevitable."

The convention called for the following actions:

● Passage of a stricter clean air law with special emphasis on acid rain control.

● Development of a system to notify workers of past and present health hazards in the workplace, combined with a compensation program for those already affected by toxic agents.

● Reauthorization of existing pesticide control and toxic waste disposal laws.

● Action to combat the federal government's failure to enforce laws requiring public notice of the names and effects of toxic chemicals by urging state governments to fill the gap.

● Restoration of the gutted Occupational Safety & Health Administration programs that are essential to providing safe conditions for the nation's workers.

● Action to halt White House and congressional efforts to weaken environmental regulations.

The convention participants also were addressed by former OSHA Administrator Dr. Eula Bingham, who is now vice president of the University of Cincinnati; Rep. Parren J. Mitchell (D-Md.), and Jeanne Malchon, president of the American Lung Association.

Leading the March

The following is from an address to the AFL-CIO Convention, Oct. 3, 1983, by Rep. Geraldine A. Ferraro (D-N.Y.).

WHEN HISTORIANS tell the story of the 1984 elections, the longest chapter will be on the re-emergence of organized labor as a major political force in America.

The labor movement is in the front of the march to victory in 1984, and those of us who are labor's friends are cheering you every step of the way.

Labor and Democrats have driven the engines of prosperity and social justice in this country. It is time for reforging a great American political alliance. And I'm proud to stand with labor women as they take on a greater role in that alliance.

The women of America have had enough of Ronald Reagan.

Mr. Reagan thinks that you help poor people by cutting their food allowances, that you reduce deficits by cutting taxes for the rich.

Ronald Reagan is wrong. What he says is dangerous nonsense. His policies are a disaster, and we have to stop him.

Ronald Reagan and the Republicans say we are fighting for "special interests." Now, personally, I have had it up to here with their calling labor and women and minorities "special interests."

What are banks? What are insurance companies? What are oil companies? They are the special interests, and they are what the Republican Party is all about.

THE REAGAN recession created a whole new class of unemployed people. They're called "discouraged workers," and they don't even count in official unemployment rolls. They've been out of work so long and have so little hope of finding work that they've just dropped off the screen.

Discouraged workers, people working part-time involuntarily because they can't find full-time jobs, and displaced and unskilled workers are all left behind by Reaganomics. Trickle-down rhetoric and help-wanted ads are no substitute for a commitment to training people for real jobs.

We'll get a jobs bill only when we take the Senate back from Jesse Helms and Orrin Hatch.

As a member of Congress, I get paid exactly the same as my male colleagues in the House of Representatives, and that makes me a very lucky and unusual woman. I have to tell you that in my entire adult working life, that is the first time I am able to make that statement.

I have a little bit of vested interest. My mother was a widow. Do they think the kids in those households want any less than children who are in two-person headed households? Do you think we get sick less? Do they think that we get less hungry?

The Republicans talk about the gender gap as if it is a cavity in need of filling by token appointments and photo opportunities. But no amount of cosmetic surgery will repair the gap between this President and the majority of America's voters.

AS BIG A problem the President has with women, he has an even larger one with blacks. The Republicans know their policies are disastrous for minorities, and so they write them off as a "special interest."

The fact is, minorities don't want to be special. They simply want the same opportunities for education, jobs and housing that everyone else wants.

The Democratic Party is the majority party in this country. It is so because we represent the dreams and the hopes and the goals of the majority of American people—blacks and whites, men and women, workers and retirees.

Republicans try to fragment our constituency by calling these groups "special interests." If you add up all those interests, you come up with a cross-section of America. What you'll find is that the special interest is a healthy America, a strong America, a fair America.

The American Dream?

Gender gap a key factor in '84 election contests

By Press Associates, Inc.

There are times in people's lives when, as the saying goes, the men are separated from the boys. The 1984 elections are shaping up as a time when, to update the expression, the women may be separated from the girls.

More and more, as women join the workforce, by necessity as well as by choice, they are finding they have much in common with others who work for a living. These are the working women, to differentiate them from the girls and ladies of the tea parties and country clubs—nice people, all, but somewhat insulated from life's harsh realities.

As women have struggled to cope with the workaday world, they have articulated their needs and interests. The so-called gender gap is a reflection of these needs and interests, and it is important enough to decide many elections this year if enough women register and vote.

The differences in the political attitudes of men and women began to show up with some consistency during the 1970s. According to the National Commission on Working Women, women were putting greater importance than men on the role of government in reducing the income gap between the rich and poor, in helping those in need and on civil rights.

For example, responsible polls in 1982 asked this question: "Should government work to substantially reduce the income gap between the rich and the poor?" The "Yes" responses from women totaled 73 percent; from men, 61 percent. The "gender gap" was 12 points.

On whether social security spending should be increased, decreased or left the same, 56 percent of women responding favored an increase compared to 44 percent of male respondents.

But women also seem to be voting their interests, and their votes are going Democratic.

In 1982, women say, their votes elected the Democratic governors of three major states. In New York, Mario Cuomo won with 51 percent of the vote. Women gave him 52 percent of their votes compared to 43 percent from men, a 9-point gap. In Texas, Mark White got 52 percent of the vote. Women gave White 54 percent, men 43 percent, an 11-point gap. In Michigan, James Blanchard won with 52 percent; women gave him 56 percent, and men 41 percent, a 15-point gap.

Reaction to Reagan

The big test, however, lies ahead. If there is anyone who can inspire the mass mobilization of the women's vote, it is President Reagan.

Where Reagan has spent several decades attacking the federal government, women workers increasingly expect the government to play a more active role in such areas as pay equity, job training, child care, and achieving equal rights.

Women workers have interests similar to male workers, and Reagan has been on the wrong side on almost every worker issue.

Reagan's social program cuts had an especially adverse impact on women. The Women-Infants-Children Food program (WIC) is 100 percent women and children who are nutritional risks. On Aid to Families with Dependent Children, 94 percent of the 11 million recipients are women and children. On food stamps, 85 percent of the 22 million users are women. Under Medicaid, 66 percent of those helped are women.

A newly formed group, AFL-CIO Women Working for '84, along with labor generally and various women's and child welfare organizations are mounting a nationwide effort to register millions of unregistered women and union members.

The gender gap is real but, more importantly, the surge in the women's vote is in line with those progressive forces which want to restore harmony to the nation, put people back to work and enable America to stand for peace and stability in the world.

MEMO FROM COPE

Reagan Campaign Theme

You Never Had It So Good!

OH, REALLY?

President Reagan has been testing his campaign theme out on the hustings lately. The theme is: You never had it so good.

(The "good" of the recent recovery is brief compared to the two-year, Reagan-induced recession that preceded it. During that 1981-83 Reagan-Republican recession period, more than 30 million individual workers suffered one or more periods of unemployment.)

* * * * * *

Today "is a far cry from the gloom and doom of four years ago," the President said in dedicating a new factory.

(For the two years-plus of the Reagan-Republican recession, the average period of unemployment for a jobless worker was, 1981-83 respectively: 14 weeks, 16 weeks, 20 weeks.)

* * * * * *

"This is a wonderful time to be alive," he announced at a July 4 picnic and parade in Alabama.

(Being alive beats the alternative most any time, which is as true now as ever. But about those 30 million workers who got laid off: The average gross earnings they lost in the Reagan-Republican recession and will never recover was, 1981-83: $3,315; $4,005; $5,620.)

* * * * * *

In the middle of an "everything's coming up roses" speech to Texas lawyers, Reagan said: "I'll resist the temptation to comment on all the odd causes and special interests the other party seems to be embracing these days."

(Like those 30 million "special interest" workers who lost jobs in the Reagan-Republican recession, maybe? And who lost overall gross earnings, 1981-83, of: $76.2 billion; $108.1 billion; $151.7 billion. Total gross earnings lost by the jobless in 1981-83 period: $336.1 billion. That "other party" tried to "embrace" and help them. Reagan hardly lifted a finger.)

Reagan has been telling his audiences his economic program has worked just like he knew it would.

* * * * * *

"We're seeing a new respect for family and neighborhood," the President announced.

(Not from this Administration. When workers are idled, their families suffer. More than 10.7 million family members of jobless workers lost all or some of their medical coverage in the Reagan-Republican recession. As for neighborhoods, few in which workers lived were spared the sight of neighbors being bounced from their homes through mortgage foreclosure, which hit highest numbers ever in the Reagan-Republican recession, 1981-83 respectively: 116,000; 160,000; 178,000.)

* * * * * *

On the stump, the President forecasts a future—under his leadership, of course—all but unblemished by economic concerns. He asked the Texas lawyers: "How can anyone in the United States of America, in the world today, be scared of anything?"

(Well, just as a couple of examples: With interest rates high and expected to climb further, a lot of folks are scared to buy a house. Not just scared, but unable. And with Reagan failing to stem the flow of imports, a lot of folks are scared for their jobs—because the trade imbalance for 1984 will translate into 1.8 million lost jobs and job opportunities if the rest of the year continues at the rate of the first five months.)

* * * * * *

A lot of folks would argue against the "you-never-had-it-so-good" campaign approach by the President, among them:

- 1 million needy Americans from whom the Administration took all food stamp aid.
- 4 million working poor who lost some food stamp aid.
- 7-8 million Americans now living in poverty who weren't before the Reagan Administration came along.
- 725,000 families (including their 1.5 million children) that suffered cuts in AFDC assistance.
- 1.1 million children from low-income homes who were deprived of free or reduced-price school lunches and 900,000 who lost out on school breakfasts.
- 700,000-plus would-be college students whose education was disrupted by Reagan cutbacks in higher education loans.

Mr. President: Who Never Had It So Good?

Odds 'n Ends

OBSCURED BY SPECULATION about a woman as vice presidential nominee is fact women are candidates in nine U.S. Senate contests. One is incumbent Sen. Nancy Kassebaum (R-Kans.), seeking re-election. Others are Republicans Nancy Hoch of State Board of Regents, challenging Sen. James Exon in Nebraska; Montclair Mayor Mary V. Mochary running against New Jersey Sen. Bill Bradley; manufacturer Barbara Leonard vs. Sen. Claiborne Pell (R.I.). Democrats—Minnesota Secretary of State Joan Growe against Sen. Rudy Boschwitz; state house majority leader Elizabeth Mitchell vs. Sen. William Cohen in Maine; Oregon state Sen. Margie Hendriksen challenging Sen. Mark Hatfield; legislator Judy Pratt vs. Sen. Pete Domenici in New Mexico; Edythe Harrison going against Sen. John Warner in Virginia.

ADD THIS to one-vote-counts collection: Melvin Purvis won South Carolina Democratic primary for U.S. Senate over Cecil Williams 145,968 to 145,543, just 425 votes. A recount whittled Purvis's lead to 325 out of 297,463 votes cast, in percentages 50.05 to 49.95. Purvis will face Sen. Strom Thurmond in November.

COLUMNIST DEBUNKS colleagues who talk of "invincibility" of Reagan. Mark Shields in Washington Post contends Reagan not only "vincible" but "even vulnerable" to a strong Democratic campaign. Shields points out Reagan had virtual free ride to good press while Democrats roughed up one another in primary period, took several "presidential" trips—China, D-Day beaches—that provided great media footage. Despite this and economic improvements, Shields comments Reagan still only manages roughly 50 percent in polls that pit him head-to-head against specific challengers. Too, Shields notes, "Reagan is a politician capable of making some real bonehead plays" (he's always sounding off on social security) and that most Americans consider the President "tilts to the affluent." Shields concludes, "this has all the makings of a very close election."

Mondale-Ferraro slate hailed for strong appeal to workers

The Democratic Party's Mondale-Ferraro ticket for 1984.

Candidates, platform offer clear alternative to Reagan

By David L. Perlman

San Francisco—The Democratic convention nominated a presidential ticket American workers can enthusiastically support and adopted a platform that offers workers a clear alternative to the policies of the Reagan Administration.

For organized labor, the convention action vindicated the AFL-CIO's break with precedent last October in its pre-primary endorsement of Walter F. Mondale's presidential candidacy. The endorsement, Federation President Lane Kirkland told Mondale at the time, represented "a commitment to be at your side in every primary and every caucus in every state of the union."

Labor's commitment was carried out, through all of the ups and downs of the roller-coaster road to San Francisco.

Mondale's selection of New York Congresswoman Geraldine A. Ferraro as his running mate proved as popular in labor circles as it was among convention delegates who had come to San Francisco as supporters of the three presidential candidates.

Ferraro's nomination for vice president is "an added plus," Kirkland said. He predicted that rank-and-file union members will respond to Gerry Ferraro "with enthusiasm."

Rising star

She has been a rising star in Congress, proved herself a skilled mediator as chairman of the Democratic Platform Committee, and needs no introduction to the trade union movement. Ferraro's mother was for many years a member of the Ladies' Garment Workers. As a teacher early in her career, Ferraro was a member of the AFT and served as a building representative—the equivalent of shop steward.

Mondale, himself, is a Hubert Humphrey protege from Minnesota who at 56—17 years younger than President Reagan—has been attorney general of his state, a senator for 12 years, and Vice President of the United States in the last Democratic Administration.

The platform adopted at the convention sets full employment as a central goal of economic policy, calls for revitalization of basic American industries and the repair of the nation's neglected infrastructure.

It proposes fairness in tax policies to help reduce Reagan's enormous budget deficits, backs labor law reform and denounces this Administration's "relentless assault on the collective bargaining power and rights of working men and women."

National commitment

The convention affirmed a national commitment to "peace, strength and freedom," assailing all forms of dictatorships. (Platform excerpts, Page 6.)

Mondale came to the convention with the delegate commitments assuring him a first-ballot nomination, but the challenge was to unite the supporters of Gary Hart and Jesse Jackson behind his candidacy after a long and hard-fought primary season.

A Mondale ally, New York Gov. Mario M. Cuomo, began the healing process in a keynote speech eloquently stressing the principles that unite Democrats.

Cuomo called for a repudiation of the "social Darwinism" of the Reagan Admin-

Trade unionist delegates savor fruits of solidarity

San Francisco—"Unity" was the identifying mark of the record 603 delegates and 198 alternates at the Democratic convention who were members of unions affiliated with the AFL-CIO.

You could spot them, and they could spot each other, by the blue lapel pins they wore that carried that one-word message—"Unity."

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland spoke of the fruits of that unity during a meeting of convention participants from affiliated unions. He credited labor's solidarity with helping to assure the nomination of a presidential ticket that working people can enthusiastically support.

Setbacks overcome

Using nautical terms from his seafaring days, Kirkland reminded the delegates of the crisis faced by the Mondale campaign after its early primary setbacks in New England.

"We all felt like the crew on a ship that was anchored off a lee shore with the engine down, a gale coming up, and the anchor dragging. We just had to find a little bit of good holding ground until we could get the steam back up."

The commitment made at the AFL-CIO convention a few months earlier was put to the test by those early setbacks. But even when the outlook was bleakest, Kirkland said, nowhere in the trade union movement was any voice raised to suggest that "we ought to abandon ship and forget the whole thing."

Kirkland noted that the unifying factor of common interests among trade unionists was demonstrated at the last Democratic convention, even though AFL-CIO affiliates were divided on presidential candidates and the AFL-CIO itself did not take part in the primary campaign. But labor delegates from both camps were dissatisfied with the 1980 platform draft's lack of commitment to full employment goals. They joined together to support and pass substitute language.

It was the moment at the convention

To a winner

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland sent the following telegram to Walter F. Mondale:

"Congratulations on your outstanding victory. We look forward to marching at your side through the general election campaign and on to victory in November. The Mondale-Ferraro team represents and stands for the mainstream of the best ideals and aspirations of this country. You are going to win."

San Francisco parade

City's unions send their message

San Francisco—The greatest labor parade in this city's colorful history celebrated the 50th anniversary of the San Francisco general strike and showed delegates to the Democratic national convention what trade union solidarity is all about.

More than 160,000 union members from virtually every organized trade and occupation took part in the four-hour parade through downtown San Francisco and in the giant rally at Civic Center Plaza that followed.

Some of them rode on fire engines from throughout the Bay area, or on bulldozers and construction cranes. Some were on colorful floats. And some propelled themselves the length of the parade route in wheelchairs.

Mostly they marched behind the banners of their unions, carrying their messages in a sea of thousands of placards.

The message that came across most vividly was that San Francisco is still a union town—just as it was on July 16, 1934, when nearly all the city's workers turned out to support the cause of a two-month strike by dock workers and seamen against a union-busting employers' alliance. Two pickets had been fatally shot and the National Guard had been called up.

Citywide shutdown

But for the next four days, the city was shut tight and nothing moved without special clearance from the central labor council's general strike committee.

The chairman of the strike committee was Harry Bridges, once a figure of controversy, but now the guest of honor at this great parade. Bridges, who helped found and for years headed the unaffiliated Longshoremen & Warehousemen, will be 83 soon and the huge crowd at the Plaza rally joined in a "happy birthday" song.

It was that kind of a day, with bagpipe bands led by kiddie majorettes, families marching together with an older child pushing a stroller for a toddler.

There were iron workers and letter carriers, insulators and telephone workers, machinists and seafarers, public sector workers and service employees.

Store clerks came fresh from the picket line at a large department store and three busloads of Phelps Dodge strikers came from Arizona to join the rally.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue marched at the head of the parade, along with Ex-

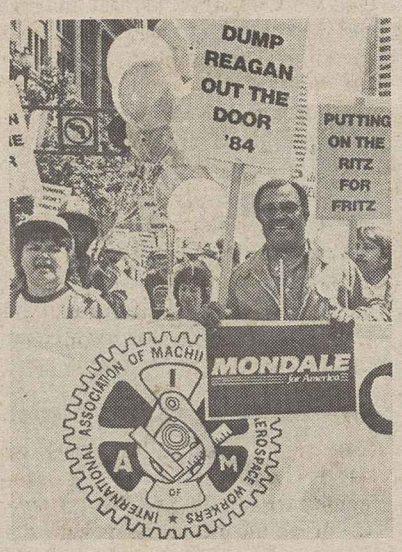
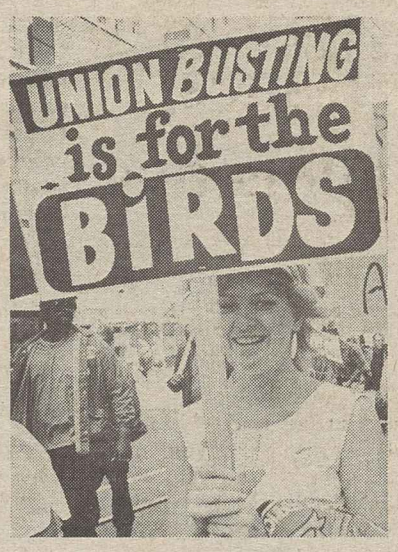
Solidarity on parade

More than 160,000 strong, San Francisco area unionists and their families throng the city's streets in the largest labor parade in the state's history. The demonstration through the heart of the city was organized by the California AFL-CIO to coincide with the Democratic convention and dramatize labor's deep concerns over the Reagan Administration's disastrous policies. Labor's strong support of the Mondale-Ferraro ticket was evident on proudly waved signs along the entire line of march. The record turnout also celebrated the 50th anniversary of the famed San Francisco general strike.

The streets of San Francisco vibrate with banners, balloons and the chants of union marchers.

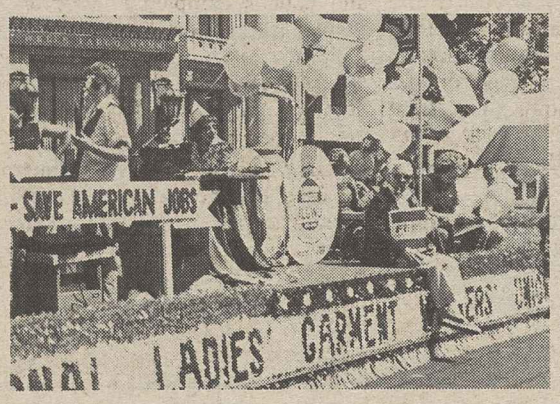
Trade unionists from labor's broad spectrum sound a basic union creed.



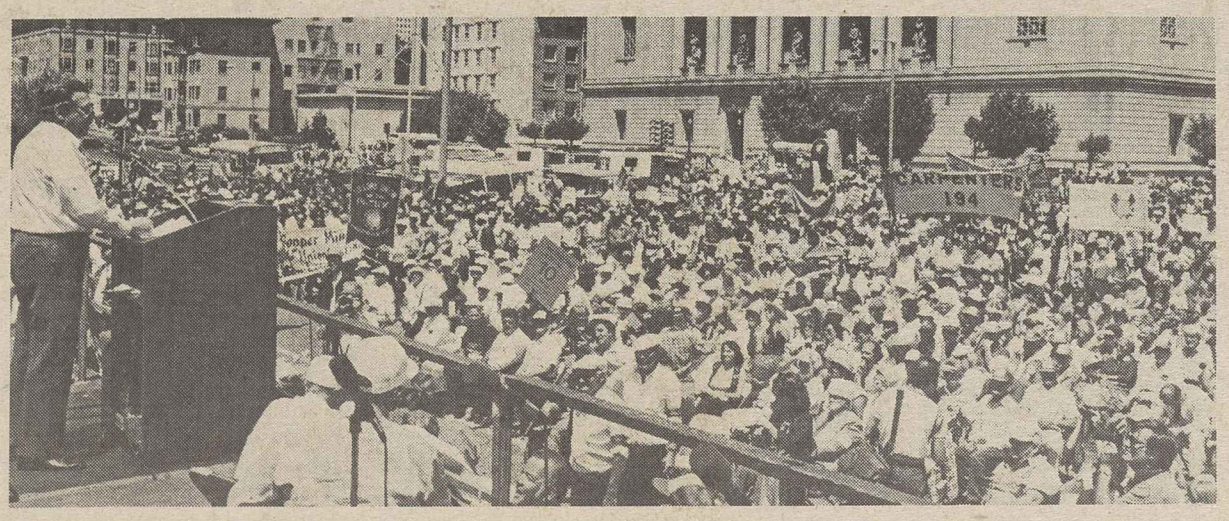


From every trade and profession, unionists carry a message for the Reagan Administration.

Leading the march, California AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. John Henning, Federation President Lane Kirkland and Irena Kirkland.



Union pride runs strong among parading workers and their families.



At rally that caps the march, Kirkland urges unionists to vote for change in November.

istration, in which only the strongest are allowed to succeed.

The American people, with all their diversity, are still a family, Cuomo said. There must be a "sharing of benefits and burdens," he insisted. "The problems of a retired school teacher in Duluth are our problems . . . the hunger of a woman in Little Rock is our hunger."

Democrats "believe in firm but fair law and order," he said, "in the union movement, in privacy for people, openness by government, civil rights and human rights."

In order to unite the nation, "we Democrats must unite," Cuomo urged.

The healing process included prime television time for the two losing candidates to voice the principles that had brought them into the presidential contest and sustained them during the months of primaries and caucuses. And it showed, for both Hart and Jackson, the enthusiasm and loyalty they had inspired in their delegates.

A magnet of unity

By her popularity, Ferraro was herself a magnet for bringing the party together again. In a convention where half the delegates were women, there were many Hart and Jackson supporters who felt that Ferraro's nomination for vice president had made them, too, "winners."

Then, as the balloting confirmed Mondale's victory, came the emotional closing of ranks so essential to a successful campaign. The battle for the nomination was over.

It was "a time to unite," Hart told his supporters. "We must now speak with one voice."

And for Jackson, who had sought to make his campaign a "rainbow coalition," it was "a time to cooperate" and join in a new and broader coalition.

Mondale's acceptance speech — the opening salvo in the campaign — was aimed at Americans who had voted for Ronald Reagan four years ago.

He said bluntly that tax increases will be needed, whichever candidate wins the presidential election, in order to bring down the huge Reagan deficit. Mondale challenged President Reagan "to put his plan on the table next to mine and debate it with me on national television."

On tax policy, Mondale warned, Reagan "will sock it to average-income families again, and leave his rich friends alone. I won't. To the corporations and freeloaders who play the loopholes or pay no taxes, my message is: Your free ride is over."

But Mondale didn't wait for his formal acceptance speech to embrace the unity theme. He came to the convention hall on the night of his nomination to pay tribute to his primary opponents, thank those who had supported him throughout the seesawing campaign, and ask the help of those who supported his opponents.

There was recognition, too, for the candidates for the nomination who withdrew after the early round of primaries. They included three senators—Alan Cranston of California, John Glenn of Ohio and Ernest Hollings of South Carolina—along with George McGovern, the party's 1972 presidential candidate, and former Florida Gov. Reubin Askew.

"It's not just my cause," Mondale stressed. "It's our cause, and we must win it together."

The sea of Mondale-Ferraro buttons and placards the final day of the convention told its own story.

It would still be an uphill fight, the polls indicated. But not nearly as uphill as had once appeared the case.

At labor caucus in San Francisco, COPE Director John Perkins briefs union delegates to the Democratic convention. He spelled out the federation's campaign on voter registration and getting out the union vote.

when trade union solidarity took over, and it provided a "taste of what might be achieved if we simply tried unity for a change," Kirkland said.

At the meeting, which was open to the press, Kirkland told the union delegates—most of whom were attending their first convention—not to be distracted "by all of the gossip, all of the rumors and all of the little alarms" that are a "normal" by-product of the Democratic Party's "proclivity for inventing new quarrels and new arguments when none was necessary."

The brouhaha over the party role of Democratic National Chairman Charles T. Manatt and the campaign role of Bert Lance was in the headlines at the time. The identity of the "spear carriers" is only incidental in the campaign, Kirkland suggested.

But "the burden and the task of leadership and of inspiration will be on the shoulders of Walter Mondale and Gerry Farraro—a strong ticket . . . that is going to win."

Aware of risks

Kirkland told the delegates that the AFL-CIO was well aware that political "opportunists" would seek to exploit a negative view of trade unionism so that "the role of this movement and its right to participate in American life would itself become an issue."

But labor's achievements, Kirkland said, have never depended on the "popularity" of the trade union movement. "We have always struggled for everything we have achieved," he pointed out.

The political slur that the trade union movement does deeply resent, Kirkland said, is that labor is just another narrow special interest. The real special interests, Kirkland said, will be congregating in Dallas next month at the Republican convention.

In sharp contrast, he said, "we speak for those who do the work in this country, and we voice their aspirations." The Democratic Party "can never flourish and can never achieve success if it turns its back on the working people of America," Kirkland declared.

Earlier in the meeting, COPE Director John Perkins spoke to the convention participants and the many union officials on hand for the convention about "Phase Two" of the AFL-CIO's election effort.

Perkins outlined the "one-on-one" voter registration campaign that will rely on union stewards and the volunteers they recruit and train.

One on one

Each volunteer will personally approach —"one on one"—fellow workers whose names are not on a COPE-provided match-up of union membership with voter registration rolls.

The task was well begun in the primary and caucus campaigns, Perkins said, but raising the number of union members eligible to vote is an essential prerequisite for Phase Three—a massive get-out-the-vote campaign among members of affiliated unions in November.

COPE already has distributed kits to be used in the voter registration effort, Perkins said.

The guidelines are differentiated for states and localities that allow voter registration on the job, in union halls and other easily accessible locations, and for those jurisdictions where people seeking to register must go to a courthouse or town hall at specified hours.

Labor leaders stress issues, goals in convention speeches

San Francisco—A cross-section of union leaders was among the speakers at the Democratic national convention, dealing with platform issues and the massive effort needed to put the convention's program in effect and elect its presidential ticket.

AFL-CIO Vice President J. C. Turner, president of the Operating Engineers, spoke as a member of the party's Commission on Platform Accountability, which was set up after the last convention, largely in response to labor concerns.

The commission's report, on which Turner spoke, set up procedures to identify the party's legislative commitments and report on the performance of Democratic members of Congress on the legislative goals. It also incorporates as a permanent "credo" of Democratic principles a commitment to a full-employment economy and "a society where all workers are guaranteed without question the legal right to join unions of their choosing and to bargain collectively."

Other presentations

In other presentations from the convention podium:

● AFL-CIO Vice President Glenn E. Watts, president of the Communications Workers, literally "blew the whistle" on the Reagan Administration.

His piercing blast on a pocket whistle was the opening of an address stressing the distinction between the Democratic Party's economic program and the Administration record. "We must make that distinction clear in the coming campaign," he emphasized.

● AFL-CIO Vice President Gerald W. McEntee, president of the State, County & Municipal Employees, spoke from the convention podium of the damage inflicted by President Reagan's mangling of "human services, education, women's rights and civil rights programs."

● Bricklayers President John T. Joyce, co-chair of the Democratic National Committee's Labor Advisory Council and a federation vice president, warned that Reagan Administration assaults on federal labor law and worker rights threaten a return to "the law of the jungle" in labor-management relations. A Democratic administration is needed to shape a new "compact" for industrial peace, he urged.

● Joyce Miller, in her role as head of the Coalition of Labor Union Women as well as vice president of the AFL-CIO and the Clothing & Textile Workers, spoke of the stake of working women in a Mondale-Ferraro victory. "Never before has the choice between the two parties been so clear," she declared. The Reagan Administration has wiped out hard-won gains while "the Democratic platform addresses the concerns of women."

Another woman member of the AFL-CIO Executive Council, Barbara Hutchinson of the Government Employees, spoke during the platform debate.

● AFL-CIO Vice President Albert Shanker, president of the Teachers, accused the Reagan Administration of cutting back successful programs that have been responsible for raising the test scores of the most disadvantaged students. Such programs should be expanded, not destroyed, Shanker urged.

ecutive Sec.-Treas. John F. Henning of the California AFL-CIO, the leaders of the area central bodies, and state and regional officials of two unaffiliated unions that had key roles in the 1934 strike—the Teamsters and the West Coast Longshoremen.

Presidents of a number of AFL-CIO unions were in San Francisco for the Democratic convention and marched with their local members.

A sea of placards, many of them handmade, left no doubt of the labor movement's unity against the Reagan Administration policies. And proud and happy trade union women made sure that no Walter Mondale for President sign was without its Geraldine Ferraro sticker. The sponsoring groups had intended the celebration as non-partisan, but the buoyant union members chanted their preferences along the parade route.

Continuing battle

At the Civic Center Plaza, where the line of march ended, Kirkland spoke of the battle for trade union rights half a century ago—and of the battle still going on.

Violence against workers exercising their trade union rights was overcome in San Francisco 50 years ago, but it has been faced by hotel strikers in Las Vegas and by Phelps Dodge strikers in Arizona in the present day, he noted.

And throughout the industrial scene, he said, the mission of the new "labor-management consultant" is the same as that of an earlier era's "hired goon." It is "to bust unions and destroy collective bargaining."

Kirkland affirmed labor's demand for "a government that serves the interests of all the people, not just the privileged few."

Ronald Reagan's Administration hasn't provided that government, Kirkland said. "So we must do our duty as trade unionists and as citizens by marching to the polls and voting for our ideals and principles."

Poland halts 'sham' trials of unionists

A Polish military court put off the trial of four leading members of the workers' rights group KOR, a forerunner of Solidarnosc, pending a decision in Poland's parliament on an amnesty for political prisoners.

Announcement of the suspension came in the second day of hearings against the four dissidents in Warsaw. Their trial was branded a "sham" by AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, "an arrogant affront to world public opinion."

Kirkland noted that the trials got under way at the same time that Poland's communist regime was seeking favorable credit terms from the West.

"The Polish government is not entitled by right to any economic favors from the United States," Kirkland said. "The American people will not support any aid to the Polish regimes so long as it scorns their deepest values—which are also those of the Polish people.

"General Jaruzelski obviously believes that democratic resolve throughout the world will flag in the face of his relentless persecution of Polish freedom fighters. He is wrong."

Conspiracy charges

The trials of the four key KOR leaders, began July 13. They had been charged with plotting to overthrow Poland's socialist system by force.

The presiding judge in the case said that in view of the government's announcement on July 17 that there would be a pardon of political prisoners in connection with the 40th anniversary of communist rule in Poland the trials were adjourned. There was still the possibility that the defendants may not be covered by the amnesty, however, because of reported opposition among communist hardliners to dropping the charges.

The amnesty announcement coincided with the conviction of Bogdan Bujak, a former Solidarnosc member, on charges he led an anti-state demonstration. He was given an 18-month jail sentence.

Female professionals show growing support for unions

Female professionals are turning to unions in increasing numbers—a trend that portends vital gains for women workers and a stronger labor movement, a conference sponsored by the AFL-CIO Dept. for Professional Employees concluded.

The three-day session at the George Meany Center for Labor Studies drew some 60 staff members from 16 AFL-CIO affiliates who explored a wide range of issues affecting white-collar women workers, including organizing, pay equity, new technology and sex discrimination.

Gloria Johnson, director of education and women's activities for the Electronic Workers, told the conference that with the surge of women into the workforce—and mostly into "white-collar" jobs—assuring that women workers can organize unions and bargain for fair contracts is critical to the future growth and strength of the entire labor movement.

She pointed out that within the fast-growing category of white-collar jobs, professional and technical jobs are expanding at a rate of about 4 percent a year, and about 63 percent of all white-collar workers are women. There are already more women than men in professional and technical jobs who carry union cards. Johnson chairs the DPE committee on salaried and professional women.

In a keynote address to the conference, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue stressed that one of the major organizing tasks of the labor movement is to "inform female professional and technical workers that through collective bargaining and trade unions the issues of pay equity and career advancement are being addressed."

Working for change

He underscored the importance of working for political change now to clear unfair obstacles to organizing.

AFL-CIO Vice President Barbara Hutchinson scored Reagan Administration policies that have spelled setbacks for women.

Four more years under this Administration could be a disaster for women, Hutchinson warned, pointing out that among other factors, a re-elected President Reagan could appoint as many as five Supreme Court justices, intensifying the conservative grip on the high court that has already meant adverse decisions for all working people.

Hutchinson is the women's department director of the Government Employees.

Ann Nelson of Cornell University's School of Industrial & Labor Relations told the participants that a key to organizing women workers is overcoming the "Lone Ranger" mentality and demonstrating that many goals on the job can be accomplished through the union.

Sharon Stout, also of Cornell, pointed out that in the category of professional and technical jobs—where women are increasingly employed—the win rates in National Labor Relations Board elections have been higher than in any other job category.

Union staff members at the conference also participated in a series of workshops including a panel discussion of key issues in organizing chaired by Lela Forman, director of women's activities for the Communications Workers, with Kerry Korpi of the State, County & Municipal Employees and Sandy Wiesmann of the Teachers.

Focus on communications

A panel on communications was led by Louise Walsh of the DPE with Sandra Porter of the National Commission on Working Women, Nina Roscher of the American Chemical Society and Judy Schub of the National Federation of Business & Professional Women's Clubs.

Miki Yara of the Professional Athletes led a discussion on contract language with Ellen Scully of the Service Employees, President Linda Puchala of the Flight Attendants and Joanne Riggs of AFGE.

New technology was discussed by Ruby Hawkins of the Auto Workers on a panel with Delma Bagley of the Food & Commercial Workers, Kay Peters of the Screen Actors and Roger Newell of AFT, and pay equity was addressed by Attorney Christine Owens.

Court limits workers' rights in choosing bargaining agent

A 4-3 Supreme Court decision involving New Jersey's regulation of its gambling casinos has limited the federally-protected right of workers to choose their own representatives.

At issue in the case was the scope of a 1977 law paving the way for legalized gambling in Atlantic City. It included provisions barring persons with organized crime "associations" from holding office in any union representing casino employees.

Unions covered by the law were required to register with the state's Casino Control Commission. If the commission disqualified a union officer, it could enforce its ban by barring the union from receiving dues from any member employed by a hotel casino or collecting employer payments for pension and welfare funds.

HERE local

Local 54 of the Hotel Employees & Restaurant Employees, which was involved in the case, had represented hotel and food service employees in Atlantic City almost from the turn of the century and bargained for some 12,000 workers, including about 8,000 employed by casino hotels. None of its members was employed in a job directly involving the gambling operations.

A Casino Commission investigation of officers of the local was marked by procedural controversy — in one case over the ability of a terminally ill officer to testify. Another challenged local union officer offered to answer any questions so long as his attorney could be present, but the offer was refused by the authorities.

The commission nevertheless ruled three officers disqualified to serve and barred the union from collecting dues so long as they were in office.

In response to the union's legal challenge the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 3rd Circuit held that the state was precluded from barring the union from functioning as a representative of the casino hotel workers by federal labor law and ERISA, the federal pension reform law.

Decision partially overturned

It was this appellate court decision that the Supreme Court overturned in part.

The four-member Supreme Court majority held that the state could set standards to assure that unions will be free of organized crime influence without infringing on federal labor law. But it sent back for further consideration by the lower courts the determination of whether the dues collection ban would so incapacitate the local as to prevent it from carrying out its bargaining function.

Three dissenting justices asserted that it was obvious that a union that can't collect dues is unable to function effectively and therefore the state law infringes on the federally protected right of the workers to a bargaining agent of their own choosing.

The dissenting opinion was written by Justice Byron R. White, joined by Lewis F. Powell, Jr., and John Paul Stevens.

The prevailing opinion was written by Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, joined by Chief Justice Warren E. Burger, Harry A. Blackmun and William H. Rehnquist.

Two justices—William J. Brennan, Jr., and Thurgood Marshall—did not participate in the case.

Convair pact ends walkout by Machinists

San Diego—The Machinists ended a 13-day strike against General Dynamics Corp.'s Convair division, overwhelmingly approving a new three-year contract.

The new agreement, covering some 4,200 workers at Convair plants here, at Vandenberg Air Force Base, Calif., and Cape Canaveral, Fla., is comparable with others negotiated this year in the aerospace industry, IAM negotiator William Weigand said.

"We took no concessions. We got a settlement and I think we got the company's attention," he said.

Under the contract, employees will receive lump-sum payments equal to 3 percent of pay in each of the first two years of the agreement, followed by a 3-percent general wage increase in the final year. Quarterly cost-of-living adjustments of 1 cent for each three-tenths of a point rise in the consumer price index continue as under the old contract.

Full coverage

Also, the company now will pay the entire cost of medical care coverage. Employees formerly contributed about $10 per pay period. Monthly pension benefits will rise from $14 multiplied by years of service to $16 in the first year and to $18 in 1986. Dental coverage also was increased.

The major sticking points in the strike were the company's insistence on smaller pension improvements and for continued worker contributions for medical coverage.

Weigand said that the contract was ratified by 86 percent of those voting. The old contract expired on Apr. 29, but the parties agreed to keep it in force while negotiations continued.

Convair makes cruise missiles, Centaur rockets and aircraft parts.

Democratic plank endorses national health insurance

The Democratic Party reaffirmed support of comprehensive national health insurance in adopting its 1984 platform, AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman stressed.

In a letter refuting suggestions by Washington Post writers that the platform ignored the issue, Seidman pointed out that the document contains clear and explicit language on the commitment to the health insurance goal.

Seidman's letter quoted from the platform's section on "Economic Justice: Keeping Our Commitments" which specifies under its health section:

Controlling costs

"As Democrats, we believe that quality health care is a necessity for everyone. We reaffirm our commitment to the long-term goal of comprehensive national health insurance and view effective health care cost containment as an essential step toward the goal.

Health cost containment must be based on a strong commitment to quality of service, delivery and care."

The AFL-CIO and the Democratic Party have shared a commitment to national health insurance "since the days of Harry Truman," Seidman emphasized.

The AFL-CIO recognizes, he said, that the first step to enactment of national health insurance is effective health care cost control.

Seidman praised the party's platform for its "recognition of the realities of 1984, which include the need to restore the damage and right the wrongs perpetrated by the Reagan Administration."

The same reaffirmation of commitments—and concern over damage done by the Reagan Administration—are found throughout the Democratic platform's planks on social issues.

AFSCME study finds

Balanced budget plan would stifle economy

A balanced budget constitutional amendment would throw the economy into a tailspin and bring about double-digit unemployment within two years, according to a study commissioned by the State, County & Municipal Employees.

The constitutional amendment proposal, which the House rejected two years ago, is back in the news as conservative sponsors push it as an election-year ploy to take the heat off President Reagan for his succession of record budget deficits.

But if the balanced budget requirement had been written into the Constitution, the last recession would still be with us, according to the study by Data Resources, Inc. And by projection of economic trends, adoption of the amendment in the 1987 fiscal year would throw 5 million people out of jobs within two years.

AFSCME President Gerald W. McEntee said the union commissioned the study because too little attention has been given to the impact of a constitutional balanced budget requirement on the national economy.

"The forecast is frightening," he said.

Taxing restrictions

The projection assumes that the conservative supporters of the amendment will resist any increase in taxes, compelling drastic spending cuts in order to balance revenues and expenditures. And in fact, the congressional resolutions proposing the constitutional amendment also contain restrictions on the taxing authority of Congress.

The study concludes that such an amendment would bring "immediate and severe recession" with record unemployment rates and a loss to the economy of more than a trillion dollars of output over the three years. The report added:

"Without a dismantling of our defense program, social security and other large domestic programs would have to be gutted to cut spending by such an amount. Conversely, without a dismantling of the social security system, our defense program would have to be gutted."

Annual spending cuts of from nearly $300 billion to $400 billion would be needed, the study estimates.

In either event, there would have to be "extraordinarily deep cuts in programs considered essential by the American people." The study warns that "millions of people will lose their jobs, tens of millions of poor and elderly will suffer the loss of reduction of benefits and almost all communities will suffer from lost services and increased taxes."

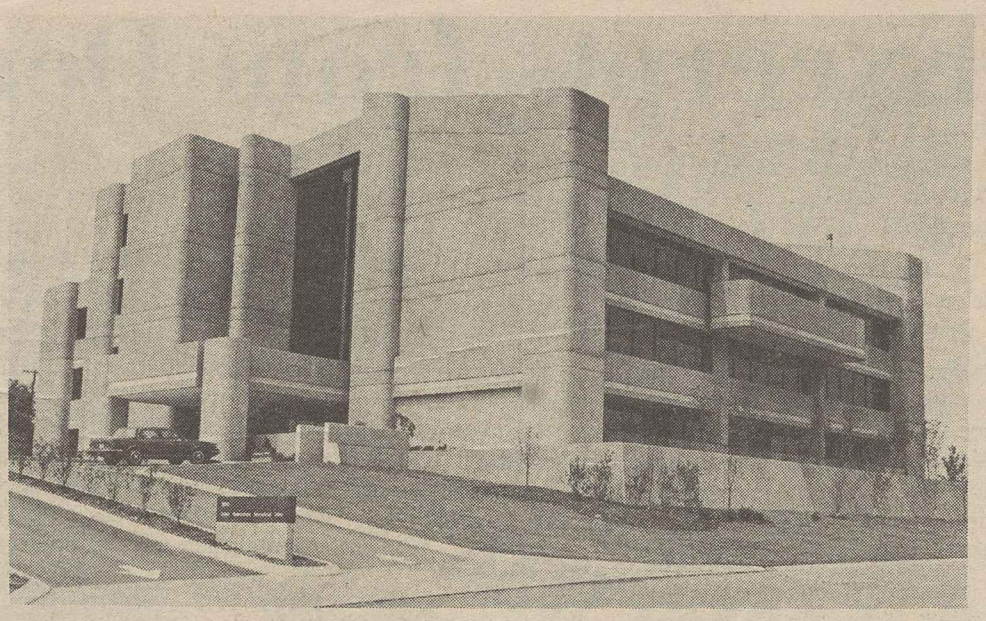
Reduced aid

Another byproduct, the study suggests, would be major reductions in federal aid to state and local governments, forcing cuts in public services. Further, the decline in the economy would reduce state and local tax revenues substantially.

Advocates of a balanced budget amendment have been using the threat of a constitutional convention called by petition of 34 states as a prod to get Congress to initiate the amendment. There is no time limit in the Constitution for the state petitions and 32 states have passed resolutions seeking a constitutional convention, although some of the actions may be subject to challenge.

A discharge petition campaign is under way in the House to force the Judiciary Committee to bring the balanced budget amendment to the floor for a vote.

In a recent letter to House members, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison urged House members not to sign the petition and to oppose such an amendment. "We view this drastic proposal as a serious threat to America's constitutional and economic well-being," Denison said.



New Paperworkers' HQ

Nearly 1,000 members, visitors and guests joined in ceremonies dedicating the Paperworkers' new headquarters building in Nashville, Tenn. The 70,000-square-foot facility featuring a four-story atrium was dedicated during the union's centennial year. UPW President Wayne E. Glenn, at the ribbon-cutting ceremony, pledged to use the structure to enrich "the lives of all our members."

Railroad panel outlines plan to boost unemployment fund

Labor, management and public members of the Railroad Unemployment Compensation Committee reached a qualified consensus on steps needed to strengthen the system's financing.

The disagreement that wasn't resolved was whether the system should remain independent, as the union members urge, or be phased in with the feedral-state unemployment system that covers most other workers, as management wants.

There is unanimous agreement, however, that the Reagan Administration's proposal for merging the two systems should not be enacted.

The committee, set up by Congress last year as part of legislation dealing with funding of the Railroad Retirement System, is headed by the public member, Robert J. Myers, who had been director of the National Commission on Social Security Reform.

Myers sided with the two union members—President Richard I. Kilroy of the Railway & Airline Clerks and President John F. Sytsma of the unaffiliated Locomotive Engineers—on the desirability of maintaining an independent system that would continue to cover both unemployment and sickness benefits for railroad workers.

The two employer members, while favoring a merger, joined in the consensus recommendations that were proposed on the assumption that an independent system will be continued.

The consensus plan covers the technicalities of fund transfers, loans and repayment between the retirement account and the unemployment insurance account, both of which are administered by the Railroad Retirement Board.

It calls for indexing of the wage base on which the railroad unemployment insurance tax is paid, a surcharge when the reserves are at a low level, and a federal one-time grant of $135 million which is described as equalization for "past preferential treatment given to the state unemployment insurance systems."

UAW hails formaldehyde ruling

Detroit—The Auto Workers welcomed a federal court decision on formaldehyde because it "supports our belief that the politically oriented leadership of OSHA (Occupational Safety & Health Administration) has violated its duty to protect workers against job hazards."

Dr. Frank Mirer, director of the UAW health and safety department, said, "We're happy the judge agreed with the point we have been making all along—that OSHA failed to treat our petition according to the law, and he came very close to saying what we have said that the decision not to provide workers protection against formaldehyde was politically motivated."

The U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia in its July 2 ruling ordered OSHA to reconsider its denial of a petition by the UAW and 14 other unions for an emergency standard on formaldehyde.

The rulings, by Judge John Lewis Smith, also directed OSHA to reconsider its decision to refrain from initiating permanent rulemaking proceedings.

The UAW's suit had requested that the court order OSHA to implement an emergency standard and begin rulemaking. Mirer said the judge should have gone farther and ordered the emergency standard and added, "The UAW will continue to pursue every means of insuring that Reagan's OSHA acts responsibly and complies with its stated goal of protecting the health and safety of workers."

The 15 unions petitioned OSHA in October 1981 for an emergency standard, citing evidence that formaldehyde may pose a cancer risk to humans. In January 1982, OSHA rejected the petition on the basis that it felt workers were not exposed to a "grave danger" in using formaldehyde, a condition which must be met in setting such emergency measures.

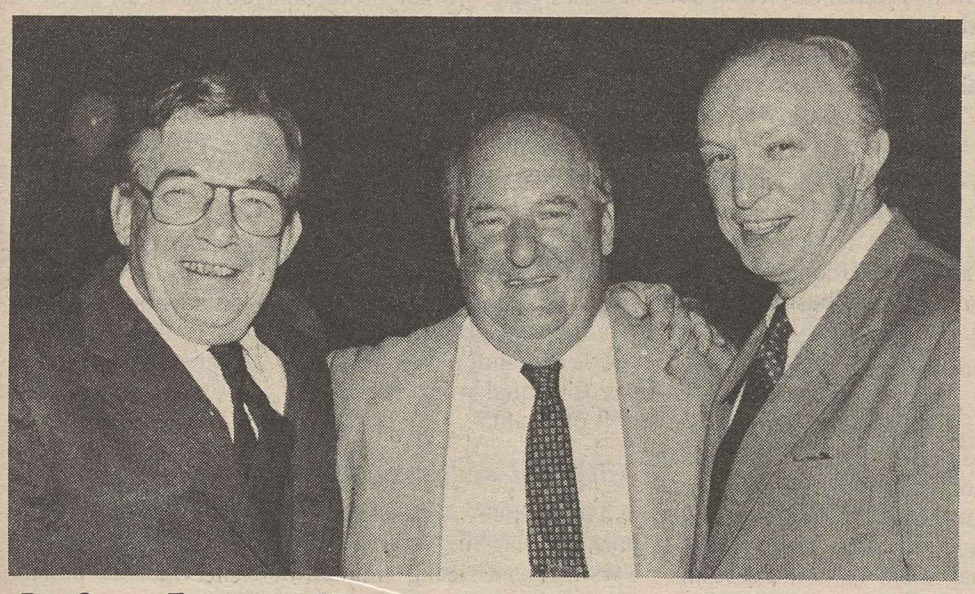
Judge Smith scored the agency's two-page denial letter for its many deficiencies. He also pointed to the nearly two-year period of the suit and the court's mandate to review the agency decision in light of its "record" on formaldehyde as of the time of the court suit.

"It is difficult to see how the statutory scheme would be advanced by either judicial order compelling OSHA to issue an emergency standard or a judicial blessing of OSHA's two-page denial," Judge Smith wrote, adding that "however, delay and doctrine should not allow OSHA to sidestep the serious questions posed by employee exposure to formaldehyde, nor avoid its obligation to adequately explain its actions."

Workers at risk

OSHA has estimated that 2.6 million workers are exposed to formaldehyde on the job. The pungent gas is usually marketed in water solutions and is used by wood preservers, embalming fluid workers, textile printers and anatomists and biologists. It is also used in products such as textiles, adhesives, foam insulation, fungicides, air fresheners, cosmetics, medicinals and toothpastes. It is a possible carcinogen in humans, associated with nasal cancers.

OSHA's standard currently limits exposure to 3 parts of formaldehyde per million parts of air, and was adopted for toxic effects other than cancer.



A fond goodbye

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and Sec.-Treas. Thomas Donahue congratulate Tom Moran, Donahue's assistant, on his retirement June 30 after 43 years of service to the federation and one of its predecessor organizations, the CIO. Over that span Moran worked for John L. Lewis, Philip Murray, George Meany and William Schnitzler besides Kirkland and Donahue. Among other duties, he was the federation's personnel manager and convention coordinator. During his career, he organized and led CIO Office Employees Local 1695, and he was active in the Maryland/D.C. AFL-CIO and in COPE.

1985 Democracy Endowment funds put to conferees

The issue of funding for the new National Endowment for Democracy will be taken up by a House-Senate Conference Committee when Congress returns from its recess, July 23, and the AFL-CIO is rallying grass-roots support.

Legislative Director Ray Denison urged state and city central labor bodies to press their congressional delegations to back the highest funding level possible for the Endowment.

A federally financed, nonprofit organization, the Endowment was established by Congress to promote the evolution of democratic institutions—including free trade unions — in developing countries. The AFL-CIO Free Trade Union Institute is a participating organization.

The House recently voted to eliminate fiscal 1985 funding for the Endowment while the Senate voted to slash funding by $10 million to $21.3 million. The House-Senate conference committee must reconcile the differences between the two measures.

Denison, in calling for renewed lobbying for the funding measure, described the work of the Endowment and the Free Trade Union Institute as "an important endeavor."

Excerpts from Democratic Platform

Following are excerpts from the Democratic Party Platform adopted July 17, 1984, at the party's national convention in San Francisco.

A fundamental choice awaits America—a choice between two futures.

It is a choice between solving our problems, and pretending they don't exist; between the spirit of community, and the corrosion of selfishness; between justice for all, and advantage for some; between social decency and social Darwinism; between expanding opportunity and contracting horizons; between diplomacy and conflict; between arms control and an arms race; between leadership and alibis.

America stands at a crossroads.

Move in one direction, and the President who appointed James Watt will appoint the Supreme Court majority for the rest of the century. The President who proposed deep cuts in social security will be charged with rescuing Medicare. The President who destroyed the Environmental Protection Agency will decide whether toxic dumps get cleaned up. The President who fought the Equal Rights Amendment will decide whether women get fair pay for their work. The President who launched a covert war in Central America will determine our human rights policy. The President who abandoned the Camp David process will oversee Middle East policy. The President who opposed every nuclear arms control agreement since the bomb went off will be entrusted with the fate of the earth.

We offer a different direction.

For the economy, the Democratic Party is committed to economic growth, prosperity, and jobs. For the individual, we are committed to justice, decency, and opportunity. For the nation, we are committed to peace, strength, and freedom.

The Republican Administration has turned its back on basic industries and their communities. Instead of putting forward policies to help revitalize and adjust, Mr. Reagan tells blameless, anxious, displaced workers to abandon their neighborhoods and homes and "vote with their feet."

America's economic strength was built on basic industries. Today, in a changing economy, they are no less important. Strong basic industries are vital to our economic health and essential to our national security. And as major consumers of high technology, they are catalysts for growth in newly emerging fields. We need new approaches to ensure strong American basic industries for the remainder of this century and beyond.

Adequate roads and bridges, mass transit, water supply and sewage treatment facilities, and ports and harbors are essential to economic growth. For four years, the Reagan Administration has refused to confront adequately the growing problems in our infrastructure. Another term will bring four more years of negligence and neglect.

An America at work is a moral obligation as well as the most effective way to return our economy to a high growth path. Employed people stimulate the economy, their taxes pay for the expenses of government and their production adds to our national wealth. Moreover, the social and economic fabric of the nation will be strengthened as millions of Americans who presently are frozen out of productive and dignified employment become contributing citizens.

Full employment pledge

A Democratic Administration will pursue economic policies which provide the basis for long-term economic growth and will allow us to fulfill our commitment to jobs for all Americans who want to work. A key part of the effort will be reducing and eventually eliminating the deficits that currently form a dark cloud over the nation's future. In addition, monetary policy must be set with an eye to stability and to the strengths or weaknesses of the economy. Finally, we will pursue policies that will promote price stability and prevent inflation from breaking out again.

Ronald Reagan's tax program gave huge breaks to wealthy individuals and to large corporations while shifting the burden to low and moderate income families. The Democratic Party is pledged to reverse these unsound policies.

We will cap the effect of the Reagan tax cuts for wealthy Americans and enhance the progressivity of our personal income tax code, limiting the benefits of the third year of the Reagan tax cuts to the level of those with incomes of less than $60,000. We will partially defer indexation while protecting average Americans. We will close loopholes, eliminate the preferences and write-offs, exemptions, and deductions which skew the code toward the rich and toward unproductive tax shelters. Given the fact that there has been a veritable hemorrhage of capital out of the federal budget, reflected in part by the huge budget deficit, there must be a return to a fair tax on corporate income.

Social security is one of the most important and successful initiatives in the history of our country, and it is an essential element of the social compact that binds us together as a community. There is no excuse—as the Reagan Administration has repeatedly suggested—for slashing social security to pay for excesses in other areas of the budget. We will steadfastly oppose such efforts, now and in the future.

Help for education

Today, education in America needs help. But, the Reagan Administration offers misleading homilies about the importance of education while aggressively slashing education programs.

This is intolerable. We know that every dollar we invest in education is ultimately returned to us six-fold. We know that the education of our citizens is critical to our democracy.

There are four key goals that a Democratic program for educational excellence must address: strengthening local capacity to innovate and progress in public education and encourage parental involvement; renewing our efforts to ensure that all children, whatever their race, income, or sex have a fair and equal chance to learn; attracting the most talented young people into teaching and enabling them to remain and develop in their profession; and ensuring that all American families can send their children on to college or advanced training.

America cannot successfully compete in the world economy if a significant portion of our future work force is illiterate, unskilled, and unemployable.

The Democratic Party must give our young people new skills and new hope; we must work hand in hand with the private sector if job training is to lead to jobs. Specifically, targeted efforts are needed to address the urgent problem of unemployment among minority teenagers. We must provide job training for those who have dropped out of school, and take every step to expand educational opportunity for those still in school. We must recognize the special needs of the over-age-50 worker and the displaced homemaker. Through education, training and retraining we must reduce these dangerously high levels of unemployment.

Trade and industrial policies

A healthy U.S. auto industry is essential to a strong trade balance and economy. That industry generates a large number of American jobs and both develops and consumes new technology needed for economic vitality. We believe it is a sound principle of international trade for foreign automakers which enjoy substantial sales in the United States to invest here and create jobs where their markets are. This can promote improved trade relations and a stronger American and world economy.

We also believe U.S. auto makers need to maintain high-volume small car production in the U.S. With the U.S. auto companies' return to profitability (despite continued unemployment in the auto sector), we urge expanded domestic investment to supply consumers with a full range of competitive vehicles. We support efforts by management and labor to improve auto quality and productivity, and to restrain prices.

Where foreign competition is fair, American industry should compete without government assistance. Where competition is unfair, we must respond powerfully. We will use trade law and international negotiations to aid U.S. workers, farmers, and businesses injured by unfair trade practices.

We need industrial strategies to create a cooperative partnership of labor, capital, and management to increase productivity and to make America competitive once more. Our keystone industries must be modernized and rebuilt, through industry-wide agreements. Where necessary, through presidential leadership, we must negotiate industrial modernization and growth agreements that commit management to new domestic investment, higher levels of employment and worker training, as well as commit labor to ease the introduction of new technologies.

There must be a broad consensus and commitment among labor, business and financial institutions that industry should and can be assisted, and in a particular way. We believe that all parties to modernization agreements must contribute to their success and that the government must be prepared to use a range of tools—including tax, import, and regulatory relief, and appropriate financing mechanisms—to assist this revitalization. There should be a primary emphasis on private capital in any such agreements.

We will restore a strong Equal Employment Opportunity Commission and renew the commitment of the Department of Justice and the Department of Labor to enforce civil rights laws and executive orders. A Democratic Administration will, by vigorously enforcing laws and strengthening education and training opportunities, increase minority participation in the workplace and eliminate wage inequities which leave minorities at the bottom of the pay scale.

We will insist on pay equity for women. Today, white women who can find work earn, on average, only 62 cents for every dollar earned by white men. Black women earn only 58 cents for every dollar earned by white men, and Hispanic women only 56 cents. The earnings gap—and the occupational segregation of women which it reflects—extends to all women at every educational level, but is most pronounced among black and other women of color who are confronted by historical and contemporary racial barriers which transcend sex.

The Democratic Party defines nondiscrimination to encompass both equal pay for equal work and equal pay for work of comparable worth, and we pledge to take every step, including enforcement of current law and amending the Constitution to include the unamended ERA, to close the wage gap.

Labor law reforms

This nation established a labor policy more than a generation ago whose purpose is to encourage collective bargaining and the right of workers to organize to obtain this goal. The Democratic Party is committed to extending the benefit of this policy to all workers and to removing the barriers to its administration.

To accomplish this, the Democratic Party supports: the repeal of Section 14b of the National Labor Relations Act; labor law reform legislation; a prohibition on the misuse of federal bankruptcy law to prevent the circumvention of the collective bargaining process and the destruction of labor-management contracts; and legislation to allow building trades workers the same peaceful picketing rights currently afforded industrial workers.

We support the right of public employees and agricultural workers to organize and bargain collectively, and we will act to assure that right. Inasmuch as farm workers are excluded from coverage under the National Labor Relations Act, the Democratic Party recognizes the heroic efforts of farm workers to gain contracts and their right under the law to use boycotts as an effective tool to achieve such ends. We must restore to federal workers their First Amendment rights by reforming the Hatch Act. We must also protect federal and private sector workers from invasions of their privacy by prohibiting the use of polygraphs and other "truth test" devices.

In addition, the Mine Health Safety Act and the Occupational Health and Safety Act must be properly administered, with the concern of the worker being the highest priority. All efforts to weaken or undermine OSHA's basic worker protection provisions, or to shirk the duty to enforce them, are unacceptable and intolerable. For the victims of occupational disease, we insist on legislation to assure just compensation and adequate health care for these workers as well as vigorous enforcement action by OSHA to eradicate the causes of occupational disease.

All fair labor standards acts, such as the minimum wage and Davis-Bacon protections, must be effectively enforced. We reject the so-called "subminimum wage" as an appropriate tool of social or economic policy. We strongly oppose workfare which penalizes welfare recipients and undercuts the basic principle of equal pay for equal work. Workfare is not a substitute for a jobs program.

National security

There is no higher goal for the Democratic Party than assuring the national security of the United States. This means a strong national defense, vigorous pursuit of nuclear arms control, and a foreign policy dedicated to advancing the interests of America and the forces of freedom and democracy in a period of global transformation.

This will require new leadership, strong alliances, skillful diplomacy, effective economic cooperation, and a foreign policy sustained by American strength and ideals. And to hold the support of the American people, our leaders must also be careful and measured in the use of force.

The Beginning of Victory

THIS IS just the beginning. These are just the first fruits of political solidarity in action, and I am convinced that it will be the pattern of our political work in the future.

The burden and the task of leadership and of inspiration will be on the shoulders of two people . . . Walter Mondale and Gerry Ferraro. That is a strong ticket that represents and stands for the best ideals and aspirations of this country. And that ticket is going to win.

It has been a tough struggle. We anticipated that it would be a tough struggle at our convention last year, when we began the (endorsement) process we went through—starting with a thorough canvass of the feelings and views of the membership on the part of every affiliate of the AFL-CIO.

That canvass went on for months before the question was presented to the most representative body in the Constitution of the AFL-CIO, our General Board—a General Board enhanced not only by the presence of national and international union officers, but by the presence of representatives of state federations and city central labor bodies. Then it was put to the ultimate resolution and recommendation of the convention.

WE KNEW the job would not be easy, and we knew that the role of American trade unionism—the role of this movement of ours and its right to participate in American life—would in itself become an issue. The cold opportunists amongst those in politics would seek to exploit any negative view of trade unionism in this country that we have suffered and labored under all these years to their advantage. We expected that, and we knew that, in the last analysis, our chances for success did not depend upon the popularity of organized labor in American life.

We have always struggled for everything we have achieved in a relatively hostile public environment. That is a fact that we simply have to live with. There are ways in which we can be popular: Sell out our members. That would make us very popular with some segments. But because we stand and fight for our members, because we sometimes have to do those things which inconvenience the public or are misportrayed in the press, popularity is not likely to ever be the lot of the trade unionist.

We know that we speak for one of the broadest interests, one of the broadest bodies of the American people. We speak for those who do the work in this country, and we voice their aspirations. And this party in particular, this party meeting in convention here, can never flourish and can never achieve success if it turns its back on the working people of America.

That's why we're here: to see that they don't.

EARLY ON, the popular wisdom was that it would all be over after a few states had their primaries and caucuses. And we're sometimes as big a damn fool as anyone else. We tended to believe that. We stressed our efforts in the earlier states and just did not pay sufficient attention to those that were later on down the line. We had to do a fast recovery under the most adverse circumstances.

There was a time when I'm sure we all felt like the crew on a ship that was anchored off a lee shore with the engine down, a gale coming up and the anchor dragging. We just had to find a little bit of good holding ground until we could get that steam back up. We did find that holding ground, just long enough to get our steam back up and get those engines going and get back on the road to victory.

And that's a tribute to you. In our most difficult period, when the outlook was the bleakest and it looked as though we might be headed for the rocks, nowhere in the trade union movement did I ever hear of a single person who ever lost heart and said we ought to abandon ship and forget the whole thing.

There was resolve and a recommitment and a greater determination, and that's what brought us to where we are today. That's what's going to bring us victory in November this year.

—AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland at union member-delegates caucus, Democratic National Convention, July 16, 1984, San Francisco, Calif.

Several million jobless shut out from benefits

By Press Associates, Inc.

The Labor Dept.'s encouraging news that the nation's unemployment rate dropped to 7.1 percent in June was accompanied by discouraging news for the millions of jobless Americans.

Of the 8.6 million jobless people who are supposed to be covered by the unemployment insurance program, only 2.5 million are receiving jobless benefits—fewer than 30 percent. More than 6 million unemployed workers aren't getting the benefits.

This is the lowest percentage of unemployed receiving benefits in the nearly 50-year history of the federal-state jobless insurance system, the Center on Budget & Policy Priorities noted in an analysis based on Labor Dept. statistics.

While the nation's unemployment rate has declined sharply from the postwar records set by the Reagan Recession, today there are more unemployed workers without jobless benefits than during the worst of the recession. In November 1982, 5.9 million jobless workers received no compensation. In June 1984, 6.1 million of the unemployed received no benefits.

The problem lies mostly with the budget cuts pressed by the newly elected Reagan Administration and passed by Congress in 1981.

Reagan-imposed restrictions

Just before the economy began sinking into its deepest and longest recession since World War II, jobless benefits were cut in duration and new eligibility restrictions were imposed. Specifically, the formula for triggering extended benefits within a state was radically altered.

An example of the unfairness and irrationality of the new formula is West Virginia, whose extended benefit program triggered "off" in April despite a state jobless rate approaching 16 percent. Currently only two states, Idaho and Alaska, provide extended benefits.

To make matters worse, many states imposed new eligibility rules and cut back benefits as their recession-battered trust funds sank into the red and had to borrow from the federal Treasury at high interest rates.

Because of cutbacks and inflation, there has been a 35-percent erosion in buying power of jobless insurance payments to long-term jobless workers over the past 10 years. The average weekly payment in 1983 was $120 a week—only 40 percent of average wages in industries covered by the system.

Bleak picture

While the overall June unemployment rate is the lowest since April 1980, the picture is considerably gloomier for the long-term jobless than it was four years ago. In June, the number of long-term unemployed—those out of work over six months—held steady at 1.6 million, up nearly one million over April 1980.

Also, the number of workers too discouraged about the job market to look for work, and not counted in the official jobless rate, has held at about 1.3 million since the beginning of the year, up 340,000 since April 1980.

Organized labor long has urged Congress to enact a permanent program of federal supplemental benefits with a maximum duration of 65 weeks. It has said that state triggers either should be eliminated or total unemployment, not insured unemployment, should be used as the trigger.

Labor also has suggested a system of federal reinsurance to help state trust funds meet extraordinary costs of high unemployment.

Finally, labor has called for federal minimum benefit standards. Meanwhile, it has urged states to remove harsh eligibility provisions and to restore, if not increase, weekly benefit amounts and benefit duration periods.

Many of those without benefits have been twice victimized—first by the Reagan Recession and then by the Reagan cutbacks. They need help.

ACTWU Health & Safety Director Eric Frumin shows reporters the type of paper dust mask OSHA wants to require asbestos workers to wear instead of mandating that companies meet more effective clean air standards.

Proposed asbestos limits hit as allowing 'needless deaths'

Excessive levels of exposure to asbestos that the Reagan Administration would permit will lead to "untold needless deaths," the Clothing & Textile Workers warned.

Testifying at Occupational Safety & Health Administration hearings, ACTWU Safety Director Eric Frumin said the proposed standard's exposure limits are inadequate to protect workers from asbestos-caused cancer and lung disease in workers and members of their families.

Frumin, who called the proposal "a fraud," also assailed OSHA's plan to offer employers the option of making paper dust masks the primary workplace exposure control device instead of engineering controls to clean asbestos-laden air.

The Reagan OSHA proposal caters to employer pressures for the use of disposable respirators instead of engineering controls and is "a cruel hoax, completely at odds with the accepted definition of permissible exposure limits" in the medical, scientific and legal communities, Frumin asserted.

Disease victims

In his testimony at the OSHA hearings, and at a news conference beforehand, Frumin introduced three ACTWU members suffering from asbestosis, two of whom have worn the paper respirators.

James Simmons, 68, one of hundreds of asbestosis and cancer victims who worked at the now defunct UNARCO plant in Paterson, N.J., told the agency that after the asbestos plant closed in 1954, signs of the diseases began showing up in workers as years passed. Simmons, who is now totally disabled from the disease, said he helped initiate the series of medical examinations conducted by Dr. Irving J. Selikoff of Mt. Sinai School of Medicine which formed the basis of the doctor's landmark study that identified asbestos as an extremely dangerous job hazard.

Shirley Thomas, 45, of Charleston, S.C., still employed at R. M. Industrial Products Co., testified that she breathes in asbestos daily on the job even though she wears a respirator.

Thomas said she continues to work at the plant in spite of her illness because she knows she could not pass a physical for a job elsewhere, and she needs the medical benefits she receives.

The respirator . . . "did not stop the dust from getting into my nostrils and my mouth, and spreading into my lungs," Thomas said, describing herself as "victim of a lie . . . a victim of the respirator, too."

Branded a gimmick

Earlier in the same OSHA hearings, which began June 19, the AFL-CIO and a number of its affiliates scored the proposed asbestos standard as having "nothing to do with worker protection," instead serving as "merely a public relations gimmick."

Although the proposed standard would lower the exposure limit from the current 2 million fibers per cubic meter to somewhere between 200,000 to 500,000 fibers, the AFL-CIO and its affiliates want an exposure limit of no more than 100,000 fibers.

Labor also wants a 50,000-fiber level to trigger medical surveillance, a separate standard for the construction industry and requirements that engineering and work practice controls will be the primary means for control.

Frumin charged that the proposed OSHA standard fails to provide any requirements for regular plant monitoring of asbestos dust levels, for worker education or for medical examinations in spite of evidence that the substance is known to be dangerous "in the most minute amounts."

Unions leave table

Postal talks stymied by pay freeze demand

All four unions representing nearly 600,000 employees of the Postal Service broke off contract talks, and vowed to stay away from the bargaining table until management began negotiating "in a meaningful way."

President Vincent Sombrotto of the Letter Carriers and President Moe Biller of the Postal Workers, the two largest unions, said that USPS "has not gotten off dead center yet on the economic garbage they handed us."

Sombrotto added: "We've given them an ultimatum. The ball is in their court."

The two unions bargain together for one contract. Two other unions, the Mail Handlers division of the Laborers and the unaffiliated Rural Letter Carriers, bargain with the USPS for separate contracts. The joint APWU-NALC contract covers over 500,000 workers and constitutes the largest single collective bargaining agreement in the country.

The major sticking point in the negotiations has been the Postal Service's demand for a three-year wage freeze for current employees and a one-third reduction in the scale for newly hired workers. There are also differences among the parties over a cost-of-living adjustment.

Wage package

The APWU and the NALC have proposed wage and benefit increases totaling more than 10 percent in the first year of a three-year contract and 4 percent in each of the second and third years.

"They've got to come up with something in terms of money or working conditions," Biller said as talks broke off.

Sombrotto said that if USPS negotiators did not make "the first move" toward serious bargaining on the economic issues before current contracts expire at 12:01 a.m., July 21, the only two courses of action would be binding arbitration or a strike.

If the dispute were to go to arbitration, a federal fact-finding panel would be set up to study the impasse for 45 days. Sombrotto and Biller said they would delay any decision about a strike or arbitration until members could vote to authorize such actions at their annual conventions on Aug. 19.

Bargaining began on Apr. 24, but no significant progress had been made since then. Management's attitude all along has been that workers should be required to make concessions.

Biller, the APWU's chief negotiator, said "there is no reason whatsoever for givebacks," and observed:

"The Postal Service remains profitable and healthy and there is every reason to believe that it will continue to be so. The men and women who work for the service are responsible in part for this enviable financial position, and they deserve to share in the good times."

Management's claim

A major issue separating the parties is management's claim that Postal Service employees make substantially more than private-sector workers doing comparable work.

The average postal worker now earns $23,238 in basic salary, plus about $4,500 in premium pay and benefits.

"When you compare us with union workers in major companies, our pay is very reasonable," Sombrotto observed.

"If management wants to reach an agreement, they must tear up their economic proposal and put a serious one on the table," Biller and Sombrotto said. "We have told them before, and we'll tell them again—there will be no givebacks, cuts, or concessions of any kind."

Since 1971, when the Postal Service was established, postal employees have had the right to bargain through their unions for wages and benefits.

Consumer boycott pressed against big poultry processor

The AFL-CIO called on consumers to boycott turkeys processed by the Marval Poultry Co., in support of a seven-week-old strike against the Virginia firm.

The strike by some 600 poultry workers, represented by Food & Commercial Workers Local 400, began on June 4 after their contract expired. Marval, the world's largest turkey processor, handles 200 million pounds a year.

"The key issue in the strike is working conditions," Local 400 President Thomas McNutt told a Washington news conference. "The conditions there are incredible."

The Landover, Md.-based local and Marval enjoyed harmonious relations for nearly 30 years until the firm was bought in 1981 by Rocco Enterprises, a Virginia food conglomerate. Working conditions have deteriorated to the point where the safety and health of the workers are endangered, McNutt said.

Eight Marval workers at the news conference described the oppressive and intolerable conditions brought on by speedups on the production line. McNutt termed the conditions a "return to the days of the industrial dark ages," and charged Rocco's plan is to destroy the union.

"We believe that informed consumers, armed with the facts about how Marval imposes oppressive working conditions on its employees, will refuse to buy Marval products," UFCW President William H. Wynn said in a statement read by McNutt. Wynn declared that the Marval workers' struggle for basic human dignity "is our fight as well."

28 brand names

Marval products — turkeys, turkey breasts and turkey rolls—are sold under 28 brand names primarily in grocery chain stores east of the Mississippi, with the major market centered along the East Coast. Some of the brands are Marval, Manor House, Esskay and Rockingham.

Workers reported that conditions inside the plant at Dayton, Va., are so poor and work rules so stringent that many are not allowed to leave the production line to go to the bathroom or receive medical attention. The local said that the accident rate has nearly tripled since Rocco took over the plant.

Seventy percent of Marval's workforce is made up of women earning between $5 and $5.60. an hour.

Hospital strikers fight 'givebacks'

New York—Nearly 50,000 members of District 1199 of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union remain on strike against 71 hospitals and nursing homes in New York City and Long Island and no new bargaining sessions are scheduled.

The strike began July 13, two weeks after the old contracts expired, and involves primarily orderlies, technicians, nurses' aides, housekeepers and clerks. At five of the non-profit private hospitals that belong to the League of Voluntary Hospitals & Homes, nurses represented by District 1199 have struck in sympathy with their fellow workers.

District 1199 Treas. Telbert King explained that the League, along with the Association of Voluntary Nursing Homes, is seeking severe changes in the contract that amount to benefit "givebacks" and the two sides also remain far apart on economic issues.

King said the hospitals and nursing homes want to assert subcontracting rights, increase the probationary period while lowering probationary pay, eliminate longevity steps, halve the training fund contribution and pay benefit costs on a flat rate rather than a percentage basis.

The union is pressing for a 10-percent annual wage increase, a guarantee of every other weekend off, and language changes in other clauses.

Independents struck, too

Besides the walkouts against members of the two industry groups, several independent nursing homes were struck on July 16.

The hospitals and nursing homes are continuing to operate using non-union staff on 12-hour shifts, augmented by volunteers and relatives of the patients.

King said the union has an emergency committee on each picket line and should an emergency occur, the hospital administrators need only ask for help and the pickets will return to work to cover the emergency.

The hospitals have pressed for the New York state health commissioner, David Axelrod, to stipulate how much the state would underwrite any agreement by providing for higher rates under Medicaid and Blue Cross. Those insurance programs, with Medicare, provide about 95 percent of all hospital income.

New York Gov. Mario Cuomo, upon returning from the Democratic National Convention in San Francisco, said the state would not "guarantee" any wage increases for the hospital workers as it had in past contract negotiations.

The Cuomo Administration pointed to the new hospital reimbursement system as providing for prospective increases for the workers of 6.5 percent the first year and 6.2 percent the second.

The hospitals, however, have offered increases of only 4 percent annually. The union noted that delays in applying the increases each year and other "givebacks" would reduce the management wage offer to only 2.3 percent.

OSHA recess appointment sparks wide protest

By Arlee C. Green

President Reagan's recess appointment of Robert A. Rowland to head the Occupational Safety & Health Administration ignited a storm of protest in the Senate.

In expressing serious reservations about Rowland's qualifications, several senators decried Reagan's maneuver to bypass the Senate confirmation process to fill a job critical to the health and safety of workers.

The AFL-CIO branded Rowland "completely unqualified" to fill the key position.

Reagan sent his nomination of Rowland, who was chairman of the Occupational Safety & Health Review Commission, to the Senate for confirmation on June 28, one day before it recessed for the Democratic convention.

But three days before the Senate was to reconvene, the White House announced Rowland would receive a recess appointment, effective July 20. The maneuver would allow him to hold office through the 1985 session of Congress.

Sen. Donald W. Riegle (D-Mich.) charged that "enforcement of worker safety and health laws has suffered greatly under this Administration's agenda of regulatory abdication. In replacing a management consultant with a management lawyer, President Reagan has continued his frequent practice of placing people in these types of positions who do not enforce the law. America's workers should condemn this appointment."

Riegle cited Rowland's "limited and controversial experience in the field of occupational safety and health," and said a "thorough public review of his record is essential." He charged that Reagan's action avoids "the Senate's careful consideration of his nominee's qualifications."

Riegle termed Rowland's lack of experience "disturbing" and said a review of the record Rowland compiled as OSHRC chairman "should concern all citizens even more."

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) termed the appointment "a disservice to Postal Workers President Moe Biller, left, and Letter Carriers President Vincent Sombrotto prior to the breakdown of contract talks with the USPS.

Postal Service assailed on union-busting tactic

The Postal Workers and Letter Carriers denounced as outrageous the U.S. Postal Service's plans to unilaterally set up a two-tier wage scale that would slash wages for new hires to 23 percent below the current level.

APWU President Moe Biller called the move "a provocative, union-busting tactic," and NALC President Vincent Sombrotto warned that "it's not going to work, you can bet on that."

Sombrotto, in a bulletin to members, pointed out that "union members carried this Postal Service on their backs when times were tough, and now when there's a fat surplus they have the nerve to try to destroy the contract for new employees."

The move, which is supposed to affect workers hired after Aug. 4, "heightens the tensions" in the current contract talks between the USPS and four postal unions, the APWU said. Biller warned that the action "is a clear signal that the Postal Service and the Reagan Administration are out to push postal workers and their unions to the wall."

The new two-tier wage scale was one of the major reasons the postal unions walked out of negotiations last weekend, allowing contracts covering some 600,000 USPS workers to expire. The agency has also insisted on a three-year wage freeze for all employees.

Union negotiators refused to accede to management's demands, and the old agreements expired at midnight on July 20. In announcing the new wage plan, USPS said it was free to impose unilateral changes on its workers because the former contracts had lapsed.

But the unions said their lawyers are reviewing the move with an eye to a possi-

Mondale tax stand challenges Reagan on credibility issue

By David L. Perlman

Walter F. Mondale positioned himself firmly in the American mainstream as he made the transition from contender for the Democratic nomination to his party's candidate for President of the United States.

In this election, Democrats aren't about to let a Republican Administration spawned by right-wing ideologues take over the political middle ground by default.

President Reagan has already tried to smear his political opponents as un-American. They're "so far left, they've left America," Reagan said in a Texas campaign speech.

Mondale's acceptance speech, like his selection of Geraldine A. Ferraro as the vice presidential candidate, was a bold departure from conventional politics.

The stakes were high. Except for a presidential debate, which still is not certain, it was likely to be the largest television audience Mondale will have for a major campaign address.

Sea of flags

The convention arena, where so many impassioned speeches had been delivered, provided a colorful backdrop—a sea of American flags waved by enthusiastic delegates. For a warmup, there was the genuine excitement of the history-making nomination of Geraldine Ferraro and her acceptance speech.

Mondale addressed his speech to the voters he must win over—those skeptical of politicians and campaign promises, the sometime Democrats who voted for Ronald Reagan four years ago.

There was no secret about Reagan's re-election strategy. The President and his surrogates would seek a rerun of the 1980 election, portraying the Democratic ticket as a return to the past. And Mondale's program would be dismissed as big spending and high taxes.

That in fact was the script that the President followed at a hastily called White House news conference after a public opinion poll showed a strong surge of support for the Democratic ticket. It gave Mondale a 48-to-46 edge over Reagan.

But Mondale had already moved the campaign up to 1984 by acknowledging frankly that the Democratic Party had gotten out of tune with the American

Board to meet

The AFL-CIO General Board will meet in Denver on Aug. 19 "to prepare for the election campaign and to mobilize labor's support for endorsed candidates at all levels," Federation President Lane Kirkland and Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue announced in a notice to affiliates.

The General Board consists of members of the Executive Council, plus the president or other principal officer of each affiliated union and department. In addition, as was done at the General Board meeting last October that recommended a presidential endorsement, each state federation and local central body has been invited to send its principal officer.

The Executive Council is scheduled to meet in Denver, Aug. 20-22.

McMichen slate ahead in ITU election

Colorado Springs, Colo. — Challenger Robert S. McMichen has taken a commanding lead over incumbent Joe Bingel in the re-run election for the presidency of the Typographical Union that is also a test of membership sentiment on whether the ITU should stay in the AFL-CIO or drop out to merge with the Teamsters.

The ballot counting for president and the union's other four top offices is under supervision of the Labor Dept., which ordered a repeat of the November 1983 contest after its investigation—requested by McMichen—turned up campaign violations.

In the re-run, McMichen, who has been ITU's first vice president, leads Bingel by 21,181 votes to 12,005 with almost 75 percent of the votes in. McMichen won the earlier race by 5,000 votes. He and a slate of challengers favor efforts to merge with another AFL-CIO union, such as the Graphic Communications Union, while Bingel and other incumbents want to bring the ITU into the unaffiliated Teamsters.

Other returns

In the race for secretary-treasurer, three-term incumbent Thomas W. Kopeck leads Robert E. Petersen, secretary-treasurer of ITU Local 101 in Washington, D.C., by 18,998 votes to 13,863.

Challengers are well ahead in two races for vice presidencies. Billy Joe Austin of the Denver local leads incumbent Vice President Robert L. Wartinger by 17,964 to 13,753, and Local 101 President William Boarman is leading ITU Rep. Ray Brown by 17,643 to 14,253. Both results are reversals of last year's election results.

Incumbent Allan J. Heritage is running unopposed for third vice president, a post reserved for the union's Mailers unit.

The unofficial tally is based on results from 441 of 502 locals, or about 33,000 of some 45,000 total ballots cast. Among ballots still to be counted are those from the New York and Canadian locals.

The Labor Dept. said it would certify the results by July 31.

A 'labor statesman'

Joseph D. Keenan dies, political action pioneer

Joseph D. Keenan, former AFL-CIO vice president and retired secretary of the Electrical Workers who earned the title of "labor statesman" in his seven decades of service to the trade union movement, died of heart failure July 22 in Washington. He was 87.

Throughout his career, Keenan was deeply involved in civil rights issues, fair housing programs and political action, as well as serving as a close adviser to U.S. presidents. He has been recognized as an architect of the Committee on Political Education, and of the AFL-CIO's mortgage and housing investment programs.

In a message to his wife Jeffie, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue said Keenan was "a spokesman and symbol of the American labor movement at its very best."

Keenan's "gifts of diplomacy and conciliation helped mightily to resolve conflicts and bring about the AFL-CIO merger of 1955," Kirkland and Donahue said. "His work as architect of Labor's League for Political Action laid the groundwork for this year's exercise in united political action."

His "unstinting efforts" on behalf of middle- and low-income workers "helped bring better, more affordable housing within the reach of countless Americans," they noted.

Kirkland and Donahue stressed that Keenan's work in mobilizing and securing fair treatment of construction workers during World War II "played a crucial part in maximizing America's war efforts and hastening victory," and they pointed out that after the war "his success in helping to revive the shattered unions of occupied Germany was no less vital a contribution to restoring democracy in postwar Europe."

Keenan joined IBEW Local 134 in Chicago as an apprentice in 1914, held his first union office there in 1923 and was elected its recording secretary in 1928. He was named IBEW international secretary in 1954. He retired from that office in 1976.

From 1937 to 1951, Keenan served as secretary of the Chicago Federation of Labor, and as World War II began, he was named as the AFL's representative on the National Defense Advisory Commission created by President Roosevelt to mobilize national defense efforts.

War effort

Later he became labor vice chairman of the War Production Board where he played a pivotal role in working out labor agreements that contributed to stable labor relations throughout the war.

As labor adviser to Gen. Lucius Clay in Germany from 1945 to 1947, Keenan helped rebuild the German unions that had been crushed by Hitler.

For his services, Keenan was awarded the nation's two highest civilian honors, the Medal of Freedom and the Award of Merit.

In 1948, Keenan became director of COPE's forerunner, the AFL Labor's League for Political Education. From 1951 to 1954, he also served as secretary of the AFL's Building & Construction Trades Dept.

A supporter of the merger of the federations, Keenan was elected to the Executive Council of the newly formed AFL-CIO in 1955 and was re-elected at each federation convention until his retirement. Among his key roles on the council was his chairmanship of the Housing Committee.

He also was president of the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept. from 1975 to 1979.

In addition to his wife, Keenan is survived by two sons, Joseph, Jr. and John. Funeral services were held July 26 at Holy Name Cathedral in Chicago, and burial was at All Saints Cemetery, Des Plaines, Ill.

Louisiana labor reopens push on agency shop law

Baton Rouge, La.—The Louisiana AFL-CIO wasted no time in cranking up a campaign for passage of an agency shop measure in the 1985 session of the state legislature after the house voted down the bill by a three-vote margin.

President Victor Bussie of the state labor federation attributed the 49-52 loss to the lack of support from Gov. Edwin Edwards despite his earlier assurances.

The bill, which the Senate adopted by one vote, would have amended the state "right-to-work" law to allow certified unions to bargain with employers for clauses requiring payment of service fees by nonunion employees.

The House defeat of the measure rules out the possibility of it being reintroduced in this session of the legislature.

Bussie said the National Right to Work Committee brought a task force of lobbyists into the state in the drive to kill the measure by pouring $300,000 into an advertising blitz against it.

Bakery Workers negotiate pattern accord for 8,000

Cincinnati—The Bakery, Confectionery & Tobacco Workers won new three-year agreements with Interstate Brands Corp. and ITT Continental Baking Co. which provide wage increases of 40 cents an hour each in the second and third years of the contract.

The agreement, retroactive to June 10, 1984, covers some 8,000 members directly and sets the pattern for an additional 5,000 BC&T members. Wages in the two units range from $9.80 to $10.45 per hour.

The union's eastern states bargaining team beat back the companies' demand for a two-tier health-benefit structure that would have reduced coverage for new hires, BC&T said.

Under the agreement, the companies will contribute 38½ cents per hour to maintain health benefits in the first year and an additional boost in the third year. On Jan. 1, 1985, the deductible will be increased to $200 from $100, and the contribution rate will be adjusted to reflect the change in the deductible.

On June 8, 1986, when the second wage hike takes effect, the companies will also increase the contribution rate to the level necessary to maintain the workers' existing benefits.

Pension contributions by the employers will be increased effective Jan. 1, 1987, to provide for an increase of $50 more per month in retirement benefits.

The pact also provides for an increase of from 10 cents to 20 cents over the life of the agreement in contributions to retirees' welfare benefits.

Economic data still emitting mixed signals

Uncertainty over the economy emerged in a government report showing workers' real average weekly earnings up a modest two-tenths of 1 percent in June and factory orders for durable goods off 3.2 percent.

The slight gain in earnings followed a 1-percent decline in May. Average weekly earnings before adjustment for price changes increased a seasonally adjusted four-tenths of 1 percent.

The consumer price index for urban wage earners and clerical workers (CPI-W)—the measure used to adjust for price changes—rose one-tenth of 1 percent seasonally adjusted in June.

The Bureau of Labor Statistics report showed real weekly earnings of nonsupervisory workers on private, nonfarm payrolls, expressed in constant, uninflated 1977 dollars, averaged $174.19 in June, compared to $173.77 in May and $171.57 a year earlier. But real wages remain well below 1979 levels.

Lower prices for gasoline and apparel helped offset continuing higher costs for medical care, entertainment, and for certain goods and services.

Medical costs

Medical care prices in June rose five-tenths of 1 percent, the same as in each of the previous two months.

The June drop in durable goods orders was the second decline in the last three months. Orders rose 4 percent in May, after a 6.5 percent decline in April, the biggest drop in four years.

Revised figures on the nation's total output of good and services showed the real growth rate in the first half of the year was higher than previously estimated. The gross national product (GNP) rose at an annual rate of 7.5 percent in the second quarter, down from a 10.1 percent rate in the first quarter.

NLRB order hits two N.J. dailies over 1981 lockout

The National Labor Relations Board ordered Allbritton Communications, Inc. to reinstate with back pay mailroom employees and newspaper deliverers who were unlawfully locked out at two New Jersey newspapers in 1981.

The board also ordered Allbritton to reinstate composing room employees who struck the company later that year but unconditionally agreed to return to work only to be rebuffed.

In the long-delayed 2-1 decision, however, the board reversed a 1982 ruling by an NLRB administrative law judge that Allbritton engaged in bad faith bargaining with Typographical Union Local 103 on a new contract for the composing room workers and that the firm must bargain with ITU's editorial members at the Paterson News and the Hudson Dispatch.

NLRB Member Don A. Zimmerman, in a partial dissent from the opinion of Chairman Donald L. Dotson and Member Robert P. Hunter, backed the administrative law judge's call for a remedial bargaining order for the editorial employees. The majority ruled that Allbritton made unlawful threats to these workers as they sought ITU representation but reversed the judge's finding that they were laid off because of their support for the union.

The NLRB had been harshly criticized for delaying its review of the judge's decision and securing the reinstatement of the workers. The ITU and the Newspaper & Mail Deliverers Union picketed the board's headquarters in Washington last year urging it to issue a decision.

In its decision, the board held that Allbritton violated federal labor law by unilaterally deciding to use nonunion workers in jobs traditionally handled by union members and then locking out union members who protested the change.

Carpenters challenge L-P elections

The Carpenters will ask federal courts to overturn a series of decertification elections held by the National Labor Relations Board at struck facilities of Louisiana-Pacific Corp. The union charged that the acting NLRB general counsel acted improperly in lifting an order blocking the votes.

The union, which has also challenged ballots in all of the nine elections, said it will step up its consumer boycott of the lumber company's products and its "corporate pressure campaign" to inform L-P shareholders about the firm's union-busting activities.

Carpenters President Patrick J. Campbell charged that the company, "with the help of one of the most outrageous National Labor Relations Board decisions in history, is trying to put our local unions out of business by sponsoring decertification elections that are at best immoral and in many cases patently illegal."

The results of the elections, which went against the Carpenters and Woodworkers, "are very much in doubt and we are filing suit in federal court to overturn the NLRB decision that caused the elections to be held in the first place," Campbell said.

About 1,700 members of the Carpenters' Lumber Production & Industrial Workers and the Woodworkers struck 17 L-P mills June 24, 1983, after the company refused to agree to an industry pattern agreement signed by other major firms and demanded sharp concessions instead.

Earlier this year, the NLRB had ordered its Northwest regional office to issue an unfair labor practice complaint against L-P for bad faith bargaining. But last month Acting NLRB Gen. Counsel Wilfrid Johansen revoked the order, which had also specifically blocked decertification elections.

Reagan appointee

Johansen was named acting general counsel when the term of William A. Lubbers, a Carter Administration appointee, expired in April. President Reagan's nomination of management attorney Rosemary Collyer as the NLRB's chief lawyer has not been confirmed by the Senate.

"The company is trying to convince the public that the elections are valid and that our strike is over, but we are serving notice that the battle has only begun," Campbell declared.

L-P owns 114 mills nationwide, including many in the South, and the company's bargaining strategy has sought to force down wages in the better-paying Pacific Northwest plants to bring them closer to those in the low-wage southern operations. Workers in L-P's southern mills earn about half the average $10 an hour paid in other L-P mills.

Although seven other major timber companies signed new agreements with the two unions last year, L-P demanded wage freezes, benefit reductions, and lower pay for new hires. Recently the company has added elimination of union security to its demands, the unions reported.

The unions' boycott of L-P products was endorsed by the AFL-CIO Executive Council in December 1983, and picketing is being conducted at some 400 lumber and building products retailers. A key target of the boycott is L-P's "Waferwood" plywood substitute.

As part of its boycott program, Carpenters members held demonstrations at the Davis Cup tennis tournament in Atlanta which the company sponsored. "The $750,000 Louisiana-Pacific is spending on this tournament could have been used to pay its employees a living wage and avoid what has become one of the uglier labor-management fights of this decade," Campbell charged.

'Amnesty' questioned

Restoration of rights demanded for Poland

By James M. Shevis

The United States should continue economic sanctions against Poland until trade union rights are restored, the AFL-CIO urged.

Despite the amnesty proclaimed for political prisoners, the situation in Poland has not "fundamentally changed," the federation stressed.

"As long as Solidarity is still declared illegal, as long as there are no trade union rights for Polish workers, things remain the same," Director Irving Brown of the federation's International Affairs Dept. warned.

"It is quite clear what is motivating the Polish government: the American dollar. This shows that the sanctions have worked, and that this is an attempt at a tradeoff," Brown said.

"If the price of liberty is an economic tradeoff, the answer is 'no.' If people think lifting of the sanctions is going to correct the situation, they are wrong."

Other support

Gen. Sec. John Vanderveken of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions in Brussels had a similar view:

"The amnesty measures offer little hope unless they are accompanied by the full respect of human and trade union rights in Poland." The ICFTU comprises 138 union affiliates in 95 countries, representing a total of 83 million workers in the free world.

The amnesty plan approved by the Sejm, Poland's parliament, calls for the release of 652 political prisoners, including 11 prominent leaders and advisers of the outlawed Solidarity trade union, and thousands of others held for nonpolitical crimes.

Labor's plea to keep the sanctions intact was followed by reports the Reagan Administration had decided to lift some of them, including the prohibition on Polish commercial airliners landing in the United States and the ban on government-funded scientific exchanges.

At his nationally televised news conference July 24, the President said he was still studying the new amnesty terms, but added that if they "met the conditions that we've laid down, yes, we will meet with regard to lifting the sanctions."

Lifting of bans

According to press reports, White House plans to lift the ban on air travel and scientific exchanges would be announced soon. Additional steps would await evidence that Poland is living up to its promise to release all political prisoners, Administration officials were quoted as saying.

When the sanctions were first imposed on Poland, Reagan said they would remain in effect until the Jarulzelski regime ended martial law, released all political prisoners, and opened a new dialogue with the church and Solidarity.

While the military regime has declared that martial law is over, many of the repressive measures remain. And even though it declared amnesty, the government reserved the right to arrest people again.

In January of this year and last November, the Administration took some steps to ease the sanctions after Polish authorities released some political detainees. The measures eased Polish fishing privileges in American waters and allowed a limited number of charter flights to the United States by Poland's national airline, LOT.

Polish authorities had expressed hope that the latest declaration of amnesty would trigger the removal of all U.S. sanctions. Among the major economic sanctions are:

- U.S. refusal to support Poland's admission to the International Monetary Fund.
- A ban on new U.S. government credits for food and other commodities.
- Suspension after 22 years of "most-favored nation" trading status for Poland, the first Soviet bloc country to receive it. The move effectively boosted tariffs on Polish manufactured goods, particularly textiles.
- Further restriction of high-technology exports to Poland.

Brown, who also presented the AFL-CIO's views in a Voice of America broadcast, said the crux of the problem is the Polish government's refusal to grant workers the right to associate freely, form trade unions, and bargain collectively—all rights contained in International Labor Organization conventions ratified by Poland.

Worker rights

"There is no way to protect the rights of workers if there is no legitimate trade union movement," he stressed. "There cannot be normalization and economic progress in Poland until there is a restoration of Solidarity, which is still strongly supported by Polish workers."

The ICFTU's Vanderveken said in a statement that if the political prisoners must pay for their release with silence and resignation, then the amnesty declaration is only "a cosmetic measure."

Vanderveken cited recommendations of an ILO commission of inquiry demanding the unconditional release of all imprisoned Solidarity members, freedom of association for all socio-professional groups, respect for trade union pluralism, and government dialogue with the true representatives of Polish workers.

"All these conditions must be taken together before we can fully assess the attitude of the Polish government," he said. "The international free trade union movement cannot be satisfied with half-measures where basic human rights and trade union freedoms are concerned."

Inside your schools

An October segment of the Teachers' television magazine series, Inside Your Schools, will feature the Museum for Immigrating People. It was conceived by AFT member Peter Lerner, a New York school teacher. The museum is a recreation of the experiences of various ethnic groups which emigrated to the United States through Ellis Island, N.Y. The series is transmitted nationwide by some 500 cable stations. Entertainer Steve Allen will be the host of the 1984-85 season of half-hour shows.

Unions assail Postal Service for imposing 2-tier pay scale

ble legal challenge to block the demand for wage cuts.

In breaking off the talks, the APWU and the NALC—the two largest unions involved—castigated the USPS for "stonewalling" tactics and for sticking with what they called "almost a mirror image of the outrageous proposal it made two months earlier."

Sombrotto and Biller called the USPS final offer "an insult to the nation's postal workers."

The Postal Service, which is steered by a new conservative majority on its Board of Governors, said it was imposing the lower pay scale for new workers because its economic studies showed postal employees earn "in excess of 23 percent" more than their counterparts in private industry. In addition, new hires will receive substantially less sick leave and annual leave than current employees get.

APWU and NALC bargainers broke off talks with USPS negotiators after 10 hours of almost nonstop bargaining. Talks with two smaller employee groups, the Mail Handlers division of the Laborers and the unaffiliated Rural Letter Carriers, who negotiate separately, lasted only a few hours longer.

The failure to reach agreement set in motion the factfinding and arbitration provisions of the Postal Reorganization Act of 1970. Since the process was established, arbitration has been used to resolve issues, but never an entire contract.

Under the law, the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service is to present management and unions a list of 15 factfinders within 10 days of the breakdown of talks. From the list, each side will choose one name. The two chosen then will choose a third person from the list to serve as chairman.

The panel is to report its findings within 45 days.

Arbitration panel

If the dispute remains unresolved after 90 days, the parties may elect to go to arbitration and a three-member arbitration panel would be named, which would have 45 days in which to issue binding settlement terms.

Both the APWU and NALC, which together represent 500,000 USPS workers, are scheduled to hold simultaneous conventions in Las Vegas Aug. 20-25, and delegates are expected to decide what course of action to take if no agreement has been reached by then.

Angered by management's "stonewalling and deception," Sombrotto blasted USPS negotiators for never making a serious economic offer.

All four unions had left the bargaining table four days before the final breakdown of talks when USPS bargainers told them the Postal Service had "no intention" of discussing economic issues. The unions resumed negotiations when management announced its willingness to bargain over the unions' proposals.

USPS reneged

"You brought us back to the table with the false promise that you would negotiate our economic proposals," Sombrotto told USPS negotiators. "You did not. You capitulated to the Board of Governors."

Biller described management's tactics as "the most despicable I have seen in 50 years of labor negotiations."

The unions have proposed wage and benefit increases totaling about 10 percent in the first year of a three-year pact and 4 percent in each of the second and third years.

An APWU-NALC wage study showed that while the $11.80 average hourly wage of USPS workers exceeds average pay in some industries, it trails pay scales in others such as auto and steel. The unions say postal workers need raises to keep pace with inflation. Also, they point out that productivity has risen more than 3 percent a year in the Postal Service as more mail is handled by fewer workers.

AFL-CIO backs Machinists in boycott of El Al Airlines

In a move to help the Machinists resolve a bitter dispute with El Al Airlines, the AFL-CIO Executive Council voted to endorse a boycott of the Israeli air carrier.

The council approved the boycott in a mailgram poll conducted earlier this month. The federation announced its action at the IAM's request after scheduled negotiations on July 18 with the government-owned airline produced no visible progress.

About 230 members of IAM District 100 in New York and Miami walked off the job Mar. 16—nearly a year after their contract with El Al had expired. Attempts to resolve the dispute under federal labor law governing the airline industry proved fruitless, and the airline refused to move from its demands for stiff concessions or stop union-busting tactics that have included the use of strikebreakers.

IAM President William W. Winpisinger said the union has asked the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, the International Transport Workers' Federation and the International Metalworkers' Federation to initiate boycotts against El Al.

In addition to its international service, El Al has a New York-Miami route here.

Winpisinger also cabled Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Shamir asking for the Israeli government's "immediate intervention . . . to put a halt to the continual and outrageous anti-union tactics by El Al negotiators so that good faith bargaining can proceed and the long-standing relationship of American trade unionists with Israel can be preserved."

At its May meeting, the Executive Council adopted a strongly worded statement calling on El Al management to drop its "take-it-or-leave-it" stance in bargaining and its demands that include a three-year wage freeze, benefit cuts, and damaging work rule and job security changes. Histadrut, the Israeli labor federation, has also condenmned El Al's handling of the dispute. The airline has a long history of labor disputes in Israel, including a four-month strike in 1982-83.

Wayne Pierce appointed treasurer of Carpenters

Wayne Pierce has been named treasurer of the Carpenters by the union's executive board to fill the unexpired term of Charles Nichols who retired Dec. 31. The term runs until the union's next convention in 1986.

Pierce, 54, of Salina, Calif., had been an international representative of the UBC since 1972. Earlier, he held a number of offices in Carpenters Local 925 in Salina where he had been a member since 1949.

Pierce has served as president of the Monterey County Building & Construction Trades Council and of the Monterey-Bay District Council of Carpenters.

Strike settled, but job hazards keep plant closed

Poultney, Vt.—Members of Furniture Workers Local 136 here ratified a new three-year agreement that ended a five-week strike against Staco, Inc. and Chase Instruments, subsidiaries of the family-owned Keeper Corp., but it may be a while before all of the 94 Staco-Chase workers return to work.

The Vermont Health Dept. ordered Staco-Chase to close its plant—to prevent it from further polluting this community's sewage system. Earlier, the state job safety agency cited the company for exposing its workers to excessive levels of mercury.

The new contract will provide the workers with wage increases totaling 60 cents per hour over the term and improved health care coverage. It also calls for a joint union-management safety and heatlh committee and provides for more stringent rules on housekeeping.

The workers have risked exposure to mercury ever since Staco-Chase moved to this town in 1971, enticed by the promise of a decade of tax breaks from the town.

The Staco plant fills thermometers with mercury and paints on the numbering, producing about 130,000 daily. The Chase division produces glass products—including the thermometer tubes.

Danger level

State health officials ordered the plant closed after urine tests revealed elevated levels of mercury in the workers—and their children.

Exposure to mercury for extended periods can cause damage to the liver, kidneys, and central nervous system, as well as brain damage, nausea, and dizziness.

The action came less than three months after the Vermont Attorney General and the Village of Poultney filed a lawsuit charging that the company had polluted the Poultney River by allowing mercury to drain into the sewerage system.

UFWA member Tina Bushey's daughter Ida, age 3, is tested for mercury in her blood. Beatrice Busey, 4, awaits her turn for the painful test.

The Vermont Occupational Safety & Health Administration had cited Staco several times for ventilation problems which overexposed workers to mercury. The most recent citation—in mid-1983—is being contested by the company and is awaiting review by the state Occupational Safety & Health Review Commission.

In the lunch room, mercury was found on the soft drink, snack and change machines, as well as on the refrigerator handles and napkin holders. VOSHA assessed a penalty of $810.

VOSHA has recommended the company end its incentive piece-rate method of pay which deters workers from immediately cleaning up spills, and called on the firm to provide showers, work clothes and change rooms.

In March 1984, the Vermont Health Dept., aided by the National Institute of Occupational Safety & Health, began testing workers at the plant on a voluntary basis. It determined some workers had been overexposed to mercury. Urine testing of the workers showed levels as high as 1,141 micrograms of mercury per liter, more than five times higher than VOSHA's permissible limit.

Later testing of some workers' children revealed that 18 of 23 had mercury in their urine above recommended limits.

UFWA President Carl Scarbrough called the situation in Poultney "an example of gross, willful negligence. Unions are fighting for strong national laws to prevent workers—and communities—from being poisoned by profit-hungry corporations. Without such laws, workers will continue to have to choose between a job and their health—and we think that's a choice no worker should have to make."

UFWA Local 136 President Phyllis Jones said health and safety was not the major issue when the workers voted to strike, because "we didn't know then how big a problem we had. We didn't find that out until the state closed them down."

Surprise inspections

As part of the clean-up plan, the company will have to agree, in writing, to permit surprise inspections of the plant, Jones said. "In the past, they always had advance notice of an inspection—and they always cleaned the plant up temporarily."

When the company fully reopens, Jones said, the situation in the plant will be completely different. The union members were "quite concerned" about the health conditions, "especially when they found out the effects on their children."

The company still has to submit a plan for meeting the health department's requirements in order to reopen, and it will have to obtain a permit to use the local sewage treatment facilities. The suit filed by the state and the village also would compel the company to pay for cleanup costs to purge the system of the estimated seven pounds of mercury that went down the company's drains.

UFWA safety specialist Jamie Cohen aided the workers in Poultney. In summing up the impact of the occupational hazards they faced, she noted that the workers feared not only for their lives, but for the future health of their children as well.

"These workers have a basic human right to be able to hug their children and they've been denied that right," Cohen observed.

In Cleveland, union, community and religious groups protest Reagan Administration's scheme to slash wages of teenage workers.

Cleveland picket line protests youth subminimum pay plan

Cleveland—A coalition of union, community and religious leaders gathered outside one of this city's busiest fast-food restaurants for a lunch-hour march to protest the Reagan Administration's plan to force a subminimum wage on teenage workers.

More than 70 protesters picketed outside a McDonald's restaurant in downtown Cleveland to dramatize the unfairness of the Reagan proposal to slash the minimum wage for 16- to 19-year-olds from $3.35 to $2.50 an hour from May through September.

John Ryan, president of Communications Workers Local 4309, told participants in the rally that the cut-rate wage proposal is "the Reagan Administration's latest scheme to fill the pockets of the rich with money stolen from working people.

The Reagan Recession has thrown thousands of workers in Ohio alone out of decent jobs and now "the President wants to push through a youth wage law to replace those workers with $2.50-an-hour teenagers," Ryan charged.

LaShana Underwood, 15, from the Collinwood Community Center warned that the subminimum wage "will pit the young against those in the trade unions, and I don't want to be against my father," a Steelworker.

Linda Watkins, president of the Council of Unemployed Workers, contested the Administration's claim that new jobs would be created and warned that the real result would be that adult workers would be replaced.

At the rally, Mike Marcellino, representing Rep. Louis Stokes (D-Ohio), asserted that if the Administration gets away with wage discrimination against teenagers, other groups will suffer the same fate. The answer to high youth unemployment is job creation and training, he said.

Rev. Harry Nevels, pastor of the Emanuel Episcopal Church, said that as a teenager in Savannah, Ga., he was paid less for jobs than white teenagers in much the same way as the Administration is now proposing a separate teen wage labor class.

Mylion Waite, associate director of the Interchurch Council of Greater Cleveland, branded the Reagan scheme a "hoax."

And in a parody composed for the rally, to the tune of the McDonalds ad jingle, labor singer Todd Smith sang "We deserve a break today, let's destroy the minimum wage . . . yes, we'll turn teenagers into slaves at 'McRonalds.'"

Political deadlock stymies key measures in Congress

A deadlock between the Democratic-controlled House and the Republican Senate has stalled some of the legislative priorities of both labor and the Reagan Administration, providing both sides with ammunition for the congressional election campaign.

Labor-supported bills the House passed in the first session of Congress include domestic content requirements for automobiles sold in the United States, protection for unemployed workers against the foreclosure of their homes and loss of health insurance, and emergency jobs legislation.

All are opposed by the Administration, and the Senate Republican leadership has kept them off the floor.

Reagan, at his July 24 news conference, attacked the House Democratic leadership for not taking up Administration proposals he said would "help reduce deficits" and "reward work and thrift."

Topping his list was a proposed constitutional amendment to require a balanced federal budget—a measure the AFL-CIO helped defeat in the previous Congress with a nationwide campaign alerting Americans to the consequences.

The President complained also about House inaction on tax credits for private school tuition. But the Republican Senate has already soundly rejected it.

More for the rich

Reagan's other criticisms included House failure to act on "enterprise zone" incentives for corporations or on a proposed expansion of the tax-exempt IRA program that would reduce revenues to benefit mostly affluent families.

One of the President's complaints was that the House hadn't acted on legislation allowing student religious groups the same right to meet in public high schools before or after regular school hours. When the House overwhelmingly approved the Senate-passed measure the next day, the White House was quick to claim victory.

In fact, as the President's advisers well knew, changes made by the Senate had eliminated most of the controversy over an earlier version of the bill and its passage had been assured.

As Congress returned for a three-week schedule—before breaking again on Aug. 10 for the Republican convention—civil rights and pay equity for women were among the labor-supported, House-passed bills that were awaiting Senate action.

The civil rights measure is a legislative attempt to remedy the Supreme Court's Grove City College decision limiting the ban on discrimination in federally assisted programs. The Administration has been working behind the scenes to get the Senate to limit its scope.

On pay equity, the Administration's sensitiveness to women's issues following the choice of Geraldine Ferraro as the Democratic vice presidential candidate may bring about approval of a House-passed measure the White House hoped to kill.

Pay equity study

It would establish an independent study of sex-based pay distinctions in the federal civil service. An Administration "dirty tricks" memo proposing to sabotage the study and turn unions against women's groups helped get it through the House with strong labor support.

One bill expected to reach final passage after a House-Senate conference is a pension equity measure that would make it easier for women workers to retain pension rights on returning to a former job.

The Administration is pressing for Senate passage of a labor-opposed subminimum youth wage bill, and the AFL-CIO is calling on senators to oppose confirmation of yet another employer lawyer to a key post with the National Labor Relations Board—in this case, Rosemary M. Collyer, Reagan's choice for NLRB general counsel.

Both the House and Senate have passed versions of an immigration reform bill that has become a volatile political issue because of concerns of Hispanic groups over some of its provisions. Labor had urged the need for legislation, but sought stronger anti-discrimination safeguards and now opposes the measure in the version passed by the House, which includes a form of "guestworker" program that would allow growers to bring in "temporary" workers from Mexico.

Big defense firm indicted in death of UAW member

Lansing, Mich.—State Atty. Gen. Frank Kelley charged General Dynamics Corp. with criminal manslaughter in the death of an Auto Worker who was overcome by freon gas fumes.

UAW member Harvey Lee, a driver-mechanic at the General Dynamics' plant in Centerline, Mich., collapsed and died last Nov. 15 in an M-1 military tank that had been flooded with gallons of the highly toxic freon solvent. On Nov. 25, the Wayne County medical examiner's autopsy report stated that Lee died of irregular heartbeat caused by exposure to the freon.

UAW Vice President Mark Stepp said the indictment confirms "what we have been saying all along—that General Dynamics's corporate arrogance has placed its workers' lives in jeopardy. Repeatedly, after many near-tragedies, we tried to get GD to stop the practices that killed Harvey Lee. The company never listened."

This is the first time the state has ever charged a corporation with involuntary criminal manslaughter, but none of the company officers was named in the action. The company faces a maximum penalty of $17,500 if it is found guilty.

Aware of hazard

The attorney general said that, "it is clear that General Dynamics had substantial advance knowledge of the dangers associated with the use of freon in the cleaning of military tanks."

Kelley stressed that "it is time that companies like General Dynamics learn that the safety of its employees comes above production and profits. The actions we are taking today will not bring Mr. Lee back to his family and friends, but hopefully it will put all others on notice that the state of Michigan will not tolerate this type of corporate irresponsibility."

The company is contesting charges made last December by both the state and federal job safety agencies. The federal Occupational Safety & Health Administration's charges involve non-fatal incidents at the Centerline plant, while the state OSHA charges concern Lee's death.

Stepp suggested that the Reagan Administration consider withholding defense contracts from General Dynamics until all of its operations can be certified as safe.

Under fire

A majority of Senate Republicans voted for a Democratic-sponsored resolution sharply critical of President Reagan's appointment of Anne Burford to head an environmental advisory committee.

The resolution, approved 74-19, noted Burford's "controversial and flawed tenure" as administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency, her partisan approach to the job, and her resignation under fire.

Burford's new post, as chairman of the National Advisory Committee on Oceans & Atmosphere, does not require confirmation. But the resolution expressed the "sense of the Senate" that Reagan should withdraw the appointment. The President said he will not do so.

Union editors aid crackdown against phony labor papers

Operations of phony labor papers in Illinois and New York have been squelched thanks to cooperative efforts of the AFL-CIO International Labor Communications Association and local law enforcement authorities.

In Illinois, the attorney general has charged Richard L. Cammeron with misrepresenting a privately-owned paper as having numerous union endorsements. The claims of labor backing for the publication were made in the course of phone solicitations pressing central Illinois business owners to buy expensive ads.

Law enforcement authorities began an investigation of the operation after editors of bona fide ILCA-member publications reported complaints they had begun receiving from the business community.

In New York, a state appeals court upheld the 1981 felony fraud conviction of Justin White of Riverside, N.Y., also known as "Nick Conte," for selling ads in phony police and fire fighters' papers.

In Illinois, authorities cracked down on Cammeron, who operates R. L. Cammeron Enterprises of Brentwood, Tenn. He was charged by Illinois authorities after a three-month investigation spurred by information provided by bona fide AFL-CIO labor council publications. Helping in the investigation were the Union News, of the Bloomington-Normal Trades & Labor Assembly; The Labor Paper, of the West Central Illinois Building & Construction Trades Council; the Southern Illinois Labor Tribune, of the Greater East St. Louis Central Labor Council, and the Champaign-Urbana Federation of Labor.

The attorney general's suit charges that the Cammeron operation, which printed a paper called the "Labor Tribune" in Fort Wayne, Ind., solicited advertising from businesses in Champaign, Bloomington and Peoria with claims that it was an official labor publication.

Cammeron's solicitors, the attorney general said, in some cases led the businesses to believe that they could face strikes or other labor problems unless they took ads that ranged in price from $50 to $200 apiece.

Endorsing fees

A letter obtained during the course of the investigation—addressed to building trades unions and signed by Cammeron—solicited endorsements from the unions with promises of "anywhere from $500 to $3,500" in "endorsing fees" along with an offer to send the paper free to members.

The letter also suggested that the locals or councils charge members "$1 to $4 a year" to get the paper to create additional revenues.

Cammeron also offered "to employ as an editorial assistant any business agent or officer." Anyone who bit would "send to us articles of interest" and "we will pay anywhere from $50 to $100 per month and carry your name in the masthead of the newspaper as an editorial assistant."

The AFL-CIO papers also reported that the so-called Labor Tribune had been operating sporadically in the Midwest since at least the mid-1960's.

Tax rise controversy poses credibility gap for Reagan

people—and had paid a political price in the election of Reagan.

It wasn't just the Democrats who had paid the price, though. "Four years ago, many of you voted for Mr. Reagan because he promised you'd be better off," Mondale noted. "And today, the rich are better off, and the middle class is standing on a trap door."

The huge deficits that the Reagan Administration rolled up while giving tax windfalls to the rich "hike interest rates, clobber exports, stunt investment, kill jobs, undermine growth, cheat our kids and shrink our future," Mondale charged.

Bluntly, he warned that "whoever is inaugurated in January, the American people will have to pay Mr. Reagan's bills." Inevitably, taxes will go up, he said.

"Let's tell the truth," Mondale challenged. "Mr. Reagan will raise taxes, but so will I. He won't tell you. I just did."

That issue of credibility haunted Reagan at his news conference five days later.

In serious conversation, practically no responsible member of Congress from either party contends spending could be cut sufficiently to avoid increased taxes—and certainly not without drastically slashing defense spending.

At the White House news conference, Reagan was asked whether he would "flatly rule out the possibility of seeking a tax increase next year" if he were to be re-elected.

It was now the President's credibility at issue. "Yes," he responded firmly.

Then, a little less firmly, "I have no plans for a tax increase."

Later came the reluctant acknowledgement by Reagan that maybe "if we have gotten government costs down to the point at which we say they cannot get any lower . . . then you would have to look at the tax structure."

Post-election bomb

And finally, Reagan acknowledged that he has asked the Treasury Dept. to present him next December—after the election—"with options on tax simplification and ways in which we can broaden the base and thus lead to the ability to further reduce the individual's rates by broadening the base."

By contrast, in his Texas campaign speech, Reagan scoffed at the notion of higher taxes and asked Democrats to vote for him if they believed "government should not plunder more of our earnings."

But even as Reagan was speaking, Senate Finance Committee Chairman Bob Dole—the leading Republican spokesman on taxes—was assuring reporters that the President had "clearly left open the possibility" of a tax increase after the election. Dole has termed higher taxes essential to bring the deficit under control.

Mondale made clear in his acceptance speech that fairness will be a key issue in the campaign, and that the burden of budget squeezes and taxes must be shared by "freeloaders who play the loopholes or pay no taxes," including corporate ones.

The "realism" his campaign represents, Mondale said, recognizes "that America must have a strong defense and a somber view of the Soviets," and that "government must be as well-managed as it is well-meaning."

But this can be achieved without an arms race, Mondale stressed, without abandoning any of the "family" that makes up America—not the children or the elderly—and without deserting the cause of human rights at home or abroad.

N.J. bank strike brings raises for 400

Jersey City, N.J.—Office & Professional Employees Local 153 won a new three-year agreement with the Trust Co. of New Jersey to end a 21-day strike.

The contract, covering 400 OPEIU members at 19 branches, provides annual flat-rate increases totalling 20.4 percent over three years—7 percent of payroll the first year, divided equally among the members of the unit, and 6 percent each in the second and third year.

Local 153 Vice President Michael Goodwin said pensions were also improved by $1 per month per year of service, with the minimum pension increased by 17.2 percent.

Starting with the 15th year of employment, each employee will get one additional week's pay as a vacation bonus, plus an additional week of pay for every five years of service thereafter. Health and welfare benefits were also improved.

LID salute

On its 79th anniversary, the League for Industrial Democracy honored AFL-CIO Vice President Joyce D. Miller, who is president of the Coalition of Labor Union Women and a Clothing & Textile Workers' vice president, and Sandra Feldman, a vice president of the Teachers and of the New York City AFL-CIO. From left: LID Executive Director Arch Puddington, Miller, Feldman, Dr. Donna Shalala, Hunter College president, and LID Vice President Bayard Rustin.

Rutgers University receives papers of Sidney Margolius

New Brunswick, N.J.—The late Sidney Margolius was praised here as a pioneer in consumer reporting for more than 40 years and as an early advocate who helped to create the modern consumer movement.

The tribute to Margolius came as his widow, Esther, turned over his collected papers to the Dept. of Special Collections and Archives of the Rutgers University Libraries.

Rutgers President Edward J. Bloustein, in presenting a citation to Mrs. Margolius, said her husband was "dedicated to the cause of the poor, the oppressed and the discriminated and left an indelible imprint on the conscience of the American trade union movement and hundreds of labor editors."

Several hundred people attended the ceremony. They included friends and colleagues of Margolius and fellow alumni of the Rutgers Class of '34, which co-sponsored the event. Betty Furness of NBC News, Federal Trade Commissioner Michael Pertschuk and consumer advocate Esther Peterson related their experience with Margolius.

Peterson recalled that she first became acquainted with Margolius in 1940 when she was an organizer for the Clothing Workers. She said Margolius was considered radical at that time because he criticized business practices. But, she said, he had success in getting business to understand that consumers had a right to information on the product label so they could make prudent decisions in the market-place.

Pertschuk said he first met Margolius when they served on President Johnson's National Commission on Product Safety. One reason the panel made headway, Pertschuk said, was because "Sid cut through the lawyers' fog and the scientists' timidity." The goal, he added, was to try to set minimum standards on product safety and establish the authority to recall products. The result was the Consumer Product Safety Commission.

Furness said she first met Margolius when she had him on a program to discuss "how to handle your money." She said he was an "encyclopedia" of information for consumers.

Headed PM team

Margolius began his consumer specialty on the newspaper PM in New York, where he supervised a dozen reporters. PM accepted no avertising and lasted about five years.

Margolius subsequently wrote a syndicated column which appeared in some 100 newspapers and he published 400 magazine articles. His first of 20 books, titled "The Consumer's Guide to Better Buying," sold over a million copies.

At the behest of Machinists' editor Gordon Cole, Margolius began a column for the labor press in the late 1940s and it became widely used, reaching millions of union families and appearing regularly in the AFL-CIO News as well as other labor journals.

Since 1979, the popular Margolius column, "How to Buy," has been distributed to the labor press by Press Associates, Inc. After Sidney's death in 1980 the column was continued by his chief researcher, his wife, Esther.

Charles R. Baker dies, labor writer, consultant

Reston, Va.—Charles R. Baker, a labor publicist and political consultant, died of cancer at his home here July 22.

Baker, who was 63, worked for newspapers in Ohio before joining the Auto Workers public relations department in 1950. He later served as director of the Institute for American Democracy, a group that opposed right-wing causes.

In 1976, he formed a consulting firm to handle the publications of Food & Commercial Workers Local 400 in Washington, Local 27 in Baltimore and Local 1360 in Camden, N.J. He is survived by his wife, Barbara, and two sons.

General Motors, Ford

UAW contract talks keyed to job security

Detroit—Job security for some half-million members of the Auto Workers employed by General Motors and Ford will be "the centerpiece of this year's talks and the key to satisfactory settlement this fall," UAW President Owen F. Bieber declared as the union opened negotiations with the companies.

The UAW's contracts with the two largest American automobile companies expire Sept. 14. The opening round of the renewal talks with General Motors July 23 and with Ford a day later were largely ceremonial.

At the outset, Bieber told a press conference that the talks this year may be "the toughest this union has ever had." He said Ford and GM workers, who gave up $4 billion in concessions to help their employers under the old contract, "are entitled to and deserve" a wage increase, but he did not specify what the union would seek.

The UAW represents 350,000 workers at GM plants and 144,000 at Ford facilities. Another 24,000 GM workers are represented by the Electronic Workers, whose contract expires at the same time.

The major concern of both unions is that members' jobs will be lost overseas in the coming years as the industry turns to low-wage countries for labor.

Bieber said that GM plans to shift even more automobile and parts production abroad. If the industry's plans are allowed to proceed, it would mean the loss of roughly 200,000 U.S. jobs in auto manufacturing industries in the next two years.

"What we are talking about is not only the future of auto workers, but the future of our country and the future of basic industry here," he said.

Bieber said GM and Ford together plan to import 650,000 cars from Mexico, Japan, Korea, and Europe in the next few years.

At a news conference following the union's initial bargaining session with GM, Bieber also suggested that the UAW might consider reopening its current two-year contract with Chrysler Corp., to have it expire simultaneously with the GM and Ford pacts. The Chrysler agreement is slated to expire in September 1985.

Board seats

Bieber said the union also is seeking seats on the boards of General Motors and Ford. The UAW won representation on the Chrysler board in 1980 in return for concessions that enabled the firm to secure a federal bailout and avert bankruptcy.

One way the union hopes to preserve jobs is to negotiate restrictions on excessive overtime. The UAW said that in the first three months of this year the amount of overtime worked in the industry would have provided the equivalent of 97,000 jobs and could have meant the rehiring of 80,000 laid-off workers.

Increased automation of American automobile plants and its effect on employment is also on the union's bargaining agenda along with rising health costs, improved pensions for retired workers and advance notice on proposed plant closings.

OSHA recess appointment brings firestorm of protest the working people of the nation." He said, "There's no reason to expect Robert Rowland's performance as head of OSHA will be any different than (former OSHA Administrator) Thorne Auchter's and there's good reason to believe it could be worse."

Kennedy added, "This appointment may be a political plum for Mr. Rowland, but it may well turn out to be a lemon for the nation's workforce."

Sen. Jennings Randolph (D-W.Va.) voiced similar concerns about the timing of the recess appointment and the manner in which it was done.

Labor's criticism was even more pointed. Director Bert Seidman of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Occupational Safety, Health & Social Security charged that Rowland is "completely unqualified" for the post since his "only knowledge of health and safety matters comes from his service on the review commission."

Rowland had been an assistant attorney general of Texas in the late 1950s and specialized in tax law while in private practice. He was named to the commission post after serving the Reagan-Bush Campaign in Texas in 1980.

Seidman characterized Rowland as an "inexperienced, political extremist" who "intentionally fails to support the basic principles" of the federal job safety law.

Margaret Seminario, the federation's job safety expert, pointed out that in the vast majority of cases that came before OSHRC, Rowland voted to vacate OSHA findings that would have required employers to take meaningful actions in protecting workers from hazards.

An analysis of 179 commission cases shows Rowland upheld the OSHA inspection action only 23 times, while the board's majority supported the agency 111 times, Seminario noted.

Poor record

Since Reagan's naming of E. Ross Buckley to the commission in January, also by recess appointment, Rowland has not supported OSHA in a single case, she observed. In the three cases where the agency's citations were upheld, Rowland dissented.

Further criticism of Rowland's qualifications came from Bertram Cottine, a former OSHRC commissioner and Carter appointee who served two years with Rowland.

Cottine charged that Rowland is "as unqualified to serve as assistant secretary for OSHA as he was unqualified to serve as a member of OSHRC. On enforcement, his record says it all. He is extremely conservative on enforcement of OSHA rules and unfamiliar with worksite hazards and the need to correct them."

Cottine expressed his concern that with Rowland heading OSHA, the agency's rulemaking would cease and that Rowland would continue to make appointments from "the family of political zealots that support the President's view." Reagan, when campaigning in 1980, was quoted by Business Week magazine as saying, "I question seriously the need for OSHA."

The White House has not disclosed who will be the new OSHRC chairman or whether Rowland's vacancy will be filled prior to the November elections.

Studies Center listing for August, September

The George Meany Center for Labor Studies will offer nine institutes and workshops during August and September. The schedule:

Labor Law, Aug. 12-17—A course for non-lawyers focusing on legal issues arising in bankruptcies, plant closings and transfer of plant ownership, as well as a look at the slanted enforcement of Landrum-Griffin Reporting & Disclosure Act.

Newswriting & Editing, Aug. 19-24—For union editors and would-be editors on the basics of producing readable publications, cosponsored by the International Labor Communications Association.

Organizing Techniques I, Aug. 19-24 and Sept. 23-28—A program on the mechanics of an organizing campaign with videotaping of participants in action.

Arbitration Techniques: Preparation & Presentation, Aug. 26-31 and Sept. 30-Oct. 5—Presentation of mock cases before professional arbitrators. Participants will be videotaped.

Union Administrator & Business Agent, Sept. 16-21—A class for full-time union officers on office management, budgeting, contract administration, reaching members and avoiding legal troubles.

Effective Speaking, Sept. 16-21—A workshop on formal speeches, committee reports, confrontations, panel discussions and debates, including the preparation and use of visual aids.

Computers for Local Unions, Sept. 24-28—A briefing on the use of computers for union officers who plan to buy data processing equipment.

Nearly 60 candidates for bachelor of arts degrees in labor studies enrolled in the George Meany Center/Antioch University program will be on campus July 29 to Aug. 3. An alumni program is set for Aug. 1 and 2.

The Railroad Signalmen will bring its staff to the center for leadership training, Aug. 12-17.

The American Institute for Free Labor Development will bring 40 trade union leaders from Latin America to the campus Aug. 19 for five weeks of classes.

More information on these and other labor studies is available from Fred K. Hoehler, Jr., executive director, George Meany Center, 10000 New Hampshire Ave., Silver Spring, Md. 20903; telephone 301/431-6400.

High Tech, Low Pay

ON THE MORNING after the Democratic convention, departing delegates found in the business section of the San Francisco Chronicle a news story that brought to life one of the important issues of the coming election.

"Another major electronics layoff in Scotts Valley," the headline over the article read.

The news was that Seagate Technology, a manufacturer of disk drives used by computers to store information, was going to lay off another 700 workers—on top of 700 others who lost their jobs earlier this year.

The company announced that it would shift manufacturing operations to its plants in Singapore and Bangkok, a path already taken by many other high-tech companies, the article noted.

Seagate's announcement said merely that the move was being made to reduce costs and company officials "flatly refused further comment." But some months earlier, a Seagate official had strongly hinted of a move. In the Far East, he said, "for $3 a day and a bowl of soup, people will work their butts off 12 hours a day."

The story noted that earlier this year two other disk drive companies had taken similar moves—the Tandon Corp. laid off 1,400 U.S. workers to transfer production to Singapore, and the Qume Corp. laid off 600 workers in transferring production abroad.

"Analysts said all three companies acted from strength, not financial weakness," the San Francisco Chronicle reported. In other words, the companies were making money, but they wanted to cut production costs to make still more money.

And you just can't beat $3 and a bowl of soup for a 12-hour day.

SO MUCH for the argument that high-tech jobs will replace the jobs lost in basic industries such as steel and auto.

To the Reagan Administration, the exodus of the high-tech companies has been merely the working of the marketplace, and any intervention to save U.S. jobs should be shunned.

Walter Mondale took a different view when he accepted the Democratic presidential nomination. Speaking of the loss of 3 million U.S. jobs, Mondale said:

"To big companies that send our best jobs overseas, my message is: We need those jobs here at home. Our country won't help your business unless your business helps our country."

Tax laws should penalize, not reward, corporations that give up on America and America's workers.

The Fox Season

THE SENATE, by an impressive bipartisan majority, has protested President Reagan's "fox in the chicken coop" appointment of Anne Burford to head an environmental advisory committee.

Burford came close to destroying the Environmental Protection Agency during her tenure as its administrator. But since her new post does not require confirmation, the Senate could only request the President to withdraw the appointment.

Unfortunately, Burford is not the only Reagan appointee out of sync with an agency's mission. We have seen the National Labor Relations Board transformed by Reagan Administration appointees from a neutral body enforcing the rights of workers to a hanging jury made up almost entirely of employer partisans. And at the Occupational Safety & Health Administration, employer costs have taken priority over worker protections.

Burford's appointment, unfortunately, does not require Senate confirmation. But the President's choice of Rosemary Collyer as general counsel of the NLRB does. And despite the recess appointment of Robert Rowland to head OSHA, his selection will eventually have to pass the Senate's scrutiny.

The Burford resolution reflected the Senate's concern for the environment. If the Senate shows the same concern for the protection of workers, neither Collyer nor Rowland will be confirmed.

Senior House member peppers Reagan policies

By Press Associates, Inc.

Congressman Claude Pepper has the well-earned reputation of being the leading congressional champion of the nation's senior citizens.

Robust at age 83, Pepper is also the most senior member of Congress. Age has not tempered the fervor of the Florida Democrat, nor mellowed his anger about the Reagan-led attacks on programs which provide a measure of security and dignity to older Americans.

Pepper's address to the Democratic convention is excerpted:

The sleeping giant of American politics, the 28 million senior citizens of America, has awakened. The senior citizens are hurt and angry. They have been double-crossed, deceived and betrayed.

I am here to tell you they will no longer tolerate such abuse and continue to turn the other cheek. They have left their rocking chairs and taken up placards. This citizens' militia is marshalling in every city of this great land. This army has united together as a giant fist to smack down their worst enemy in modern times who has masqueraded as their greatest friend.

In November of 1984, the senior citizens of America are going to de-elect Ronald Reagan, the man they mistakenly elected in 1980.

Presidential ploy

When he appeared on the scene in 1980, Ronald Reagan was 70 years old. "I am one of you," he said. "Trust me," he said. "I will preserve and protect those programs of importance to you," he said.

From the minute he took occupancy of the White House, Ronald Reagan has systematically set out to scuttle just about every program for the elderly. And he has done it all with a smile.

From the security of his throne in the White House he repeated his campaign promise that he would not cut social security. In short order, President Reagan proposed the most devastating series of cuts in the social security program ever.

Only a Democratic Congress preserved for the elderly the social security system put into place by President Franklin Roosevelt and nurtured by every subsequent administration.

Itching for more

Even now, after we made social security solvent and sound for the next 75 years, and President Reagan promised to preserve it, Mr. Reagan has proposed more cuts. He has proposed changing the fundamental structure of social security. He proposes making it a welfare program instead of a vested right for all Americans. He just can't seem to keep his itchy hands off of social security.

In February 1981, in his first message to the Congress, President Reagan said, "We will not cut Medicare." Every year thereafter he has directed the Congress to cut billions of dollars from the Medicare program. Mr. Reagan has transferred more and more of the burden of escalating health care costs to the backs of the elderly.

The sleeping giant of American politics, the nation's elderly, intend to call Mr. Reagan into account. In America, the people are sovereign. This November Mr. Reagan will be judged and we intend to look past the rhetoric, past the show-biz and the special effects. We will be mindful of the biblical admonition: "By your deeds you shall be known." We will strip aside Mr. Reagan's words and measure the facts.

In Walter Mondale and Geraldine Ferraro, the senior citizens of this nation have leaders they can believe. I think that credibility, integrity and fairness is the fundamental issue in this campaign. It is a simple matter of being fair and keeping your word. Walter Mondale and Geraldine Ferraro are the perfect counterpoint to the man who beams such warm smiles and turns such a callous heart to the needy of this land.

LEGISLATIVE ALERT!

Bankruptcy Reform Campaign Ends in Victory! Congress Curbs Corporate Abuses, Restores Protections to Union Contracts

Labor won its most important legislative victory in recent memory as Congress approved a bill that overrules the Supreme Court's Bildisco decision and restores safeguards to labor union contracts when a company files for bankruptcy reorganization.

Under Bildisco, companies were allowed to misuse bankruptcy law in order to break union contracts. Companies in bankruptcy proceedings were allowed to continue operations under the same management, with executives enjoying the same salaries and benefits. But workers were arbitrarily deprived of their contract and subject to the whims of management regarding pay, benefits, hiring, firing, and all other issues, including their jobs.

The reform legislation changes all that. No longer can management break a contract unilaterally; it must ask permission of a bankruptcy court. And if the company is in financial trouble and really needs to cut its costs, it must make an offer that cuts pay and benefits only to the extent necessary to save the company. The company must open its books to show financial need. And management must take its share of pay and benefit cuts.

This Alert! provides information about the big win on labor's top issue in Congress for 1984.

Here's How Reform Bill Protects Union Contracts

COMPARISON OF BANKRUPTCY LAW REGARDING UNION CONTRACTS
BEFORE AND AFTER CONGRESS PASSED REFORMS

Aspect of law	Under Bildisco decision, before Congress passed reform bill	Current situation, with labor-backed reforms in place
Who decides whether a contract may be broken?	Company management decides. Bankruptcy court hearing comes later, after workers perhaps are fired.	A bankruptcy court decides. Contract remains in effect unless and until bankruptcy judge says otherwise.
When may a union contract be broken?	If it is "burdensome."	Only if it is necessary for successful reorganization of the company in bankruptcy.
Who bears the burden of cost-cutting?	Management could place the entire burden on employees. No pay cuts for management required; company's creditors may be paid in full.	Company creditors and management must share in burden of cost-cutting to improve company's financial outlook.
Collective bargaining required?	No. Management allowed to break contracts unilaterally.	Yes. Company must make offer to union providing only those pay and benefit cuts necessary for successful reorganization. This must occur before the company asks the court to allow breaking of the contract.
Must company provide relevant financial information to unions during negotiations?	No.	Yes.

The fight to overturn the U.S. Supreme Court's Bildisco decision and restore protections to union contracts was won in four months of intense Congressional activity. Following is a chronology:

Feb. 22, 1984: U.S. Supreme Court rules that companies may unilaterally break their union contracts upon filing for Chapter 11 bankruptcy reorganization. Workers may be fired, pay and benefits may be cut, seniority and workplace rules may be broken immediately.

Feb. 22: Having anticipated the Supreme Court's decision, Rep. Peter Rodino (D-NJ) immediately introduces legislation to overrule Bildisco, require bankruptcy court approval to break a contract, and allow it only when necessary to save the company and preserve jobs.

Feb. 23: AFL-CIO Executive Council vows to do everything possible "to assure than Congress corrects the Supreme Court's mistake and vindicates national labor policy." AFL-CIO begins campaign to inform union members of threat to their contracts.

March 21: House passes Rodino bankruptcy reform bill (H.R. 5174) by voice vote. Under the rule for debate, opponents could try to kill the bill, and they did try to do so. But the vote was so strongly in favor of reform, opponents did not exercise their right to a roll-call.

June 19: The Senate approves a bankruptcy bill without any labor provisions. A solid majority of Senators supported an amendment by Sen. Bob Packwood (R-OR) to protect union contracts, but a few anti-worker Senators used filibuster threats to prevent a vote. So the AFL-CIO supported passage of a bill without labor provisions, because House-Senate conference offered a better chance than continued stalemate on the Senate floor.

June 29: House and Senate approve labor-backed compromise hammered out by House-Senate conference committee. Proposal by Rep. Bruce Morrison (D-CT) and Rep. William Hughes (D-NJ) with leadership of Rep. Rodino brought final agreement.

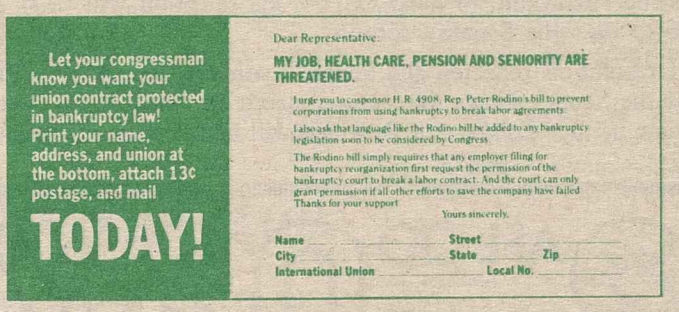
Union Members Had Key Role in Bankruptcy Victory

A crucial part of the bankruptcy reform battle was the effort by the AFL-CIO and its affiliates to inform union members of the threat posed to their contracts. The AFL-CIO knew that letters and mailgrams from union members would help convince Congress of the importance of this issue.

The AFL-CIO conducted five mailings to union members as the legislation moved through the House and Senate. Mail was targeted to union constituents of legislators who labor's Washington lobbyists had determined were "on the fence"-- not yet committed to labor's position, but possibly persuadable.

The response was phenomenal. In the first campaign, AFL-CIO President Kirkland asked union members to mail a postcard to their Representative. More than 31 percent of those receiving the request did so! (A five percent response to a mailing is considered excellent.)



Later, as the battle moved to the Senate, the AFL-CIO used electronic mail to ask members to send Mailgrams to their Senators. Even though the cost was high (approximately $2.75 each), union members responded. This was the key factor in the solid majority of Senators' support for Sen. Bob Packwood's (R-OR) reform amendment.

The AFL-CIO and its affiliated unions are grateful to all who responded to appeals for action. The massive outpouring of messages reinforced Congressional support and countered attempts by the U.S. Chamber of Commerce and the anti-labor Right to Work Committee to influence the voting. When working people speak up, Congress does listen.

Poverty rise tied to Reagan program cuts

By Susan Dunlop

The double disasters of the Reagan tax policies and devastating budget cuts in human programs ganged up with the Reagan recession to knock millions of Americans into poverty—people who would not otherwise have been there.

A study by the nonpartisan Congressional Research Service and an analysis of census and tax data released by two congressmen sharply contradict the Reagan Administration's claim that its economic and social policies have not hurt the needy.

Instead, the studies add weight to mounting evidence that the Administration's actions have seriously damaged the economic well-being of millions of low- and middle-income Americans who were already struggling to make ends meet.

The congressional study, done at the request of Democrats on the House Ways & Means Committee, found that between 1980 and 1982, 2.2 million more Americans dropped into poverty as a result of the Reagan policies than would have been there if those program cutbacks had never been enacted.

Cause and effect

CRS used economic models to measure the changes in the poverty rate between 1980-82. The models also made it possible to estimate separately how much of the increase in poverty was due to the recession and its record-high unemployment and how much could be chalked up to budget slashes, particularly in restrictions to the Aid to Families with Dependent Children program.

CRS found that a sharp increase in the poverty rate for children and for women raising families alone was clearly linked to the Reagan budget cuts and was worsened by the recession.

The slumping economy and unemployment that marked the first half of the Reagan Administration were the keys that drove workers and their families into poverty they might have been spared, the study noted.

It found that the combined effects of the recession and the budget restrictions forced poverty rolls up about 8 percent higher than they would have been.

The economic slump and its devastating joblessness accounted for about 6 percent of the increase, or the addition of about 1.6 million more Americans to the ranks of the poor over the period measured.

The budget cuts alone—particularly the slashes in AFDC—forced at least 2 percent more Americans into poverty than would have been there without the cuts. Of the 557,000 people that figure represents, over 330,000 were children, CRS said.

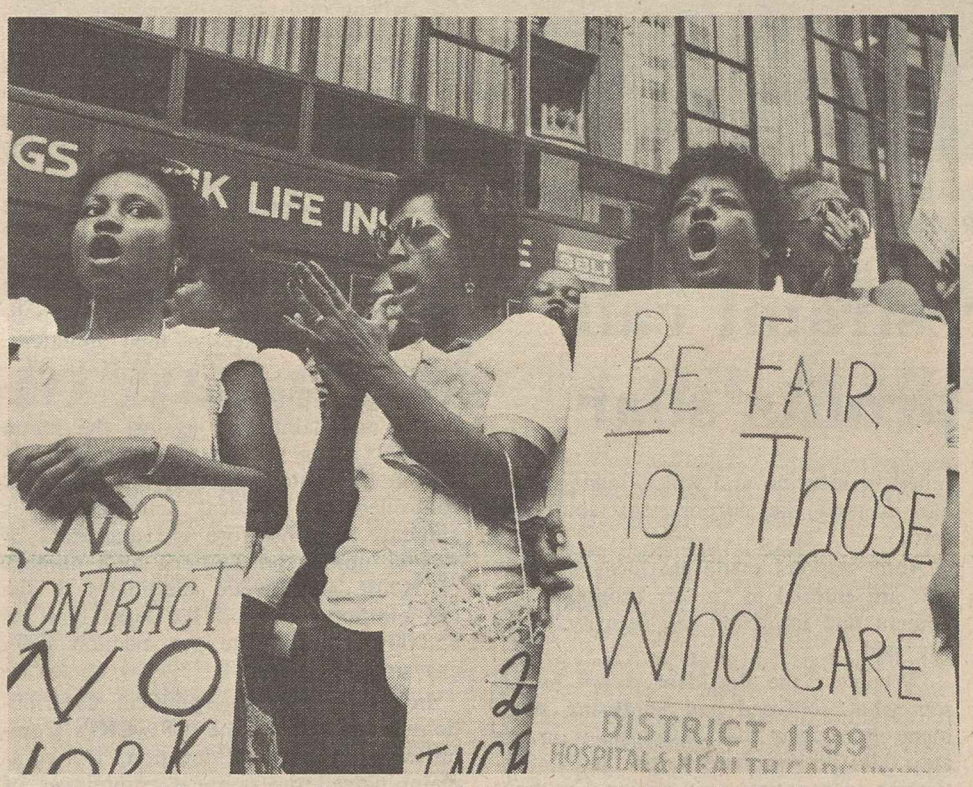
Postal unions ask court to bar pay, benefit cuts



Striking health care workers carry their message through Manhattan.

Lowest-paid workers

50,000 standing firm in N.Y. hospital strike

New York—More than 50,000 determined hospital workers—members of District 1199 of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union—entered the fourth week of their strike against 59 health care institutions in the New York metropolitan area.

They voted down overwhelmingly what their employers termed a "final offer" of a 4-percent raise, which the union contends amounts to no more than 2.3 percent when adjusted for proposed givebacks.

The hospital workers are mostly in the traditionally low-paid jobs, including orderlies, nurses' aides, housekeepers, clerks and technicians. Most are black or Hispanic. And their union spirit has been unflagging throughout this city's longest and biggest strike by health care workers.

Midtown march

Some 5,000 of the strikers marched through midtown Manhattan to a union rally at the hotel where the hospital management negotiators are housed.

They cheered District 1199 President Doris Turner, RWDSU President Alvin E. Heaps and supporters from other unions, including Victor Gotbaum, president of District 37 of the State, County & Municipal Employees, which represents the bulk of city employees.

Heaps told the rally that hospital management is trying to force an unacceptable contract on its workers by using "the same union-busting tactics that we have seen employers try to get away with all across the country."

The international union stands firmly behind District 1199's battle for a fair contract, he pledged.

Gotbaum told the strikers that their fight is the fight of all of the city's union members. "If you take a beating on the picket line, then we'll take a beating at the bargaining table."

Management's supposed "final offer" was unanimously rejected by the union's bargaining committee but was brought to the full membership for a vote that began with a mass meeting at Felt Forum in Madison Square Garden.

Turner told the gathering, "We refuse to give up."

The members shouted back, enthusiastically, "No way, no way," calling for rejection of the offer.

"Then if that's your decision," Turner told them, "build a picket line that will not be moved."

Turner called the hospitals' offer, with its "givebacks" and "freezes," "insulting and deceiving."

If management thinks the union's ranks

Suit brands management order illegal

By James M. Shevis

Four unions representing 600,000 Postal Service employees asked a federal court to block USPS from slashing the pay and benefits of new workers.

The unions, which broke off negotiations with the quasi-federal agency July 20 because of its refusal to engage in good-faith bargaining, want the court to prevent USPS from unilaterally cutting the salaries of workers hired on or after Aug. 4 by 23 percent. USPS said it would also cut the sick leave and annual leave of new hires by half.

The suit was filed in U.S. District Court in Washington by the Postal Workers, Letter Carriers, the Mail Handlers' division of the Laborers, and the unaffiliated Rural Letter Carriers.

The unions' position is that their old three-year contract remains fully in effect until the outcome of factfinding and arbitration. The suit charges that the attempt by USPS to impose a two-tier wage system is illegal.

Talks broke off when USPS continued to demand substantial givebacks by current employees, a three-year wage freeze, and a two-tier pay scale for new workers.

Law breaking

Addressing the National Press Club, NALC President Vincent Sombrotto and APWU President Moe Biller charged USPS was "in defiance of the law," and that "we filed suit to protect the gains it took years of hard bargaining to win."

The unions are now in the process of choosing a factfinder for a panel to study the issues in the simmering contract dispute. NALC and APWU have chosen their candidates, Biller said, but the other unions as yet have not. USPS also makes a selection, and the two chosen factfinders then pick a third person to chair the panel.

The panel is to report its findings within 45 days. If the parties do not reach an agreement by Oct. 19—90 days after the old contract expired—the law requires the Election law ruling backs labor's political action role

By David L. Perlman

The Federal Election Commission has dismissed a 62-page complaint against the AFL-CIO and various affiliated national and international unions after determining that the allegations of election law violations were baseless.

The FEC's unanimous finding was a setback for the Center on National Labor Policy, one of the more virulent of the anti-union groups allied to the National Right to Work Committee. The Center raises money through alarmist letters to the gullible. A recent example warned that "ruthless union bosses" imperil "our nation's very survival."

At issue in the complaint filed with the FEC was whether the autonomous unions that are affiliated with the AFL-CIO may operate their own political action committees, just as a corporation that is a member of the Chamber of Commerce may set up its own PAC.

The FEC, a bipartisan body set up to police the Federal Election Campaign Act, adopted the finding of its general counsel that congressional intent and all applicable precedents clearly supported the labor movement's understanding of the law.

In the proceedings, the Center on National Labor Policy had provided the legal services for a "citizen's complaint" filed with the election commission by an Okla-

UAW President Owen Bieber, flanked by Vice President Donald Ephlin, right, and Regional Director Frank Runnels, go into auto industry talks.

Reagan's pay restraint call comes as auto profits soar

Detroit — Record-high profits for the auto industry and some unsolicited advice from President Reagan put a sharper spotlight on contract negotiations covering nearly half a million workers at General Motors and Ford plants.

General Motors followed up a record first quarter with a second quarter profit of $1.6 billion, 54 percent above the same period a year ago. Its earnings for the first half of 1984 were above $3.2 billion, and the three other auto companies have posted comparable gains.

Industry analysts are predicting that the four automakers will roll up record profits of $12 billion in 1984.

Auto Workers President Owen Bieber said there are a lot of things that President Reagan can do to assure the long-term health of the auto industry and develop an industrial policy that would assure jobs for workers and quality products for consumers. But injecting himself into the bargaining picture isn't one of them, Bieber suggested.

Management tilt

Reagan, in the course of a somewhat rambling reply to a question in a Detroit television interview, ended up with what appeared to be a strong tilt to the management side.

Reagan acknowledged that "the workers did make concessions" when the auto companies were losing money and that contract problems "are between management and labor to work out." But then he went on to say in a comment widely reported in the press that the workers should show "restraint" in the negotiations so as to not "turn off the recovery."

Bieber retorted that the UAW is negotiating "in the wake of a recession the President himself engineered that cost tens of thousands of jobs." He noted the huge bonuses recently given to auto industry executives, "which the President failed to mention and which management has deemed the corporations could afford."

Auto workers made sacrifices in 1982 and are entitled to "a fair economic settlement and improved job security," Bieber said.

"Whatever the President meant by his somewhat confused and confusing statement, it is clear that both parties in the auto talks possess the expertise and sophistication to negotiate an agreement without interference by third parties," Bieber stressed.

Industry talks

Reagan's comments came after the union opened talks with Ford and GM, the two largest American automobile companies. The UAW contracts expire on Sept. 14.

After GM's financial results were announced, UAW Vice President Donald F. Ephlin, who heads the union bargaining team with GM, said the earnings "demonstrate very clearly" that the firm can raise wages for workers, restrain car prices for consumers, and still meet its capital spending needs.

Ephlin said that the industry must understand that it has to share its record profits and productivity with the workers, who have gone for almost three years without a real wage increase.

The union represents 350,000 workers at GM and 144,000 at Ford facilities.

Negotiations are also under way between the Electronic Workers and General Motors for a new agreement covering 24,000 IUE members.

HRDI adds St. Louis to program for disabled

St. Louis—The AFL-CIO Human Resources Development Institute has expanded its handicapped placement program to serve the St. Louis area.

HRDI worked closely with the Missouri AFL-CIO and the Greater St. Louis Labor Council in setting up the program here to develop jobs and training opportunities for handicapped and disabled persons. HRDI has signed cooperative agreements with the state's Dept. of Education and the Bureau for the Blind.

Since the HRDI program was initiated in 1977, some 8,000 jobs have been developed and more than 2,700 handicapped persons put back to work. The program also operates in Minneapolis-St. Paul, Baltimore and Houston.

homa businessman, James E. Antosh. He is the brother of the Center's executive director, Steve Antosh.

Under federal election law, business and labor political activities are governed by the same rules for fund solicitations, the same obligations for reporting expenditures and the same limits on contributions and assistance to candidates for federal office.

Limits on political contributions can't be circumvented by establishing multiple fund-giving outlets, the law assures. Thus, a company isn't allowed to set up a separate political fund at each of its plants to multiply the amount it can legally give to a favored candidate. Nor can a union set up political funds for each of its locals.

Voluntary federations such as the National Association of Manufacturers, the Chamber of Commerce and the AFL-CIO can and do make political contributions from voluntarily donated funds without infringing on the dollar limits of the political action committees of their affiliates.

Aim of complaint

The complaint filed against the union political funds sought to upset this approach by contending that the AFL-CIO controlled the political activities of its affiliates and therefore the aggregate of various union contributions to a number of House and Senate candidates in the last election exceeded the legal limit of $5,000 per candidate per election from any single PAC.

In addition to the political contributions committee of the AFL-CIO's Committee on Political Education, the complaint named the political committees of the Auto Workers, Teachers and Electrical Workers.

The complaint alleged that the relationship between the AFL-CIO and its affiliates was so close and the federation's ability "to influence the political and socio-economic decision-making of its member unions" was so great that the various political funding committees should be treated as one.

Separate entities

The findings adopted by the Federal Election Commission noted that the congressional reports and legislative history clearly supported the treatment of the AFL-CIO's committee and the political action committees of its affiliates as separate entities.

The commission also recognized the distinction that the AFL-CIO has made between its subordinate bodies, such as state and local central bodies, and affiliated national and international unions. The subordinate bodies are required to comply with AFL-CIO policy on national issues while the affiliated unions are free to take different positions on candidates and issues.

The complaint also had challenged the constitutionality of denying trade associations the right to set up separate political funds in each city or state. They, like the AFL-CIO central bodies, are considered as a single entity for purposes of political contributions.

The FEC found no basis for the challenge, noting that the arguments raised had previously been dismissed by courts.

A previous attention-getting complaint of election law violations handled by the Center on National Labor Policy sought a ban on the use of a union label—the "union bug"—on newsletters that members of Congress send to constituents.

Union label

In that case, the allegation was that use of the union bug amounted to illegal use of government funds to promote "compulsory unionism" since the newsletters were sent out postage-free under congressional frank. The Center was rebuffed in that case by both the FEC and a federal court that dismissed its suit.

Its executive director at the time was Baker Armstrong Smith, who left the Center to join the Reagan Administration. Smith resigned from his post at the Dept. of Housing & Urban Development last year after allegations that he had sabotaged enforcement of federal wage laws and charges that he had fired employees because of their union membership.

Labor hits move to weaken law on product liability

The AFL-CIO has urged senators to oppose a product liability bill that would weaken existing legal protections for both consumers and workers.

As cleared by the Senate Commerce Committee, the measure would reduce the liability of manufacturers for harm caused by their products and would nullify state laws providing greater rights to victims.

In a letter to senators, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison cited the "alarming increase in worker and consumer deaths due to unsafe or defective products." For injured victims or survivors, the only remedy often is damage awards won through lawsuits against the manufacturers. About half of all such product liability damages, he noted, go to workers injured on the job.

The proposed legislation would require proof of negligence by the manufacturer and would diminish the manufacturer's obligation to provide adequate warning to workers regarding the harmful potential of a product.

Import surge widens trade deficit

The U.S. trade imbalance was rocked by another tidal wave of red ink in June as the nation's merchandise trade deficit hit $8.9 billion for the month.

The Commerce Dept. reported that the import deficit for the first six months of 1984 soared to $59.8 billion—117 percent above the comparable period of 1983.

For the first six months of 1984, imports were up 31 percent over a year ago.

The half-year deficit is just short of the record $69.4 billion imbalance posted for all 12 months of last year.

On an annual basis, the nation is facing a whopping trade deficit for 1984 of some $120 billion, the worst in history. One Commerce Dept. study released earlier this year—after several months of record deficits including an all-time one-month record in April of $12.2 billion—estimated that the deficit could grow as deep as $130 billion by the end of the year.

Of the total deficit for the first half of 1984, $41.7 billion is in manufactured goods. For the same period last year, the imbalance was $14.2 billion.

AFL-CIO Research Director Rudy Oswald linked the deteriorating trade picture to "the bankruptcy of U.S. trade and economic policies."

The "tremendous" increase in imports, Oswald said, "demonstrates an absence of a coherent and effective U.S. policy. On top of that, the macroeconomic policies of the Reagan Administration have worsened the crisis by leading to a dollar that has appreciated 58 percent since 1980."

Dollar impact

The overvalued dollar, he said, has priced U.S. exports out of world markets while giving imports a wide cost advantage in both domestic and other foreign markets.

Oswald pointed out that the damage is especially deep in manufacturing where the deficit for such goods as tires, paper, textiles, iron and steel and other metals is up 65 percent over last year.

In machinery and transportation equipment, the trade balance plunged from a $96.4-million surplus in the first six months of 1983 to a $15.3-billion deficit this year. Imports in the category increased 44 percent.

For other goods, such as clothing, shoes and toys, the deficit increased 68.5 percent over the 1983 period, because of a 35-percent increase in imports.

The American Iron & Steel Institute charged that a "surge" of imported steel into the U.S. market has stunted the domestic industry's attempts to recover from its depression.

The industry group pointed to government data showing steel imports in June up 38 percent over the same month last year. For the first six months of 1984, AISI said, imports accounted for 24.2 percent of the U.S. market, 73 percent higher than the same period last year.

House defies veto warning on food bill

The House passed overwhelmingly a veto-threatened hunger relief bill that would undo some of the cutbacks in the food stamp program that were inflicted early in the Reagan Administration.

Although the legislation was based on the recommendations of a presidential task force, Office of Management & Budget Director David Stockman protested it would be too costly. In addition, he complained, it would "repeal important reforms" in the food stamp program. Stockman said he will recommend that President Reagan veto the measure if the Senate also approves it.

Bipartisan effort

Despite the Administration's opposition, the House passed the bill by a 364-39 vote, with a majority of Republicans joining in support.

The legislation slightly increases food stamp benefits for all recipients—an average of 63 cents a month—and allows homeless persons to receive assistance.

Its main change, however, is an increased allowance for work-related and household expenses that can be deducted from income limits on food stamp eligibility and higher limits on other deductions. These include child care expenses and housing and utility costs.

The effect would be to allow low-income employed persons to obtain more food stamp assistance. In large measure, the changes made by the bill would restore the income exemptions to the level that existed before the cutbacks imposed on the program by the so-called Gramm-Latta budget that Congress enacted in 1981.

Another provision of the bill expands the definition of disabled persons who are entitled to food stamps on a more liberal income and assets test.

African exchange

Eleven African trade union women exchange views with AFL-CIO International Affairs Director Irving Brown, right, at the conclusion of a three-week, work-study tour of the United States. The unionists, from Liberia, Lesotho, Kenya, Botswana, Mauritius, Zimbabwe and South Africa, visited local unions across the country and participated in education projects including an on-the-job meeting with unionists in Richmond, Va. The federation's African-American Labor Center sponsored the tour. AALC Executive Director Patrick J. O'Farrell is next to Brown.

Unions denounce Reagan scheme to tax workers on fringe benefits

A federal tax system that is already tilted against wage-earners would be made even more inequitable by proposals to levy additional taxes on workers based on the value of their job-related fringe benefits, union witnesses warned at Senate hearings.

Fringe benefits are increasingly being eyed by the Reagan Administration and some members of Congress as a source of tax revenue without a general tax increase. And the Administration has already proposed—under the guise of seeking to lower health care costs—a limit on the tax-free premium employers could provide for health insurance coverage of their workers.

AFL-CIO Associate Legislative Director Robert McGlotten and other union witnesses challenged the assumptions of such proposals—and the fairness.

The deficits that lead to pressure for new revenue sources stem from the Reagan Administration's "tax giveaways" to the wealthy and to the virtual elimination of the corporate income tax, McGlotten stressed. Further, he noted, some of the tax changes enacted this year to reduce the revenue loss fall hardest on workers. The final version of the tax bill also failed to renew the current tax-exempt status of employer-provided legal services and educational benefits.

McGlotten warned that tax policies designed to discourage health plans providing comprehensive coverage would reverse "decades of progress" in insuring workers against the cost of illness. He reminded the panel that many of the fringe benefits that would be affected by tax changes were shaped through years of bargaining that often involved concessions in one contract area in exchange for improvements in others.

Wrong approach

Sen. Bob Packwood (R-Ore.), who presided at the hearings as chairman of the Subcommittee on Taxation, also was critical of the proposals to tax various worker benefits. He suggested that discouraging the private sector from providing benefits to its workers would build pressure for an expansion of government-funded benefits.

Union witnesses testifying at the hearings included:

● Auto Workers Legislative Director Dick Warden, who stressed the distinction between negotiated benefits received in cash, such as fully taxed vacation and holiday pay, and those benefits "which are only rendered as services and cannot be converted to cash."

Warden said the imposition of income or payroll taxes on such non-cash benefits as health insurance, education assistance and group legal services "is unacceptable because it would increase the tax burden of the average worker while nothing is added to his or her earnings."

● President John DeConcini of the Bakery, Confectionery & Tobacco Workers spoke with pride of the comprehensive health care and pension plans negotiated by the union, with portability for workers who change employers. But he warned that such programs, which meet an important social need, "will be severely injured" if tax policy is changed to discourage them and it becomes more costly for employers to provide benefits than pay out the money in wages.

Legislative exclusion

● For the Food & Commercial Workers, Michael L. Tiner urged Congress to continue and make permanent the exclusion of legal service benefits for workers from taxation. Packwood has introduced legislation to that effect. Tiner, the UFCW's assistant government affairs director, acknowledged the pressures on Congress to find new revenue sources. But in doing so, he urged, Congress should "look to those who benefited most" from the tax cuts enacted in 1981 and who now should "share in the burden of cutting the deficit."

● Robert A. Georgine, who heads the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept., testified for the National Coordinating Committee for Multiemployer Plans in strong opposition to the "disturbing trend" toward using tax policy to limit employer-provided benefits. That's not the way to achieve efficiency and cost containment goals, Georgine insisted.

● Teachers Vice President Loretta Johnson said ending the tax-exempt status of educational benefits provided to workers falls heaviest on minorities and low-paid employees. She cited the social benefits that have come from such AFT programs as free college courses for paraprofessionals that have enabled many to move to higher skills and in some cases qualify as teachers.

Labor-backed youth jobs bill passes House subcommittee

A House subcommittee has approved a youth jobs bill designed to help needy teenagers complete high school and gain employment skills.

The legislation, sponsored by Rep. Augustus F. Hawkins (D-Calif.), was backed by the AFL-CIO as the "right way" to approach the problem of youth unemployment. By contrast, the Reagan Administration solution is to cut the minimum wage for teenagers from $3.35 an hour to $2.50 from May through September.

Under the Hawkins bill, the federal government would help fund after-school and summer jobs for needy youngsters, aged 16 through 19, with preference to those doing poorly at school and most likely to drop out and join the high-unemployment ranks of the unskilled.

Participants in the program would be monitored to assure continued attendance in classes and progress in their academic courses.

The legislation is expected to be approved by the full House Education & Labor Committee, clearing it for the House floor. But there is little likelihood of the Senate taking up a companion bill that has been introduced by Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.).

Burford resigns

In other congressional developments:

● Overwhelming congressional disapproval of a presidential appointment bore results as Anne M. Burford resigned as head of an environmental advisory panel. The post didn't require confirmation, but both the Senate and House had voted by bipartisan majorities to ask President Reagan to withdraw the appointment. Burford's reign as administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency had been marked by serious charges of political cronyism and inaction on polluters.

● With Republicans and Democrats vying for election-year credit, the Senate voted 86-3 to assure a cost-of-living increase next January for social security recipients even if the inflation rate since the last rise is below the 3 percent trigger level. The most recent estimate was that it would come to 2.9 percent.

President Reagan, under fire for his record of hostility to social security, supported the waiver at his last news conference, and the Senate acted two days later. The wage base on which social security taxes are paid is increased proportionately to keep up with the inflation rate. The effect would be to increase the tax paid by workers making more than the present base of $37,800 a year.

The House has not yet acted on the bill. Under present law inflation under 3 percent is carried over to the following year in determining the cost-of-living increase. But eliminating the ceiling would mean that the beneficiaries get the raise a year earlier than otherwise.

● Senate passage of a postal appropriations bill assured continuation of reduced rates for publications of non-profit organizations, including union newspapers and journals, to avoid a steep rise in postage costs.

● A House-Senate conference will shape the final version of legislation to reauthorize and toughen the federal law regulating the treatment and disposal of toxic wastes. The White House had been cool to many of its provisions, and the bill was stalled in the Senate for a full year.

But under political pressure from environmentalists, the White House changed signals and Majority Leader Howard Baker told the Senate he expected President Reagan to sign it. The bill passed the Senate unanimously and must now be meshed with a somewhat more stringent measure the House passed last November.

Strike continues at 6 Las Vegas hotels

Las Vegas, Nev.—Some 1,400 members of the Hotel Employees & Restaurant Employees locals here remain on strike against six hotels that insist on keeping scabs that they hired after the Apr. 2 walkout.

The holdout hotels are the Hyatt-owned Four Queens, Sam's Town and the California, all members of the Nevada Resorts Association, as well as the Holiday Inn South, Holiday International and the Marina Hotel.

HERE organizer Bill Grandfield said no negotiating sessions have been held since the holdouts issued the demand to keep the "permanent replacements." He added that the Hyatt Four Queens had asked to meet with union negotiators, even though it stands firm on keeping the scabs.

Grandfield said the Hyatt negotiators were no longer willing to accept the provisions agreed to by the 26 major hotels and prefer to seek "takebacks" from the union.

HERE is continuing its informational campaign against the holdouts by running newspaper ads and leafleting the Olympics in Los Angeles.

A scuffle at the Marina Hotel between security guards and pickets resulted in one female picket receiving a broken arm and another elderly striker being taken to the hospital after she received cuts and bruises from being shoved to the ground.

are going to break, "they couldn't be more wrong."

"This union is no stranger to struggle. We know how to stand tall."

Most of the strikers work for non-profit hospitals and nursing homes represented by the League of Voluntary Hospitals & Homes, others for establishments represented by the Association of Voluntary Nursing Homes, and some for non-affiliated employers.

The union is seeking a 10-percent pay increase, with improvements in hours, overtime, holiday and vacation provisions, sick leave, promotions and layoff protections. Other contract issues involve workplace safety and health.

Guaranteed weekends

A major rallying point has been the union's call for the guaranteed right to have "every other weekend off." Many of the picket signs carry this demand in the letters "EOWO."

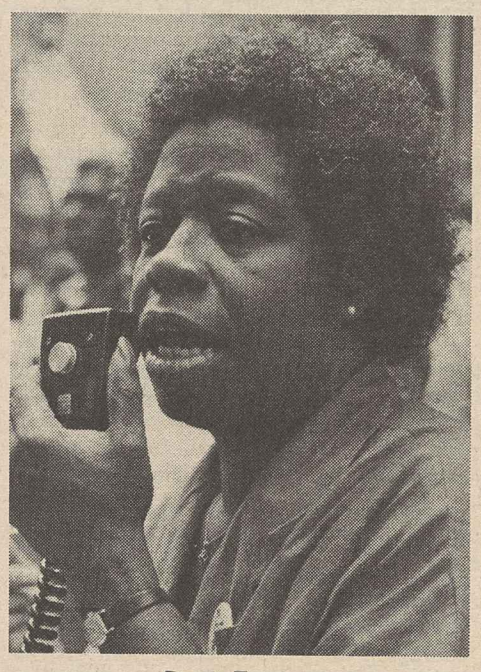
It's a matter of dignity, Turner explained. People want an assurance of a weekend off as a matter of right, not something that is at the whim or scheduling convenience of management.

The non-profit hospitals receive most of their funds through the New York State Health Dept. reimbursement system, and a group of prominent public officials has called on the state to press hospital managements for an accounting of state funds and a settlement of the strike.

Payments from the state will increase 6.5 percent this year and 6.2 percent next year —a percentage substantially greater than they have offered their workers.

Some 3,000 nurses represented by District 1199 joined the picket line, but nurses in three hospitals were under a court order to return to work.

At Long Island College Hospital and St. Mary's, the nurses reluctantly did so. But at St. John's Episcopal Hospital, they stayed out, awaiting the rehiring of the eight nurses the hospital had fired at the beginning of the strike. A federal district judge has threatened to impose $15,000-a-day fines on the union if the nurses refuse.



Doris Turner

Meanwhile, the strike continued to spread as two additional hospitals and a nursing home were struck on Aug. 1. The union's tally shows 42 hospitals, 14 nursing homes and three ambulatory health clinics on strike.

At a breakfast meeting with District 1199 leaders, some 50 representatives of New York City unions pledged their support—including financial aid and picket line reinforcement.

Three federal mediators have met at various times with the two sides, but union negotiators say there has been little management movement at the bargaining table.

Poverty rise tied to unfair program cuts

The weak economy was the most disastrous factor forcing married-couple families into poverty, CRS said. Nearly 10 percent of the overall 12 percent increase in poverty for this group came as a result of the recession.

The ravaged economy also accounted for most of a 10 percent increase in poverty among working adults, CRS data showed.

Rich benefit

In a separate analysis, Representatives Charles Rangel (D-N.Y.) and Rep. Robert Matsui (D-Calif.) charged that the Reagan tax program resulted in hefty tax hikes for the poor while easing the share paid by the rich.

Using Census Bureau data, the Rangel-Matsui study calculated that federal taxes paid by households below the official poverty line rose at least 58 percent between 1980 and 1982. Over that period, the study found that the number of poor families paying taxes also doubled.

Rangel and Matsui said the tax burden for a family of four living at the poverty line was $460 in 1980, but after the Reagan tax changes, the tab rose to $946 for 1982 and will reach $1,076 in the current year.

The official poverty line for such families was $8,414 in annual pre-tax income in 1980 and $9,862 in 1982.

Refute Reaganomics

Rangel and Matsui, who serve on the tax-writing Ways & Means Committee, said the figures help to refute Reagan's statements that his economic policies don't hurt the poor.

"These dramatic increases in tax burdens for low-income families contrast vividly with the reductions that have been afforded the affluent and many large corporations," they said.

The congressmen also called for changing the way the official poverty line is set so that it will be based on after-tax income. The system would give a more accurate picture of a family's spendable cash. The Administration not only opposes that change, but also wants to have such non-cash benefits as food stamps and housing assistance added to the tally for determining who's poor.

The two Democrats pointed out that the Census Bureau tally at 34.4 million Americans living in poverty in 1982 would have been 37.6 million if the data had been based on after-tax income. Matsui and Rangel questioned the bureau's latest figures on the same grounds.

Georgia study finds poor worse off under Reagan

The Reagan Administration may be claiming that its deep cuts in social programs hurt no one, but the facts prove otherwise, a new study on hardship clearly demonstrates.

Titled "Coping with Poverty: Working Poor Families in Georgia," the study focused on the lives of 207 poor, female-headed families who lost all benefits under the Aid to Families with Dependent Children program as a direct result of the Reagan restrictions.

The study by the Washington-based Center for the Study of Social Policy was funded by the Ford Foundation. It is one of a series of efforts underwritten by the foundation to assess the impact of the Reagan budget cuts on working welfare recipients.

It found that the increased hardship among the Georgia families clearly refutes the Administration's statements that only "the undeserving," or people with "considerable outside income" would be touched by the cuts.

"The 1981 budget cuts in AFDC," the study said, "although touted as 'welfare reform' did not reform the program in any positive way. Instead, they made many working mothers poorer, increasing financial hardship for a group of families government should be supporting—those willing and able to work but who cannot raise their families out of poverty on their wages alone."

All of the women who participated in the Georgia study were single parents who worked and received some welfare assistance before the 1981 budget cuts. All lost AFDC between October 1981 and June 1982 as a result of the new Reagan eligibility rules because their gross incomes exceeded a ceiling of $549 a month for families in Georgia, and because the new formula for benefit calculation was tightened to disqualify many working recipients.

Rock-bottom benefits

The study pointed out that state welfare benefits in Georgia are among the lowest in the nation, and only because the state legislature raised its own meager benefits slightly—and because of the availability of federal food stamps—were many of the families able to subsist at all.

About half the mothers interviewed had completed high school, 10 percent had some training after high school but none had completed college. About half lived in households with other adults—many because they had been forced to give up their own homes.

All of the women had held one or more jobs over nearly the entire period studied, and virtually all held service, factory or clerical jobs. Most earned less than $4 an hour.

Child care and health care for their children and themselves were found to be major problems. Few of the mothers held jobs that provided more than minimal fringe benefits, and health care problems were intensified, the study pointed out, because the families lost Medicaid when they lost AFDC.

The average gross earnings for the families at the time their benefits were cut off was $447 a month—rising when AFDC and food stamps were included to about $609 a month. But without AFDC, and even with a slight increase in food stamps, the families' total monthly pre-tax income dropped after the cuts to about $554.

The study also pointed out that after the cuts, many families with a working mother actually had less disposable income than those with a non-working mother supporting her family solely on welfare.

Yet the working mothers stressed that they wanted to work, and expressed some embarrassment at taking "welfare" at all. Since only 12 percent were able to make up for their AFDC loss through increasing their earnings, the families responded to the increased hardship by paring monthly expenses, including many basic necessities. Many borrowed money from finance companies, family or friends. About 30 percent had no telephone.

Many turned to charities for clothing and food, and 82 percent reported that they had run entirely out of money within the previous year including one-third who said they had run out of food completely at times.

Hurting the poor

"In the end," the report concluded, "it appears the Administration simply wanted to save money by cutting families off welfare—strictly a budgetary goal."

What happened in 1981, the study said, did not take into account the complexity of the crucial federal-state partnership that characterizes AFDC, "nor did the Administration take the time to find out who they would be cutting off AFDC and what effect such an action would have on these families."

Membership signal

ITU election margin rejects Teamster ties

Colorado Springs, Colo. — Robert S. McMichen's election as president of the Typographical Union over incumbent Joseph Bingel by a nearly 2-1 margin signaled the membership's rejection of a proposed merger of the ITU with the unaffiliated Teamsters. Two other incumbent officers were defeated in the Labor Dept.-supervised rerun election.

And in San Francisco, U.S. District Court Judge Thelton E. Henderson's continuance until Sept. 17 of a court-imposed injunction blocks a merger referendum vote on Sept. 19 that had been planned by the pro-Teamsters board members. The injunction prohibits the union's officers from taking any action toward merger with any other union.

McMichen, along with Billy Joe Austin of Denver and William Boarman of Washington, opposed merger with the Teamsters, favoring instead a merger with an AFL-CIO affiliate, the Graphic Communications Union.

The McMichen slate in a statement stressed that its victory shows "the members of the ITU cherish our long democratic tradition and will never allow it to be put up for sale." It proves "that the overwhelming majority of ITU members have no desire to be absorbed by the Teamsters union," the statement said.

Natural ally

The statement added, "The vote indicates a clear interest in pursuing merger" with GCIU, "our most logical, natural ally. We plan to pursue and, we hope in time, to consumate the merger with GCIU, or if that is not possible, with another union in the mainstream of U.S. and Canadian labor."

The Labor Dept. announced the preliminary vote totals on July 27 and gave the candidates until Aug. 6 to file any challenges.

If challenges are filed, the Labor Dept. is to rule on them within 30 days. If there are no challenges, the vote tallies will be certified and the officers sworn into office prior to the union's September convention.

The Labor Dept.'s preliminary totals gave McMichen 28,167 votes to Bingel's 15,296. In the vice presidential elections, Austin defeated incumbent Robert L. Wartinger, 24,157 to 17,237; Boarman topped incumbent Raymond Brown, 23,918 to 17,699 and incumbent Alan J. Heritage, who ran unopposed for the slot reserved for a Mailer member, received 29,757.

Kopeck re-elected

Incumbent Sec.-Treas. Thomas W. Kopeck was re-elected over challenger Robert Petersen of Washington, 24,569 to 18,532.

McMichen had previously defeated Bingel by 5,000 votes in the elections held in November 1983. The union's canvassing board set aside the results of those elections amid charges of campaign irregularities and promised to reschedule them in the spring of 1984. It also allowed Bingel to remain in office.

In the interim, Bingel and the other officers worked out a merger document with the Teamsters and scheduled a referendum vote for May 16.

McMichen requested the Labor Dept. to investigate the election and the canvassing board's actions, while his supporters filed suit in San Francisco to block the referendum. The court issued an injunction blocking the merger vote until the Labor Dept.'s rerun election determined the leadership of the union.

On June 19, just prior to the voting in the rerun election, Bingel and the other officers set Sept. 19 as the date of the Teamster merger vote.

Judge Henderson's action to deny the ITU's request to dissolve the injunction will prevent the outgoing officers from acting to notify the membership of the referendum as required under the ITU constitution. Thus, the Sept. 19 merger vote will not be able to be held, according to attorney Stephen Berzon, who represented the six McMichen supporters who sued to block the May 16 referendum.

Unions protest abandonment of Women's Bureau mission

The Reagan Administration's willful disregard of the interests of wage-earning women is reflected in the present policies and programs of the Women's Bureau of the Labor Dept., union witnesses charged at House hearings.

Ellen Wernick of the Coalition of Labor Union Women and Pat Thomas, Service Employees' education director, testified that under the Reagan Administration, the bureau's activities have been "strangled" and its mission "distorted."

The "historic working relationship between organized labor and the Women's Bureau has all but ceased to exist," they pointed out in their appearance before the Manpower & Housing Subcommittee of the Government Operations Committee.

Budget target

The Administration tried to kill the bureau in 1981 through massive budget cuts, Wernick and Thomas explained. But when that maneuver was headed off through the lobbying efforts of labor and women's groups, the Reagan Labor Dept. used its administrative powers to hamstring the bureau's activities, change long-standing policies and cut off contacts with union women.

The Women's Bureau was established by Congress in 1920 to "promote the welfare of wage-earning women, improve their working conditions, increase their efficiency and advance their opportunities for promotion in employment."

Thomas and Wernick pointed out that until the Reagan Administration took office, the bureau was the official federal resource for information on the status of women in the workforce and for related data. The bureau served as the Labor Dept.'s arm for information on the rights of women under both federal and state laws, and it funded a variety of programs for women workers, including job training. Those functions have been sharply cut, they asserted.

Wernick, who is executive director of CLUW's Center for Education & Research, noted that after its founding in 1974, CLUW was regularly consulted by the Women's Bureau on many issues, and around the country the bureau's regional staff developed working relationships with CLUW leaders and other union women.

But since 1981 those relationships have completely disintegrated, access to the bureau's resources and information have been virtually closed to union women, and organized labor is no longer consulted on or asked to participate in bureau-sponsored activities such as conferences on employment and other working women's issues, Wernick said. She appeared at the hearing on behalf of CLUW President Joyce D. Miller.

Thomas, who chairs Washington Union Women, an informal network of women trade unionists in Washington, D.C., pointed out that in 1972 the bureau was instrumental in the founding of WUW and assigned staff to participate in the group's monthly meetings.

Positive effort

The bureau assisted by maintaining WUW's mailing list, arranging for meeting sites and notifying participants. The project was so successful that the bureau even produced a pamphlet for its regional offices explaining how similar groups could be established.

But in 1983 without notice or explanation, the bureau told WUW that it was ceasing to provide all assistance. A staff representative in Philadelphia—who was prohibited by travel cost restrictions from attending meetings—was assigned as a liaison to WUW.

Mondale, Ferraro off to fast start

Walter F. Mondale and Geraldine A. Ferraro carried the Democratic presidential campaign to enthusiastic crowds from New York to Texas in a week during which the Republican message came through somewhat garbled.

It was a week in which the GOP's "New Right" tried to read a group of moderate senators out of the Republican Party and both President Reagan and Vice President Bush did some waffling on the question of debates with their Democratic challengers.

The Democratic team got a rousing "home-town" sendoff in the Queens, N.Y., district that sent Ferraro to Congress. The New York City borough of nearly 2 million people was decked with Mondale-Ferraro signs, and the political dignitaries who turned out included Gov. Mario Cuomo, Sen. Daniel Moynihan and Mayor Edward Koch.

Both Mondale and Ferraro gave major speeches to the National Urban League conference in Cleveland and then took part in a voter registration rally.

Theme for America

The Urban League audience repeatedly broke into applause as Mondale reiterated his theme of an America in which people can "go as far as their talent and effort will carry them"—and where the American dream doesn't carry a "whites only" sign.

Ferraro, whose place on the ticket was credited by pollster Louis Harris with turning the public opinion trend from a Reagan landslide to a horse race, said the Democratic ticket stands for "full and fair employment . . . educational excellence . . . fair and decent housing."

In Jackson, Miss., Mondale and Ferraro made clear that the once-Democratic Southland wasn't going to be surrendered to President Reagan in this election campaign. They picnicked with farmers and got a warm greeting at a rally at the governor's mansion before starting two days of campaigning in Texas.

Mondale said the formal launching of the campaign in Mississippi and Texas was intended to let southern voters know that "they're important" in the Democratic script for victory in November.

Swinging wildly

Reagan, who had swung wildly at the Democrats the previous week while campaigning in Texas, passed up an invitation to address the Urban League and relied on television coverage of his opening of the Olympics in Los Angeles to keep him in the public eye.

But as the Republican Party prepared for its mid-August convention, the remnants of a once-strong moderate wing were trying without much success to keep the Reaganites from pulling the GOP still further to the right.

On the most substantive issue, the right wing was pressing for a firm platform commitment against any tax increases—a denial of Mondale's contention that an increase to bring down the budget deficit is essential no matter who is elected President. But the credibility problem for the platform writers was that a number of prominent Republicans as well as economists of all persuasions have openly agreed with Mondale.

A leading spokesman for the GOP's right wing, John T. (Terry) Dolan, sought to banish from the Republican Party a group of moderate senators who held an unofficial platform hearing so that organizations and individuals not associated with the Reagan Administration could get a hearing for their views.

Dolan, who is chairman of the National Conservative Political Action Committee, showed up to charge that the real purpose of the hearing was "to trash President Reagan and his Administration."

He told four of the organizers—Senators Lowell Weicker of Connecticut, Charles Mathias of Maryland, John Chafee of Rhode Island and Robert Stafford of Vermont that they should get out of the Republican Party, Dolan told two other senators who had cosponsored the hearings that they should be "more careful of the company they keep" or they'd be in trouble with "the folks back home."

At a higher level, Bush appeared to be having second thoughts about his earlier promise to debate Ferraro.

While he would "like" to debate the Democratic vice presidential candidate, Bush said, some of the Reagan campaign strategists "think it would not be a good idea." Bush said Ferraro has been getting "disproportionate" attention in the campaign.

Debate on debates

Reagan, meanwhile, indicated that he might be willing to engage in two debates with Mondale if they could agree on a format and time, but more than that would be unwise because, according to Reagan, it would "bore the pants off" television viewers.

Mondale's response was a question to the 7,000 people at the Jackson, Miss., rally.

"Would a debate be boring here in Mississippi if we discussed why 10.5 percent of the good people of this state are unemployed, why farmers are having their worst year in history, why the interest rates are rising? Would it bore the pants off the people of Mississippi?"

The shouted response from the crowd was a loud "No."

parties to submit to binding arbitration. A three-member arbitration board then will render a decision within 45 days after it is appointed.

While the Postal Reorganization Act of 1970 spells out the factfinding and arbitration procedures, the parties are free to resolve the impasse by themselves.

The APWU and NALC—the two largest postal unions—said further action against USPS will be decided by delegates to their conventions later this month. The unions will meet separately but simultaneously in Las Vegas, Aug. 20-25.

Administration's role

In their Press Club remarks, Biller and Sombrotto accused the Reagan Administration of casting "its long and sinister shadow" on the postal bargaining long before formal talks got under way. USPS is steered by the Reagan-dominated Board of Governors, which injected "mean-spirited politics" into the collective bargaining process in early April, they said, by claiming that postal workers were overpaid by some 23 percent when compared with private-sector workers.

"So by April, even before the talks got going," the two union leaders said, "our workers were already under attack by an Administration hell-bent on crushing their hopes for a more secure future and a safer workplace."

Biller called on Reagan to have Postmaster Gen. William F. Bolger come up with a fair proposal. He described Bolger as "the most anti-labor Postmaster Generals we've ever had" even while he has feathered his own nest.

Biller cited reports that Bolger was the recipient of a "retirement enrichment" package worth more than $62,000 negotiated by former Board of Governors Chairman Robert L. Hardesty, suggesting that Bolger and his "well-heeled cronies" take care of each other at workers' expense.

Biller also noted that Bolger hired one of the nation's most notorious labor law firms to take part in the contract talks.

"If he took them on a month ago, it is quite clear he wanted to disrupt the negotiations," Biller charged. The union-busting firm involved is Littler, Mendelson, Sastiff & Tichy of San Francisco.

The postal unions' position on USPS's unilateral change in the pay and benefit levels for new hires drew prompt support from Rep. William D. Ford (D-Mich.), chairman of the House Post Office & Civil Service Committee.

In a July 26 letter to Bolger, Ford called the proposed two-tier pay scale illegal under the Postal Reorganization Act and said the damage to postal labor-management relations "is likely to be permanent."

"I am puzzled by this decision," Ford said. "Whatever is achieved by this action is being purchased at the cost of a generation of ill will and devastated morale."

As federal employees, postal workers are forbidden by law to strike. Biller and Sombrotto indicated, however, that there might not be any alternative.

"Whether it's legal or illegal, when workers are pressed to the point where they feel they have no other course of action, they'll take that action," they said in response to a question during their joint appearance at the Press Club.

"Workers pushed up against the wall have the right and the responsibility to withhold their labor as the weapon of last resort," they said.

Roller coaster Reaganomics

Drop in new orders depresses key index

A sharp decline of nine-tenths of 1 percent in the government's index of future economic activity in June "is another sign of the roller coaster effects of Reaganomics," AFL-CIO economists observed.

The decline in the index—the first major reverse in the key measure in nearly two years—indicated further slippage in the economy. June house sales were down 5.3 percent from a year earlier, another portentous indication, and there were big declines also in new orders for machine tools and in construction contracts.

Of the steep drop in the government's leading economic indicators index, Federation Research Director Rudy Oswald said that the June decline in new orders for manufactured consumer goods and materials was "particularly worrisome" for what it signaled about future factory employment.

The drop in the index was the first month of decline since August 1982, when the measure dipped one-tenth of 1 percent. The index is based on a variety of sensitive economic data that usually are the first to register a shift in economic trends. Slight declines have been reported in the past—a one-tenth of 1 percent drop in May, for example—but were later revised as more data came in to the Commerce Dept., which issues the monthly report.

Negative signs

Seven of the 10 indicators that make up the index contributed to the June decline, and the remaining three were on the edge of deterioration, the government reported.

The biggest negative factor in June was the decline in manufacturers' new orders for consumer goods. Another large contributor to the decline was contracts and orders for plant and equipment.

The other five indicators that contributed to the June decline were vendor performance, change in sensitive materials prices, stock prices, new business formation and average weekly initial claims for state unemployment insurance benefits.

The two positive indicators were the pace of building permits, which increased slightly despite a general leveling out of the housing industry, and expansion of the money supply. A 10th indicator—the length of the average workweek—did not change.

In its report on June machine tool orders, the National Machine Tool Builders' Association said orders were down 40 percent from May. The order dip parallels a June decline in capital goods orders of all types reported a week earlier by the Commerce Dept.

New construction contracts were off 10 percent in June from the May level, F. W. Dodge reported. The sharpest drop occurred in utility construction, which "fell almost to the vanishing point," Dodge said.

On a regional basis, construction gains during the first half of the year were strongest in the Midwest and Northeast.

Meanwhile, the Labor Dept. reported another rise in productivity in the nonfarm sector of the economy. The rise in the second quarter was 3.3 percent, at an annual rate, and followed a 2.6 percent increase in the January-March period.

Second-quarter manufacturing productivity rose at a 3.2 percent rate, weaker than the first period's 3.7 percent rate.

Nine-state poll shows voters supporting curb on imports

Most voters in the nation's major industrial states strongly favor tougher U.S. restraints on job-destroying imports, according to a public opinion poll commissioned by the Steelworkers.

In the survey of likely voters in nine key industrial states, 76 percent of those questioned said the federal government should take a tougher position on imports. Nine out of ten respondents said they believe it is unfair for American workers to lose their jobs because of subsidized foreign imports, and 65 percent of the voters said they would favor specific limits—such as quotas—on steel imports.

Those who favor import restraints said they are needed to have jobs, and 78 percent of all respondents—including 90 percent of those who support import limits—agreed that the loss of American jobs to imports is a real, current problem that should be stopped.

The telephone survey was conducted in June by Fingerhut/Granados Opinion Research among a sample of likely voters in Pennsylvania, Ohio, Illinois, Texas, Michigan, Indiana, Kentucky, Alabama and Missouri.

Steelworkers President Lynn Williams said the poll shows "that the general public shares the opinions I hear our own members express every day. The problem of jobs and the issue of trade are inseparable."

In the survey, the researchers also found deep concern over both the failure of American business to reinvest resources in basic industry here and the use of subsidies by foreign governments to make their exports cheaper.

The poll showed that 77 percent of the voters favor "requiring American steel companies to reinvest profits in modernization of their plants," and 88 percent believed that foreign governments are helping to destroy American industry and jobs by subsidizing their own industries to help undercut U.S. products.

Wages up 2.8% in major contracts

Major collective bargaining agreements negotiated in private industry during the first six months of 1984 will yield average wage increases of 2.6 percent in the first year and 2.8 percent annually over the life of the contracts, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

The last time the same parties bargained —two or three years ago in most cases— the comparable figures were 7.6 and 6.6 percent, respectively, BLS said.

In the second quarter alone, negotiated wage increases averaged 2.3 percent in both the first year and annually over the life of the contracts. First-quarter settlements averaged 3.1 percent in the first year and 3.4 percent annually during the contract periods.

The first-half figures—2.6 percent in the first year and 2.8 percent annually over term—matched the average increases for all 1983 settlements.

Major contracts are those covering bargaining units with at least 1,000 workers. Settlements during the first half of this year covered 834,000 workers.

As of June 30, however, another 866,000 workers were under contracts that had expired or reopened but had not been renewed. BLS explained that these workers continued to be covered by the terms of their prior agreements, except for about 4 percent who were involved in work stoppages. About 45 percent of the workers covered by expired contracts were in railroad transportation, with another 21 percent in construction.

In a breakdown of the first-half settlements, BLS said that nearly three-fourths of the workers covered had wage increases averaging 4.6 percent in the first contract year, while one-fifth had no wage change and the rest had decreases.

"One-fifth of those with no wage changes or decreases in the first year will have subsequent wage increases that will result in a net gain for the contract term," BLS added. "Thus, by the end of their contracts, nearly four-fifths of the workers will have an increase in wages, averaging 4.1 percent a year.

Wage increases negotiated in the first six months of this year were in a variety of industries, including petroleum refining, public utilities, water transportation, construction, airlines, and building service and maintenance.

Settlements with no specified wage changes over their life were primarily in the construction industry, but appeared also in the shoe, primary metals, can, transportation equipment, textile manufacturing and transportation industries.

BLS said that 21 percent of all workers under first-half settlements were covered by cost-of-living adjustments, compared with 57 percent of all workers under existing major agreements. The COL adjustments are not included in the settlement average increases since they depend on future changes in the government's consumer price index.

In contracts covering 5,000 or more workers, combined wages and benefits increased an average 4.3 percent in the first year of the pacts and 3.9 percent annually over the contract term, about a third higher than the increases for all 1983 settlements.

Utility Workers win pact in 6-week Detroit strike

Detroit—Some 3,600 members of Utility Workers Local 223 ended a six-week strike against Detroit Edison Co., after approving a new three-year contract providing for wage and benefit increases.

Hourly wages, which averaged $13.23 under the old contract, will rise an average of 39 cents in the first year, 34 cents in the second and 39.5 cents in the third. The union also won a slight improvement in the cost-of-living adjustment formula.

Some key issues in the strike, the longest ever against Detroit Edison, were health care and reinstatement of strikers discharged during the walkout.

No Longer a Game

AMERICA'S POSTAL employees and their unions are indignant—outraged at the blatant union-busting tactics employed by the U.S. Postal Service in the current round of collective bargaining.

They have good reason for indignation.

Bargaining within the strictures that Congress set for the postal service has never been smooth or easy. But until now it has been successful, despite a few trips to the brink. Contracts covering more than half a million workers have been regularly negotiated and ratified. A provision in the law for binding arbitration if contract talks are deadlocked has seldom had to be invoked.

It's been different this year, with a governing board appointed by President Reagan apparently calling the signals.

As starters, management insisted that the purpose of the contract negotiations should be to determine how best to bring down pay levels.

Management agreed that productivity had gone up, that employees were turning out more work. But it took the view that the pay scales it had negotiated in the last round of bargaining were simply too high.

In an editorial comment at the time, the AFL-CIO News suggested that the U.S. Postal Service was engaging in a bit of gamesmanship not unknown in contract negotiations. The editorial concluded: "Fun is fun, but it's time to get down to serious bargaining. Too much is at stake."

Now, it turns out that there was nothing subtle about the postal management bargaining tactics. What you saw was what you got.

NOT ONLY DID management not budge in any significant way from its original demand, but it defied the clear intent of the arbitration provision of the law setting up the U.S. Postal Service by announcing that it would go ahead with a two-tier wage system unilaterally.

Earlier, it had brought in for the management bargaining team a member of one of those "labor law" firms that show up to give advice to employers trying to keep a union out or get a union decertified.

With the apparent endorsement of the Reagan Administration, the U.S. Postal Service has delivered an ugly message to its employees. Collective bargaining is out, union-busting is in.

Presidential Advice

PRESIDENT REAGAN injected himself into some delicate and important labor-management relations the other day, although it's hard to tell from his rambling response to a television interviewer whether he meant to do so.

The question was about the auto negotiations and the President suggested that the workers show "restraint" so as not to "turn off the recovery" despite record industry profits. He did acknowledge that auto workers had made "concessions" when their companies were losing money and he didn't think government should interfere in the negotiations.

On that last point, a loud Amen.

As for the President's advice to the worker side of the bargaining table to exercise restraint, it would have been taken less amiss if he had shown some flash of concern earlier this year when the auto industry executives voted themselves huge bonuses to celebrate the return to profitability.

The union representatives have been seeking responsible paths to a permanently stable automobile industry and their bargaining position has been reasonable by any fair standard. But neither the industry's greed nor the President's ill-advised comments makes the negotiating task any easier.

Asbestos victims decry flawed OSHA proposal

By Press Associates, Inc.

James Simmons started work at the Union Asbestos & Rubber Co. in Paterson, N.J., in 1948. On his first day, he punched his time card and was told to report to shipping and warehouse. "There was dust everywhere. I was told that I would get used to the dust," he recalled.

Since the 1930s, the dangers of workplace exposure to asbestos dust were known from mortality studies of U.S. and British workers. But Simmons and his fellow workers "were never told that asbestos was dangerous to our health."

Although they had their suspicions, they didn't find out for sure until the plant closed in 1954. As an officer of the Clothing & Textile Workers local at the plant, Simmons helped initiate the series of medical examinations conducted by Dr. Irving Selikoff which formed the basis of the doctor's landmark 1964 study that blew the lid off the asbestos industry's coverup.

In 1980, Simmons, 68, was diagnosed as having asbestosis, a disabling, progressive lung disease. He was awarded a total of $3,300 in workers' compensation based on 1954 benefit levels. He also was awarded medical benefits, but these ended in 1982 when the company filed for bankruptcy to escape asbestos-related disability claims. His savings are nearly exhausted now.

Advancing illness

"My health at this time is very poor," Simmons said. "I have half a stomach. My lungs are full of asbestos. I have severe shortness of breath."

Simmons and other victims of asbestos-related disease came to Washington recently to reinforce the testimony by health and safety experts that proposals by the Occupational Safety & Health Administration to regulate workplace exposure to asbestos are grossly inadequate. OSHA's proposed limit on airborne asbestos is little better than the current standard and its proposal to permit respirator masks to substitute for plant engineering controls will result in many more deaths, they testified at an OSHA hearing.

Shirley Thomas still works at the R.M. Industrial Products Co. in Charleston, S.C., despite an advanced case of asbestosis. She said she must support her children and work long enough for pension eligibility. She added that she also needs the company's medical benefits, since she can't find another job because of her disability.

The plant where Thomas works was where in 1935 lung cancer for the first time in the United States was traced to worker exposure to asbestos. The industry's attempt to hide the hazards of breathing asbestos continues today.

Victim of a lie

Thomas, 45, said she feels "like the victim of a lie. I have worn four or five different types of respirators, and I was told that it was supposed to keep me from inhaling the dust. But it did not protect me."

"My health will keep deteriorating day by day, year by year," Thomas continued. "The swelling of the joints, the leg pains. Walking uphill or downhill makes me short of breath. The constant colds and coughing, the gasping for breath is nerve-wracking and a very hard strain on my family."

Sometimes, Thomas said, "you feel like killing yourself, just knowing that your death will be slow and painful, and knowing that you will be on medication and feeling pain for the rest of your life. The burden that your family will have to bear for your suffering, and the costs to them."

James Drye, chief steward and safety representative of ACTWU Local 1836 at the Charleston plant, detailed other worker concerns. He said, "Even the company doctors don't want to tell us about the dangers of asbestos. The only time we find out is when our union calls a meeting or sends us some information or when we read about it in the newspapers."

In factories, shipyards, construction sites and schools across the country, the victims are still lining up for work each morning. The tragedy which awaits many of them can be prevented.

LEGISLATIVE ALERT!

Reagan Asks Congress for Unfair Tax and Budget Amendments

President Reagan goes into the Congressional home stretch seeking legislation to establish enterprise zones and tuition tax credits--unfair programs that would cost billions of dollars in addition to the rest of his proposed budget:

1. DEFENSE SPENDING: $272 Billion
2. "ENTITLEMENT" PROGRAMS: $441 Billion
3. INTEREST ON NATIONAL DEBT: $116 Billion
4. OTHER PROGRAMS: $132 Billion

Then the President says, "I have no plans for a tax increase." But (1) Reagan opposes any tampering with his huge defense increases. (2) He promises to maintain "safety net" entitlement programs and even asked for a Social Security increase. (3) Interest payments on the national debt must be made. (4) That leaves "other programs" totalling $132 billion.

Someone should tell the President that it's impossible to eliminate a $180-billion deficit by making cuts in programs whose total cost is $132 billion. Even if he abolished all those programs --closed the federal courts, let interstate highways fall apart, closed the State Department, shut down the space program, and so on-- he would have a deficit approaching $50 billion.

Taxes must be raised to close the deficit. The question is: who will pay? Reagan asks for new taxes on workers' health insurance. Democratic Presidential candidate Mondale, noting that many millionaires and profitable corporations pay no taxes, has called for reforms to restore fairness.

Reagan Asks Congress for "Enterprise Zones," Tuition Tax Credits, Balanced Budget Amendment

For those who may have forgotten, President Reagan's industrial policy is tax cuts for corporations. His Caribbean policy is tax cuts for corporations which export U.S. jobs to that region. His youth employment policy is subminimum wages--and higher corporate profits.

At his July 24 press conference Reagan made a pitch for "enterprise zone" urban policy. Enterprise zones are tax cuts for corporations located in certain urban districts. They would increase the deficit another $1 billion over three years.

Reagan also asked Congress to pass tuition tax credit legislation. While public schools suffer from Reagan budget cuts, he wants to give tax cuts to parents who can afford private schools. The cost: more than $1 billion per year.

Finally, Reagan asked Congress to approve a Constitutional amendment to force balanced budgets. None of the four budgets Reagan has proposed since 1981 has been balanced; in fact, Reagan deficits are roughly three times those of the Carter Administration.

WHAT YOU CAN DO: Urge your Senators and Representative to oppose the Reagan enterprise zone, tuition tax credit, and balanced budget Constitutional amendment legislation.

98th Congress Only Weeks from Adjournment; Here's an Issue Update

Congress is planning to adjourn in October, and will be in recess August 13 through September 5 for the Republican National Convention. So it has only a few more weeks to complete action on issues of concern to working people. Following is a progress report on the AFL-CIO's legislative priorities for 1984:

LABOR'S KEY ISSUE ENDS IN VICTORY: CONGRESS OKs BANKRUPTCY REFORMS TO PROTECT UNION CONTRACTS

The worst threat to union contracts in recent memory came on Feb. 22, 1984, when the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that companies filing for bankruptcy reorganization could unilaterally break collective bargaining agreements.

The AFL-CIO and its affiliated unions immediately began a campaign to urge Congress to overrule the court and restore protections to labor contracts. The House quickly passed reform legislation, but several anti-union Senators held up Senate action. After several delays and many tense moments, a compromise was reached that provides meaningful protection to workers. See July 23 Alert! for details.

REAGAN'S UNQUALIFIED, ANTI-WORKER NOMINEE FOR NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS POST STILL ON HOLD

President Reagan nominated Rosemary Collyer for the post of National Labor Relations Board general counsel. When a worker files a charge of unfair labor practices, only the general counsel can issue a formal complaint and get the wheels of justice turning.

Collyer not only is almost completely inexperienced in labor law; she also has shown an anti-worker bias in her work on job safety and health issues. As head of the Mine Safety & Health Review Commission, Collyer showed a consistent bias in favor of employers and against workers.

WHAT YOU CAN DO: Urge your Senators to oppose the nomination of Rosemary Collyer for NLRB general counsel.

WHAT HAPPENED TO HEALTH CARE, MORTGAGE HELP FOR THE JOBLESS? GOP SENATE STONEWALLED BOTH

President Reagan threw the country into the worst postwar recession in order to bring down the rate of inflation. The Democratic-controlled House responded to the AFL-CIO's calls for recession-relief programs. The House voted to provide a measure of health insurance for the unemployed, as well as a limited program of loans to help unemployed homeowners avoid foreclosure.

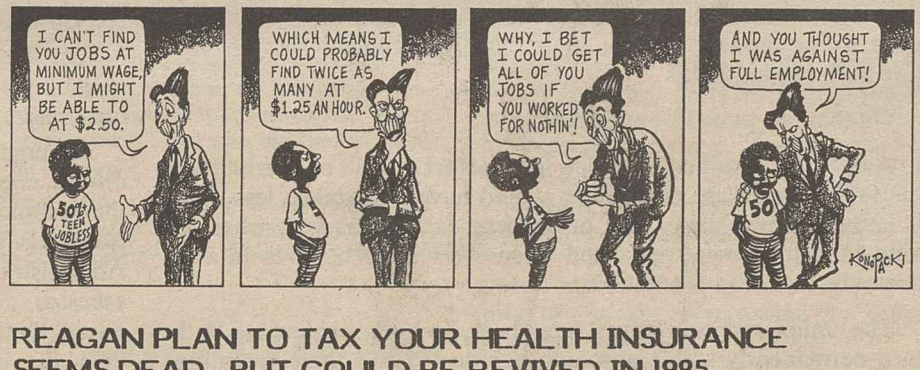
The Republican-controlled Senate, which had led the way in passing Reaganomics and bringing on the recession, turned its back on its victims and stonewalled these attempts to provide help to the jobless.

SUBMINIMUM WAGE DISCRIMINATES AGAINST YOUTH; REP. HAWKINS HAS A BETTER IDEA

President Reagan's proposal to solve the youth unemployment problem is to allow employers to pay teens $2.50 per hour instead of the regular $3.35 minimum wage. Employers could fire adults and replace them with teenagers, with no real increase in jobs.

Sen. Augustus Hawkins (D-CA) has a better idea. His bill, H.R. 5017, would provide part-time jobs during the school year and full-time summer jobs to underprivileged teens who remain in school or return to school and who maintain good performance both in school and on the job.

WHAT YOU CAN DO: Urge your legislators to oppose the Reagan subminimum wage scheme. Ask your Representative to cosponsor and support H.R. 5017, and your Senators to support the equivalent S. 2397.



REAGAN PLAN TO TAX YOUR HEALTH INSURANCE SEEMS DEAD--BUT COULD BE REVIVED IN 1985

The Reagan Administration has been asking Congress to approve a new tax on health insurance provided to workers as a fringe benefit of employment. House and Senate committees kept this scheme out of their deficit-reduction measures this year. But with budget deficits approaching $200 billion each year, Congress will continue to search for new revenues, so we'll have to watch this issue in 1985.

DOMESTIC CONTENT BILL WOULD RESTORE JOBS IN AUTO MANUFACTURING, RELATED INDUSTRIES; PASSED BY HOUSE BUT STOPPED IN GOP SENATE

Domestic content legislation would require auto and truck manufacturers with large sales volume in the United States to produce portions of their vehicles here. It would restore up to a million U.S. jobs in auto manufacturing and its many related industries, including steel, plastics, electronics, rubber, glass, and textiles.

The House voted 219-199 to approve the content bill, but the Senate bill has not progressed beyond hearings. The Reagan Administration opposes content legislation.

Congress votes pension equity

Metal Trades unions "bury" the unaffiliated union that lost its bid to take over their bargaining unit.

Ferraro bill knocks down sex barriers

By David L. Perlman

Congress voted final approval to a labor-supported pension equity bill that will knock down many of the barriers that have prevented women workers from receiving full retirement credit for their years of employment.

The legislation, which passed the House and Senate unanimously, is based on a bill that Rep. Geraldine A. Ferraro—now the Democratic vice presidential candidate—first introduced in 1981. The bipartisan congressional caucus on women's issues endorsed it last year as part of an "economic equity" package and it is the first major component to be enacted.

President Reagan is certain to sign it into law, probably with an election-year statement of praise, although the Administration had originally opposed some of its provisions.

Ferraro and Rep. William L. Clay (D-Mo.) whose subcommittee nurtured the bill to enactment, spoke of the long and continuing effort to make pension coverage fairer and more certain.

Ferraro told the House the legislation was "an important first step" and said she is working with Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) to fashion a new bill that would address the pension problems caused by the "increased mobility" of America's workers.

Amends ERISA

The bill that Congress passed is in the form of an amendment to the 1974 Employee Retirement Income Security Act (ERISA) and takes effect in 1985. It covers both single-employer and multi-employer pension plans and applies equally to men and women.

It does not require any employer to provide a pension plan. But for firms that do so, these are the major changes in the rules:

- Employers can't exclude workers under age 21 from participation in a pension plan, providing they have at least one year of service. The 1974 law allowed exclusion of persons under 25.
- Once a worker is covered, past em-

Freeze on workers

Postal Service bosses in line for pay boost

The Postal Service—which wants to freeze pay of rank-and-file employees and slash pay for new hires—plans to give its managers an 8.1-percent raise, according to a USPS report on pay projections.

The USPS tipped its hand in a document written in connection with testimony in February before the Postal Rate Commission to help justify its request to raise the postage rate for first class mail.

And this week, Postmaster Gen. William F. Bolger assured a convention of postal supervisors that they would be spared from the wage freeze USPS is pressing on its 600,000 workers.

Postal Workers President Moe Biller called the move "outrageous" and asserted that "if they are asking the workforce to take pay cuts, the least they ought to do is not slap the workers in the face" by planning such generous management wage sweeteners.

Letter Carriers President Vincent Sombrotto stressed that the USPS "has the most productive workforce in the world. They deserve to be rewarded."

"Any talk about management raises at a time like this is obscene," Sombrotto declared.

The four postal unions—the APWU, NALC, Laborers' Mail Handlers division and the unaffiliated Rural Letter Carriers—are seeking a new agreement for the 600,000 postal service employees, but the talks stalled when USPS management refused to soften its hardline takeaway demands.

Meanwhile, oral arguments in a federal court challenge brought by the unions to prevent the USPS from unilaterally initiating a new "two-tier" wage system that would slash pay and benefits of new employees are scheduled for Aug. 15. The unions are seeking a preliminary injunction to block the USPS move.

If USPS were to put the new pay scale into effect, it would cut the wages of some 35,000 to 40,000 new workers it expects

Metal Trades get vote of support at Norfolk yard

Portsmouth, Va.—Workers at the Norfolk Naval Shipyard here rebuffed an attempted raid by an unaffiliated union and gave the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Council a strong vote of confidence.

Bargaining over a contract covering 8,600 shipyard workers had been stalled, and the National Federation of Federal Employees sought to capitalize on the deadlock by challenging for bargaining rights.

The three-month campaign, in which AFL-CIO organizers and representatives of the affiliated unions participated, ended with a 3,825 vote for retention of the Tidewater Federal Employees Metal Trades Council to 2,417 for the NFFE and 170 for no union.

Council President Ron Ault said the campaign strengthened ties among the 17 affiliated unions and predicted that the outcome will give the council's negotiators a stronger hand at the bargaining table. Management had sought to capitalize on

Labor calls for fairer tax system

The AFL-CIO gave its own prescription for tax reform to the Senate Finance Committee, and warned that the massive deficits under the Reagan Administration "threaten the nation's economic future."

AFL-CIO Research Director Rudy Oswald termed an increase in federal revenues essential and said it could be achieved in large part by a restoration of fairness to the tax system.

Oswald outlined labor's proposals for "a major tax reform initiative that would close loopholes that favor business and the rich, reverse some of the more unfair and unwise features of the 1981 law, keep income as the tax base, and retain a progressive rate structure."

He argued rejection of various alternatives to the progressive income tax that have been proposed.

"Flat tax system, value added taxes, sales taxes and consumption taxes are all unfair tax systems," Oswald testified. "They primarily benefit the wealthy and are not based on ability to pay."

As Oswald was testifying at the Senate's exploration of tax options, the AFL-CIO was supporting an effort to achieve a more realistic exchange rate for the dollar in testimony before a House Banking subcommittee.

Monetary handicap

Henry B. Schechter, director of the federation's Office of Housing & Monetary Policy, backed a resolution by Rep. Berkley W. Bedell (D-Iowa) urging presidential action to overcome "the handicap of the overvalued dollar."

The dollar's imbalance in relation to the currency of other countries has been a major factor in the nation's huge trade deficit, Schechter stressed. When the dollar is overvalued, America's exports suffer because they are priced too high and imports gain unfair advantage over U.S. products because the exchange rate lets them be marketed at lower cost.

Oswald noted in his Senate testimony that high interest rates stemming in part from the large federal deficit has been a major factor in the overvaluation of the dollar. Tax changes to reduce the deficits would help bring down interest rates as well, he suggested.

On tax approaches, Oswald acknowledged the superficial appeal of an expenditures tax, but stressed that it would perpetuate inequities since it would be primarily the wealthiest individuals who would escape taxation of money they save or invest, while persons who must spend most of CWA convention slogan is backdrop for Walter Mondale.

Mondale scores with jabs at Reagan's credibility gap

Walter F. Mondale got a presidential welcome from enthusiastic union members in Philadelphia and Toledo as he hammered away at the credibility gap that has thrown the Republican campaign into disarray.

Continued fumbling by President Reagan, Vice President Bush and their assorted official spokesmen on the post-election tax issue added fuel to Mondale's charge that the Reagan Administration is hiding its tax increase proposals until after the election.

Mondale challenged Reagan's denials and half-denials in a speech to thousands of flag-waving delegates to the Communications Workers convention in Philadelphia.

Was it just coincidence, he questioned, that Reagan has asked that the results of a tax study be given to him in December —after the election—rather than in September or October? Does Reagan's nose grow like that of Pinocchio when he doesn't tell the truth, Mondale wondered.

Public right to know

Americans are entitled to know how the rival presidential candidates propose to deal with the nation's economic problems and the deficit before the election, he insisted.

"The debate is not about bookkeeping . . . . It is about people and jobs, the future and our children." Americans can face up to the truth and don't have to be shielded from the facts, Mondale said in a speech repeatedly punctuated by applause and ovations from the CWA members.

The setting was different when Mondale spoke to union dockworkers in Toledo—on the shores of Lake Erie with a Liberian tanker rumbling in the background. But the message, given in shirtsleeves in the sweltering mid-summer weather, was similar.

Reagan wants to increase the Pentagon budget, Mondale noted, adding, "He said he won't raise taxes. He says he won't cut the safety net and he says we'll have a balanced budget."

He'll do it by "voodoo economics," Mondale joshed, playing on the phrase that Bush used against Reagan four years ago when they were competing for the Republican nomination.

Among the vice presidential candidates, Democrat Geraldine Ferraro scored points for achievement by steering the pension equity bill she sponsored to final approval by the House. She has a full campaign schedule mapped out for the week of Aug. 13, after Congress adjourns and before the Republican convention opens.

To and fro

Vice President Bush, meanwhile, kept slipping deeper into the White House credibility gap. Besides appearing to disagree with Reagan's insistence that there will be no tax increase if he is re-elected, Bush appeared to tilt back and forth on the question of a debate with Ferraro.

First Bush said he was "ready and willing" to debate Ferraro, but the decision was up to the Reagan campaign strategists.

Then the White House press official, Larry Speakes, bounced the ball back, saying that the question of a debate is "a personal matter for the Vice President to decide."

CONVENTION

The Florida AFL-CIO will hold its 1984 convention in Hollywood instead of Bal Harbour on Nov. 12-15.

Keyed to AT&T break-up

CWA delegates back plan to reshape union

Philadelphia—By a 2-1 margin, delegates to the Communications Workers convention voted to restructure their union to meet the changes in the nation's telephone system stemming from the divestiture of AT&T.

The amendment to the union's constitution creates two new vice presidents to represent members in the AT&T Communications and AT&T Technologies bargaining units. CWA represents about 525,000 employees of the giant phone system.

The final roll call vote on the restructuring was 347,467 to 156,172.

In his opening address to the delegates, CWA President Glenn Watts said the two new vice presidents will become voting members of the union's executive board, replacing the former AT&T Long Lines director and the posts of national directors for the installation, sales and Western Electric manufacturing divisions of the old Bell System.

James Irvine, who was CWA's national director for the old Long Lines unit was unanimously elected vice president of the AT&T Communications unit.

Ronald J. Allen, a CWA staff representative, was elected vice president for the AT&T Technologies unit over three other candidates.

The national director's posts will be phased out over several years.

In another move aimed at restructuring the union, the delegates adopted a constitutional amendment establishing separate bargaining councils for CWA members employed by the Bell regional operating companies and another for AT&T. Separate councils will also be set up for United Telephone, General Telephone and Continental Telephone Systems, as well as a council covering all other smaller independent telecommunications companies.

Bye, bye Reagan

In his opening address, Watts drew an ovation when he declared that "we are in the final months of Ronald Reagan's presidency, during which all working people and all unions have been under siege."

He warned that "the climate created by the Reagan Administration has fostered hostilities toward labor which will take a long time to undo—even after we have elected Walter Mondale and Geraldine Ferraro."

CWA had endorsed Mondale's bid for the Democratic presidential nomination last fall, and at the convention the delegates pledged "all-out support" for the Mondale-Ferraro ticket.

In a resolution, the convention underscored the approval of the "historic decision to place Rep. Ferraro on the Democratic ticket" as an indication of the "progressive alternative that the Democratic Party has to offer the American people."

Mondale, who was one of the convention speakers, received a cheering welcome.

In other convention action, the delegates adopted a resolution dealing with the "equal access" issue in telephone communications that is pitting unionized phone service against such non-union long distance services as MCI and Sprint.

The resolution provided for funding the CWA's "Call and Buy Union" media campaign through a $2 per member "fair share" contribution. A goal of $1 million in contributions by Labor Day was set.

"The jobs of thousands of CWA members can be on the line under 'equal access,' " Watts said, "since it has been estimated that for each 1 percent loss of market share by AT&T, approximately one thousand union jobs could be lost."

As part of the AT&T divestiture agreement, Watts pointed out, many local phone customers will be required to choose whether they want to stay with AT&T long distance or pick another carrier. CWA will urge consumers to choose reliable, operator-assisted long distance service.

Pennsylvania district

The convention also formally established the union's newest district, created after the 12,000-member Federation of Telephone Workers of Pennsylvania voted earlier this year to affiliate with the AFL-CIO union.

William E. Wallace, formerly president of the FTWP, was elected vice president of the new district which was carved out of former CWA District 2. FTWP Vice President Vincent J. Maisano, was elected president of the new CWA Local 13000, now the union's largest local unit.

In other actions, the delegates adopted resolutions:

- Urging the leaders and members of the unaffiliated Telecommunications International Union to join CWA's ranks and directing the CWA executive board to pursue merger with the union.
- Saluting the centennial of the birthdate of President Harry Truman, and expressing CWA's admiration and respect for Truman's ideals and his accomplishments as president.

Watts led the delegates in a memorial service for CWA's founding President Joseph A. Beirne who died on Labor Day 1974. Beirne's widow, Anne, and his daughters Maureen Houston, Bren Leiss and Carole MacDonald were special guests of the union for the memorial.

Reagan vs. Bush

Which half of the Republican presidential ticket do you listen to?

"We have no plans for, nor will I allow plans for a tax increase," President Reagan told reporters during a picture-taking session with Vice President Bush at the presidential ranch in California.

A few hours later, Bush explained to reporters that Reagan was really "keeping his options open" on the issue of tax increase.

The White House press aide, Larry Speakes, declined to interpret the President's views. "He said what he meant and he meant what he said." As for Bush's remark, Speakes didn't think it was "much different" than what Reagan had said.

Bush later said the fuss the media made over his remarks discouraged his efforts to be "helpful."

After this, he told reporters, he won't say anything about tax policy except to quote President Reagan's words.

Treasury Sec. Donald T. Regan muddled the water a bit more with a statement that the Administration doesn't plan any increases in taxes for 1985. But as for 1986 or later, "we haven't even come to grips with that budget."

Fairer taxation urged to achieve deficit reduction their income would bear a proportionately heavier burden.

The same reasoning, he said, applies to proposals to tax everyone at the same rate or impose a value added tax, which is common in Europe but "merely another variant of a sales tax."

Oswald praised many of the features of the tax bill sponsored by Sen. Bill Bradley (D-N.J.) and Richard A. Gephardt (D-Mo.), which would simplify the tax structure and set up three rates for individuals, depending on income, at 14 percent, 26 percent and a top of 30 percent. The standard deduction would be raised so that a family of four would not owe income tax unless its annual income exceeded $11,200 and deductions could be applied only toward the 14 percent tax rate.

The Bradley-Gephardt bill would also set a flat 30 percent corporate tax rate and scale back many of the added tax benefits business get.

He expressed concern that the proposed changes would only raise the same amount of revenue as the present system.

"A substantial increase in tax revenues" is needed to bring down the huge deficit, Oswald noted. "People with higher incomes can afford to pay higher rates and should be required to do so," he urged.

ployment since age 18 has to be counted toward pension vesting. ERISA previously required only coverage for work after age 22.

- A worker with less than five years of service now will be able to regain pension credits for that service by returning to the job within five years. Present law commonly provides that credits are lost if the break in service exceeds the length of previous employment.
- A new provision assures against loss of pension credits for a maternity or paternity leave of up to one year.
- The new survivorship provision assures a pension for the spouse of a worker who had vested pension rights and who died before reaching retirement age. The pension will start when the spouse reaches the earliest retirement age under the plan.

That is a considerable improvement over ERISA, which generally does not require survivorship benefits if a worker dies before the earliest age at which he or she would have been eligible for a pension.

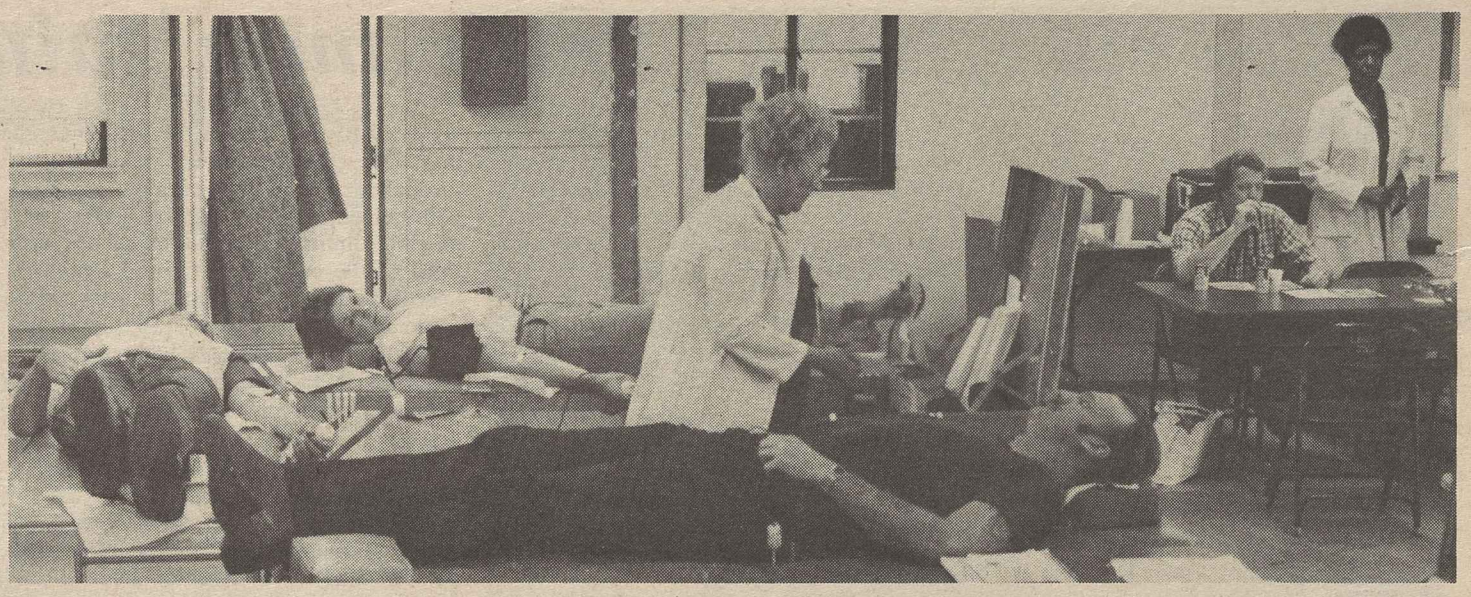
- In order to waive survivorship benefits—which usually result in an actuarily reduced pension — both the worker and spouse must sign statements rejecting that option. Under ERISA, the decision was made by the covered worker and the spouse was often not aware of it.

Shared benefits

In a divorce settlement, a court could—but would not have to—award one of the parties a share of a former spouse's pension as part of the settlement.

While the changes made in ERISA do not distinguish as to the sex of the workers or spouses affected, the obvious intent is to upgrade the protection received by women.

The AFL-CIO testified in support of pension equity at two House hearings last year—endorsing the Ferraro bill before the Education & Labor Committee and supporting its provisions as part of the omnibus economic equity bill at Ways & Means Committee hearings.



Picket line break

In a continuing commitment to community service, members of Utility Workers Local 223 took time off from the picket line at Detroit Edison Co. to help ease a blood shortage in southeastern Michigan. The union arranged for a Red Cross bloodmobile at the local's strike headquarters shortly after the emergency call for donors was issued. The local won a three-year contract in its six-week strike against the utility.

Poverty toll hits 35.3 million, family income below '79 mark

More than 6 million Americans slipped into poverty since 1980, and median family income remains below the 1979 level, two reports from the Census Bureau show.

Poverty has deepened for the fifth year in a row and is at its highest level in almost two decades, Census Bureau said, as 35.3 million Americans—or about 15.2 percent of the population—didn't earn enough money in 1983 to rise above the poverty line. Last year, 900,000 people were added to the ranks of the poor.

In 1982, about 34.4 million people were classified as poor, or about 15 percent of the population, compared with 11.7 percent in 1979.

The nation's poverty rate, except for a fluctuation during the Nixon recession, had been declining since 1966, the beginning of the anti-poverty programs under the Johnson Administration.

The Census Bureau said a family of four was considered to be living in poverty in 1983 if its income was less than $10,178.

In a separate report, the bureau said median annual family income rose only 1.6 percent in 1983 to $24,580. Although this was the first increase in four years, it is still substantially below the 1979 level of $26,890. Median income is the point at which half of all families have higher incomes and half have lower.

The bureau noted that there has been no significant decline in poverty among "those groups that usually benefit from economic growth" such as married-couple families. The poverty rate for those families in 1983 remained at 7.6 percent.

For female-headed families, the poverty rate was 36 percent in 1983, three-tenths of 1 percent less than in 1982.

Families maintained by women accounted for 47 percent of all poor families in 1983. The number of poor children under 18 was 13.7 million in 1983, and their poverty rate remained as bad as in 1982, at 22 percent. Of those poor children, nearly 12 million were under age 15.

The poverty rate for Americans 65 and older declined slightly from 14.6 percent in 1982 to 14.1 percent in 1983.

In other findings, the bureau reported:

- The poverty rates among white, black and Hispanics remained high and virtually unimproved from last year. The 1983 rate for blacks was 35.7 percent, nearly three times the 12.1 percent rate for whites. For Hispanics, it was 28.4 percent.
- Regionally, the poverty rate increased from 13.3 percent to 14.6 percent in the Midwest; from 13 percent to 13.4 percent in the Northeast, and from 14.1 percent to 14.7 percent in the West. The highest rate was in the South—17.2 percent of the population was poor, compared to 18.1 percent in 1982.
- Median annual family incomes were $25,757 for white families, $14,506 for black families and $16,956 for Hispanic families in 1983.
- Median annual income was $27,286 for married couple families overall and $32,107 in families where the wife also worked. For female-headed households, the median income was $11,789 last year.

divisions among the workers, he noted.

Ault said the election campaign also helped council leaders get a good reading on the issues that most concerned shipyard workers.

President Paul J. Burnsky of the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept. termed the "reaffirmation of support" by the blue-collar shipyard workers "a gratifying endorsement of our effectiveness in the past and a declaration of confidence that progress will continue in the future."

The Tidewater Metal Trades Council, which has 17 affiliated craft locals, has been the blue-collar bargaining representative at the shipyard since 1973. This is the second time it has beaten back a representation challenge from an unaffiliated union.

Machinists sign pact with United

The Machinists ratified a new three-year agreement with United Airlines that provides five pay adjustments and improvements in pensions and severance.

The contract, which run through Oct. 31, 1986, covers 14,500 mechanics and other ground workers and was ratified by better than a 4-1 ratio.

The top hourly rate for mechanics will increase from $15.91 to more than $18 over the terms of the agreement. A 3.7 percent increase, retroactive to Nov. 1, 1983, is coupled with further raises of nine-tenths of 1 percent effective July 1, 1984, and 2.1 percent on Nov. 1, 1984. Increases of 2.9 percent will occur on Nov. 1, 1985 and Sept. 1, 1986.

Pensions were improved by about 15 percent over the term with the monthly benefit per year of service rising from $29.50 to $34 for mechanics, from $25 to $28.81 for ramp workers and from $22 to $25.36 for other workers.

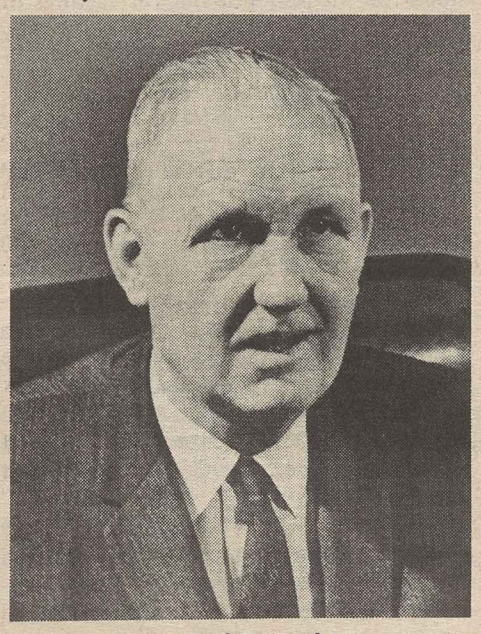
The agreement also sets severance pay at one week's pay per year of service.

Rep. Carl Perkins mourned as champion of worker goals

America's unions mourned the death of Carl D. Perkins, an unreconstructed New Deal Democrat who headed the House Education & Labor Committee for 17 of the 35 years he served in Congress.

Perkins "understood the needs of working people, the poor and the jobless," AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue said. The soft-spoken congressman from rural Kentucky was "a vigorous fighter" for America's "have-nots," they testified.

House Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill led a congressional delegation to Hindman, Ky., for the funeral. Perkins, 71, was on his way back to his district when he was stricken by a heart attack. The day before, he had helped steer needed job training funds through the House.



Rep. Carl D. Perkins

Perkins, elected to Congress in 1948, fought for aid to education and for black lung compensation for disabled miners, many of whom lived in his district. A black "miner's wreath" of mourning draped the entrance to the Mine Workers headquarters in Washington. Perkins helped steer most of President Lyndon Johnson's Great Society program through the House, and he fought valiantly to prevent its dismembering by the Reagan Administration.

In his first election, Perkins defeated a Republican incumbent. If he had lived out his term, he would have been unopposed for re-election in November. His record in Congress, on the COPE scorecard, was a lifetime 285 key votes that labor considered "right" to only 35 "wrong" votes — an 89 percent positive rating.

The tribute from Kirkland and Donahue noted the "personal warmth and unique capability for persuasion" that Perkins used "to bring about milestone legislation for which millions of American will be forever grateful."

The Education & Labor Committee will remain under firmly liberal leadership, despite the death of Perkins.

Next in line by seniority—and virtually certain to be officially elected chairman—is Rep. Augustus F. Hawkins (D-Calif.), a champion of job-creating programs and co-author of the Humphrey-Hawkins Full Employment & Balanced Growth Act.

Zimmerman airs concerns on NLRB

The National Labor Relations Board will be crippled if it is not returned to full strength soon, NLRB member Don A. Zimmerman warned the Reagan Administration in announcing plans to leave the board when his term ends in December.

Zimmerman's departure would leave the board with two vacancies. The White House has yet to fill the seat on the five-member board left vacant by the retirement of Republican Howard Jenkins in August 1983.

Zimmerman, the NLRB's lone Carter Administration appointee, said in a letter to the White House that he does not want to be reappointed since he plans to return to the private sector.

"During my term of office, I have learned firsthand that to administer and enforce the (National Labor Relations) Act most effectively the board needs to maintain a full complement of five members," he wrote. "Regrettably, this has not been the case for most of the past five years.

"Those who depend on the processes of the NLRB will be best served by restoring the board to full strength as soon as possible. It is toward that end that I want to provide you with ample time to select and nominate my successor."

House curbs OSHA on human guinea pig tests

By Susan Dunlop

The House adopted an appropriations bill amendment that bars the Reagan Administration from allowing employers to evade the federal job safety law in the name of "research" into the effects of hazardous conditions on workers.

The measure was spurred by recent revelations that Adolph Coors Co., Dan River, Inc. and other firms received variances to Occupational Safety & Health Administration standards under the pretext of conducting experiments on the deterioration of workers' health while exposed to occupational hazards.

The amendment was drafted by Rep. David R. Obey (D-Wis.), who has been investigating a questionable relationship between OSHA and Coors. Obey proposed the ban on human experimentation after it was disclosed that OSHA granted variances from health standards to Coors, Dan River, a Virginia textile firm, and Gulf Coast Lead Co. of Tampa, Fla.

The variances gave the firms permission to use workers as human guinea pigs exposed to hazards such as cotton dust, noise and lead far above established OSHA standards.

Dan River abandoned its proposal following a storm of protest from unions and congressmen, and Gulf Coast Lead's experiment—and the variance—were terminated shortly after it became known that a worker had to be carried off the job because of kidney failure linked to high levels of lead in his bloodstream.

But in a new investigation, Obey found that although OSHA has testified that only two human experimentation variances had been granted under the Reagan Administration, another such scheme was approved for Coors. An inspection revealed noise levels as much as 250 percent above permissible limits at the company's glass and ceramic facility.

Brewery inspections

Obey pointed out that OSHA has conducted inspections at Coors facilities only four times since the agency was taken over by Reagan appointees. Under previous administrations, Coors facilities were inspected about every seven weeks.

Of the four inspections, Obey said, three were in response to fatalities at Coors facilities. Such inspections are required by law. The only general inspection took place December 1982.

At that time, he said, OSHA found that noise standards were being ignored throughout the glass plant, anywhere from 170 percent to 250 percent above permissible limits. In addition, about one-third of the employees showed significant loss of hearing since going to work in the Coors facility.

Obey reported that the OSHA inspectors recommended fines and citations for the violations, but the penalties were later dropped in a deal worked out between OSHA and Coors.

An investigation earlier this year by Obey and Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) revealed that former OSHA Administer Thorne G. Auchter demoted and disciplined a regional agency director for trying to inspect Coors plants.

The legislators pointed to the Coor's family's support for the Reagan Administration—as well as numerous far right-wing organizations—and they called for an investigation into the dramatic drop in OSHA inspections at Coors since Reagan took office.

The language of the variance agreement between OSHA and Coors, reached in October 1983, says the company will be allowed to "cooperate in, and volunteer" the use of its glass plant for a research study on "the effect of occupational noise on the hearing of employees exposed thereto."

Also the Coors-OSHA deal "agreed" that the study would be done by the National Institutes of Occupational Safety & Health. NIOSH was not asked about it in advance and later said it would not get involved.

Abusing the law

Obey branded the episode another example of the "gross abuse of the law that has been practiced at OSHA."

It is "outrageous," he said, "that such practices could have been instigated by individuals at the Labor Dept. who are supposedly charged with protecting worker health and safety."

The language now in the House appropriations bill expressly forbids the Labor Dept. from using any of its funds to grant such variances or give permission for the exposure of workers to hazards "for the purpose of conducting experiments on worker safety or health."

The bill is expected to go to a House-Senate conference committee.

Postal Service hires tried union-buster for big bucks

Postal unions point to Postmaster Gen. William Bolger's hiring of a notoriously anti-union law firm as a clear indication of USPS's hardline stance in contract talks.

The largest of its kind operating on the West Coast, the San Francisco-based law firm of Littler, Mendelson, Fastiff & Tichy is engaged almost exclusively by employers determined to eliminate unions.

Bolger reportedly has a six-month, $300,000-contract with the 39-year-old firm. He said he hired the group because his staff of 45 labor lawyers was too busy handling labor-management cases to help USPS prepare for the binding arbitration that awaits parties in the current negotiations.

"To hire that firm is like a declaration of war," said Charles McDonald, assistant director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization & Field Services.

"For an agency that has a substantial number of labor relations attorneys in house to go outside and hire—at taxpayer expense—a union-buster to undercut its workers is a sign they're trying to send a message that the negotiations are going to be a little different than in the past," McDonald said.

McDonald, who edits the Rub Sheet, an AFL-CIO report on union-busting activities, said that USPS's proposed "two-tier" wage plan that would slash wages on new employees may have been Tichy's idea, based on his past performance.

McDonald's files list dozens of firms that have retained the law firm to handle arbitrations, grievances, decertification elections, negotiations, strikes, and other labor-related matters.

Joblessness zaps 8.5 million workers as unemployment rises to 7.5 percent

A whopping 400,000-increase in unemployment last month hiked the nation's jobless rate four-tenths of 1 percent to 7.5 percent with 8.5 million workers hunting for jobs.

The sharp rise in civilian unemployment, coupled with the addition of 900,000 persons living in poverty, serve as "cold reminders that millions of Americans have been made victims of the unfair policies of Reaganomics," the AFL-CIO charged.

"While the White House and Wall Street hail signs of another economic slowdown, workers and the poor pay the costs through higher joblessness and increased poverty," the federation said.

The Bureau of Labor Statistics reported that July's 400,000-increase in unemployment erased a matching drop in joblessness in June and brought the rate back to the May level.

All social groups hit

The higher joblessness in July cut across all groups of workers—male and female, young and old, black and white.

By another measure, which includes members of the armed forces stationed in the United States, the nation's unemployment rate in July was 7.4 percent, also up four-tenths of 1 percent.

Total employment last month fell by 355,000 to 105.4 million, BLS reported. The civilian labor force grew only 61,000, to 113,940,000, over the month.

Despite the overall decline in employment, BLS said that manufacturing employment increased by 105,000 last month to 19.7 million.

Production work up

In the durable goods area, employment increased markedly in fabricated metal products, machinery, and electrical and electronic equipment. The employment rise in nondurable goods manufacturing—the first since April—reflected an increase in apparel and small gains in several other industries.

BLS said there were also increases in the services industry, transportation and public utilities, and in the business and health services industries.

BLS Commissioner Janet L. Norwood, testifying before the congressional Joint Economic Committee, confirmed that the sharp rise in unemployment indicated a slowing of the economy.

She noted, however, that there often are problems with the seasonal adjustment of the June and July figures. As the year progresses, she said, more data will be coming in, "and the situation should become clearer."

Last month's five-tenths of 1 percent increase in unemployment for adult women brough their rate back up to 6.9 percent, the level that had essentially prevailed between February and May.

The report also showed a big rise in joblessness among teenage blacks, to 42.4 percent, after dropping nearly 10 percent to 34.3 percent in June.

For adult males, the unemployment rate rose to 6.5 percent from 6.3 percent the previous month. The jobless rate for teenagers overall rose to 18.3 percent from 17.6 percent in June. The rate for whites rose three-tenths of 1 percent to 6.4 percent while the rate for blacks rose from 15 to 16.9 percent. The rate for Hispanic workers was 10.6 percent, up from 10 percent.

Lost jobs

Most of the July increase in unemployment took place among workers who had lost their jobs, BLS said. There was little or no over-the-month change in either the number of persons who were on layoffs, had left their jobs voluntarily, or were entering or re-entering the labor force.

The length of the average workweek of production and non-supervisory workers was unchanged at 35.3 hours for the third month in a row.

Weekly hours and overtime in manufacturing, at 40.6 and 3.4 hours, respectively, also were about the same as in the previous two months.

Unions denounce planned pay hike for postal bosses to hire this year by 23 percent. USPS also wants a three-year wage freeze for current employees.

Those two USPS demands are the stumbling blocks in the postal negotiations—the largest single master agreement to be negotiated this year—that broke down July 20. The talks await binding arbitration that could take as long as four months to complete.

The unions and USPS are free to dissolve the impasse by themselves under the 1970 Postal Reorganization Act. APWU and NALC leaders have said further action on their part will be up to delegates at the unions' separate Aug. 20-25 conventions in Las Vegas. As federal employees, postal workers are forbidden by law to strike.

Bolger stirred up the dispute last week when he threatened to fire all postal workers in the event of a walkout. APWU President Moe Biller and NALC President Vincent Sombrotto described Bolger's remarks as "purely an act of provocation. He's raising the specter of a strike, without our even bringing it up."

Bolger said he would hire private companies to deliver mail if there were a strike.

Bolger, who is 62 years old, plans to retire Dec. 31 after 43 years in the postal system. He has come in for criticism over the recent "retirement enrichment" bonus awarded him by the Reagan-dominated Board of Governors that steers USPS.

The bonus, the first in recent memory paid to a postmaster, will give Bolger $62,000. Bolger, meanwhile, complained in a newspaper interview that he is underpaid in his $82,900-a-year job, saying that "the compensation is not a proper level today for the responsibilities involved."

Yet Bolger maintains that USPS employees are "overcompensated" in their average annual pay of $23,000.

"If he's so dissatisfied with his job," said the APWU's Biller, "he ought to spare everyone the agony that he's given us and leave right now."

Kroll memorial fund spurs cancer research

Philadelphia—The Fred Kroll Chemotherapy Testing Center has been established at Hahnemann University here with more than $100,000 contributed by labor organizations and friends of the late president of the Railway & Airline Clerks.

The contributions in Kroll's memory are being used to support technicians and to purchase equipment and supplies.

Reagan move unwarranted

Easing of sanctions on Poland deplored

By James M. Shevis

President Reagan's relaxation of sanctions he imposed on the communist government of Poland following its crackdown on the Solidarity free union movement is "ill-timed, ill-advised, and discouraging to the cause of human rights," the AFL-CIO declared.

"In abandoning the conditions he set for removing the sanctions, the President signals the Jaruzelski regime that he lacks the resolve to follow through on a major U.S. foreign policy objective, and invites the Polish government to devise new subterfuges in its quest for economic aid," the federation charged.

Reagan said he was easing some of the sanctions imposed in 1981 because of what he called "a significant move" by Poland toward national reconciliation. The White House said it will lift the ban on air travel to the United States by the Polish state airline LOT and re-establish scientific exchanges between Poland and this country.

Reagan's action came in response to an amnesty plan for political prisoners announced by the Polish parliament on July 21. He also indicated that "complete and reasonable implementation" of the plan would probably result in the withdrawal of U.S. opposition to Polish membership in the International Monetary Fund.

What the President ignores, the AFL-CIO charged, is that "the amnesty is not genuine." The released prisoners are barred from political activity in violation of their fundamental human rights, and are threatened with re-arrest if they resume their work on behalf of Solidarity, the federation noted.

"The AFL-CIO welcomes the release of political detainees in Poland, hundreds of whom are trade unionists," the federation said in a statement. "But, as the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions has pointed out, 'if the price of their freedom is silence and resignation, then the amnesty . . . is only a cosmetic measure to hide an economic tradeoff.'"

When Reagan first imposed the sanctions, the AFL-CIO statement recalled, he outlined three conditions for their removal: the release of all political prisoners, the restoration of Solidarity, and the opening of a dialogue among the government, Solidarity and the Catholic church.

"He recognized that unless these conditions are met, Poland would be incapable of solving its economic problems," the federation observed. "The conditions have not been met, and Poland will not be able to solve its economic problems no matter how much assistance it may receive from the IMF."

Financial status

The Warsaw government owes Western banks, including many in the United States, more than $30 billion. If Poland were to become a member of the IMF, as much as $4 billion in international credits might become available to the Jaruzelski regime. But those credits would hinge on Poland's agreement to craft a more efficient economic program by restoring market incentives and ending subsidies.

The AFL-CIO joined Solidarity Chairman Lech Walesa in stressing that without trade union pluralism, Poland would still have its problems. In a July 26 statement, Walesa said:

"Freedom of activity for free trade unions and guarantees for the observance of human rights are necessary conditions to lead our country out of its economic and social crisis.

"This is the only chance for Poland, for Polish society, and the Polish government. Only if these conditions are met will we be guaranteed that the amnesty is not just a short episode and that new prisoners will not refill the jails again."

House approves project funds to spur democracy

The House voted to continue funding the National Endowment for Democracy, a unique program that enables labor, business and other non-government groups to help the development of democratic institutions in other countries.

Despite its bipartisan origin, the concept encountered stiff opposition and the House last May had voted to delete funding for the program from a State Dept. appropriations bill.

The Senate revived the program after barring further funds for international institutes that had been set up by the Democratic and Republican parties. A House-Senate conference committee then reached agreement on a funding level of $18.5 million—approximately the current level, but down from the $31 million originally budgeted and the $21.3 million voted by the Senate.

At that level, the House approved funding for the program by a 273-181 vote, reversing the 226-173 setback last May.

The AFL-CIO, which participates in the program through its Free Trade Union Institute, urged the importance of private efforts to build "the infrastructure of democracy" around the world.

A letter to House members noted the many requests for assistance from unions in other countries that are striving to build organizations that can effectively represent workers and promote human rights.

Senate concurrence in the conference agreement was anticipated as Congress tried to clear its legislative calendar before adjourning for a recess that will run until after Labor Day.

Apart from appropriations measure, the House had votes scheduled on superfund legislation that would expand the program for cleaning up toxic wastes and a generic drug bill that the AFL-CIO has endorsed as a boon to consumers and a money-saver for health care plans.

Cleveland Steelworker Dan Liuzzo is featured in the first segment of the new season of "America Works," the AFL-CIO's public affairs TV series.

Labor's TV series will air this fall on 155 stations

America Works, the AFL-CIO's weekly public affairs television series, opens its third season over Labor Day weekend with the first of six new programs on public television stations this fall.

The first four of the new half-hour episodes will focus on the role of union members in quality of work life, teenage wages, asbestos hazards in schools and mortgage foreclosure prevention.

The series is produced by the Labor Institute of Public Affairs, the AFL-CIO's television production arm.

So far, 155 PBS stations have put "America Works" into their fall lineups, and other stations are expected to sign on, LIPA said.

America Works premiered in July 1983 on a network of commercial broadcast stations, and began its second season this January. The 12 programs in the series were also seen this summer on public broadcasting and cable channels.

The format for each segment of America Works includes a documentary examination of an issue of concern to workers that is followed by a discussion by guest panelists with opposing points of view.

Emmy Award winning broadcast journalist Marie Torre will again host the six new segments and moderate the debates.

Unionists featured in the first four programs scheduled for September are:

- Dan Liuzzo, a Steelworker in Cleveland who is a member of a labor-management team that works on improving not only the quality of products in the plant, but also on the quality of life for its employees.
- Milka Ruiz, a Bronx, N.Y. teenager and a member of Frontlash, the labor-supported youth organization, who is leading a fight against the Reagan Administration's proposal for a youth subminimum wage.
- Karen Bivins, a member of the Philadelphia Federation of Teachers, who has organized a coalition of teachers, parents and other school employees in an effort to get asbestos hazards out of the city's schools.
- Frank Alexander, an Auto Worker in Waterloo, Iowa, who is working with local farmers to avert mortgage foreclosures on family farms.

The institute is advising labor groups and union members to check PBS stations for local broadcast dates and times, since they will vary from city to city.

McMichen hits effort to void ITU vote

Robert S. McMichen, winner of the re-run election for president of the Typographical Union, charged that three defeated incumbent ITU officers are resorting to "shameful" tactics in challenging the outcome of the government-supervised election.

"Twice now the ITU's members have voted incumbent President Joe Bingel out of office, most recently by a margin of nearly two to one," McMichen said. "Twice now he's refused to accede to their wishes."

Bingel and defeated incumbent Vice Presidents Robert L. Wartinger and Raymond Brown, filed a protest with the Labor Dept. charging that the AFL-CIO improperly aided the candidacies of McMichen, Billy Joe Austin and William Boarman, winners of vice presidential contests.

The complaint, according to Labor Dept. investigator Charles Weber, alleges the federation used its resources, mailing lists and manpower to influence the election.

"Bingel and company's charges are a sham and they know it," McMichen declared. "Our campaign didn't accept a dime from any individual or organization outside the ITU. What beat Joe Bingel and his crowd was the greed of Joe Bingel and his crowd and the record will prove it."

Noting that the ITU convention begins Sept. 7, McMichen said that "it's not unreasonable to assume that Bingel and the forces outside the ITU who have been thwarted in their efforts to take over our union hope to create such confusion at the convention that they can somehow still manage to accomplish their goals. Our members will never let that happen."

McMichen, Austin and Boarman were elected to office primarily on the basis of their support for continued affiliation with the AFL-CIO and their rejection of the attempted merger of the ITU with the unaffiliated Teamsters.

Blocked referendum

The ITU-Teamsters merger document, negotiated by Bingel and the other top ITU officers, specified the ITU would become a division of the Teamsters. A referendum on that merger proposal was blocked by a U.S. district court injunction in San Francisco. The order, by Judge Thelton Henderson, prevented ITU officers from taking any actions on merging the ITU with any other union.

The Labor Dept. has set a deadline of Aug. 27 to "either certify the election or go into court," Weber said. He noted that the ITU voluntarily agreed to the re-run of the election that was held in November 1983.

In the first election, McMichen defeated Bingel by nearly 5,000 votes. The union's canvassing board, however, voided the election and proposed to schedule a new one, but it had not done so before the Labor Dept. intervened in April. McMichen won the re-run election by a vote of 28,167 to 15,296 for Bingel.

Weber said that if the Labor Dept. certifies the results of the elections and rejects the challenges, then on the Monday following "our decision, the newly elected officers should be installed." The agency could possibly have to go to court, he said, if it determines yet another re-run election should be held.

McMichen, who was prevented from taking office as ITU president, served as chairman of the Merger Committee for One Big Printing Union, which favored the ITU merging with an AFL-CIO affiliated union, and he worked as a temporary AFL-CIO representative to the graphic communications industry unions.

Flight Attendants ratify new Piedmont contract

The Flight Attendants wrapped up a year of negotiations with Piedmont Airlines by ratifying a new three-year agreement that provides wage increases totaling 12.5 percent.

The contract, covering 1,500 attendants, was approved by a 58 percent majority.

The new agreement, which runs through Mar. 31, 1987, includes improvements in expense allowances and additional pay for extra duties and responsibilities.

Attendants will also be guaranteed longer rest periods between some flights, the union reported.

Kirkland views challenges for labor studies graduates

The labor movement is facing a challenge of change and new opportunities for growth as new technologies and new occupations are redefining the composition of the workforce, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland told the graduates receiving bachelor of arts degrees from the George Meany Center for Labor Studies.

"The ground is always shifting under our feet—and we are always on the move. That's what makes our work so interesting," he observed in his commencement address.

To meet the challenges of the future, "we need new organizing techniques, expanded research capacity, modern communication skills, new political strategies and a host of other weapons," he said.

The center's external degree program, run in cooperation with Antioch University, graduated 12 more students, raising to 69 the number who have received degrees in the past 10 years.

Acquiring skills

Kirkland noted it is customary for commencement speakers to "warn graduates of the perils of the real world," and stressed that it was the experience these union leaders already had in the real world that "brought you here to acquire new tools, skills and understanding."

He said that no degree can prepare career trade unionists for the demands of their professions as "we are called upon to be economists, politicians, psychologists, sociologists, administrators, bookkeepers, educators and organizers — and much else. . . ."

While union leaders can expect criticism "from those who sit unexposed and untested," he noted that this "all goes with the territory" and "is more than offset by the rewards of our service."

He reminded the class that union members have been "savaged by Reaganomics and its consequences" as millions have faced unemployment, mortgage foreclosures, family stress, increased taxes and dashed hopes for the education of their children.

"Even with the passing of the Administration that authored these woes, our movement will still be severely tested by the inescapable changes in the world of work," Kirkland stressed. "Your skills, combined with the new spirit of solidarity that is everywhere evident in our ranks, will help our movement to meet the challenge of tomorrow."

Issac Hunt, dean of the Antioch School of Law, presented the bachelor degrees to: Joseph Benevides, senior representative of Electrical Workers Local 1357 in Honolulu; Michael Bennett, steward of IBEW Local 1547 in Anchorage, Alaska; Michael Ellis, business agent of Operating Engineers Local 627 in Oklahoma City, Okla.; AFL-CIO Field Rep. Bobby Fouche of Harrisburg, Pa.; Charles (Chip) Gamble, grievance chairman of Steelworkers Local 2499 in Williamsport, Pa.; and Jacqueline Franks Kazel, research and political education director of Wyoming AFL-CIO.

Also graduating were: Robert L. Kellerman, regional director of the Allied Industrial Workers in Saginaw, Mich.; Joseph C. Meredith, construction division director for the Boilermakers in Kansas City, Kan.; Anthony Perrone, international representative of the Food & Commercial Workers in Little Rock, Ark.; Daniel J. Repasky, board member of IBEW Local 1547 in Anchorage, Alaska, and Dennis J. Schuyler, a general chairman of the United Transportation Union in Cleveland.

In wage-hour case

Court takes new look at states' rights issue

The Supreme Court may take a fresh look at a controversial 1976 precedent when it decides a pending case involving federal wage-hour law protection for employees of San Antonio's city-owned bus system.

At issue is the application—or the reversal—of the Supreme Court's 5-4 decision in what has become known as the National League of Cities case. In that case, the court majority ruled that Congress couldn't apply the Fair Labor Standards Act to state or local agencies that perform traditional government functions.

Its reasoning was that requiring states and their subdivisions to comply with a national floor under wages and ceiling on hours would violate the "state sovereignty" guaranteed in the Constitution by the 10th Amendment.

In the aftermath of the decision, the Labor Dept. drew up a list of state and local government activities that it considered still covered by the wage-hour law because they were not traditional functions of government. Besides public transit systems, the list included such activities as state or county liquor stores and off-track betting.

The San Antonio Metropolitan Transit Authority, backed by the American Public Transit Association, then sought a declaratory judgment that the constitutional bar the Supreme Court found in its National League of Cities opinion also applied to local transit systems.

Attorneys for the Amalgamated Transit Union, which represents San Antonio bus drivers, and for the Justice Dept. argued against the attempt to extend the scope of the National League decision. They relied on a 1982 Supreme Court decision upholding the applicability of the wage-hour law to employees of a state-owned commuter railroad to reinforce their argument.

The Supreme Court heard arguments on the case last March and was expected to render a decision before starting its summer recess last month.

Question of sovereignty

Instead, it asked the parties in the case to submit arguments on whether the 10th Amendment state sovereignty doctrine as applied by the Supreme Court majority in the National League of Cities case "should be reconsidered."

Labor's answer was a resounding "Yes."

The precedents cited in the Transit Union brief range from the earliest years of the Republic to the present era. None of the cases support a conclusion "that Congress' delegated power to regulate commerce is diminished because a state, rather than a private party, is engaged in the activity which constitutes commerce," the brief notes.

"State sovereignty is secure so long as the law-making and law enforcement functions . . . are unimpaired," the union contends. And in any event, it argues that whatever immunity might constitutionally be accorded to actions of the states does not fall automatically on local government bodies.

The Supreme Court is expected to schedule arguments on this phase of the case in its new term, which begins in October.

Deck officers signal S.O.S. for battered U.S.-flag ships

Linthicum Heights, Md. — The U.S.-flag merchant marine, leaking at the seams, may be heading for disaster if federal help is not rushed out, the Masters, Mates & Pilots warned in signaling the S.O.S. at the union's convention here.

Delegates struck out against neglect of the nation's merchant marine, and called on the government to "develop, support and implement a comprehensive maritime program which increases the number of American vessels and the share of U.S. cargo they carry."

MMP President Robert J. Lowen also dressed down elements of the industry seeking to enrich themselves at the expense of the merchant marine, America's "fourth arm of defense."

These tactics, he said, have brought the industry perilously close to destruction.

The convention condemned actions of three major tanker companies—Trinidad Corp., Delta Lines and Marine Transport Lines—that have refused to bargain collectively with the MMP as the designated representative of all their licensed deck officers.

The MMP recently negotiated a three-year contract with operators of dry cargo vessels. However, the tanker operators, represented by the Tanker Service Committee, are still holding out.

Fraternal support

President Thomas W. Gleason of the Longshoremen, the parent organization of MMP, praised the ILA affiliate for its support of dockworkers in current battles.

In convention action, delegates called for:

- Strict enforcement of the 1920 Jones Act on shipping to help bolster the nation's economic and military security.
- Extending veterans' benefits to merchant mariners who risked their lives in service to their country.
- Strong opposition to legislation that would allow two foreign-built passenger vessels, the Cunard Countess and Cunard Princess, to engage in coastal cruise trade.
- Full support for extending current restrictions on the export of Alaskan oil.

The convention also endorsed a political action program that would include a direct mail campaign, a newsletter and grassroots lobbying aimed at preserving and creating American maritime jobs.

Abuses cited in prison job projects

Prison inmates should receive education-related job training but not be put to work making products that compete with goods produced by free labor, the AFL-CIO urged at House hearings

Federal law bars most prison products from being sold in interstate commerce. But the law was modified in 1979 to allow a limited number of demonstration projects. These exceptions were supposed to assure payment of prevailing wages and be undertaken in consultation with local labor groups.

AFL-CIO Economist John L. Zalusky told a House Judiciary subcommittee that the demonstration program has been abused and regulations should be tightened, not loosened.

Prisoners employed on approved projects have commonly been paid less than prevailing wages, Zalusky testified. He noted that the first demonstration project undertaken involved the reopening of an Arkansas meat packing plant that had employed union members before it closed. The new workforce was made up of convicts, and Zalusky termed the venture a clear violation of the employment provisions of the 1979 law.

"Workers and their unions support the rehabilitative aims of prison job programs," Zalusky testified. "They expect and deserve changes in the law to protect their own jobs through enforcement provisions strong enough to prevent violations."

The AFL-CIO testimony urged applying both the wage-hour law and the Occupational Safety & Health Act to demonstration projects involving the employment of prisoners. They should be paid at the same hourly rate as free labor working at comparable jobs in the same industry—based on national industry standards if the product enters interstate commerce, Zalusky urged.

Zalusky proposed that prison industry be reviewed by a board of directors representing employers and unions in the private sector and state goverment, including a representative of the state Labor Dept. and a prisoner representative.

Prisoner participation in the work projects should be fully voluntary, Zalusky stressed. In addition to deductions for taxes and a reasonable amount for room and board, a fixed share of wages received could properly be applied to a fund for crime victims and witness assistance.

At the same time, he urged, there should be an upgrading of educational programs for the prison population with community involvement to "help ensure that training is relevant to existing and expected job opportunities."

OPEIU gains contract for 152 dental surgeons

Hackensack, N.J.—Office & Professional Employees Local 153 negotiated the first contract for 152 dental surgeons on the faculty at Fairleigh Dickinson University's dental school.

The unit of doctors was organized last September. Its initial three-year agreement provides for retroactive pay adjustments back to January 1983 and salary reopener clauses for July 1984 and July 1985. It also contains a one-year reduction in the timetable for promotions.

Far from Dead

A BALANCED BUDGET amendment to the Constitution of the United States is such a scatterbrained concept that it may appear to be beating a dead horse to take up cudgels against it. Unfortunately, this particular horse is far from dead.

President Reagan has given an election-year embrace to the long-festering constitutional amendment proposal, and with good reason. It gives him an escape hatch when challenged on his plans to deal with a huge and fast-growing deficit.

Rather than bite the bullet and concede the need for more tax revenues, the President tries to tell us that the deficits will disappear if the Constitution is amended to prohibit them.

Now that's nonsense, of course. Obviously, anytime Reagan thinks the budget can be balanced without destroying the nation's defenses or dismantling its government, all he has to do is send such a budget to Congress. Instead, he has submitted budgets with deficits approaching $200 billion—ignoring his 1980 campaign pledge of a balanced budget by 1984.

If it so defies common sense, why is a constitutional amendment to require a balanced budget such a clear and present danger?

THE ANSWER is twofold: A ticking time bomb in the form of state petitions for a constitutional convention, and the hypocrisy of legislators who knew better.

The Constitution was itself the product of a convention called to strengthen the original Articles of Confederaiton that bound the former British colonies together. The delegates quickly decided to create an entirely new structure rather than try to patch the old.

With that experience, it is not surprising that the option of a constitutional convention was written into the new Constitution.

In fact, the delegates had built an enduring structure and the normal process of amendments initiated by Congress and ratified by the states proved adequate.

The constitutional convention process was never used and—considering the risks involved in tampering with the structure of government—should not be.

But no one thought to set a time limit on the process of petitioning for a convention, so state resolutions that were adopted as far back as 1975 are presumably valid today. Thirty-two resolutions have been adopted, and while some are subject to various challenges, the total is dangerously close to the 34 required.

Some members of Congress are using the argument that it would be better if Congress initiated a balanced budget amendment than risk a runaway convention that could come up with even more outrageous proposals.

That's the same gutless path that brought about adoption of the state resolutions in the first place.

The balanced budget constitutional amendment drive was spawned by one of these right-wing, single-issue groups that members of legislative bodies too often seek to appease. A balanced budget sounds almost as good as motherhood and apple pie.

So these mischievous resolutions were passed by state after state, and because they carried no time limit, they are as dangerous now as a decade ago.

CONGRESS CANNOT depend on the state legislatures that caved in so easily to pressure to pass the constitutional convention call to stand up and reject a balanced budget amendment if it is submitted for ratification. Neither the House nor the Senate should do anything that would risk such a catastrophe.

The legislatures that years ago petitioned for a constitutional convention should vote to rescind those petitions. That's the best way to defuse the time bomb. And the people of the states in which the issue is still alive should be given the facts—by their elected officials, their unions, their newspapers—that they need for an informed opinion.

If President Reagan wants a balanced budget, let him propose it to Congress. If he had done so this year, that would have put an end to the matter.

Reagan rhetoric refuted by facts on fairness issue

By Press Associates, Inc.

President Reagan always bristles at the suggestion that his budget and tax policies reward the rich at the expense of workers and the poor.

With the approach of the November elections and the Democratic challenge on the "fairness" issue, Reagan's protests of innocence have been louder and more frequent.

At his televised press conference on July 24, Reagan made a spirited defense of the fairness of his program with regard to social program spending, taxes, family income and inflation.

Regarding the criticism that his budget policies "had victimized the poor and the needy, there is not one single fact or figure to substantiate that charge," Reagan declared as the TV cameras rolled and reporters dutifully took notes.

However, the facts and figures from official, nonpartisan sources show that Reagan misrepresented the results of his policies. The Center on Budget & Policy Priorities documented the Reagan record, using data from agencies including the Congressional Budget Office, General Accounting office, Bureau of the Census, Congressional Research Service, and the White House Office of Management & Budget. The center's report was titled, "There He Goes Again: An Analysis of President Reagan's Statements on the Fairness Issue at his June 14 and July 24 Press Conferences."

Budget claims

The report's point by point analysis of Reagan's statements begins with his claim that his budget cuts haven't hurt the poor.

FACT: At least 560,000 persons, a majority of them women and children, were pushed into poverty by the 1981 budget cuts alone.

Nearly half a million single-parent families, mostly women and children, were cut from public assistance under the 1981 budget, often resulting in lost health coverage, utility shutoffs, and even running out of food. The programs for the poor were cut over twice as much as other social programs in percentage terms.

Families with incomes under $10,000 will suffer a net loss of $19 billion—$1,100 on average—from the Reagan budget and tax changes over the 1983-1985 period. Families with incomes over $80,000 will gain $35 billion—$24,000 on average—during the same period.

Mostly because of 1981 changes in the unemployment insurance system, fewer than 29 percent of the jobless are now receiving benefits — the lowest percentage on record.

REAGAN: "We are aiding more people and spending more money in those (means-tested) programs than has ever been spent in history. . . ."

FACT: Spending for low-income, means-tested programs, adjusted for inflation and unemployment, has been reduced by over $16 billion, or one-sixth, from fiscal 1981 to fiscal 1984.

Fewer, not more, Americans are being served even though millions have fallen into poverty since Reagan took office. Nearly 3 million fewer children eat school lunches; half-a-million fewer receive school breakfasts; fewer low-income working mothers are provided day care; there are fewer Aid to Families with Dependent Children beneficiaries; fewer low-income persons are provided legal services, and fewer poor children are screened for lead poisoning.

REAGAN: "Our tax policies have been more beneficial to (people at the lower end of the income scale) than to anyone else."

FACT: The Federal tax burden on families at or below the poverty line has increased sharply since 1980. A family of four at the poverty line paid $462 in federal income taxes in 1980. The same family must pay $1,079 this year.

REAGAN: "I think the reduction in inflation has certainly got to help people . . . at the lower end of the earning scale."

FACT: The real income of low- and moderate-income families, those in the bottom 40 percent, has fallen since 1980 despite lower inflation.

MEMO FROM COPE

NOV. 6 . . . THE ISSUE IS THE FUTURE

On November 6, Americans will choose between two candidates for President . . . and between two programs and two policies. Above all . . . we will choose between two visions of the future. At stake within this encompassing issue of the future of this nation and its people are many issues of particular concern to working people and their families. The record of Ronald Reagan and the program of Walter Mondale on these issues follow.

Jobs

MONDALE—Urges full employment policies with teeth in them to encourage job-creation so all may work. To avert another recession like Reagan's, would trigger special job-providing programs that sustain economic growth. Believes full employment is foundation of a strong economy.

REAGAN—More than 30 million wage-earners suffered one or more episodes of unemployment in Reagan-Republican recession 1981-83, losing $336.1 billion in earnings. President proposed no jobs programs for those laid off and tried to stymie plans advanced by others.

Aiding the Jobless

MONDALE—Demands jobless benefits adequate in amount and duration to protect those laid off and their families. Would retain special help for workers displaced by imports. Supports providing continued health coverage for idled workers.

REAGAN—Proposed reductions in jobless comp (blocked by Congress) despite deep, long recession. Tried to cut off special aid to workers displaced by imports. Opposed effort to continue health insurance for laid-off workers (10.7 million lost health coverage in families of idled workers).

Trade

MONDALE—Supports "content" law. Vows strict import limit unless U.S. trading partners lower barriers to products made here. Will not tolerate "dumping" of foreign-made goods on U.S. markets. Insists on fair trade that benefits our workers and industries as well as countries we trade with.

REAGAN—Talks "free trade" in a world where it doesn't exist. Opposes "content" plan to require certain portion of U.S.-made parts in products sold here, save American jobs. Permits almost unrestricted flood of foreign goods that continue to wipe out millions of U.S. jobs.

Reviving Basic Industry

MONDALE—Proposes business/labor/government consultation to aid basic industries through hard times largely caused by unfair foreign competition. Would okay loans if absolutely needed to safeguard industries essential to employment and national defense.

REAGAN—Opposes any special effort—offers no plan—to help basic U.S. industries, regardless of consequences to millions of U.S. workers and the economy itself. (Opposed Chrysler loan which saved hundreds of thousands of jobs and was repaid within a few years.)

Job Safety/Health

MONDALE—Sponsor of original job safety/health law when in Senate. Urges increased coverage, more effective enforcement. Demands clear identification of, protection against, hazardous substances in the workplace, swift clean-up of toxic waste dumps.

REAGAN—Has undercut OSHA: Fewer inspections; fewer protections for workers; delays in setting standards for worker exposure to hazardous substances; inadequate standards when finally set. Has made no real headway in toxic waste clean-up.

Unions

MONDALE—Opposed extreme action by Reagan against PATCO. Vows to appoint fair-minded, even-handed persons to NLRB, who'll judges cases on merit, provide decisions more speedily to clear away case backlog.

REAGAN—Broke air traffic controllers union, threw 11,000 out of work. (Present controllers lodge same complaints PATCO struck over, move toward unionizing.) Stacks NLRB with management representatives who leave union complaints in mothballs or consistently find against unions.

Taxes/Deficit

MONDALE—Proposes cap on tax benefits Reagan heaped on wealthy, plus repeal of Reagan giveaways to Big Oil, other corporations that let nearly 100 profitable firms escape taxation entirely. (These steps would greatly reduce deficit.) Would close loopholes and tax shelters to oblige rich persons, corporations to bear fair share of tax load, take big bite out of huge deficits.

REAGAN—Engineered history's biggest tax bonanza for rich persons, big corporations—major reason for Reagan's $200 billion deficits which starve programs for workers, the needy. Under Reagan tax cuts, rich reap huge gains, average citizens at best hold their own. Would tax worker health insurance. If re-elected, expected to propose national sales tax, which hits average American hardest.

Education/Youth

MONDALE—Urges $10 billion infusion of new funds to upgrade public schools, increase teacher pay. Promises to protect, expand college loan program for children of workers and the needy, so every qualified student will have chance at higher education. Opposes youth subminimum wage.

REAGAN—Slashed aid to public schools; cut college loan programs, depriving more than 700,000 low/moderate income students of needed funding to help complete education. Repeatedly proposed subminimum wage for youth.

Equal Rights

MONDALE—Would throw out Reagan appointees to Civil Rights Commission, provide strong enforcement of Voting Rights Act, other minorities protections. Supports ERA, full rights for women, minorities.

REAGAN—Weakened U.S. Civil Rights Commission. Fought extension of Voting Rights Act, fostered lax enforcement. Opposes ERA, gutted programs that aid minorities.

Social Security

MONDALE—Would uphold basic concept of Social Security, its protections and benefits. If necessary, would draw from general Treasury funds to sustain benefit levels for retirees.

REAGAN—A loose cannon on the deck. Erupts regularly on Social Security with comments that suggest he'd revamp program to cut protections, retiree benefits. (Example: "Social Security ought to be voluntary.")

Health

MONDALE—Would put lid on hospital and doctor charges (fastest rising costs of all), strengthen Medicare, Medicaid to provide more protection at less cost and safeguard funding for both programs.

REAGAN—Has no effective program to control runaway medical costs. Cut Medicare, Medicaid, seeks further cuts in these basic health programs, yet jeopardizes funding through failure to promote adequate controls.

Fairness

MONDALE—Will restore Reagan cuts in programs for the needy, resume fight to eradicate poverty that's been abandoned under Reagan. (Number of persons living in poverty increased by 6 million during Reagan era, reached highest levels in 20 years.)

REAGAN—Deprives a million persons of all food stamps, 4 million of some. Cuts 1.1 million school children out of school lunches, 900,000 off school breakfasts. Slashes $110.2 billion from wide range of people-serving programs.

At Capitol Heights, Md.—and across the nation—postal workers on off-duty time deliver messages protesting management's contract demands.

Congress prohibits two-tier wage cuts by Postal Service

By David L. Perlman

Congress blocked the U.S. Postal Service from imposing a two-tier wage system that would have drastically slashed the pay and benefits of all newly hired workers.

The clearcut congressional directive was written into a veto-proof appropriations bill in language that had the force of law. It reinstated for new hires as well as assuring for present employees the conditions that had been negotiated by the postal unions in the contract that expired on July 20.

Postal management, which was already facing a legal challenge from the unions, said it would "obey the law."

The parties remained far apart in their bargaining positions and the 45-day factfinding procedure provided by law in the event of a contract impasse is under way.

There are actually three sets of simultaneous negotiations and factfinding—the two biggest unions, the Postal Workers and the Letter Carriers, are bargaining together; the Mail Handlers division of the Laborers is bargaining separately for the workers it represents, and the unaffiliated Rural Letter Carriers make up the third negotiating team.

Action by Congress came shortly before a scheduled federal district court hearing on a suit by the four postal unions to block the two-tier pay plan. The hearing, originally set for Aug. 15, was postponed in anticipation that President Reagan would sign the appropriations bill—which includes funds for El Salvador assistance and essential government functions—and that the Postal Service would not renege on its promise of compliance.

Praise for Congress

In Las Vegas, where the Letter Carriers and the Postal workers will hold separate but simultaneous conventions starting Aug. 19, union reaction was applause for Congress and resentment against a provocative management that hired a professional anti-union consultant to help shape its negotiating stance.

Management's "last offer" before the factfinding process got under way was still a pay freeze for the present workforce coupled with a 23-percent cutback in wages, benefits and vacation time for new hires.

The factfinding procedure started with the two sides in each of the three sets of negotiations choosing one member each from a list of mediators supplied by the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service, with the two chosen deciding on the third member.

The factfinding report, which must be submitted within 45 days, may be either with or without recommendations for a settlement.

If the parties still cannot reach a voluntary agreement, the law requires that the issues in dispute be submitted to binding arbitration. Postal employees are forbidden by law from striking.

Both Postal Workers President Moe Biller and Letter Carriers President Vincent Sombrotto have charged management with deliberate provocative actions that have worsened the bargaining atmosphere.

Productivity not a gain for workers or buyers

By Susan Dunlop

Although the nation's economy posted a gain in productivity in 1983, workers and consumers have yet to reap the benefits.

Overall productivity for the U.S. economy rose 2.7 percent last year, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported. In the manufacturing sector alone, productivity increased 4.3 percent.

AFL-CIO Research Director Rudy Oswald pointed out that despite these changes, corporations in general "are not reducing prices paid by consumers, and workers are receiving little benefit."

Instead, the productivity gains are being absorbed by higher profits and interest payments, such as those on corporate bonds which primarily benefit the wealthy.

Unit costs

A separate BLS report showed that unit labor costs in 1983 rose only 1.6 percent while unit non-labor costs—primarily those profits and interest payments—were up by 6.3 percent.

And in the second quarter of 1984, unit labor costs edged up just 1.2 percent while non-labor costs jumped 7.5 percent compared to second quarter 1983.

Overall, Oswald said, the productivity figures show that pressure for wage constraints and givebacks is unwarranted.

The BLS breakdown of productivity changes by industry showed gains among three-quarters of the classifications surveyed, but declines among 25 percent of the industries.

In manufacturing, the steel industry posted a record productivity increase of 27.7 percent in 1983 over 1982. But BLS noted this was a rebound from the recession-battered industry's record 18.1-percent decline in productivity in 1982.

Steel output was up 14.7 percent in 1983 due to increased demand, while employee hours were down by 10.2 percent, reflecting problems such as plant closings and cutbacks.

Among those industries contributing to the demand for steel was motor vehicles where productivity was up 14.2 percent based on a 30.6 percent increase in output. Employee hours were up 14.3 percent. The BLS pointed out that the improvement in this industry contrasts with its 8 percent decline in productivity in 1982.

Reagan's NLRB overturns policy on hospital units

The Reagan-appointed majority of the National Labor Relations Board changed policy again, switching to the employer side in a refusal-to-bargain case and scrapping established guidelines for bargaining units in the health care field.

In the short run, the new 3-1 decision means that St. Francis Hospital in Memphis won't have to negotiate with Electrical Workers Local 474, which won a representation election for a unit of 43 maintenance workers.

The hospital had resisted bargaining for more than four years. Finally, it found an NLRB majority that agreed that it didn't have to.

In the long run, as AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland noted in an interview, it

Rowland-Buckley connection

Appointments threat to job safety

By Arlee C. Green

Workers can expect a further retreat in federal job safety law enforcement under Robert A. Rowland and E. Ross Buckley, the AFL-CIO charged.

Rowland was sworn in last month as head of the Occupational Safety & Health Administration after leaving the chairmanship of the Occupational Safety & Health Review Commission. And Buckley, a member of the commission just six months, was named by President Reagan to take over as chairman.

Reagan bypassed the Senate confirmation process on Rowland by giving him a recess appointment while Congress was out for the Democratic convention.

An AFL-CIO analysis of the Rowland and Buckley voting records at OSHRC points to a grim outlook for worker safeguards against job hazards, warned Margaret Seminario, the federation's industrial hygienist.

From Rowland's appointment to the commission in 1981, where he served with Carter Administration appointees Bert Cottine and Timothy Cleary, until Cottine's departure in the spring of 1983, the panel ruled on 146 cases involving employer violations. Rowland voted to vacate OSHA citations in 121 cases, or 83 percent.

Lone dissenter

In contrast, the commission upheld the OSHA in 72 percent of the cases during this period, with Rowland usually dissenting.

After Buckley joined Rowland on the commission in January, OSHRC upheld OSHA citations against employers in only four of 20 cases.

Buckley became the swing vote. "Everything we had feared about Buckley coming on the commission has proven true," Seminario said. "He has moved in lockstep with Rowland to weaken even further OSHA's ability to protect workers."

She pointed out that Buckley joined with Rowland on a number of cases to overturn previous enforcement decisions. Seminario noted the Duquesne Light Co. case where Rowland and Buckley held that employers don't have to provide medical examinations to workers unless there is "at least some degree of regular asbestos exposure." In this case, the workers were exposed to 10 times the federal limit on asbestos.

The two Reagan-appointed commissioners ruled that such intermittent exposures are non-serious violations, even those an Cement workers at a strike rally in Independence, Mo., hear union officers charge that years of peaceful labor relations with their employer, Missouri Portland Cement Co., have been ruined by the company's union-busting tactics. The strike by 650 members of the Boilermakers' cement division is in its 10th week at four of the company's plants in Missouri, Illinois and Michigan. The company forced the strike by rejecting an industry pattern settlement. At the rally are, right, Boilermakers Vice President Richard Northrip and Director Henry Bechtholdt of the union's Cement Workers division.

House expands 'superfund'

El Salvador aid bill cleared by Congress

The House voted a major expansion of the superfund program for cleanup of toxic wastes and Congress reached a consensus on support for El Salvador's new government before beginning a recess that will run until after Labor Day.

Congress has for all practical purposes abandoned its elaborate budget-setting procedure this year, but it is moving ahead with appropriations bills at a somewhat faster pace than in the past. The funding bills are needed to keep government programs going in the fiscal year that starts next Oct. 1.

The El Salvador aid battle was over a supplemental appropriations for the current fiscal year, and the outcome amounted to a cautious vote of confidence for the new administration of President Jose Napoleon Duarte.

As finally approved, the measure included $70 million in addition to the $126 million previously provided for military aid along with an added $120 million in economic support.

Originally, the House had rejected any added military aid and the Senate added the $117 million requested by the Administration. The $70 million compromise was accepted by the House on a 234-161 vote.

The AFL-CIO had urged approval of the full amount of economic and military aid as recommended by the National Bipartisan Commission for El Salvador—the Kissinger Commission—on which Federation President Lane Kirkland served.

A letter from AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison urged approval of the Central American assistance funds.

Support for Duarte

"The Duarte government was elected with the full support of the workers and campesinos," the AFL-CIO letter noted. "Duarte deserves a fair chance to achieve his objective since he is committed to meeting the conditions of democracy, land reform, dialogue for peace, and prosecution of the murderers of the AFL-CIO representatives," it concluded.

An amendment inserted in the bill on a motion by Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) conditioned military assistance to El Salvador on continued progress in human rights protection. It requires President Reagan to certify that this is the case before funds are released.

The toxic waste superfund bill would authorize the Environmental Protection Agency to spend up to $10.2 billion over five years to clean up abandoned toxic dumps. The existing program, which under the Reagan Administration was marked by EPA foot-dragging, was begun in 1980 with a $1.6 billion authorization.

Most of the funds for the program come from taxes on the petroleum and chemical industries, which would be increased under the House-passed bill. The Administration has resisted the measure, urging Congress to wait until next year when an EPA study is supposed to be completed.

In another area of labor interest, the Senate passed a compromise generic drug bill, which combines longer patent protection for firms that develop new drugs with a simplified procedure for other firms to market the drugs under a generic name without repeating extensive research in order to obtain approval from the Food & Drug Administration.

The AFL-CIO has supported generic drug legislation as a means of lowering health care costs for individuals and for group insurance plans.

Painters pick 5 new officers, re-elect Duval at convention

Painters President William A. Duval headed a mixed slate of incumbents and challengers who were swept into office by acclamation at the union's 25th convention. Just prior to the voting, all of the opposition slate withdrew. The result was the election of a new secretary-treasurer and four new vice presidents.

Convention delegates also voted to establish a strike defense fund and approved the creation of a new Canadian district.

A. L. "Mike" Monroe, a district vice president, was elected the union's new secretary-treasurer. His son Michael Monroe, 2nd District organizing director, was elected vice president of the district.

International Rep. Patrick Lane was elected to the 4th District seat and Walter Raftery, the 6th District organizing director, is now that district's vice president.

Besides Duval, incumbent Vice Presidents Bernard Sniegowski, James Wolford, Guy Leber and Richard J. Zack were returned to office.

Just prior to the voting, incumbent Sec.-Treas. Robert J. Petersdorf withdrew from the election, along with incumbent vice presidents Jack T. Cox of the 4th District and James B. Cox of the 6th District. Also withdrawing were challengers Harry Martin and James Shay.

David Cairns of Toronto was elected vice president of the new Canadian district. Previously, the at-large 7th District vice president covered Canada, along with the union's special trades division.

Defense fund panel

In creating the strike defense fund, the convention set up a committee comprised of members from each district to determine the source and level of revenues.

Delegates also voted to give their full support to the "initiative of the AFL-CIO in supporting candidates in primary elections as well as general elections" and urged the federation to "do everything possible to dump Reagan in November."

In a convention address, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland told delegates that the progress their union made over the past 97 years has been jeopardized by the Reagan Administration. Kirkland warned the delegates not to be taken in by the Republican campaign aimed at getting voters to forget the misery caused by Reagan policies.

In opening the convention, Duval said Reagan "and those that pull his strings must be removed from the federal level where that kind of thinking and resulting activities have caused so much hardship for our members."

President Robert A. Georgine, of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept., urged the convention to direct its pension funds toward creating "jobs for our members and other workers."

President Frank Drozak, of the Maritime Trades Dept. detailed for the convention the economic assault on workers over the last four years, keying on the decision of the National Labor Relations Board, the weakening of OSHA and the Reagan attacks on social security and the Davis-Bacon Act.

In convention sessions focusing on job safety, delegates were addressed by former OSHA Administrator Eula Bingham, Dr. Irving Selikoff and Dr. Edwin Holand Dr. Edward Baker of Harvard.

The convention also adopted resolutions supporting the AFL-CIO's call for a $68 billion national public works program, establishment of union retirees' clubs, backing common situs picketing and freezing the salaries of the union's executive board and international representatives through 1985.

Court reinforces union right to data in pay rate case

A union has a right to the information it needs to check up on a contractor's compliance with the prevailing wage provisions of the Davis-Bacon Act, a federal judge ruled.

Electrical Workers Local 41 suspected that a non-union subcontractor employed on a Buffalo housing construction project wasn't paying his workers prevailing wages and benefits. But when it sought the payroll data under the Freedom of Information Act, the Dept. of Housing & Urban Development deleted from the payroll records most of the information the union needed.

HUD's argument in the subsequent court proceedings was that payroll data including the names of the employees would infringe on personal privacy and could subject the employees to "unwanted organizing pressure."

Judge Louis L. Oberdorfer of the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia upheld the union's request for the information and rejected HUD's arguments.

Appointees termed safety hazards

OSHA expert testified "there is a possibility of contracting cancer based on any amount of asbestos exposure."

They also held the employer would not be required to monitor worker exposures because of the "sporadic" nature of their exposures. Seminario pointed out that if this type of ruling were allowed to stand, it would rule out basic medical and monitoring protections for most construction, demolition and maintenance workers who receive occasional exposures to asbestos.

Seminario said that Rowland's "interpretation of the law and of OSHA standards has been one-sidedly skewed, imposing a burden of proof on OSHA that in most instances is impossible to meet."

Rowland's decisions on workers' excessive exposure to toxic substances bordered on a body-count approach. His voting record exhibited "a total lack of understanding or acceptance of well established public health and industrial hygiene principles and would require a certainty of harm to workers before corrective action would be taken," Seminario charged.

Rowland has challenged the "agency's toxic substance standards and other consensus standards adopted in 1972, including those that have withstood court challenge, Seminario noted. He applies interpretations that are in direct conflict with the literal requirements and that seriously reduce protections afforded" by the standards, she said.

Rowland's rulings have disputed the life-threatening nature of silica dust exposure, determined the noise standard unenforceable to require feasible administrative or engineering controls, and held that engineering controls should not be preferred over personal protective equipment, such as dust masks.

Full retreat

Seminario said workers can expect that under Rowland, OSHA will cease to issue any citations for violations under the general duty clause of the job safety law. She said Rowland views the general duty clause as being "too general" and of requiring "preponderant evidence" that an employer "recognized" a hazard.

In a case where a steelworker lost an eye after being struck by a metal pellet, the company was cited for failing to provide overhead protection to the worker who was 87 feet below and 50 feet away from where the metal was falling. Rowland denied the citation because OSHA failed "to prove by preponderant evidence" that the employer "recognized" the hazard.

Seminario also suggested that "if there is a way to interpret the law absolving the employer of requirements specified by the law, Rowland will do so." She noted under the inorganic arsenic standard, employers are required to provide medical exams without cost to the employee. Rowland found fault with that requirement being placed in the preamble of the standard and held that OSHA "should not construe the 'without cost' requirement to require reimbursement of these costs (travel costs) as a matter of law."

The U.S. 9th Circuit Court of Appeals rejected Rowland's reasoning and found the preamble was legally applicable and did require payment for time spent taking exams, Seminario pointed out.

In a case involving exposure to silica dust at seven times the allowable limit, Rowland chided OSHA for not being able to prove that silicosis could result from such exposure. He would have not found the overexposure to be "serious" and would have assessed no penalty, Seminario said.

In appointing Rowland as Auchter's replacement, she said, the White House seems to have found a person who fits the sentiments expressed by Mr. Reagan in March 1980 when he said to Business Week magazine, "I question seriously the need for OSHA."

Mondale's record vs. Reagan policies

Following is the introduction to the AFL-CIO Review of the Issues and Candidates, which was prepared for the federation's General Board meeting in Denver on Aug. 19. The General Board, representing all of the AFL-CIO affiliates and central bodies, will act on a formal endorsement for the presidential election.

Walter F. Mondale and Geraldine A. Ferraro have earned labor's support in the presidential election by their performance in public office and the positions they have taken on issues important to workers and their families—and to all Americans.

The votes that Mondale cast as a senator from Minnesota demonstrate that he is no mere election-year convert to the positions he has taken in this campaign. Mondale's record, and its sharp contrast to the policies of President Reagan made him the overwhelming choice of delegates to the last AFL-CIO convention.

As the endorsement resolution noted, Mondale "has been an ally of the trade union movement in the struggle to meet the needs of our people for jobs at decent wages, for better public education and medical care, for equal rights and civil rights, and for decent housing."

The contrast is equally great between the rival candidates for Vice President.

Geraldine Ferraro, like Mondale, doesn't need any introduction to the trade union movement. Her mother was a union garment worker and she was a union steward at the public school where she taught early in her career.

Her voting record in the House of Representatives was every bit as good as the voting record Mondale compiled in the Senate. Both were rated more than 90 percent "right" on key votes by AFL-CIO standards.

Vice President Bush's voting record during his terms in the House showed only one "right" vote and 21 "wrong" votes.

Prolonged siege

During the Reagan Administration, the nation went through the most severe and prolonged siege of unemployment since the Great Depression. Even now, the jobless rate remains higher than in most previous recessions.

Jobs are a key to a prosperous America, and Mondale shares labor's commitment to full employment goals.

He was an original sponsor of legislation to protect workers from sudden plant closings. During the past periods of high unemployment, he voted for emergency job programs and public service jobs for the unemployed. These are programs that the Reagan Administration scuttled, adding to the severety and hardships of the Reagan recession.

Mondale has spoken up for a partnership of government, labor and business to modernize America's basic industries and make them fully competitive. He knows that the United States cannot prosper without an industrial base and the jobs that factories provide.

Under President Reagan, the nation's trade deficit—like the budget deficit—has soared to previously unthinkable levels. High interest rates, which put a damper on the U.S. economy, have pushed the exchange rate of the dollar artificially high. You don't have to be an economist to know that it's bad news when exports from the United States are overpriced and imports are artificially underpriced because of the exchange rate of the dollar.

Fairness issue

Perhaps the issue that most separates the presidential candidates is fairness.

Since its first days in office, the Reagan Administration has tilted to the side of the rich and powerful. Those who had the least were left behind, and there are more of them. Previous administrations have achieved a reduction in poverty. Under President Reagan, there has been a sharp increase.

America should not be "a jungle where only the fittest or the richest prosper," Mondale told the AFL-CIO convention last year.

Under President Reagan, federal job and training programs have been slashed, unemployment insurance cut back, food stamp help reduced, children denied school lunches and social services slashed.

The tax cuts of which President Reagan is so proud have been worth vastly more to the wealthy than to middle-class households. Businesses have been given so many tax credits and special exemptions that the corporation tax has almost disappeared as a source of revenue. At the same time the federal deficit has grown astronomically and interest payments on the federal debt are eating up a large part of each year's revenues.

In accepting the Democratic presidential nomination, Mondale told the American people that the deficit piled up under the Reagan Administration made higher taxes and restraints on spending inevitable —regardless of whether he or Reagan wins the election.

That's straight talk, and just about every economist in the country agrees with it. It's what responsible Republicans in Congress have been saying as well as Democrats. Even President Reagan waffled on the issue until deciding that there was more political mileage to be gotten out of saying he has "no plans" to raise taxes. He's asked his advisers to send him their tax reform recommendations—after the election.

When President Reagan raises taxes or, as he would probably put it "broadens the tax base," there's little likelihood that it will be done fairly.

Mondale's prediction is that Reagan "will sock it to the average-income families again, and leave his rich friends alone."

By contrast, Mondale said, "to the corporations and freeloaders who play the loopholes or pay no taxes, my message is: Your free ride is over."

The next President of the United States will probably appoint a majority of the Supreme Court and make lifetime appointments of hundreds of other federal judges.

The president will determine by his power of appointment the manner in which the Occupational Safety & Health Act is enforced, and that's literally a life-or-death situation for many workers.

We've seen—tragically—how President Reagan's appointees have weakened job health standards and cut back on safety inspections. Employer costs have been put above worker health in setting standards limiting exposure to deadly asbestos fibers and cotton dust, among others.

The Reagan Administration has sought to weaken, not enforce, the wage-hour law and prevailing wage protections under the Davis-Bacon and Service Contract Acts.

Union-busting consultants and management attorneys have been put in charge of enforcing federal labor law. The counsel of the National Labor Relations Board is an alumnus of the fiercely anti-union National Right to Work Committee.

President Reagan still campaigns as if government were the enemy. Mondale put it differently: "Government does not belong on your back, but it does belong at your side."

Workers aren't the only group with good reason to be concerned about the dangers of a second Reagan Administration.

Acting friendly

Reagan may declare himself now a friend of the elderly and of social security. But it is not so easy to wipe out the memory of his Administration's attempt to slash social security benefits drastically, and the very real cutbacks he has made in Medicare health benefits.

Mondale's firm position is that the government made a bargain with the men and women who have paid into the social security program during their working lives—and that bargain must be kept.

On virtually every civil rights issue that has arisen in his Administration, President Reagan has sought to weaken existing laws and take the narrowest possible interpretation in enforcing them.

By contrast, Mondale was an original sponsor of the Voting Rights Act and has been identified with the generation of progress that opened doors for Americans long excluded. Under the Reagan Administration, some of those doors are again starting to close.

Until Reagan, the Republican Party like the Democratic Party had championed the Equal Rights Amendment. Mondale wants to be President when ERA becomes part of the Constitution.

Polluters have found allies in the Reagan Administration, consumers can't get anyone to listen.

The nation's infrastructure — roads, bridges, water supply and waste treatment systems—deteriorates. High interest rates have priced most young families out of the dream of home ownership — and the lack of low-cost housing has pushed proud Americans into the ranks of the homeless.

Geraldine Ferraro spoke to some of these concerns in accepting the Democratic Party's vice presidential nomination:

American dream

"Our faith that we can shape a better future is what the American dream is all about. The promise of our country is that the rules are fair. If you work hard and play by the rules, you can earn your share of America's blessings."

It "isn't right," she said, "that every year the share of taxes paid by individual citizens is going up, while the share paid by large corporations is getting smaller and smaller."

The same set of rules should apply to all Americans. "But under this Administration, the rules are rigged against too many of our people," Ferraro charged.

Under President Reagan, corporations have used billions of dollars in tax windfalls to buy up other corporations instead of investing in new jobs or in technology to become more productive.

Mondale has other ideas, and he sent a message to companies that send their jobs overseas:

"We need those jobs here at home. And our country won't help your business unless your business helps our country."

Mondale knows, as he put it, that "America must have a strong defense and a sober view of the Soviets" and he takes seriously the government's constitutional obligation to provide for both the common defense and general welfare.

And he faces squarely what President Reagan insists on denying—that the only way to bring down deficits without raising taxes would be to slash the defense program below the safety level, or demolish social security, or both.

Republicans used to talk about "fiscal responsibility." But that's before President Reagan inaugurated an administration based on what Vice President Bush once dismissed as "voodoo economics."

The contrast between the Reagan record and the Mondale program is spelled out in more detail in the pages that follow. The issues that divide the candidates are the issues that have united the unions that make up the AFL-CIO so strongly behind the Mondale-Ferraro ticket.

Pay equity issues stressed in CWA convention action

Philadelphia — The Communications Workers convention put high priorities on closing the female wage gap, extending federal job safety coverage to public employees and strengthening civil rights protections.

Delegates noted in a resolution that "the absence of pay equity has wide-ranging implications for both men and women, and for the economy as a whole. The exploitation of women as a cheap labor pool holds down the wages of those on the higher rungs of the pay scale" as well as those directly affected, the resolution observed.

Bargaining pledge

CWA President Glenn Watts pledged that the union will continue to carry the pay battle to the bargaining table.

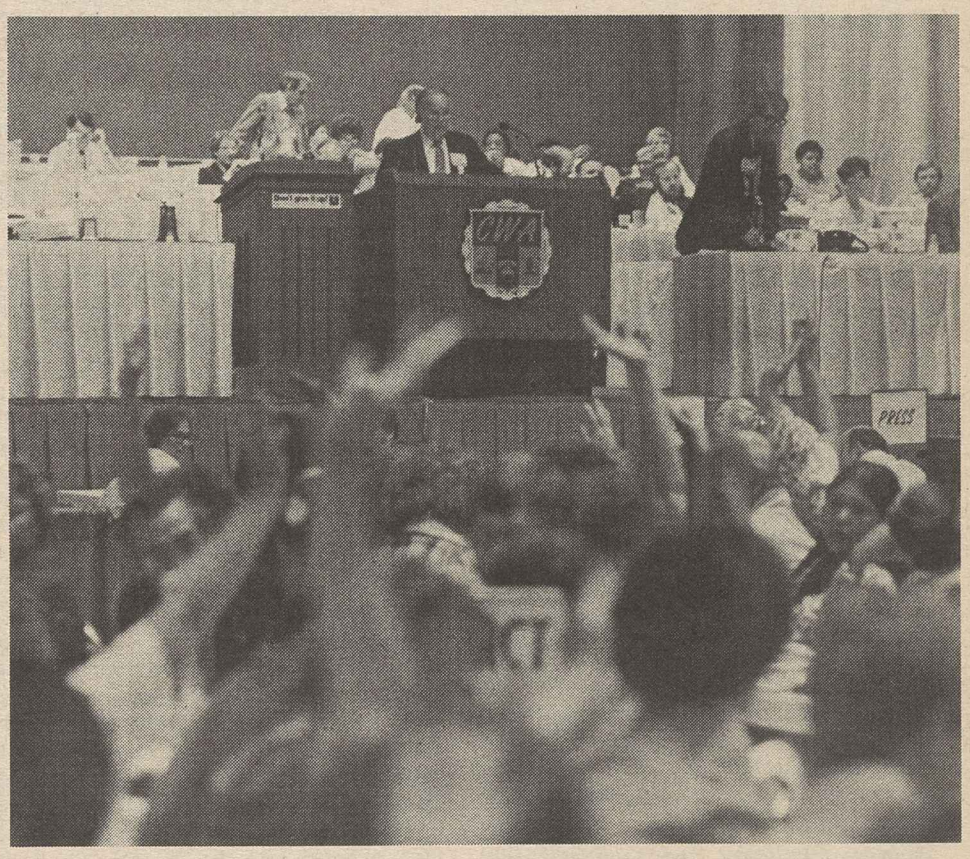
The convention stressed the need for bias-free job evaluation systems, training and retraining programs to eliminate occupational segregation, stronger laws, and legal remedies.

It also called for the CWA to develop internal education and public relations programs to help eliminate the wage gap.

Noting the abject record of the Reagan Administration in enforcing the Occupational Safety & Health Act, delegates urged Congress to adopt measures providing public workers with guarantees of safe and healthful working conditions.

In addition, delegates said the CWA should "petition Congress to re-establish adequate funding levels for existing and future OSHA programs so that proper investigative and enforcement powers, now paralyzed by Reagan Administration budget cuts, will revitalize the intent and meaning" of the OSHA program.

Immediate action is needed that would protect the independence of federal civil rights agencies against Reagan budget cuts and policies, delegates said. They urged Congress to enact legislation that would overturn the Supreme Court's Grove City College decision, sharply narrowing the 1972 law banning sex discrimination by federally aided colleges and universities.



Delegates to the Communications Workers convention in Philadelphia vote on a resolution as CWA President Glenn Watts presides.

Plasterers President Melvin H. Roots reports to delegates to the union's convention. At right is Sec.-Treas. Robert J. Holton.

Plasterers convention looks at crucial ballot box issues

Las Vegas, Nev.—Delegates to the Plasterers & Cement Masons convention were urged to look to the ballot box as well as the bargaining table for a redress of grievances.

President Melvin H. Roots said a one-sixth drop in the union's membership in the five years since the last convention reflected the impact of "Reagan, recession and reaction."

The union had already endorsed Walter F. Mondale's presidential candidacy, and delegates enthusiastically adopted a resolution introduced from the floor strongly backing the ticket of Mondale and Geraldine A. Ferraro. Now that she's on the ticket, Roots said, "we've got both the best man and the best woman."

Constitutional update

The union's 45th convention had before it various proposals for updating a constitution that dates back more than 100 years and has become unwieldly in terms of present-day conditions. Also on the agenda was the election of officers.

At the opening sessions, however, speakers stressed the importance of the coming elections to America's workers.

President Andrew T. Haas of the Asbestos Workers stressed the importance of internal union voter registration efforts.

The Administration's anti-union policies have encouraged union-busting and the formation of "double-breasted" subsidiaries by building trades contractors, he charged.

Executive Sec.-Treas. John F. Henning of the California AFL-CIO said union members in his state have been getting heavily misleading mailings from the Reagan campaign organization.

The best way to counter such an effort, he suggested, is to get the facts on Reagain's record to the union members—including the fact that nearly one-third of all income tax revenues will have to go to pay the costs of the national debt.

Reagan's "subversion of the National Labor Relations Board" is likely to be followed by the packing of the Supreme Court with anti-labor jurists if Reagan is re-elected, Henning suggested.

Roots said plasterers, cement masons and other construction workers still experience high, double-digit unemployment in much of the country.

He said there might be an excuse for the high Reagan deficits "if that money was going into productive investments—to make our industries more competitive, to rebuild our national infrastructure . . . to put people to work."

But in fact, "we are mortgaging our children's futre—and that of their children" to provide tax windfalls for the wealthy, Roots contended.

Union, U.S. Steel open job centers

Pittsburgh—The Steelworkers and U.S. Steel Corp. have teamed to set up a network of job assistance centers to aid the more than 10,000 workers hit by layoffs at the company's mills.

The centers will help the dislocated workers search for new jobs and help locate and pay for retraining opportunities. As many as half of the displaced workers are expected to use the program.

The programs will be available in addition to other benefits for displaced workers already provided in the USWA's contract with the nation's largest steelmaker.

U.S. Steel will pay for one-third of the project's estimated $4 million budget. The remainder of the funding is expected to come from the federal government through the Job Training Partnership Act.

Centers are already in place in South Chicago, Ill.; Gary, Ind.; Fairless Hills, Pa., Cleveland and Pittsburgh. Other locations will include New Jersey and Utah.

In convention action

Fire Fighters approve safety program funds

Cincinnati — Concerned with the continuing casualty rate in the fire services, the Fire Fighters convention voted to establish and fund a new union department of occupational safety and health.

The 1,200 delegates approved a special 8-cent increase in the IAFF's monthly per capita to finance the safety and health program if necessary after a Labor Dept. New Directions grant expires in mid-1985.

IAFF President John A. Gannon praised the convention decision, pointing out that for fire fighters the concerns for safety and health are "more than just a priority, they are a moral commitment."

The union's statistics show that during the decade ended in 1982, there was an annual average of 78 line-of-duty fatalities, 89 deaths from occupational disease, 45,530 injuries and 1,112 forced retirements due to job-related accidents or illnesses.

Under the federal OSHA grant, the union was able to assemble a staff of specialists in the safety and health field, conduct or sponsor research, and disseminate information to the 160,000 members of the IAFF.

Funding concerns

The convention resolution instructs the officers to seek continuing funding from government or foundations for these activities. But if that search is unsuccessful, the union will take over the financing of the projects developed by the new headquarters department.

Gannon was re-elected to a third two-year term over challenger Dustin Alward, an IAFF vice president from Randolph, Mass., by a vote 76,050 to 64,264. Sec.-Treas. Alfred K. Whitehead was re-elected without opposition.

Delegates overwhelmingly approved a presidential election resolution endorsing the Walter Mondale-Geraldine Ferraro ticket.

In introducing the measure from the convention floor, President Patrick Camtalme of Phoenix Local 493 said the convention action was essential to squelch the impression that the IAFF had come out in favor of President Reagan's re-election after a small unaffiliated group in New Jersey endorsed the Republican ticket.

In a show of hands, the delegates voted their support for the election of Democratic candidates Mondale and Ferraro by a 20-1 margin.

"Firefighters are fed up with Reaganomics, unemployment and with government serving the wealthy and big corporations," Gannon stressed.

"This union will work hard to help elect the Mondale-Ferraro team," he pledged.

Per capita boost

Delegates also approved an additional 10-cent boost in per capita payments to cover the union's increased operating costs.

Under IAFF procedures, specific projects proposed to the convention carry a per-capita price tag that is automatically built into the dues structure.

Thus, the 8-cent increaes for the job safety program and the 10-cent general fund increase raise the monthly per capita from $3.06 to $3.24.

The IAFF's concern with pay-as-you-go financing has been heightened during the last four years of austerity. In 1980, the union leadership discovered that because of faulty reporting procedures, the IAFF had an unexpected deficit that ran well over $1 million.

With an austerity program that sought to preserve basic programs and services, Gannon told the delegates that the IAFF "is once again in healthy financial condition."

"We have wiped out a staggering deficit," he told the cheering delegates.

At its opening session, the IAFF heard Ohio Gov. Richard Celeste express strong support for collective bargaining in the public sector. He praised the IAFF's record of responsibility in his state.

Court raps NLRB's policy switch

San Francisco—A federal appeals court told the National Labor Relations Board to return to its pre-Reagan policy of avoiding "unnecessary interference in internal union affairs."

The 2-1 decision by the U.S. 9th Circuit Court of Appeals was a victory for the Food & Commercial Workers in a six-year battle to get the Seattle First National Bank to the bargaining table. The bank's blatant refusal-to-bargain policies earned it a place on the AFL-CIO's boycott list.

It was a stern rebuke to the NLRB, which had started out on the worker's side of the issue but switched its backing to the management position after votes of Reagan appointees titled the labor board's membership.

At issue was whether a decision by a union to change its affiliation status would cause it to lose its bargaining rights if only union members voted on the action.

Irrational change

The policy change, which the appellate court found "irrational" and inconsistent with the National Labor Relations Act, had aligned the NLRB with management in contending that employees who chose not to join the union that bargains for them—the free riders—should have an equal vote with dues-paying members on the affiliation of the union.

The origin of the dispute dates back to 1977, when the independent union that represented employees of the Seattle First bank was unable to get management to agree to a new contract. After the bank cancelled the old agreement and made unilateral changes in conditions, the union filed charges and the NLRB found the Seattle First had failed to bargain in good faith.

In 1978, with the dispute still unresolved, the bank's union employees voted by a big margin to affiliate with the Retail Clerks, the union that is now the Food & Commercial Workers. The NLRB certified the union—now UFCW Local 1182—as the continuing bargaining agent, finding no cause to dispute the procedure followed for affiliation and no change in the nature of the union.

That was in accord with existing NLRB policy. When the bank refused to meet with the union, contending that non-union employees should have voted on the affiliation decision, the NLRB found the employer guilty of unfair labor practices.

Further consideration

The bank appealed the NLRB bargaining order to the 9th Circuit appellate court. But before the case was decided, the NLRB asked the court to remand it for further consideration by the labor board.

Then, by a 3-2 vote, it reversed its policy and agreed with the bank that non-members should have been given a vote on the affiliation decision.

This time, it was the UFCW's appeal that brought the case back to the appellate court.

The court found the NLRB's turnabout inconsistent with "the longstanding federal labor policy . . . to avoid unnecessary interference in internal union affairs and with the law's primary purpose of promoting industrial peace" through collective bargaining.

The doctrine promulgated by the new NLRB majority, the court said, would "result in interference in internal union affairs by non-members, employers (through refusals to bargain), and the board."

Contrary to policy

Further, the decision noted, the NLRB's new rule would effectively decertify a newly affiliated union, which "runs completely counter to the policy of promoting stability in the bargaining representative."

Another appellate court, the 5th Circuit in New Orleans, had taken a contrary position on the same issue, based on a policy of general deference to the NLRB's judgment on procedural matters. The differences between the circuits increases the possibility of a Supreme Court review if the NLRB should seek it. The labor board has not yet decided whether to do so, a spokesman said.

UFCW President William H. Wynn termed the 9th Circuit decision "a tremendous victory" for the union members who "have been waiting a long time for justice." He called on the bank's management to now "sit down at the bargaining table and negotiate a fair contract."

Histadrut elects Kessar as Meshel steps down

Tel Aviv—Histadrut's executive committee has elected Israel Kessar to succeed Yeruham Meshel as secretary-general of the Israeli labor federation.

Kessar, 53, had been serving as deputy general of Histadrut. Meshel, who stepped down after a decade at the helm of Israeli labor federation had nearly a year remaining before the end of his present term of office.

Kessar has been active in Histadrut and the Israeli labor movement since his youth, and has served in several capacities in the Israeli Ministry of Labor.

Congress kills 2-tier scheme on postal pay

A recent example, they noted, was the assurance given by postal management that the wage freeze being proposed for rank-and-file workers would not extend to postal supervisors. A budget projection by the Postal Service had estimated an 8.1 percent increase for supervisors. A USPS official said the projection was not binding and no decision would be made regarding supervisor pay increases until the bargaining unit dispute has been resolved.

Congress stepped into the picture when the House adopted by voice vote an amendment proposed by Rep. Silvio O. Conte (R-Mass.) to the supplemental appropriations bill. It required maintenance of the existing contract provisions until the procedures set by law for resolving an impasse on a new contract had been carried to a conclusion.

Conferees meet

The Senate deleted the provision from its version of the appropriations measure, leaving the issue to be resolved by a House-Senate conference.

Here, the Senate conferees proposed softening the language to a "sense of Congress" that the postal service should withdraw its two-tier policy.

The House conferees stood firm, contending as did the unions that the management action flouted the intent of Congress when it set up the U.S. Postal Service and that it should be directed, not merely requested, to comply with that intent.

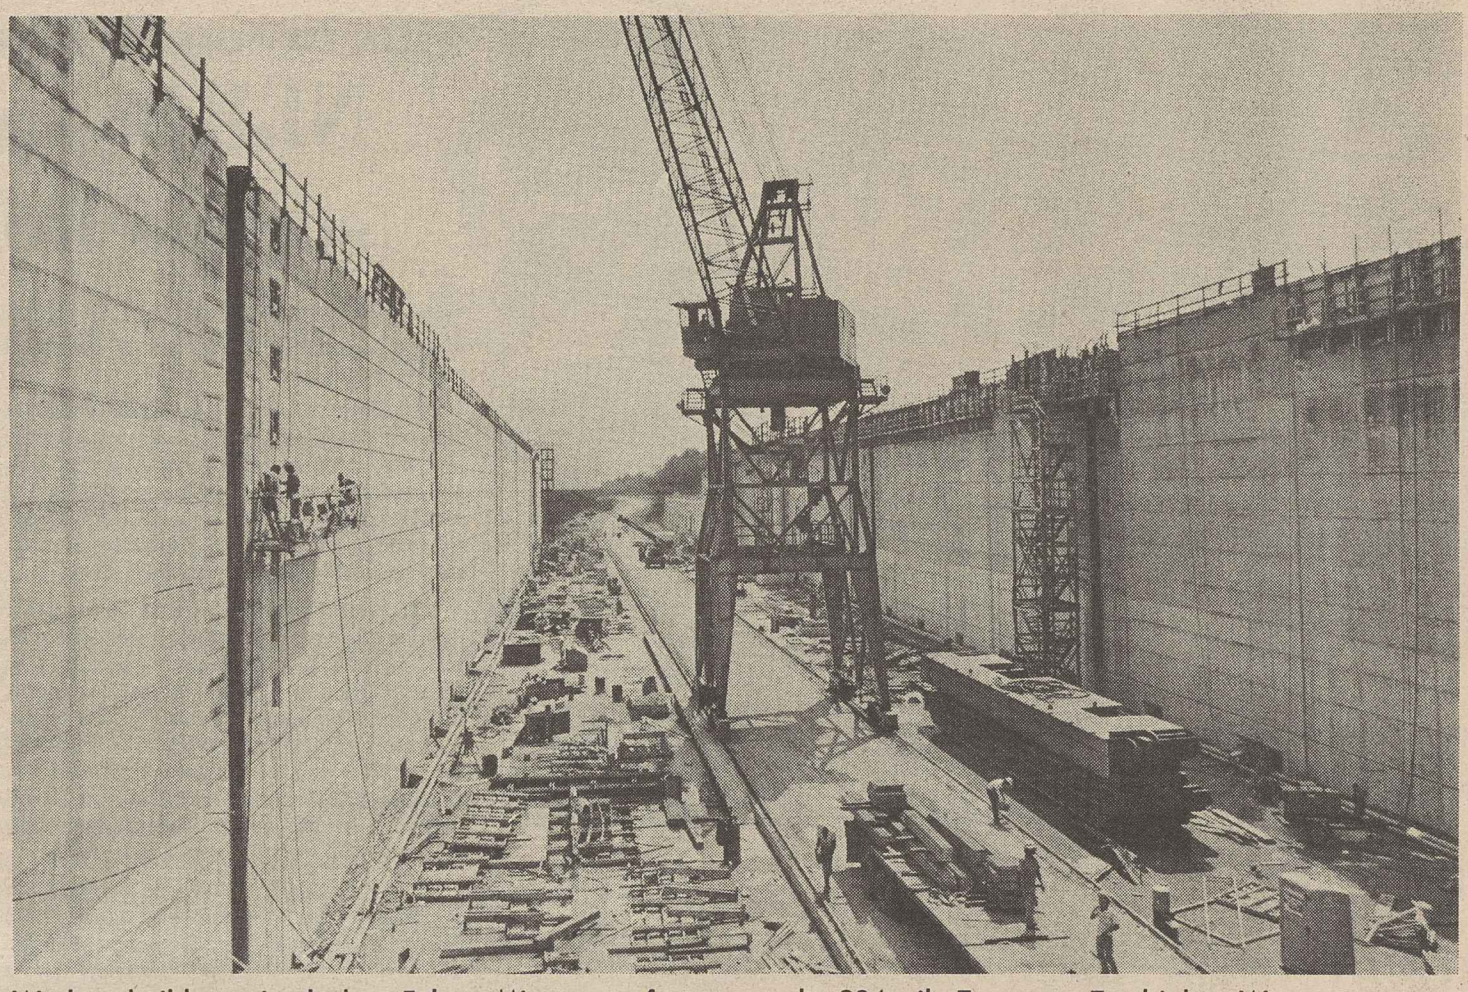
The conferees then reached agreement on most other provisions of the bill, sending it for a final vote by the House and Senate with the postal pay amendment reported "in disagreement." That left it up to the full membership of each body to vote on the issue.

The House acted first, insisting on the Conte amendment by a 378-1 vote. Rep. Ron Paul (R-Tex.) was the lone dissenter.

Among the many House members speaking for the amendment was Post Office & Civil Service Committee Chairman William D. Ford (D-Mich.), who termed the USPS action "provocative and foolish."

Ford and the other speakers emphasized strongly that the law providing fact-finding and arbitration in exchange for denial of the right to strike put an equal obligation on management to maintain the existing contract while the dispute-resolving procedures are followed.

The Senate did not dispute the House action and agreed by voice vote to drop its opposition to the amendment.



Workers build massive lock at Fulton, Miss., one of many on the 234-mile Tennessee-Tombigbee Waterway.

Job skill training adds to benefits of 'Tenn-Tom' waterway project

By the time the Tennessee-Tombigbee Waterway opens its mighty locks and canals next summer, it will have provided jobs to thousands of workers along its route from Tennessee through Mississippi and Alabama to the Gulf of Mexico. Yet if it had not been for the determined efforts of a coalition of unions, many of those workers would not have had the skill training to qualify for the decent-paying jobs provided by the project's many union contractors.

Even more, the huge inland waterway, known as Tenn-Tom, might not have been built at all if it had not been for the strong backing it got from the labor movement in urging Congress over the past 12 years to provide the money needed to complete the project.

Funds voted by Congress in 1983 finally assured completion of the waterway that will cost some $1.9 billion in state and federal money overall.

The Tenn-Tom, 234 miles long, is the largest civil project ever undertaken by the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers. By means of an inland canal, it will connect the Tennessee River with Alabama's Tombigbee River which opens into the Gulf of Mexico near Mobile.

The waterway will provide the nation with a second, major navigable water route —along with the Mississippi River—for transporting goods and raw materials.

Jobs created

Among the products expected to be barged down the Tenn-Tom are at least 20 percent of the nation's 100 million tons in coal exports and a substantial amount of the 100 million tons in grain exports.

From its beginnings in the early 1970s, the project has been backed by many AFL-CIO unions as a major source of new jobs in the region both in its construction and operation.

The unions were also quick to see the Tenn-Tom as the stimulus for an array of training and employment programs that would have lasting, positive impact on local workers.

In appropriating funds for the Tenn-Tom, Congress specified that contractors would have to hire 80 percent of their labor from residents of the 55 counties in three states along the route. By 1980, at least 30 percent of those workers had to be minorities or women.

The unions in the National Joint Heavy & Highway Construction Committee agreed that without skills training, not enough local workers would be available to meet those goals. The unions in the coalition included the Operating Engineers, Laborers, Carpenters, Plasterers & Cement Masons and the unaffiliated Teamsters.

By 1973, the unions had established a national training center in Epps, Ala., and by 1977, with funding from the Labor Dept., they had launched the "Tenn-Tom Job Train," a series of training programs including many key efforts sponsored by local unions such as Operating Engineers Locals 312 and 624.

Skills taught

IUOE Education Director Reese Hammond, who was instrumental in getting the training program rolling, said that over its course, the program has trained hundreds of workers in a wide variety of building and construction crafts. And 80 percent of the trainees have been minorities and women.

As an example of the way the training programs were structured, Hammond explained, the IUOE locals provided eight weeks of instruction followed up by 26 weeks of on-the-job training.

Trainees were placed in jobs with union contractors working on Tenn- Tom projects.

Local communities reaped some important benefits of the training project as well, Hammond said, pointing out that the students, as part of their training, worked on a variety of civic projects for which no other funding was available. Such projects included a road on a college campus, a sanitary land fill, a school parking lot and grading for an industrial park needed to attract new industry.

Communities aided

"While we trained entry level operators for our contractors," Hammond said, "we made friends for our union."

Another important benefit to local communities of the union involvement in the Tenn-Tom has been improved wages and working conditions along the length of the job.

Early in the project, the unions and local civic and civil rights groups complained sharply that the Labor Dept. had set prevailing wage rates for the project so low that fair contractors paying decent wages would be shut out of bidding for contracts. As a result of the coalition's action, the department increased its predetermined wage rates, and union contractors were able to bid successfully on the Tenn-Tom's locks, dams, excavations and numerous other massive construction projects.

Hammond stressed that building trades local unions also worked cooperatively with union contractors to enable them to bid successfully on important contracts against cheap labor contractors in "notoriously open shop states."

Stage Employees convention votes to hike per capita, dues

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Delegates to the Theatrical Stage Employes convention approved a $3-increase in quarterly per capita payments along with a $3-increase in minimum quarterly dues.

Per capita payments will rise to $15 and minimum dues to $18 per quarter next Jan. 1.

The delegates applauded a call by IATSE President Walter F. Diehl for strong support of the Mondale-Ferraro ticket in the presidential race. Diehl also urged stepped-up efforts for passage of an Equal Rights Amendment to the Constitution.

The 846 delegates representing some 30 IATSE crafts heard reports on the progress of the strike by IATSE Local 720 against major Las Vegas hotels. The local struck some 30 hotels and casinos in April in a walkout that included 17,000 members of two Hotel Employees & Restaurant Employees locals and the Musicians.

While contracts have been reached with the major employers, Local 720 remains on strike against a few smaller hotels, the delegates were told.

Because of the strike, Diehl said, the union had moved its convention to Florida from its original site in Las Vegas.

More than 70 resolutions were considered by the delegates, including a measure that urged stiffer enforcement of immigration laws particularly with the influx of illegal entertainment workers.

Another resolution sharply condemned the abuse under the Reagan Administration of the nation's labor laws and the pro-employer tilt of the Reagan-appointed National Labor Relations Board. It called for a restoration of fairness which the National Labor Relations Act was intended to guarantee, and an end to the bias in the NLRB's activities.

Delegates assailed as unfair the existing federal tax structure, calling for enactment of an equitable tax package to ease the burden on workers and middle-income Americans. Delegates also voted their opposition to any scheme to tax social security benefits.

Diehl was re-elected to his sixth two-year term, and Sec.-Treas. James J. Riley to his fourth term. Ten vice presidents were also elected along with three trustees.

A series of craft caucuses were held during the five-day convention on various issues, including the impact of new technology on IATSE members in the entertainment and communications industry.

New demands for givebacks halt New York hospital talks

New York—The strike by 50,000 hospital workers—members of District 1199 of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union—entered its sixth week as talks broke off for a second time with the 59 struck hospitals and nursing homes.

Negotiations collapsed after management offered a 5-percent wage increase in each year of a two-year package, but also insisted on slashing contributions to the union's benefit plan 10 percent. Union negotiators flatly rejected the "offer."

Management negotiators first insisted on a three-month delay in the second-year increase, a move that the union said would reduce the offer to just 3.9 percent—less than the 4-percent offer the union previously rejected. Management then offered the full 5-percent increase for each year, but sought to reduce the 11.4 percent contribution to the workers' benefit plan by 1.1 percent.

Snag on concessions

Although contract proposals contained key concessions from both sides—the hospitals agreeing to permit every other weekend off and the union's okaying a freeze on starting salaries for new hires, it was the demand for concessions on benefit contributions that deadlocked talks.

Bargaining between the union and management resumed on Aug. 11 after New York Gov. Mario Cuomo pressed each side to return to the table. He ordered State Health Commissioner Dr. David Axelrod to assist in achieving a quick settlement.

Cuomo said the hospitals are receiving adequate funds under the state's reimbursement system to provide a "reasonable settlement." Axelrod earlier had indicated that the hospitals could count on a 6.3-percent increase this year and 6.2-percent next year.

It was those assurances from the state that prompted the District 1199 members to reject overwhelmingly management's earlier offer of 4-percent annual increases. Union negotiators had unanimously voted not to recommend that package to the members, pointing out that the givebacks and delayed raises combined to provide an "insulting" 2.3 percent offer.

After negotiations broke off Aug. 15, the hospitals blamed the union for the failure to reach an agreement and threatened to start hiring strikebreakers unless its members returned to work.

District 1199 President Doris Turner said, "I am very sorry that the hospitals seek to excacerbate an already sensitive situation."

Turner expressed concern that management's threat to hire replacements could trigger severe reaction.

"I cannot give assurances what workers will do when someone tries to take their jobs away," she said.

Thousands of union members rallied Aug. 14 in a show of solidarity at Presbyterian Hospital, Montefiore Medical Center, Long Island College Hospital and St. John's Episcopal Hospital. They were joined by leaders of other unions, as well as Harry Van Arsdale, president of the New York City AFL-CIO, and President Ed Asner of the Screen Actors Guild.

The strikers are primarily lower-paid orderlies, technicians, nurses' aides, housekeepers and clerks.

Edgar Merkle dies at 84, printer of union journals

Edgar A. Merkle, who for nearly 30 years headed a Washington publishing firm that specialized in union newspapers and magazines, died at the age of 84.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue noted his close ties to the labor movement in a letter to his wife Kathleen. "Edgar's valuable assistance to the federation and its affiliated unions extended far beyond a strictly business relationship," they wrote.

Apart from his business role, Merkle was a leading conservationist and gave the State of Maryland a wildlife refuge that is named for him. Funeral services were held Aug. 16.

Tilts to employer side

NLRB's new majority scraps hospital policy

makes organizing in the health care field "more difficult."

Not only did the new NLRB majority scrap a bargaining unit policy established in 1982, it offered only vague speculation as guidance to the direction the board would take in future hospital representation cases. There is a big backlog of such cases awaiting NLRB action.

The NLRB's 1982 decision in the same case sought to set guidelines for appropriate bargaining units in the health care field as well as adjudicate the Memphis Hospital's challenge to the IBEW's representation rights. The guidelines were intended to lessen the uncertainty created by conflicting interpretations of congressional intent in health care representation cases reviewed by various appellate courts.

By a 3-2 margin—with the two Reagan appointees in the minority and three Carter Administration holdovers in the majority —the NLRB identified seven "potentially appropriate" bargaining units at health care facilities. If a representation election request were received for one of these units, the NLRB would then apply the same "community of interest test" it uses in other industries.

A part of the legislative history of the 1974 hospital bargaining law indicated a desire to avoid a multiplicity of bargaining units and the guidelines took that into account—but not to the extent that hospital management had sought.

The only member of the 1982 majority still on the NLRB is Don A. Zimmerman, and he was the lone dissenter from the policy reversal.

The new majority was made up of Chairman Donald L. Dotson, Robert P. Hunter and Patricia Diaz Dennis. Dennis concurred in the reversal, but said the board should have adopted guidelines to replace the ones they scrapped.

In switching to the employer side, the new majority said there must be a "disparity of interests" greater than required in other industries to justify a separate bargaining unit in a health care institution.

It said the policy would be better defined in the case-by-case decisions the NLRB will be making rather than through new guidelines at this point.

More legislation

Zimmerman retorted that the most likely "beneficiary" of the NLRB's new position would be lawyers who would "profit from increased litigation."

An attorney for the Memphis Hospital was "well pleased" with the outcome.

IBEW President Charles Pillard termed the NLRB reversal "outrageous but not surprising. It's what we've come to expect under the Reagan Administration," he said.

The Service Employees, a union which represents large numbers of workers in the health care field, called for congressional hearings on what it regards as a flouting of the law. SEIU President John J. Sweeney said the NLRB switch "destroys 10 years of legal precedents" on appropriate bargaining units and reflects the "politically motivated" nature of the Reagan-appointed NLRB majority.

To Henry Nichols, president of the Hospital & Health Care Employees, Reagan's appointees on the NLRB have mounted "a naked political attack on hospital workers' right to organize."

Economic summit faulted for ignoring critical issues

The free world's major industrial nations failed to address pressing problems of high unemployment and lagging economic growth at their "summit meeting" last June.

That's the evaluation of a staff report prepared for the Trade Union Advisory Committee to the Organization for Economic Cooperation & Development (OECD).

The union advisory committee, of which AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland is a vice president, has prodded the world leaders to develop an economic strategy keyed to full employment.

Instead, the report from TUAC General Sec. Kari Tapiola concludes, the OECD governments have ducked the hard questions and failed to address the problem of strengthening a very fragile and uncertain recovery.

It found in the OECD analysis of the labor market an anti-union bias, including references to trade unions as "monopolies" at a conference of finance ministers earlier this year.

Apparently, the TUAC report suggests, "the governments believe all will be well if only trade unions would renounce their fight for organization, collective bargaining rights, better working and living conditions, social legislation, health care, security of income and employment, and a say in economic policy decisions."

It stresses that by the OECD's own evaluation, the economic recovery is not likely to be self-sustaining and the forecast in fact is for unemployment to move up again in 1985 after a modest drop this year.

Experience after World War II showed that governments can cooperate to bring about economic and social progress, the report noted. The basic question now, it suggested, is whether the world's leaders can summon "the political will to do this."

Poll supports Auto Workers on content bill, contract goals

Detroit—An overwhelming majority of Americans agree that auto imports should be controlled, domestic content law should be passed, and the export of small car production should be curbed, according to a poll commissioned by the Auto Workers.

Results of the independent survey released by UAW President Owen Bieber showed that 82 percent of the people interviewed in the nationwide survey approved of the union's goals "to receive some wage and benefit increases, make quality cars at affordable prices, and keep jobs in America."

Company scheme opposed

Bieber said 84 percent of those questioned opposed the auto companies' plans to move production of small cars out of the United States and into nations overseas for import into the country even if it meant lower prices. Sixty-six percent said they were "strongly opposed" to such action.

"By a three-to-one margin," Bieber pointed out, "people agree that America's economic health depends on the automobile industry," since so many jobs are related to auto production.

Two-thirds of the public "feel threatened" by the shift of basic U.S. industry out of the country and "worry that it will have considerable impact on them personally," Bieber said in releasing the results.

The poll was conducted for the union by James Lauer & Associates, an Alexandria, Va. firm, which interviewed a national cross-section of 1,515 adults in June.

The results also showed that 70 percent of Americans believe that voluntary restrictions on Japanese car imports should be continued.

Seventy-three percent agreed that Congress should enact domestic content legislation requiring all imported cars to have a specific percentage of U.S.-made components.

The UAW commissioned the poll as part of its planning for a nationwide television advertising campaign that will outline the union's goals in negotiations for new contracts with Ford Motor Co. and General Motors Corp. Current pacts expire Sept. 14.

Pilots win first contract for 150 at Comair, Inc.

Cincinnati—The Air Line Pilots signed its first agreement with Comair, Inc., a regional airline that employs 150 pilots.

ALPA was certified as the bargaining agent for the unit in June 1983. The new 30-month contract provides wage increases, profit-sharing, a stock purchase plan and limits flying time to 110 hours a month, the union said.

Until All Workers Are Free

A speech that Rep. Don Pease (D-Ohio) made on the floor of the House last week deserves a wider audience. These are some of the things he said:

LABOR RIGHTS and unions are essential to the promotion of social justice and to the safeguarding of human freedom in any society.

For decades, the U.S. foreign aid program has sought with mixed results to further economic development and growth in Third World countries. We have witnessed some countries making real progress toward industrialization, only to find more of their people trapped in hunger and poverty.

We have learned that for development to be effective, it must benefit the broadest sectors of the population.

The capacity to form unions and to bargain collectively to achieve higher wages and safer, healthier working conditions is essential to overcome hunger and poverty.

Denial of labor rights in Third World countries tends to perpetuate poverty, to limit the benefits of economic development and growth to narrow, privileged elites, and to sow the seeds of social instability and political rebellion. Anti-labor policies may, in the short run, profit companies that use cheap labor to produce low-priced goods for export to the United States.

ECHOING THE VOICES of those who opposed the enactment of minimum wage laws in the United States, some corporate apologists now argue that many workers in developing countries are far better off working for $1 a day than they would be not working at all.

This sort of blatant exploitation of cheap labor undermines the development of self-reliant local economies in much of the Third World. It is just as true overseas as it is here at home that putting spending money in the pockets of working people creates increased demand for goods and services, which creates jobs.

The tremendous disparity in labor rights, and the absence of those rights for most workers in other countries, is a growing factor in the competitive decline of many of our basic industries like steel, shipbuilding, and auto production as well as in less-skill intensive industries like footwear, textiles, and electronics.

The threat by American-based multinational corporations to transfer domestic production and jobs from the United States to other countries in which there are no labor rights every day becomes a more common ploy to force American workers to relinquish legitimate benefits won through hardship and struggle.

Similarly, the same threats are effectively used by American-based multinational corporations to undercut the rights of workers in developing countries. These global corporations, accountable to nobody, often threaten to leave some Third World countries and to move elsewhere in order to pressure workers to accept sub-standard working conditions and very low wages.

IN THE 1980s and beyond, capital and technology will continue to be moved around the world without regard to national boundaries, while workers remain stationary and bound by national laws and personal allegiance. These economic facts of life fuel an escalating trend in global production that undercuts the rights of all workers. They combine to diminish American workers' rights to the lowest common international denominator.

Numerous American industries and unions understandably and properly continue to protest unfair trade subsidies and the "dumping" of low-priced foreign goods into the American market.

The same outcry should be heard in protest of "social dumping"—unfair competition from foreign workers whose low wage scales result from them being denied the free exercise of basic labor rights.

The rights of American workers will be more secure and U.S. industrial health will be more effectively advanced by a positive, aggressive, coordinated strategy to extend labor rights to workers in all of the countries with which we must compete.

No worker is free until all workers are free.

Soaring Reagan deficits pose new economic crisis

By Press Associates, Inc.

The federal deficit has become a hot topic of political conversation.

Deficits used to be something Republicans chided Democrats about. Democrats beginning with FDR countered that deficits weren't necessarily bad—that temporary deficit spending to pump prime the economy out of a recession was a good thing.

Ronald Reagan often talked about the evils of deficits before he became President. He attacked President Carter for his 1980 recession-year deficit of $60 billion and promised, if elected, to balance the budget by 1983.

But by 1983, the Reagan deficit had soared to a record $195 billion. In this year of "recovery," it's still running at a sky-high $172 billion.

These days, however, President Reagan tries to avoid talking about deficits or tells people not to be overly concerned, and that his "recovery" will take care of things.

The nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office (CBO) recently projected that the Reagan deficits, unless revenues are raised and spending is cut, will continue to grow for the rest of the decade, mushrooming to $263 billion by 1989.

CBO Director Rudolph Penner, a conservative Republican economist, told reporters that if this trend is not reversed, "there is a severe danger that deficits would run away from us."

Taking their toll

The Reagan deficits already are taking their toll, Penner said. They have kept real, inflation-adjusted interest rates at "extraordinarily" high levels. The CBO predicted that these high rates will slow economic growth for the rest of the year and to 2.8 percent in 1985, about half this year's estimated rate. Lower growth rates, of course, mean longer unemployment lines.

Penner noted that the deficits were forcing huge Treasury borrowings which soak up the savings otherwise available for job-producing capital investment.

The Reagan deficits are different from those in the past not only in their size, but because they don't shrink as the business cycle turns up and adds revenue to the Treasury.

Thus the Reagan revenue gap is a new phenomenon which Penner and other economists call "structural deficits." The main reason is that the interest which the government must pay on its borrowings to finance the deficit has been growing even faster than the deficit itself.

It's a vicious cycle of high interest rates and big government borrowings feeding each other.

These interest payments on the federal debt are a built-in, uncontrollable expense which this year will reach $110 billion, more than twice the 1980 level. That's more than half this year's total deficit. It's about $300 million every day of the year.

Ballooning payments

This cost of servicing the national debt could soon account for the entire federal deficit. Under Reagan, the debt has ballooned from $1 trillion to $1.5 trillion. By 1989, the CBO predicts it will rise to over $3 trillion under the current Reagan tax and spending program. The CBO projects interest on the debt to reach $214 billion by 1989.

As one way of looking at it, the increase in annual interest payments on the federal debt since Reagan took office exceeds all the annual "savings" from the Reagan cuts in health, education, welfare and social service programs.

Walter Mondale wasn't exaggerating when he recently called the deficits "appalling" and "obscene" and "a trapdoor under our economy." Mondale has pledged to cut the deficit by two-thirds by the end of his term, if elected, and to achieve this by means including equitable tax increases and reduced growth in defense spending.

Reagan and Vice President George Bush, meanwhile, have been engaged in well-publicized double-talk and waffling on the question of tax hikes.

Platform draft bears dogma of GOP right

Dallas—Long-festering differences between far-right ideologues and more realistic conservatives erupted on the eve of the Republican national convention here.

A platform-drafting committee sought to paint President Reagan into a right-wing corner by holding him tightly to a "no tax increase" pledge that the White House is trying to hedge.

The dispute kept alive the questions of presidential credibility and competence that have dogged Reagan ever since Democratic candidate Walter F. Mondale challenged him to make his tax intentions public.

Reagan waffled on the issue in various responses. When Vice President Bush insisted that the President was still keeping all options open despite Reagan's disavowal, White House aides mounted a rescue operation.

Verbal illusion

They gave reporters a written document that was supposed to represent questions asked by Larry Speakes, the White House press aide, and Reagan's responses. The gist was that what appeared to be contradictions really weren't.

As Bush explained to a reporter, "Since there isn't any difference, it is straightened out, and I see no political damage."

In Dallas, the remnants of what was once the Republican mainstream fought a losing battle.

Four years ago, for the first time, the Republican Party failed to endorse the Equal Rights Amendment for women. This time around, a lone member of a drafting subcommittee proposed support for ERA. The motion died for lack of a second.

The same dominant group that sought to bar any tax increase, no matter how huge the budget deficit, wrote into the platform draft language calling for a constitutional convention if Congress does not adopt an amendment mandating a balanced budget.

Still another economic plank called for an end to taxation of income from interest and sought further windfalls for the wealthy by calling for an end to graduated income taxes.

The drafting panel recommendations are still subject to modification by the full Platform Committee.

Rep. Jim Leach (R-Iowa), a mainstream Republican, warned that the right-wing platform language would hurt Republican candidates "in most parts of America."

Victim of Labor Board backlog easy target for anti-union boss

President Reagan's pro-management appointees to the National Labor Relations Board and staffing cuts that created huge case backlogs have dramatically altered the role of the NLRB as enforcer of labor law.

Employers can openly defy laws designed to protect workers' rights to organize and bargain collectively, knowing they'll receive at most a belated slap on the wrist from the labor board. Anti-union employers have taken Reagan's cue to crack down on active unionists with impunity.

One victim is Barbara Coker, a respiratory therapist at the Oak Ridge Medical Center in Tennessee. Fired for joining Service Employees Local 150T in August 1980, she got her job back three months later when the hospital negotiated a settlement with the NLRB out of court.

But two years later, with Reagan's anti-union policies in full bloom, the hospital laid off two workers—Coker, who was now shop steward, and assistant steward Ken Provance.

"They said it was because of lack of work, but we knew it was because of union activity," Coker said. "They violated our contract by not laying off according to seniority, so we knew we'd win."

Full of optimism, the pair filed charges with the NLRB. Then came the foot-dragging. It took eight months for an administrative law judge to hear both sides. It took another eight months to receive his ruling: the hospital must rehire the union members with full back pay.

The hospital refused to comply and filed an appeal, which took the board another 10 months to reject. Coker had written the board every week begging for a decision that would finally send her back to work.

"If these laws are supposed to protect the people, why does each step take so long?" Coker asks in disgust.

Appealing to her senator, she learned the Atlanta labor board has a backlog of hundreds of cases awaiting decisions —but a government hiring freeze has left it shortstaffed.

In June the hospital finally reinstated her—only to lay her off four days later, supposedly because of cutbacks.

"Four days' work in 2½ years — this is killing me," she exclaimed.

"Here it is August and I still don't have my back pay or my job," Coker said. "The labor board has done nothing. The compliance officer has a backlog of 300 cases. Going to appeals court would take another year."

Coker can't even draw full unemployment benefits from the June layoff because the amount is based on the previous year's earnings—which the hospital has yet to pay. She has filed a protest.

"The government is helping employers and big business starve out the little man that the laws were supposed to protect," Coker stressed. She has filed a civil suit against the hospital for damage it has done to her career and family.

And she has filed one other document: Barbara Coker has registered to vote.

"We've got to get Reagan out of there. He cares nothing for the ordinary worker."

Productivity gain not shared with workers or consumers

Gains were also posted in the household appliance industry, up 17.6 percent on 27.4 percent increased output and an 8.4 percent increase in employee hours.

The BLS survey showed that the largest productivity declines were sustained by the machine tools industry, down 29.9 percent from 1982 to 1983.

In transportation and utilities, productivity was up 17.9 percent in railroads and up 9.9 percent in air transportation.

Electric utilities posted the first productivity gain since 1977, an increase of 1.7 percent, but gas utilities had a decline of 8.1 percent. Telephone communications had a gain of 12.7 percent.

Productivity in the retail food store industry was up two-tenths of 1 percent, and it increased 1.1 percent among apparel and accessory stores. Productivity was up 2.4 percent in eating and drinking places and up seven-tenths of a percent in the hotel, motel industry.

BLS pointed out that in a number of industries, productivity percentage gains were due to decreased employee hours.

Coal mining, for example, posted a productivity gain of 13.9 percent based on a drop in output of 6.4 percent and a steep 17.7-percent decline in hours. A similar scenario applied to copper mining, where productivity increased 10.8 percent because hours dropped more sharply than output.

Bank failures at highest level since depression

It's only August, but more banks have failed so far this year than in all of 1983, guaranteeing that this will be the worst year for bank collapses since the Great Depression.

According to federal banking agencies, 49 banks have bitten the dust to date, one more than last year's total of 48. The 1983 total was the highest since the 60 failures posted in 1939.

In addition, the Federal Deposit Insurance Corp. reported, a record 721 banks are in shaky enough circumstances to be put on the agency's list of troubled banks, earning them closer government monitoring. The FDIC said there were 542 banks on that list at the end of 1983.

Study finds Reagan's policies hurt all but rich

Reagan policies have hurt middle- and lower-income Americans over the last three years and will even jeopardize their chances for improvements in the standard of living in the foreseeable future, a study conducted by Urban Institute found.

In an analysis of President Reagan's term, the institute concluded that his economic and social policies widened the gap between the rich and poor, did almost nothing to improve the standard of living of the middle class, and in an attempt to control inflation, caused a deep recession, worse than might have occurred had those policies not been in place.

The institute said that the huge federal budget deficits that will be the legacy of the Reagan years could chill the standard of living of middle- and low-income Americans well into the future.

The Urban Institute is a nonpartisan, public public policy research organization chaired by Carla A. Hills, who was secretary of Housing & Urban Development Dept. in the Ford Administration. The report was edited by economists John L. Palmer and Isabel V. Sawhill, and it contains chapters prepared about 150 analysts.

The 412-page report, titled the Reagan Record, looks at the Administration's track record on such issues as the economy, the budget, social policy, businesses, family income, natural resources and the environment, federalism, and non-profit organizations and how it has governed.

In its overview of family income, the report points out that "the failure of the Administration's supply-side initiatives to immediately revive the economy means that standards of living improved little between 1980 and 1984," except for the affluent.

Real disposable income for families fell in 1981 and 1982 before posting only slight gains in 1983 and 1984.

But even the small gains in income were not shared.

Poor much poorer

Since 1980, the report said, the real disposable income of the poorest one-fifth of all families declined nearly 8 percent, while that of the top fifth rose almost 9 percent. The income of the typical middle-class family grew by a scant 1 percent.

The institute pointed out that because of "underlying economic and demographic trends" some of this widening of income distribution might have taken place anyway. "But the particular tax and benefit reductions that President Reagan supported exacerbated the trend.

"His policies helped the affluent, but were detrimental to the poor and middle class," the institute's report concluded.

Those policies contributed to a transfer of disposable income of some $25 billion overall from middle- and low-income families to those in the highest brackets, or an extra $2,000 per wealthier family, the report said.

The report predicted that even if the nation's gross national product grows briskly over the next several years, that growth "will not necessarily translate into equivalent gains in standards of living" because the huge deficits will require changes in taxes and benefit programs that will affect incomes.

How those deficit questions are resolved —particularly in how equally both the deficit reduction measures and economic growth are shared across the income groups—will influence "who is better off" by the end of the decade, the institute said.

In other major findings, the report said that the Reagan Administration's tax cuts were designed with "economic growth, not equity, in mind," and acted to provide "the greater benefits to higher-income families."

The Administration's position that tax cuts would stimulate savings and fuel investment has produced no results, the institute said.

Meanwhile, federal taxes on businesses declined dramatically under Reagan from about 33 percent of a corporation's gross revenues in 1980 to 15.8 percent in 1982, the report showed. If Congress had not acted to take back some of the more outrageous business tax giveaways, the federal revenue loss would be even worse.

Regulatory aim

The study found that the Administration's regulatory policies emphasized productivity over the protection of health, safety, civil rights and the environment.

And in its philosophical interest in growth, productivity and "self-sufficiency," the Administration might have been expected to give some emphasis to human programs such as education, training, employment, health and social services. But instead, "these were the very programs in which the Administration generally proposed the deepest cuts" with no effort to distinguish between those ripe for cutting and those running along efficiently.

"Given his way," the institute concluded, "the President would have eradicated most of the hallmarks of the Great Society and would have shrunk social insurance programs to a scope approximating their New Deal origins." Only action by Congress and the courts have "moderated" those intentions.

Mondale rouses General Board with vow of fighting campaign

All-out effort aims for big labor turnout

By John M. Barry

Denver—Walter F. Mondale came back for a return visit with the AFL-CIO, this time as the Democratic candidate for President, to thank the federation for supporting his battle for the nomination and to promise a fighting campaign to win the election.

The AFL-CIO General Board welcomed Mondale with a warm standing ovation and cheers of "We want Fritz!" The board reaffirmed the federation's commitment to Mondale's candidacy and pledged between now and election day "to do all that needs to be done to carry out our commitment."

The candidate's appearance before the General Board came just a month after his nomination at the San Francisco Democratic convention and 10½ months after he addressed the federation's 1983 convention. It was that convention, acting on the overwhelming recommendation of the General Board, which broke with tradition to give the AFL-CIO's endorsement to Mondale in advance of the party primaries and caucuses.

Union support

In welcoming Mondale, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland expressed pride at the federation's success in building support for the former Vice President among union members, but he stressed:

"You won the nomination the old-fashioned way—you earned it."

Kirkland told Mondale that the federation "enthusiastically" supports his choice of Rep. Geraldine Ferraro as his running mate. He noted that moments before Mondale's arrival, the General Board had unanimously approved a resolution pledging an all-out effort in support of the Mondale-Ferraro ticket.

"We know the importance of this election," Kirkland said, "and we plan to take our message to every trade unionist and every trade union family between now and Nov. 6. On that day, we expect more trade union members and their families to go to the polls than ever before."

In response, Mondale observed that "none of us here has any illusions" about the campaign ahead.

"It's going to be tough. But if this year proves anything," he said, "it's that I know what it means to come from behind. I know what it is to reach inside to find strength and to reach outside for help and to cross the finish line as a winner."

Bloated profits dwarf meager pay increases

Corporate profits in the April-June quarter climbed 25 percent above the similar period of 1983, the government reported, far outstripping workers' earnings over the same span.

In its preliminary estimate of corporate earnings, the Commerce Dept. said that after-tax book profits posted a seasonally adjusted annual rate of $152.9 billion during the second quarter. This compared with a rate of $123.4 billion in the second quarter of 1983.

For the first half of 1984, profits were up at a seasonally adjusted rate of $151.8 billion, or 34.3 percent above the $113-billion rate for the first half of 1983.

Meanwhile, wage gains lagged far behind the profits rise.

Payoff of Reaganomics

"The 25-percent increase in corporate profits during the second quarter of this year is another example of how corporations benefit from Reagan economic policies," AFL-CIO Research Director Rudy Oswald charged.

"The profits of corporations have increased rapidly at the same time that corporations continue to squeeze workers, demanding givebacks, and other attacks on unions," Oswald said. "The gains from increased profits and rising productivity are not being shared with workers."

The federation's Dept. of Economic Research noted that wages and benefits combined rose only 5.4 percent over the year-ago quarter, or one-fifth the rate of profits increase.

The rise in after-tax book profits from the first to the second quarter of 1984,

Democratic Presidential Candidate Walter Mondale acknowledges enthusiastic welcome at the AFL-CIO General Board meeting in Denver.

Council warns 'recovery' leaves workers stranded

Denver—The current economic "recovery" may be good news for Wall Street investors, but it's leaving behind "the average American working man and woman struggling to earn a decent living," the AFL-CIO Executive Council declared.

In a statement adopted at its summer meeting here, the council reviewed the condition of the American economy after 3½ years of President Reagan's economic policies and found it dangerously out of balance.

Unemployment is on the rise again with two million more workers jobless now than in 1979, the council pointed out, while corporate profits are posting sharp increases and executives' salaries and bonuses "have reached scandalous levels." The statement noted that last year at least 38 business executives had salaries above $1 million and 18 had salaries of more than $2 million.

"The gap is widening between those who have much—the rich, the powerful and the privileged—and the low- and middle-income Americans who do not get a fair share of the nation's wealth," the council declared.

In another major action, the council elected Steelworkers President Lynn Williams to fill the vice presidency made vacant by the death last November of Lloyd McBride, Williams's predecessor as head of the USWA.

The council paid tribute to another former member who died recently, Joseph D.

Platform steamroller

GOP's dogmatic right prevails

By David L. Perlman

President Reagan and Vice President Bush will run for re-election on a platform shaped by the extreme right wing of an already highly conservative Republican Party.

As approved with only a handful of dissents at the Dallas convention, the platform combines the radical economic theories of the so-called "populist conservatives" with the social doctrines of Rev. Jerry Falwell's Moral Majority organization.

In the face of huge budget deficits, the Republican platform draws a rigid line against any tax increase. The White House had sought some "wiggle room" for President Reagan to get out from under his "no tax increase" pledge if he is re-elected. But the platform writers refused to compromise.

The President, nevertheless, was described as "very comfortable" with the end result.

For the future, the platform calls for still further tax cuts and looks to elimination of all taxes on dividend income. It praises the concept of a "flat tax" which would tax all incomes at the same rate. This would supposedly restore "incentives" for people to work harder and earn more money.

Anti-worker bent

For workers, the Republican platform reaffirms "support for the right of states to enact 'right-to-work' laws" that prohibit union shops.

It ignores a number of recommendations of the Republican National Committee's labor advisory panel, which was intended to give unions an input in the shaping of the platform. But it promises that the Reagan Administration will continue an "open-door policy toward organized labor and its leaders."

The platform cites "arbitrary minimum wage rates" as among the "federal statutes that keep Americans out of the workforce" and calls for enactment of a subminimum "youth opportunity wage."

It demands "repeal of prohibitions against household manufacturing," which courts have held necessary to protect federal wage-hour standards. "Restrictions on work in the home are intolerable intrusions into our private lives," the platform asserts.

Under President Reagan, the platform boasts, "runaway agencies like OSHA were reined in."

Newly elected Vice President Lynn Williams is welcomed to AFL-CIO Executive Council by President Kirkland, Sec.-Treas. Donahue.

Steelworkers' Lynn Williams elected to Executive Council

Denver — Steelworkers President Lynn R. Williams was elected a member of the Executive Council to replace his predecessor, Lloyd McBride, who died last November.

Williams was elected head of the Steelworkers in a special election last March and officially installed in June. He had served as acting temporary president after McBride's death.

Williams, who is 60, will complete McBride's four-year term ending Mar. 1, 1986. He is the fifth international president of the USWA, one of the largest industrial unions in North America.

Williams has been a member of the Steelworkers since 1947 when he joined Local 2900 at the John Inglis plant in Toronto.

He became convinced that "trade unionism is a much more effective way to work at social needs and objectives than any other," and subsequently took a union organizing job with the Canadian Congress of Labor, the forerunner of the present Canadian Labor Congress.

A native of Springfield, Ont., Williams joined the USWA staff in 1956 and was assigned to the Niagara Peninsula, where he was named area supervisor. He was transferred to the union's District 6 office in Toronto in 1965 and elected district director in 1974 before becoming international secretary in 1977.

Williams is a graduate of McMaster University in Hamilton, Ont. He served in the Navy during World War II.

A member of several boards and commissions, Williams recently was named to the Steel Tripartite Advisory Committee of the Departments of Commerce and Labor, which is seeking solutions to problems confronting the steel industry. He is a member of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. executive board.

Council sets guidelines on performers' services

Denver — AFL-CIO affiliated involved in promoting events that use the free services of actors should find out from the sponsoring organizations whether they have obtained Theater Authority clearance, the Executive Council said.

The Theater Authority is a nonprofit agency that various unions of performing artists have designated to determine whether a specific event justifies the use of donated services. The clearance procedure avoids exploitation of artists and a small fee paid to the authority helps sustain the emergency welfare funds of participating unions.

A resolution to this effect was supported in principle at the last AFL-CIO convention and referred to the Executive Council for further consideration. The council approved it as amended by its Referred Resolutions Committee.

Among union members

General Board spurs all-out election effort

He remarked that as he moved through the General Board audience toward the podium, accompanied by Mrs. Mondale and by Sen. Gary Hart of Colorado, his chief rival in the primaries and caucuses, he had recognized many old friends and allies from previous political battles.

"We've been together for years," Mondale said. "I know the potential in this room. I know the decency in this room. I know what you want for our country, and this is a strength we need to tap again for our country, and I will do it as President of the United States."

The General Board resolution, introduced by Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue, recalled the words of the endorsement resolution approved by last year's AFL-CIO convention that Mondale "has earned special esteem as an eloquent spokesman for the concerns of working people."

"That special esteem," the board said, "rests on shared principles, a common vision of social justice, and a joint determination to do the hard work necessary to create a future for America worthy of its past."

Ferraro hailed

The resolution hailed Mondale's decision "to name the right woman to the right position" in choosing Ferraro as the vice presidential candidate, and it continued:

"The AFL-CIO therefore pledges to get the facts to every trade union member and trade union family demonstrating why Walter F. Mondale and Geraldine Ferraro are the candidates for President and Vice President who best represent the aspirations of America's working men and women. We also pledge to make every effort to register trade unionists and their families and to have them go to the polls in the greatest possible numbers."

Some two dozen expressions of support for the resolution—from local and state central body leaders as well as national union officers and Executive Council members—made clear the urgency with which trade unionists look to the coming election.

They hammered home the points and developed the basic themes that Kirkland had addressed in his opening speech and which Mondale expanded on—the need to restore fairness to American society, to reverse the Reagan policies that benefit the rich at the expense of the poor and the middle class, to bring the economy back into balance through job-creating programs, and to work for a future of peace and prosperity.

Kirkland sharply attacked the performance of President Reagan during the three and a half years of his Administration, charging that he has divided America, setting "men against women, young against old, the jobless against the employed, the poor against the near-poor, and blacks against whites against browns."

If Reagan did this in his first term, "imagine what he might do in a second, unrestrained by another election," Kirkland observed. He urged his audience to consider what the NLRB would be like in a second Reagan term, the prospect of five new Reagan appointees to the Supreme Court, another Reagan tax bill.

"We are fated to live in a dangerous world," Kirkland said, "and the next four years may well be the most perilous that we have ever faced as a nation. We need a President who does not regard this circumstance as a fit subject for frivolity.

"Mr. Reagan's idea of humor when he goes off the cuff or off the record, is to announce a nuclear attack on the Soviet Union. Those who travel by commercial airline know that the average man would be dragged off a plane in handcuffs for making such a little joke about bombs. But for Reagan that is just another moonbeam from Cloudland."

Mondale, too, touched on the President's open-microphone "joke," and observed:

"He thought it was funny, but I don't think nuclear war is a joke."

No progress

He noted that Reagan is the only President since World War II—Democratic or Republican—who has not made some progress toward arms limitations in talks with the Soviet Union.

"Reagan has negotiated nothing, signed nothing and offered nothing except Star Wars," Mondale charged.

He called the election "a referendum on our future, a future that holds the door open to our children, and whether we're going to have any future at all."

"The American people know the difference between salesmanship and leadership," Mondale said. "We're going to tell the truth. We're going to press him for debates. We're going to deliver the message of a world that can be safer, a nation that can be more competitive, a society that can be fairer and a future with more hope."

A time when Reagan had real concern for workers

Denver—Ronald Reagan had 'em rolling in the aisles at the AFL-CIO General Board meeting. But not by design.

The laughter was provoked by a tape-recording of some of Reagan's views at a time when he hung around with fellow union members instead of millionaires.

The transcription was resurrected from the archives of the Ladies' Garment Workers by ILG President Sol C. Chaikin and played for the General Board. It was made for the ILG campaign committee on behalf of Truman and Barkley in 1948. Reagan, then president of the Screen Actors, made the comments while introducing Hubert H. Humphrey, who was making his first run for the Senate. Here are some excerpts.

This is Ronald Reagan speaking to you from Hollywood. You know me as a motion picture actor. But tonight I'm just a citizen, pretty concerned about the national election next month and more than a little impatient with those promises the Republicans made before they got control of Congress a couple of years ago.

I remember listening to the radio on election night in 1946. Joseph Martin, the Republican Speaker of the House, said very solemnly, and I quote: "We Republicans intend to work for a real increase in income for everybody by encouraging more production and lower prices without impairing wages or working conditions."

Remember that promise: a real increase in income for everybody. But what actually happened?

The profits of corporations have doubled while workers' wages have increased by only one quarter. In other words, profits have gone up four times as much as wages, and the small increase workers did receive was more than eaten up by rising prices, which have also bored into their savings.

The Republican promises sounded pretty good in 1946. But what has happened since then—since the 80th Congress took over?

- Prices have climbed to the highest level in history, although the death of the OPA was supposed to bring prices down through "the natural process of free competition."
- Labor has been handcuffed by the vicious Taft-Hartley law.
- Social security benefits have been snatched away from almost a million workers by the Gerhardt bill.
- Fair employment practices, which had worked so well during wartime, have been abandoned.
- Veterans' pleas for low-cost homes have been ignored.
- Tax reduction bills have been passed to benefit the higher-income brackets alone.
- In the false name of economy, millions of children have been deprived of milk once provided through the Federal School Lunch Program.

This was the payoff of the Republicans' promise. And this is why we must have new faces in the Congress of the United States—Democratic faces.

This is why we must elect not only President Truman, but also men like Mayor Hubert Humphrey of Minneapolis, the Democratic candidate for senator from Minnesota. Mayor Humphrey, at 37, is one of the ablest men in public life. He's running against Joe Ball, who is a member of the Senate Labor Committee and helped write the Taft-Hartley law.

Mayor Humphrey and Ball are the symbols of the political battle going on in America today. While Ball is the banner carrier for Wall Street, Mayor Humphrey is fighting for all the principles advocated by President Truman—for adequate low-cost housing, for civil rights, for prices people can afford to pay, and for a labor movement freed of the Taft-Hartley law.

I take great pride in presenting my friend from Minneapolis, Mayor Hubert H. Humphrey, candidate for United States senator.

Council warns of one-sided recovery

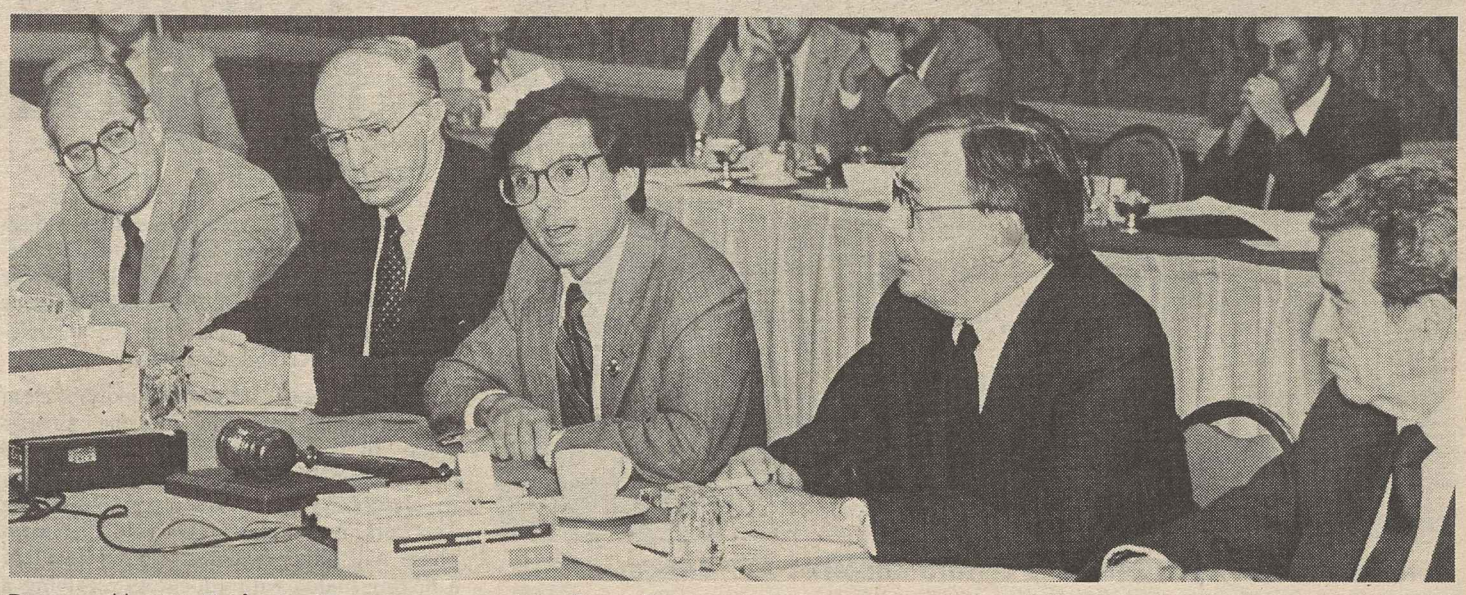
Keenan, retired secretary of the Electrical Workers. A council statement cited Keenan's 53 years of service to the labor movement, noting particularly his early encouragement of full political participation by union members and their families.

Politics absorbed much of the council's attention during the first day of the meeting, which opened the day after the General Board's action reaffirming the federation's commitment to the Mondale-Ferraro Democratic presidential ticket.

Federation President Lane Kirkland reported on developments at the Democratic convention and on the role of the 801 AFL-CIO members who took part in the convention as delegates and alternates supporting Walter Mondale. COPE Director John Perkins discussed plans for the all-out effort to see that all trade unionists and members of their families are registered to vote and get to the polls in November. And Vice President Frederick O'Neal reported on the specific program of United Black Labor for '84 to focus on the registration of black union members.



Denver Mayor Federico Pena, center, describes devastating impact on cities of Reagan program cuts.

Plight of cities

At its opening session, the council met with Denver's Democratic mayor, Federico Pena, who expressed appreciation for organized labor's support and detailed the social and economic woes that are besetting cities like Denver as a result of Reagan's sharp cuts in assistance programs.

Another visitor was Andre Vanden Broucke, president of the Belgian Federation of Labor and a member of the executive board of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions. Vanden Broucke discussed the current campaign of European labor to cut the standard workweek to 35 hours to reduce high rates of unemployment.

The council also heard a report by the Steelworkers' Williams on the current state of the strike at Phelps Dodge copper mines and smelters by a 13-union coalition led by the USWA. Williams described plans for a corporate campaign to force the company back to the bargaining table and counter its efforts to decertify the unions.

Laurence Gold, whose appointment as the federation's general counsel was announced by AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland earlier in the meeting, reported on the anti-union trend of the National Labor Relations Board as exemplified by several recent NLRB decisions. He also cited the growing backlog of cases of various types awaiting board rulings.

Focus on issues

The council was given a preview of several of the television spots and the five-minute film produced by the Labor Institute of Public Affairs that will be featured in an AFL-CIO television campaign this fall. The spots will focus on national issues of critical importance to workers and their unions. The anthem that forms the theme for the series, titled "Stand with Us, America," also was played for the General Board meeting.

In other policy actions detailed elsewhere in this issue, the council:

● Called for full trade union support of the 50,000 New York City hospital strikers, members of District 1199 of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union, in their fight for new contracts that will preserve benefits and jobs.

● Denounced the hard-line bargaining tactics of the U.S. Postal Service and pledged strong support of the postal unions in their efforts to negotiate fair and decent contract renewals.

● Condemned the anti-union actions of a number of maritime employers who are refusing to bargain with licensed personnel through their AFL-CIO unions, contending that licensed personnel are supervisors who can be fired for union activity.

● Endorsed consumer boycotts initiated by the Auto Workers against Schwinn bicycles and A.P. auto parts and by the Steelworkers against Hess Oil Co. products.

Deficit time bomb

In its statement on the national economy, the council charged that the huge Reagan budget deficits of more than $170 billion for 1984 and projected at $200 billion a year for the next five years—are a ticking "time bomb." It pointed out that interest payments on the national debt now consume a third of all individual income tax payments.

One result of the gigantic deficits is the highest real interest rates that the nation has encountered in this century. These rates have already sent the housing industry into another decline and "threaten to bring another recession before America can fully recover from the effects of the first Reagan recession," the council said.

It particularly denounced Reagan's tax policies, charging that for 3½ years the Administration "has victimized working men and women through a massive transfer of wealth and income away from low- and middle-income Americans and into the pockets of the wealthy. The last Reagan tax program weighted the scales of the tax system heavily against working people, and the next Reagan tax plan can be expected to follow the same pattern."

At his news conference on the opening day of the council meeting, Kirkland rejected a suggestion that workers bearing an unfair share of the tax burden might have difficulty understanding Walter Mondale's position on the need for a tax increase.

"Our people understand quite fully the price of civilization and the price of a decent and just and progressive society," Kirkland declared. "Those costs have to be paid, and our people bear their fair share of that burden without complaining. Their concern is with the fairness of it and with the fact that we cannot have a strong society unless all elements of that society bear an equitable share of the burden."

Workers, Kirkland said, are deeply concerned that under the Reagan Administration's policies, the most prosperous and privileged individuals and groups — those who have benefited the most "from the fruits of a free society"—are paying so little of the cost and carrying so relatively small a share of the burden.

"With this big deficit," he said, "the real choice is not between paying taxes or not paying taxes; the choice is between paying taxes to your country, for the betterment of your country, or paying taxes to the banks in the form of high interest rates."

Kirkland called high interest rates "the worst form of taxation, the cruelest form of taxation, the most regressive and unfair form of taxation. Because it's a form of taxation which, in the case of the rich, is paid for partly—subsidized partly—by the government because it can be deducted. So the richer you are, the less you pay in the form of interest rates. The poorer you are, the higher the effective rates you pay."

As is the practice at the August meeting, the council received the annual reports of the AFL-CIO's constitutional departments —Building & Construction Trades, Food & Allied Service Trades, Industrial Union, Maritime Trades, Metal Trades, Professional Employees, Public Employee and Union Label & Service Trades.

Committee reports were represented by Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue on finances and on the future of work, and by Vice Presidents Gerald W. McEntee, federal budget; Charles H. Pillard, housing; John H. Lyons, pension fund investment; Wayne E. Glenn, state and local central bodies, and Sol C. Chaikin on the Higher Education Council.

Staff reports

In addition, the council received staff reports from Economic Research Director Rudy Oswald, Legislative Director Ray Denison, Organizing Director Alan Kistler, International Affairs Director Irving Brown, and John Evans, chief executive officer of the Housing Investment Trust.

Contributions were approved to the following organizations: People for the American Way, United Negro College Fund, League for Industrial Democracy, Working Women, Citizens for Tax Justice, Citizen/Labor Energy Coalition, NAACP, Girls' Clubs of America, National Emergency Coalition for Haitian Refugees, Jewish Labor Committee, National Planning Association, and the Center for the Study of Welfare Policy.

The next meeting of the Executive Council is scheduled for Feb. 18-22, 1985, at Bal Harbour, Fla.

New York hospital workers backed in seven-week strike

Denver—The struggle of the 50,000 striking hospital workers, members of District 1199 of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union, against 59 hospitals and nursing homes has the full support of the AFL-CIO and its affiliates.

The Executive Council, in a statement, urged all union members "to support their brothers and sisters at the New York hospitals until a just and equitable solution is reached."

Meanwhile in New York, some 20,000 strikers gathered at Madison Square Garden on Aug. 21 to vote on a proposed contract but discovered the accord reached after a long bargaining session had fallen through when the terms were put in writing.

The proposal would have provided a 5-percent pay increase in each year of a two-year package and would have guaranteed workers every other weekend off.

The proposal was a slight improvement from the one that union negotiators had rejected on Aug. 18, because it lacked the guarantee of every other weekend off.

The strike, which began July 13, has had an impact on the quality of health care in the city. This past week the state health department cited eight struck hospitals for deficiencies ranging from dietary errors and unsanitary conditions to late X-rays and tests. It warned that another six hospitals would be cited for deficiencies in medical and nursing care.

Scabs fill in

The hospitals are using supervisors and scabs to fill in for the strikers, and management has threatened to hire permanent replacements if the strikers do not return to work.

The League of Voluntary Hospitals & Homes, which represents 30 of the struck facilities, succeeded in getting a federal court to issue a temporary restraining order to cut off medical benefits for the strikers.

Earlier, a federal court judge hit District 1199 with a $45,000-a-day fine for failing to get striking nurses to return to work at St. John's Episcopal Hospital.

Members of COPE Operating Committee meet in Denver to discuss the "one-on-one" voter registration campaign aimed at members of AFL-CIO unions and a follow-up get-out-the-vote effort targeted for the Nov. 6 elections.

Former school teacher Geraldine Ferraro addresses AFT delegates.

AFT convention welcomes Ferraro as a union sister

"The first day of the rest of the campaign" began for Geraldine Ferraro at a wildly enthusiastic teachers convention, where AFT delegates greeted her as a union sister.

The AFT is the union Ferraro joined when she taught in New York City's Public School 85 early in her career. And the union's convention was her first campaign stop since the ordeal—and triumph—of a two-hour televised news conference on the tax returns of the Ferraro-Zaccaro family.

Ferraro joyfully welcomed the opportunity "to get back to talking about the future of this country" instead of answering repeated questions about her tax returns. It's "the first day of the rest of the campaign," she said.

The Democratic Party's vice presidential candidate spoke to the delegates about education issues, the quest for excellence. She talked of the damage done by cuts in student aid and the shrinkage of the federal share of education funding under the Reagan Administration.

Republican strategy

While Democrats are looking to the future, the Republican convention "has been locked in a time machine," Ferraro said. "All they can talk about is 1980."

Later that day, Ferraro addressed delegates to the Las Vegas conventions of the Postal Workers and the Letter Carriers—on closed-circuit television from the TV studio of the State, County & Municipal Employees.

The cheers from the AFT delegates, the hand-lettered signs so many of them put together for her appearance, were a personal as well as a political tribute to her.

Many delegates had watched on television the previous day when Ferraro fielded question after probing question from an army of reporters and dozens of television cameras.

She had laid out six years of tax returns from her husband and herself, furnished accountants to answer technical questions, explained patiently and with some wit the problems of separating household expenses in a two wage-earner family.

Joint tax returns would have saved the couple money, but they chose the more costly route of separate returns after a 1978 experience of running afoul of Federal Election Commission regulations that allow an individual to contribute or loan an unlimited amount of money to his or her own campaign—but impose a tight limit on a spouse's contribution.

Ferraro readily agreed that the delay in putting out the tax data that had been promised hurt the campaign. She "promised more than I could deliver," Ferraro acknowledged. But "I finally delivered it, didn't I?"

And indeed she did. The picking and poking won't end entirely. A self-styled "conservative public interest law firm" filed a publicity-getting complaint with the House Ethics Committee, alleging she violated House rules by not disclosing her husband's income, assets and liabilities on the financial disclosure forms members of Congress fill out.

But nearly everyone who witnessed the lengthy press grilling of Ferraro ended up convinced of her integrity—and competence.

When the television cameras were turned off, there was applause from camera crews and from not a few of the reporters.

At his home at North Oaks, Minn., Mondale said Ferraro had "passed a test of leadership" with high grades and that the presidential campaign could get back on track.

To the AFT delegates in Washington, Ferraro expressed a heartfelt "thank you for the very warm reception you gave me. I needed it."

AFSCME gets extension of Article XX protection

Denver — The AFL-CIO Executive Council has approved extensions of Article XX jurisdictional protection sought by the State, County & Municipal Employees for five units.

The five units are Billings, Mont., city employees; Montana State Penitentiary employees; Cheektowago, N.Y., town employees; and Massachusetts State Employees Bargaining Unit 5 (Metro district police) and Bargaining Unit 9 (engineers). In each case the extension is for one year to August 1985.

Shanker stresses need

Teachers to lead way in educational reform

By Arlee C. Green

Teachers will have to take the lead in instituting reforms in the nation's educational system or they will have it done for them by legislative fiat, Teachers President Albert Shanker warned the 2,400 delegates to the AFT convention.

In his keynote address, Shanker pointed to "step one" of the reforms already taken in some states—an infusion of money coupled to varying legislative goals. In describing the choice of paths the Teachers must make, he said the next phase will either become "round two" of a boxing match with educators receiving a legislative knock-out punch, or it will become "step two" with teachers boosting their professionalism by leading the reforms.

"Either we are going to improve the profession ourselves," or "we are going to get more rules, more regulations, oppressive supervision, perhaps even private contractors," he stressed.

A series of education reports over the past 16 months provided the impetus for action. Governors and state legislatures voted the reforms, resulting in a move toward making "education more mechanical," Shanker observed. He said the wrong kind of legislation isn't the answer for education.

Counter-action

One of the messages of mandated reform is that teachers can't be trusted, that they "have to be governed by rules and regulations, or otherwise, they will not get it right," Shanker said. He urged AFT members to counter this view by taking the lead in the reforms, especially in the areas of peer reviews, teacher selection and training, and selection of instructional materials.

"If we do these things, we will develop a type of power for teachers" and a professional inter-action which will make "the life of a teacher much more attractive," he said.

Focusing on the national elections, Shanker cautioned that if the Republican Administration is returned to office, "it is not four more years of Ronald Reagan, it is probably 24 more years . . . because of the appointments to the Supreme Court."

Key among the convention actions was a resolution to support Democratic candidates Walter Mondale and Geraldine Ferraro. Delegates viewed a video tape of Mondale, who stressed this election is "a referendum of our future." He detailed his opponent's efforts on education and concluded, "When it comes to education, Reagan is uneducable."

Former school teacher Geraldine Ferraro outlined the Mondale-Ferraro plans for improving the quality of education, noting the differences between the two parties by reading from the Republican platform which calls for a "limited federal role" in education. "We need to see that today's students are the best educated in the history of the world and that calls for a national commitment—not a limited federal role," she said.

Per capita rise

Convention delegates voted a pair of per capita increases, raising the amount by 25 cents on Sept. 1, 1984, to $5.25 and to $5.50 a year later. A separate resolution will require locals to automatically increase dues accordingly so local treasuries are not drained.

Shanker's remarks on education were buttressed by other speakers. Ernest L. Boyer, president of the Carnegie Foundation for the Advancement of Teaching, noted the National Commission on Excellence in Education's report had declared the nation's future is "at risk" because of the level of educational effort. He scored the Reagan Administration's approach to reform, charging that it calls for "more than tuition tax credits or prayer in schools or a shootout over merit pay."

Boyer suggested a four-point program of school renewal that includes the development of critical thinking skills through the mastery of language, development of a core of common learning to provide students a wider perspective of the world, improved rewards and working conditions for teachers, and increased local authority over educational policies.

Texas salaries

Gov. Mark White of Texas outlined the educational reforms undertaken in his state, including the raising of teacher salaries by $4,100 and boosting the top teaching wage to $26,600.

White called for a reforging of the partnership between the states and the federal government. It is time "for federal officials to stop wringing their hands over the state of education in America and start accepting some of the responsibilities for improving it."

John J. Creedon, a former teacher who is now president and chief executive officer of Metropolitan Life, detailed the results of a survey of 2,000 teachers which showed that teachers want to be in the forefront of educational improvements, and that most favored a renewed emphasis on the basics of reading, writing and mathematics, coupled to broader curricula and tighter graduation requirements.

Polish freedom fighter Tadeusz Swidzinski, a political prisoner who served 16 months of a three-year sentence for supporting Solidarnosc, thanked AFT for its help through its Adopt-a-Family program, whereby Swidzinski was relocated to Phoenix, Ariz., earlier this year.

Asbestos in schools

The problem of asbestos in schools was addressed both by a resolution and a workshop. The delegates mandated AFT to inform its members and others of the dangers of insulating material and to set up an information clearinghouse on asbestos projects. Other workshops dealt with national elections, financing education reform, health care, merit pay, higher education issues, school discipline and child abuse.

Other resolutions called for improved education in urban schools, expanded funding for remedial education programs, an increased federal role in providing aid to higher education programs and to students, legislation to guarantee private college and university faculties the right to unionize, partnerships between business and schools, and a re-ordering of national priorities to deal with hunger in America.

Kirkland taps Laurence Gold as AFL-CIO general counsel

Denver — AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland has announced the appointment of Laurence Gold as the federation's general counsel to succeed the late J. Albert Woll.

Gold, who previously had the title of special counsel, heads the AFL-CIO's legal staff and will continue to do so, Kirkland told the Executive Council.

Laurence Gold

Now 47, Gold has been with the AFL-CIO since 1975. Before that, he was a partner in the law firm of Woll, Mayer & Gold, an associate in its predecessor Woll & Mayer, and an attorney in the Supreme Court litigation branch of the general counsel's staff at the National Labor Relations Board.

He has regularly represented the AFL-CIO as well as various of its affiliates in leading labor law cases before the Supreme Court of the United States and each of the U.S. Courts of Appeals.

Gold is also the Executive Director of the AFL-CIO Lawyers Coordinating Committee, an organization of lawyers which was formed in 1983 to serve as a clearinghouse on legal developments of interest to, and an educational center for, counsel to local and national unions.

Postal union delegates assail management tactics

By Rex Hardesty

Las Vegas, Nev. — Bitterness at the Postal Service, Postmaster Gen. William Bolger and the Reagan Administration poured out as the Postal Workers and Letter Carriers met in separate but simultaneous conventions here.

The Letter Carriers endorsed binding arbitration in postal bargaining which broke off July 20. APWU delegates endorsed a resolution empowering President Moe Biller and the union's executive board "to take whatever steps they consider best calculated to achieve our goal." Biller said the convention had voted down a resolution calling for a strike vote by union members.

Both conventions acted in executive session.

"I will lead our arbitration effort as proudly as I would have led a strike," Letter Carriers President Vincent Sombrotto told reporters afterward. "We will arbitrate as we have struck—with no letup."

Sombrotto said the convention had also given him discretionary power for other actions, but indicated it was linked to any further attempt by the Postal Service to unilaterally change working conditions during fact-finding and arbitration, which could stretch into December.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue was greeted with cheers at both conventions when he delivered messages of support from the Executive Council.

At its meeting in Denver, Donahue said, the council took note of the unions' struggle to win a fair settlement. He pointed to "the hypocrisy of a management which hires union-busting consultants, tries to put two-tier wages in place illegally, proposes an unprecedented bonus for the Postmaster and an 8.1-percent increase for all supervisors, and would pay for all that by gouging your paychecks and your fringe benefits."

Congressional rebuff

Management's attempt to impose a two-tier pay system on new hires was rebuffed by Congress.

The sponsor of that congressional action, Rep. Silvio Conte (R-Mass.) received a tumultuous welcome from both conventions. Conte told the conventions that the attempt by Bolger to impose a two-tier wage system since negotiations broke off was "subversive to the process" adopted in the postal reorganization bill of 1970.

"In return for the right to bargain, you gave up something—your right to strike," Conte told the Letter Carriers. "You kept your part of the bargain" and the congressional action was aimed at making postal management do the same, he said.

Three other House members with federal employee responsibilities in the House, Democrats Bill Clay of Missouri, Mickey Leland of Texas, and Mary Rose Oakar of Ohio also addressed one or both of the conventions.

After the executive sessions, the delegates' bitterness at Bolger's actions spilled out of the floor microphones of both conventions in a variety of proposals—all ruled incompatible with the conventions' official actions.

From NALC delegates, there were calls for a referendum on the arbitration results, which Sombrotto said contradicted the commitment to accept the results, and a proposal to conduct information picketing as long as members are without a contract. Delegates were assured such picketing would be employed when necessary.

Biller reported to the Postal Workers that the acrimony members feel toward Reagan labor policies had spurred an increase in voluntary political contributions from $34,000 in any year prior to 1982 to $388,000 in 1982 and $400,000 already this year.

He also announced plans for efforts to organize as many of the 72,000 unorganized postal employees as feasible..

Biller charged the Labor Dept. with harassment in ordering the APWU to re-run its 1983 election. He said that after months of foot-dragging, the agency issued orders one week before the 1984 contract deadline. Biller's 1983 re-election is not part of the re-run, but some 40 other APWU elections are.

In other convention actions, APWU delegates voted down a $1 increase in per capita and went through a five-hour roll-call vote to reject a convention committee proposal to shorten the time for nomination of officers by 45 days. The process runs about eight months.

Ferraro address

Each convention used a television hook up for Democratic vice presidential nominee Geraldine Ferraro to address the conventions from Washington.

She told the APWU that the Bolger and Reagan intent was clearly to "privatize" the Postal Service. And she chided the Republican convention for leaving "scarcely a man in sight in Dallas" while trying to overcome the fact the GOP opposes ERA.

She was repeatedly greeted by chants of "GER-ry, GER-ry," creating a nightmare for the technicians who had to slow Rep. Ferraro down enough to keep her remarks from being drowned out by the noise.

Schwinn, A.P. Parts, Hess Oil added to labor's boycott list

Denver—At the request of the Auto Workers and the Steelworkers, the Executive Council endorsed consumer boycotts against Schwinn bicycles, A.P. auto parts and Hess gasoline and oil products.

The council sanctioned a boycott begun by the UAW in June against products of the Schwinn Bicycle Co. after the firm shut down its manufacturing facility in Chicago and shipped production to low-wage and non-union plants in Taiwan and Japan and in the South.

Nearly 1,300 UAW members—many with decades of service—were thrown out of work. Yet Schwinn is refusing to pay the workers vacation and severance pay they are entitled to under their contract. The company has also refused to settle numerous grievances still outstanding, including 168 awaiting arbitration.

Also at the request of the UAW, the council endorsed the union's boycott of products of A.P. Parts Co. of Toledo, Ohio, a tailpipe and muffler manufacturer.

Company demands

About 450 UAW members struck the plant May 2 after months of negotiations for a new agreement during which the company refused to moderate its take-it-or-leave-it demands that would have gutted the contract.

The company's demands would have meant losses in wages and benefits of as much as $5.84 an hour and reduction of pension benefits from $18 to $7 per month per year of service.

A.P. has hired strikebreakers, fenced in the plant and brought in an outside, armed security force.

In addition to the A.P. brand, the company's products are sold nationally under the names Merit, Goerlich and Silentone in garages and auto parts stores.

The council also endorsed a Steelworkers boycott against gasoline and heating oil distributed by the Hess Oil Co.

Workers locked out

Despite a long collective bargaining relationship between Hess and its 375 employees at its St. Croix refinery in the Virgin Islands, the company locked out the employees Apr. 16, the day after the expiration of the most recent contract.

Throughout the bargaining, Hess had insisted on drastic concessions that would have undermined longstanding seniority and job security provisions. While rejecting those demands, the union was prepared to bargain beyond the expiration date, but the company imposed the lockout and is attempting to run the refinery with supervisors.

In other action, the AFL-CIO added products of the Wright Tool & Forge Co. of Barberton, Ohio, to the federation's Unfair List and urged union consumers not to buy Wright Tools.

Some 200 members of the Boilermakers struck the company on Apr. 2, 1983, and Wright Tool has hired scabs and refused to return to the bargaining table.

Maritime unions pledged aid in battle against scab crews

Denver—The Executive Council pledged its maritime affiliates all possible aid and support in their battle with employers who refuse to bargain with licensed personnel.

"These employers are seeking to destroy sound and productive bargaining relationships under which they have grown and prospered," a council statement charged. "Their position is that licensed personnel are supervisors who can and will be fired for engaging in union activity.

"Indeed, in one case, the employer went to the extreme of using the police to remove union deck officers and engineers from a ship in order to bring on scab replacements."

The Masters, Mates & Pilots at their recent convention condemned actions of three major tanker companies—Trinidad Corp., Delta Lines and Marine Transport Lines—that have resorted to use of this new anti-union tactic.

Two other AFL-CIO maritime affiliates—the Seafarers and the Marine Engineers—have run into similar experiences with ship owners.

SIU's problems have been with barge line companies with whom the union represents both unlicensed and licensed wheelhouse personnel, including mates, masters, and barge captains. Employers who have refused to bargain with the union include Dixie Carrier, American Commercial Barge Lines, and most recently SONAT Marine.

MEBA represents engine room personnel with the same companies, and has had similar experiences as SIU and MMP.

In its statement, the Council scored the National Labor Relations Board for permitting "this arrogant attempt to deny licensed personnel their basic democratic rights to a voice in setting their wages and their working conditions.

"The employers who are refusing to bargain are doing so in the expectation that the change in the National Labor Relations Board brought about by President Reagan's appointees will permit anti-union employers to do what they pleased."

Public sector pacts yield 4.4% gain

Major state and local government collective bargaining contracts negotiated in the first half of 1984 brought increases in wages and benefits averaging 4.4 percent in the first year of the agreements and 4.3 percent annually over their term, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

The last time the same parties bargained—one to three years ago—compensation increased an average 5.8 percent in the first contract year and 6.2 percent a year over the life of the pacts.

Wage adjustments alone during the January-June period this year averaged 4.6 percent in the first contract year and 4.4 percent over term. Corresponding adjustments the last time the parties bargained were 5.9 and 6.3 percent, respectively.

None of the first-half 1984 settlements included cost-of-living adjustments, nor did the agreements they replaced.

BLS keeps track of wage and benefit adjustments bargained for nearly 1.1 million workers in 88 bargaining units with at least 5,000 workers. The first-half 1984 data derive from 18 settlements covering 164,000 workers.

Twenty-six other agreements covering 295,000 workers expired before July 1, but new contracts had not been ratified by June 30.

Effective yield

Besides new settlements, BLS reports on all wage changes put into effect during the first six months of the year as the result of both new and earlier settlements. Pay increases for some 482,000 workers under these agreements averaged 4.8 percent. When pro-rated over the 1.1 million workers in the 88 major bargaining units surveyed, wage adjustments put in effect averaged 2.1 percent.

Last month, BLS reported that major settlements in the private sector covering 5,000 or more workers in the first half of 1984 yielded increases in wages and benefits averaging 4.3 percent in the first year and 3.9 percent annually over the contract term, about one-third higher than the increases for all 1983 settlements.

The bureau noted, however, that care should be exercised in comparing the size and nature of settlements in the public sector with those in the private sector because of differences in bargaining practices and settlement characteristics. A chief difference, it pointed out, is the incidence of cost-of-living adjustment clauses, which are in only a few public sector agreements, but appear in a substantial number of private sector contracts. Agreements without COL clauses tend to provide larger specified wage increases than those with COL provisions.

Hazards on the job

Dangers of exposure to excessive levels of ethylene dibromide, a cancer-causing chemical, are spelled out at a meeting of the Urban Environment Conference. Fire Fighters panel to study changes in union structure

Cincinnati—The Fire Fighters convention provided for a union commission to study the structure of the 165,000-member IAFF and recommend constitutional changes to the 1986 convention.

Restructuring of the union has been a subject of discussion for some years. The convention directed the commission, set to be representative of all groups and regions in the union, to bring in its report six months before the 1986 meeting in Las Vegas.

The commission recommendations will constitute a first order of business at that convention.

The union is now governed by a president, secretary-treasurer and 16 vice presidents, 15 of whom represent geographical districts, with one representing the fighters employed by the federal government.

Setting policy

As members of the executive board, the vice presidents determine policy. In addition, they function in the organizing and servicing spheres on a per diem basis, at the direction of the president or with his consent.

In convention floor discussion, some delegates said a revision of the union's governing structure could be helpful to them in serving their members' needs.

At the same time the delegates instructed the officers to lend help to a program of voluntary merger of local unions so as to strengthen the efforts of smaller locals in combating pressure for reduced fire protection in some communities.

Many of moves, in both larger and smaller cities, are initiated by "anti-labor organizations intent on working against the best interests of the community and its fire fighters," a convention resolution said.

The delegates voted to continue a Labor Issues Task Force created two years ago to provide a more efficient response to schemes to consolidate fire and police departments, contract out fire protection to private companies, close fire stations or take other actions against the interest of professional fire fighters.

The convention authorized an additional 8-cent monthly per capita tax to pay for the expanded services of the task force.

In the IAFF elections, President John Gannon and Sec.-Treas. Alfred K. Whitehead were re-elected, as were eight incumbent vice presidents.

Eight new vice presidents were elected: James J. McGowan, New York; Robert Palmer, Kansas City; Michael Mullane, Boston; Russell Cerami, Erie, Pa.; Michael McNeil, Denver; Dominick Barbera, Dade County, Fla.; Clarence Perez, New Orleans, and David Canfield, San Diego.

Growth in profits outpaces wages

while only 1.5 percent, was the latest in a string of quarterly rises in corporate earnings, and followed a 6.8 percent increase from the fourth quarter of 1984 to the January-March period. Profits during the last six quarters have climbed 92 percent.

The Commerce Dept. also reported that the nation's "real," or inflation-adjusted, gross national product grew at an annual rate of 7.6 percent in the second quarter. The revised estimate was just slightly faster than the 7.5 percent growth reported by the department last month.

The revision in second-quarter real GNP resulted from upward changes in consumer spending, business fixed investment, and net exports. Housing and inventory investment were both revised downward.

Real GNP grew at an annual rate of 10.1 percent in the January-March quarter.

Moderates shut out

Platform shifts GOP further to right fringe

Another section of the platform suggests a constitutional amendment—and a constitutional convention if necessary — to somehow attain a balanced budget. The platform backs amendments on prayer and abortion — but not the Equal Rights Amendment which the GOP had steadfastly endorsed before the Reagan era.

The platform rejects, strongly, the concept of "comparable pay" for jobs with comparable levels of skill and difficulty. "The free-market system" should determine the relative value of jobs, it said.

On foreign affairs, the platform blames past policies of "the Carter-Mondale Administration" for virtually all Soviet encroachments and claims the Reagan Administration will "keep the peace by keeping our country stronger than any potential adversary."

Convention oratory, as well as party platform, made clear that the Republican strategy in this presidential election will be to seek to rerun the 1980 campaign.

Speakers repeatedly evoked the plight of the hostages in Iran as symbolic of the "failure" of the last Democratic Administration. And the successful military intervention in the island of Grenada, under the Reagan Administration, grew in the retelling to an achievement approaching the World War II landings in Normandy.

On the home front, Democrats were portrayed as spoilsports who were unwilling to attribute the nation's economic pick-up to Reagan's magic. Unmentioned from the convention podium was the double-digit unemployment of the Reagan recession—the most severe of the post-war era.

Hero, not leader

Ronald Reagan, seeking a second term at the age of 73, was clearly the hero rather than the leader of the movers and shakers of the new Republican Party.

The platform was shaped by two conservative Republican congressmen—Jack Kemp of New York and Trent Lott of Mississippi—rather than by the White House as is commonly the case when an incumbent president stands for re-election.

Kemp, the author of the tax cut strategy Reagan embraced, is an all-but-declared candidate for the Republican presidential nomination in 1988. The convention-eye view is that his chief rival will be Vice President Bush. The retiring Senate majority leader, Howard H. Baker, Jr., of Tennessee, is also eyeing the race.

The New Right's dominance was reflected when the Illinois delegation picked its representatives to the convention Platform Committee. Gov. James Thompson and Sen. Charles Percy, both traditional Republicans, were passed over. Instead, Illinois was represented by Phyllis Schlafly, a right-wing, anti-ERA crusader, and Henry Hyde, a like-minded House member.

Big bucks banquet

Delegates had a wide choice of social events, but the biggest party at the convention cost $1,000-a-ticket. It was a fund-raiser that raked in a reported $1.3 million dollars for the National Conservative Political Action Committee—the New Right group that puts on negative television ads attacking Democrats. Nelson Bunker Hunt, the oil and silver baron, was the host.

On the convention floor, the GOP's unanimity was unbroken by dissent except for a scattering of "no's" when the platform was adopted by voice vote.

In television interviews, however, House and Senate members worried aloud that Democrats will be able to tie the far-out views of the GOP platform to their political opponents.

Elliot Richardson, who is seeking the Republican nomination for the Senate in Massachusetts, was taking no chances. He issued a public disavowal of the platform.

Not quite so

The Republican campaign strategy has been to ignore Geraldine Ferraro as much as possible, but the GOP's platform writers may have taken that directive a bit too far.

"President Reagan has won enactment of the Retirement Equity Act," the platform boasts.

The legislation, which gives women workers and spouses a greater assurance of pension rights, did have broad bipartisan support. But the Democratic vice presidential candidate, it happens, was its original author and chief sponsor. And the White House initially opposed some of its provisions.

Among her colleagues in the House, the measure was known as "the Ferraro bill."

Engineers vote per capita increase

Atlantic City, N.J. — Delegates to the Professional & Technical Engineers convention approved a two-stage per capita increase which would raise the monthly payments by 45 cents to $4.20. The convention action is subject to a referendum by the full membership later this year.

Under the proposal, monthly payments will rise 25 cents next Mar. 1, and an additional 20 cents on Mar. 1, 1986. The per capita was last increased in 1980.

Delegates re-elected President Rodney A. Bower to a seventh two-year term and Sec.-Treas. John H. Dunne for a ninth term. The union reported a 5 percent growth over the past two years, to 23,500 members.

Ralph McElfresh of Local 1 in Portsmith, Va., was elected vice president for federal area employees, filling the vacancy left by the retirement of Leon M. Olsen. Des Cupid of Local 164 in Scarborough, Ont., was elected the Canadian vice president, replacing Harold Reviat who retired. Incumbent Vice Presidents Michael Waske and Vincent Cacchiotti were re-elected.

In key resolutions adopted at the four-day convention, delegates called for the naming of a coordinator to aid local unions in establishing women's committees and for efforts to expand the number of local retiree clubs in conjunction with the National Council of Senior Citizens.

Another resolution urged the federal government to limit the contracting out of naval ship repairs to the current level of 30 percent. Delegates also criticized the National Labor Relations Board for not fulfilling its legal obligations, supported the bargaining efforts of the postal unions, urged enactment of federal plant closing legislation, opposed the concessionary bargaining tactics of some employers, and called for amendments to federal civil service laws.

Economic tricks

In a speech to the delegates, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland scored the Reagan Administration's practice of "voodoo economics" that has hurt American workers. He recalled the "mandate" this Administration claimed when elected to office and stressed that trade unions were almost alone in warning of the disaster such economic policies would cause the country.

AFL-CIO Vice President Joyce Miller, who is president of the Coalition of Labor Union Women, zeroed in on the suffering of women, especially as single parents, as a result of sharp cuts by the Administration in social programs. Those policies have more firmly entrenched women in poverty and low paying pobs, she said.

Federation Research Director Rudy Oswald gave the delegates an overview of the state of the world economy and noted the growth and effect of both the federal spending deficit and the trade deficit. He explained the role of the Federal Reserve Board and the World Bank and how their actions effect U.S. interest rates.

Oil Workers pact ends Sunoco refinery strike

Marcus Hook, Pa.—Two Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers locals ended a four-month strike at a Sunoco refinery here by ratifying a new 19-month contract.

The pact with OCAW Locals 8-901 and 8-933 covering 850 production workers provides lump sum payments of $400 now and $1,000 on Jan. 1, 1986, with hourly wages remaining at approximately $14.50.

Key improvements were won in the pension plan which will increase between $1,000 and $3,000 a year per employee based on years of service and age. The improved benefits will enable workers to retire earlier, the union said.

Other improvements include an increase of $5 in the company's monthly contribution to medical benefits.

The union successfully rebuffed Sunoco's proposal for a two-tier wage scale that would have cut pay for new hires by about $4 an hour.

No Higher Priority

WHEN THIS Administration came to power, claiming a mandate for the crackpot economic theories of the Radical Right, we were virtually alone in warning that Ronald Reagan's policies would bring great injury to millions of working Americans and their families.

We said Ronald Reagan would deal with inflation by throwing people out of work. He promised he would not. He gave us the most massive unemployment since the Great Depression.

We said Ronald Reagan's tax policies would benefit the rich. He said they would not. He gave his fancy friends a $750 billion tax cut handout from the public till, at the expense of the average American and the nation's future.

We said Ronald Reagan's tax giveaways, combined with huge and mindless increases in defense spending, were the most reckless and irresponsible fiscal act in our history. He promised they would lead to a balanced budget by 1984. He gave us the largest federal deficit in history. He has mortgaged our children's future.

Instead of paying higher taxes for the betterment of our own country, we pay them to private bankers in the form of the highest real interest rates in our history. And those are the most cruel and regressive taxes of all.

WE SAID Ronald Reagan's "free trade" policies would export American jobs and erode the nation's industrial base. He promised that the invisible hand of the international free market would set things right.

He gave us a trade deficit that is now running at $120 billion for this year alone—that is a measure of the jobs, hopes and opportunities that are being drained from this country in a growing flood, year by year.

We said Ronald Reagan's policies would hurt the weakest and the poorest of our people. He promised not to shred the safety net under the "truly needy." Surely, he loves the "truly needy"—he has made so many more of them.

We said Ronald Reagan represented the Far Right of the Republican Party and would seek to undermine and weaken the trade union movement. With an air of injured innocence, he said: "Who, me—a former president of the Screen Actors Guild?"

He gave us a National Labor Relations Board stacked with pedigreed union-busters; a Labor Dept. dedicated to the dismantling of Davis-Bacon, OSHA and other worker protections; and a cruel, vindictive campaign to destroy a small union of air traffic controllers and blackball its members.

If he did this in his first term, imagine what he might do in a second, unrestrained by another election.

What would the NLRB look like in a second term?

Ronald Reagan has divided America. He has set men against women, young against old, the jobless against the employed, the poor against the near-poor, and blacks against whites against browns.

THE TRADE UNION movement stood against Ronald Reagan and for common sense the first time around. But this time, we have something else going for us. We have candidates for the presidency and the vice presidency whom we had a voice in selecting as their party nominees.

Fritz Mondale was the overwhelming choice of our members for the Democratic nomination, and they turned out in primaries and caucuses to help him win at the Democratic convention. Our members know him, and he knows them.

And we have known Geraldine Ferraro for many years. She, too, understands the problems and needs of working people, and she knows how to fight for their concerns.

We have a ticket that can win in November.

Between now and then, our movement has no higher priority than to make sure that our members understand the urgency of the choice before them and turn out to vote in unprecedented numbers.

Job hazard jungle ignored after consumer risks ease

By Press Associates, Inc.

When Upton Sinclair's "The Jungle" in 1906 revealed the filthy conditions in meat processing plants, the public outrage led to the nation's first food safety laws. So great was the public alarm over what was in the food that Sinclair's original purpose—to expose dangerous working conditions—was lost.

In the decades since, workplace hazards exposed by workers and their unions have repeatedly signaled broader public dangers in products and the environment and led to protective laws and actions. But after the public outcry subsides, workers are too often forgotten, left to face the same or similar hazards at work.

Affiliates of the AFL-CIO Food & Allied Service Trades Dept., and other unions, whose members are exposed to fruits and vegetables treated by ethylene dibromide (EDB) while working in grain milling and storage operations, alerted the public that sloppy fumigation processes left EDB residues in food.

Since 1981, the unions have been appealing to the Occupational Safety & Health Administration for stronger worker protections against EDB.

Public pressure

Early this year, the Environmental Protection Agency bowed to public pressure and limited permissible consumer exposure to EDB to 900 parts per billion (ppb) in raw grain, 150 ppb in intermediate foods such as flour and 30 ppb in ready-to-eat foods such as cereals.

While EPA has moved in some areas to protect workers from EDB exposure, OSHA has not. Consequently, consumers are protected from a chemical shown in animal tests to be a carcinogen that also causes genetic and birth defects. EDB exposure has killed two workers and left others hospitalized, but many still are legally exposed to EDB up to 20,000 ppb.

Using the EDB controversy as an example, union safety and health experts and environmentalists at a recent meeting of the Urban Environment Conference explained why the nation's faulty system of pesticide regulation and failure to protect workers first puts the public at risk.

Deborah Berkowitz, health and safety director for FAST, said that the EDB contamination clearly pointed up the "link between worker exposure and consumer exposure." If OSHA had responded to the unions' 1981 petition and issued rules requiring the aeration of mills, equipment and grain to dissipate EDB and protect workers, EDB residues would not have been left to turn up in consumer products, she said.

Different mandates

Suzanne Kossan, Teamsters industrial hygienist, pointed out that part of the problem stems from OSHA and EPA working separately under different mandates. EPA considers a cancer risk of one death per one million people significant, while the Supreme Court set OSHA's cancer risk criteria at one death per 1,000 workers. But, she said, EDB clearly met the criteria for OSHA.

Kossan said that after the EPA protected consumers against EDB and OSHA still refused to take action, the union went to EPA to try to get stronger label requirements on EDB-treated products. Again, the EPA aided in protecting workers, but OSHA "rolled over and played dead."

Jay Feldman, national coordinator for the National Coalition Against the Misuse of Pesticides, said that workers in mills and plants are seeing the same problems with pesticides as farm workers: poorly worded and outdated labels, no pesticide law enforcement and little or no training or protective equipment for applicators, who are not covered by OSHA. Thus, one mill worker recruited to apply EDB ended up in hospital near death after a faulty sprayer spilled on his clothes.

Berkowitz, Kossan and Feldman stressed the need to recognize the clear link between worker and consumer health and safety issues and the necessity of joint efforts to protect workers and stop the contamination at its source.

MEMO FROM COPE

A Platform to Warm Old Millard's Heart

The mock Republican platform printed below is only a mild exaggeration of the real thing. The fact is, the document produced by the GOP was tailored by, and intended for the delight of, the GOP right wing, which is firmly in control of the party. It would warm old Millard Fillmore's heart. Among those who had a prominent hand in crafting this ultra-conservative platform were Georgia Rep. Newt (Stomp Them Commie-crats) Gingrich, Sen. Jesse (Death Squads? Them's Boy Scout Troops) Helms, and Phyllis (Hey, Hey, Waddaya Say, Let's all Dump on the ERA) Schlafly.

As had been expected by many of those alarmed by the hammerlock the right-wingers have gained on the party, they exercised their power with arrogance and without class. The disdain for moderates like Connecticut Sen. Lowell Weicker, Iowa Rep. Jim Leach and others in platform hearings was evidence of the contempt the ultra-conservatives feel for those who aren't 100 percent true-believers.

And it demonstrated the truth behind the joke making the rounds that the few moderates who got elected as delegates to the GOP convention in Dallas were assigned hotel accommodations in Houston.

The platform itself is less important than what it symbolizes and portends. Platforms, like daily newspapers, are written and soon forgotten. But they do show who's at the steering wheel and which direction a party is heading.

The Republican Party is sailing out of orbit. It has broken from the pull of gravity that once held it circling around a body of rational political thought and response. The party under Eisenhower, Nixon and Ford adjusted to, and accepted advances in, the people-serving programs that said this nation gives a damn about working people and those in need and those who are discriminated against.

The crowd now in control—the Helms and Gingriches, etc.—think the needy will be comforted if the wealthy and the corporations are coddled. And on the rights of minorities, they have the chutzpah in their platform to declare: "For millions (of minority group members) the past four years have seen a dramatic improvement in their ability to secure for themselves and their children a better tomorrow. . . . The policies of the Reagan Administration have opened literally millions of doors of opportunity for these Americans. . . . We pledge to do even more the next four years." Most minorities would take that more as a warning than a pledge.

What this bunch thinks of workers becomes clear in its platform reaffirmation of support for state "right to work for less" laws and the certainty that, handed the power, they would enact a national open shop law as a first order of business.

The nature of the GOP platform and the hold right-wingers have on other key party committees point clearly to a GOP heading further and further out from the political center of recent decades.

The strong ties between rising stars within the party like Gingrich—and now-established right-wing powerhouses outside the party, like "new right" leaders Richard Viguerie and Terry Dolan, indicate not just a shift to the right that's occurred within the GOP but one that will accelerate, perhaps beyond even Reaganism.

While they all talk in terms of grand ambition, Gingrich goes further than any in describing his role and that of a group of rightist U.S. House members he's organized into the Conservative Opportunity Society, many of whose positions are incorporated into the GOP platform. He says they are "shaping a movement, a party and western civilization." Suddenly, they're responsible for western civilization. Without them, it'll go down the pipes.

This controlling group in the GOP differs from its predecessors in another important way. It rejects the usual give and take of legislative business based on compromise. It believes in confrontation as a tactic—like Gingrich's use of the House floor and TV cameras to pin the Comsymp label on some 50 Democrats.

Gingrich says he and his mates are impelled by the "driving force of an ideological vision."

When folks get possessed of a "driving force of an ideological vision," it's time for other folks to sit up and look close, for behind many an "ideological vision," even the kinder-seeming ones, lie intolerance, intemperateness and inadequate concern for the rights of those who don't share the vision.

As those lonesome GOP moderates who bucked the tide can tell you, if you're not in on the "ideological vision," you're out in the cold and maybe out of the party . . . because it doesn't want you and your moderation any more. Its agenda is hardcore and uncompromising.

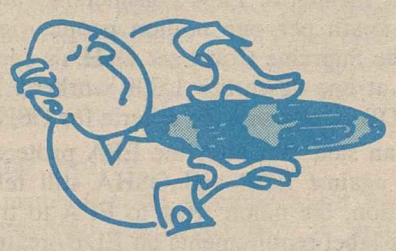
And that's the message of the Republican platform for now and the near future.

One Vote Counts

Acting Mayor Joseph Paolino won the job on his own in a special election recently in Providence, R.I., by only 117 votes out of more than 34,000 votes cast. The count was 15,509 to 15,392.

Paolino won on the strength of absentee ballots. He trailed by 68 votes when the machine tallies were announced election night. But he picked up those and more when some 800 absentee ballots were counted.

GOP: THE EARTH IS FLAT

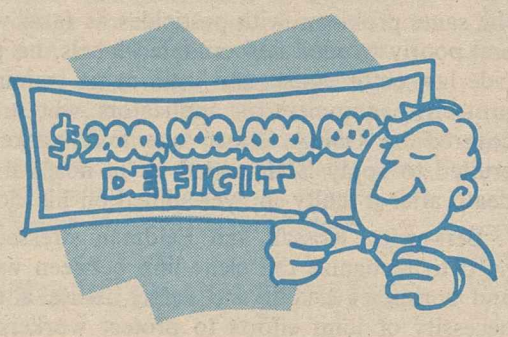


Following are key planks in the Republican Party platform adopted this week at the party's convention in Dallas:

1. The earth is flat. (Minority report: It is rectangular.)

2. We reject the concept that women are equal. The Good Lord didn't make 'em equal, and we don't need no Eee-Are-Ay to force 'em to be equal. (Minority report: Some women are equal . . . to some other women.)

3. We repudiate the progressive income tax that forces the hard-working affluent to cough up a higher percentage tax on income than the indolent masses. (Minority report: The concept of a progressive tax is eminently sensible; just start it from the other end.)



4. Return to the gold standard. (Minority report: Good idea, but make sure Bunkie Hunt unloads all that silver first.)

5. We will not knuckle under to the "comparable worth," pay equity, women's rights hooligans. (Minority report: Redundant. See Plank 2. We already said they ain't equal anyway.)

6. Under no circumstances will we increase taxes in 1985. (Minority report: At least we won't talk about it in public until then.)

7. We concur with recent economic research that demonstrates President Reagan's huge federal deficits are good. (Minority report: Unlike the much smaller ones that Jimmy Carter dumped on us, which were bad.)

8. We will enact a program to create full employment . . . in Hong Kong, Taiwan, Brazil, Korea etc. (Minority report: Plank not needed. We already have the program. We call it "free trade.")

9. We will not stand by and watch America's basic industries go to hell in a handbasket. (Minority report: We'll just turn our backs so we can't see.)

10. In the great tradition of our party, we will do all we can to provide work for workers, sustenance for the needy and security for the elderly. (Minority report: Better check that "great tradition" before we commit ourselves to this one.)

Trade deficit hits all-time high

Madison Square Garden rocks with cheers from members of District 1199 as their 47-day hospital strike ends.

Import surge in July totals $33.5 billion

By Susan Dunlop

The worst monthly trade deficit in American history was chalked up in July as foreign imports swamped U.S. exports by $14.1 billion.

The nation's trade imbalance for the first seven months of 1984 alone now stands at $73.8 billion. That tops the $69.4 billion deficit for all 12 months of 1983, which had stood as the all-time record for any year.

At this pace, according to Commerce Dept. projections, the trade deficit this year could hit—or top—$130 billion. Yet the Reagan Administration plans no action to stem the flood of red ink.

One Commerce Dept. study asserts that each $1 billion in sales lost to imports translates into about 25,000 lost American jobs.

The July shortfall was the result of $33.5 billion worth of merchandise imports—the most ever to enter the country in a single month—offset by only $19.4 billion in U.S. exports.

The July deficit was $1.9 billion higher than the previous record of $12.2 billion in April.

Surges in imports of manufactured goods, clothing, iron and steel, electronic semiconductors, Japanese automobiles and a variety of agricultural products were to blame for most of the trade imbalance, the Commerce Dept. figures showed.

Manufacturing record

The trade deficit in manufactured goods alone was a record $10.5 billion in July. Food exports—normally an item that takes some sting out of the trade deficit—shrunk to their smallest surplus in history, $909 million.

AFL-CIO Research Director Rudy Oswald called the trade deficit an "economic disaster area," and stressed that the galloping increases in imports, particularly in manufactured goods, are added evidence that American workers are being bypassed by economic recovery as they lose their jobs to imports of goods they once produced.

In sharp contrast, the Reagan Administration applauded the huge trade imbalance. White House spokesman Larry Speakes commented that the massive deficit "reflects the strength of our recovery."

Oswald warned that the trade deficit

General Motors, Ford rebuffed on takeback bids

Detroit—Provoked by a set of exceptionally stingy contract offers from both General Motors and Ford, the Auto Workers executive board voted unanimously to put both automakers on notice that they could be struck as early as Sept. 15 if a decent agreement isn't reached by then.

UAW President Owen Bieber, in announcing the board's decision to cheering members of the union's GM and Ford bargaining councils, called the management offers "meager and totally inadequate."

The UAW board met to examine the management proposals and fix a possible strike target shortly after the companies—which both rang up record profits last year—released contract proposals calling for three-years of continued wage freezes and reduced cost-of-living formulas. The firms made virtually no responses to the UAW's proposals for strong job security guarantees that are at the top of the union's agenda.

The UAW had told the companies that the workers who accepted wage and benefit concessions in 1982 to help the firms weather the recession now expected to share in the soaring profits.

50,000 strikers return

Elated workers ratify N.Y. hospital accord

New York—Fifty thousand elated health care workers returned to their jobs at hospitals and nursing homes after ratifying a union contract that took a 47-day strike to achieve.

Members of District 1199 of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union, cheered news of the settlement at a rally that overflowed Madison Square Garden and gave it 99 percent approval in a secret-ballot ratification vote.

The strikers measured the contract against the takeback demands of the employer bargaining group—the League of Voluntary Hospitals & Homes.

Key item won

Their union negotiated a 5-percent pay raise for each of the two contract years—less than it had sought, more than had been offered. But it won with no compromise the most emotional issue of the long struggle—a firm guarantee that each worker would have at least every other weekend off. No longer would a family's plans be at the scheduling convenience of management.

The 59 health care institutions affected by the strike had sought to reduce payments to the union's health and welfare fund. In the end, management dropped the takeback demand and agreed to continue payments at present levels. The union's only significant concession was a second-year freeze on the starting pay for new employees.

The contract guarantees that all strikers will return to their jobs—an issue that almost blocked settlement when the hospitals and nursing homes tried to claim the right to deny re-employment to strikers management contended had engaged in picket line misconduct. In return, the union agreed not to retaliate against nonstrikers.

The union is appealing in court fines imposed by a federal judge totaling more than $900,000 on grounds of non-compliance with a court order directing a group of nurses represented by the union at a Queens hospital to return to work during the strike.

Most of the 1199 members are in the traditionally low-paying jobs such as orderlies, nurses' aides, housekeepers and

Economic index sends a warning

By James M. Shevis

A second consecutive monthly decline in the government's index of leading economic indicators is "one more sign that Reaganomics is pushing the economy toward a new recession," the AFL-CIO warned.

The index, designed to show what will happen in the economy in the near future, fell eight-tenths of 1 percent in July after a 1.3-percent decline in June, the Commerce Dept. reported. Six of the 10 indicators contributed to the decline, led by a fall in building permits.

"The big drop in building permits indicates the vulnerability of the housing industry to high interest rates," Research Director Rudy Oswald observed. "And the rise in the number of new unemployment insurance claimants points to the growing number of layoffs.

"A new recession would start from the highest level of unemployment during any postwar 'recovery,'" he pointed out. The national jobless rate spurted to 7.5 percent in July from 7.1 percent in June.

Negative indicators

Also negative for the index were the pace of deliveries, declines in raw materials prices, lower orders for factory equipment, and the month's average of 500 common stock prices.

Four indicators were positive: orders for consumer goods increased, the average factory workweek lengthened, the money supply expanded and more new businesses were formed.

The two monthly declines represent the first back-to-back drops in the sensitive economic barometer since the start of the long Reagan recession in 1981 and provided new evidence that the economy is entering a period of slower growth.

Meanwhile, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported that worker productivity rose 2.7 percent on a year-to-year basis in the nonfarm sector of the economy during the second quarter.

Workers did not share the benefit of Virginia AFL-CIO's President-elect David H. Laws and retiring President Julian F. Carper at the state federation convention.

D. H. Laws to succeed Carper as head of Virginia federation

Norfolk, Va.—The Virginia AFL-CIO elected a new president—David H. Laws—to succeed Julian F. Carper, who will retire Sept. 30 after 31 years as a full-time officer of the state federation.

Laws, 50, has served as secretary-treasurer since 1982. Earlier, he held a number of local and international offices with the Food & Commercial Workers.

The 600 delegates to the state federation's 23rd convention also elected Daniel G. Le Blanc of the Machinists as secretary-treasurer, Russell Axsom of the Steelworkers as vice president, and 34 executive board members—all for two-year terms.

Carper, 62, a member of the Clothing & Textile Workers, held the top state CIO post at the 1956 merger, and has headed the merged federation for the last 18 years. Carper's leadership role in the battle against segregated public accommodations and official Virginia's "massive resistance" to integration of the state's public schools, and the near-doubling of federation affiliations during his years as president were among the long list of his achievements cited by delegates, state and national union leaders and state government officials throughout the three-day convention.

Campaign momentum

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue urged the state federation to sustain the political momentum that provided the margin of victory for three new Democratic congressmen in 1982 and a majority of the Virginia delegation for Walter F. Mondale at this year's Democratic nominating convention, in the now all-out campaign for the AFL-CIO-endorsed Mondale-Ferraro ticket.

National COPE Director John Perkins outlined the labor movement's efforts in voter registration, member-to-member contact and get-out-the-vote programs. He reminded the delegates of the critical decision to be made Nov. 6.

"It's a choice between leaders who represent the values of just-plain people like ourselves—family, work, responsibility and compassion—and leaders whose attitudes are shaped by the values of the affluent, the ambitions of the corporations and the ethics of the marketplace," Perkins declared. He said that in the wake of nearly four years of "grief inflicted on working people and needy people" by the Reagan Administration there is little chance that 1984 will be a repeat of 1980, when "too many of us were hornswoggled by the New Right issues."

The convention unanimously endorsed Democrats Edythe Harrison for the U.S. Senate, incumbent Congressmen Norman Sisisky (4th District), James R. Olin (6th District) and Fred C. Boucher (9th District); and challengers John G. McGlennon (1st District), Lewis M. Costello (7th District), Richard L. Saslaw (8th District) and John P. Flannery (10th District).

In a break from regular convention business, delegates cheered the burning of the mortgage on the state federation's permanent headquarters building in Richmond, purchased in 1969 and financed by loans from a number of affiliated local unions.

Affiliations pressed

New program spurs central body growth

Denver—A series of new rules and recommendations adopted by the AFL-CIO Executive Council are aimed at expanding affiliations with state and local central labor bodies and increasing their effectiveness.

The council, at its summer meeting here, approved a program recommended by the subcommittee on affiliations of the Ad Hoc Committee on State & Local Central Bodies. The panel was appointed by AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland after the convention last October.

The council stressed that increased affiliations by local unions are the key to more successful state and local federation programs. It urged all affiliated unions and constitutional departments to start vigorous programs to persuade their local organizations to affiliate with the central bodies.

The council also directed the Dept. of Organization & Field Services to do state-by-state surveys of the affiliation status of locals of each national and international union. The results will be turned over to the parent unions.

The department will also urge the central bodies to step up their own recruiting and servicing programs.

In addition, the department will conduct an analysis of "programs, practices and performance levels" of the central bodies and put together suggestions for improving, expanding or restructuring the central body system. Per capita levels will also be studied.

The Executive Council also adopted the subcommittee's recommendation for a change in rules governing state and local central bodies.

A new section in Rule 12 now confirms the right of AFL-CIO representatives "to be present or take part in any form of central body activity as directed by the President of the AFL-CIO rather than as invited by the central body."

The subcommittee on affiliations, which was appointed by Kirkland at the council's February meeting, is chaired by AFL-CIO Vice President Wayne E. Glenn. Members include Vice Presidents Kenneth T. Blaylock, John DeConcini and Charles H. Pillard.

Programs under way

Glenn, who is president of the Paperworkers, pointed out that several international unions have already begun active programs urging their locals to affiliate with state and local AFL-CIO central bodies in their areas.

The subcommittee was formed at the recommendation of the Ad Hoc Committee on State & Local Central Bodies, chaired by Vice President Robert F. Goss. Since the convention, the panel has been studying the operations and the concerns of local labor federations.

The ad hoc committee, in its report to the council, stressed that state and local central bodies "serve as the voice of the labor movement at the grassroots," and that their effectiveness would be considerably expanded if all eligible local unions supported them through affiliation.

Both panels also have been studying ways in which state and local federations can strengthen themselves by expanding and improving their own programs.

Members of the ad hoc committee include AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue, Vice Presidents Joyce D. Miller, Gerald McEntee, and Glenn F. Watts, Metal Trades Dept. President Paul Burnsky, Maritime Trades Dept. Sec.-Treas. Jean Ingrao, and Union Label & Service Trades Dept. Sec.-Treas. John E. Mara, as well as the members of the subcommittee.

Auto union targets GM, Ford as bargaining gulf continues

Instead, Bieber said, "they are treating this as a takeaway round," and he stressed that the executive board had given him authority to sit at both bargaining tables and impress on the employers the gravity of the situation.

Along with making up for nearly $4 billion in concessions agreed to in the 1982 contracts, the UAW set job security as the "centerpiece" of this year's bargaining round.

The major concern is that jobs will be lost overseas in the coming years as the industry shifts production to cheap labor countries.

The UAW also wants to preserve jobs through agreements to curtail "outsourcing," the practice of sending work to non-union or overseas firms, and by curbing "excessive overtime" for current workers so more laid-off UAW members can be recalled.

Auto representation

The UAW represents about 350,000 workers at GM and 114,000 at Ford. Another 24,000 GM workers are represented by the Electronic Workers whose contract also expires Sept. 14.

GM and Ford workers have not had a wage increase since agreeing to pay and benefit concessions to help the companies two years ago.

But GM, which posted record profits of $3.73 billion last year, offered workers no more than a lump sum of $900 in wages over the life of a three-year agreement. The proposal also called for COLA changes—including shifting the base year from 1967 to 1971—that could cut wage adjustments by about 17.5 percent, the UAW said.

The company is demanding an intensified "two-tier" wage system that would start new hires at 75 percent of base wages and COLA with increases of 5 percent over a five-year period. A modestly lower wage scale for new hires was agreed to in 1982, but it brings workers to parity quickly.

GM's proposal on job security issues offered no concrete programs, and completely ignored the detailed options the UAW had proposed as talks began, the union said.

Ford, basking in its record profits of $1.87 billion, offered even less, with no wage increase, comparable COLA cuts, and equally vague rhetoric on job security issues.

Both companies agreed to continue forms of profit-sharing agreed to in the last contract.

Electric Boat pact ends UAW strike

Groton, Conn.—The Marine Draftsmen's Association, an Auto Workers' affiliate that represents some 1,100 draftsmen and designers at General Dynamics Corp.'s Electric Boat Division here, ratified a new three-year agreement ending its 14-month strike against the nation's largest defense contractor.

The contract, approved on Aug. 23 by UAW Local 571 members by better than a 2-to-1 margin, provides for the return of nearly 700 strikers to their jobs at the submarine plant.

General Dynamics had been the target of a campaign by the UAW and other unions to focus public attention on the firm's arrogance in bargaining, its dismal health and safety record, and its alleged overcharges on Pentagon defense contracts.

UAW President Owen Bieber and Vice President Marc Stepp, who heads the union's General Dynamics Dept., said that they felt the campaign had a "substantial impact" on the UAW-General Dynamics relationship, and it caused the company "to soften its stance" on bargaining issues. They added that it helped encourage governmental action regarding defense contractor abuses.

Economic package

The agreement provides one-time payments equal to 75 hours of pay in the first year of the pact, 60 hours in the second year, and a 3-percent wage increase the final year. Hourly pay averaged a little over $9 an hour.

The new contract institutes a two-tier wage system under which newly hired workers will be paid less, with the amount of the reduction varying by job classification. New hires also will receive less personal leave and reduced benefits in other areas.

Other provisions are higher sickness and accident and dental coverage, full retirement after the worker's age plus years of service equal 85, and agreement for the removal of scabs the company hired to replace the strikers.

The firm, which had been operating with 300 strikebreakers, said it will immediately hire back 160 strikers and recall up to 500 more within the next year. The remaining 400 or so will retain recall rights through the life of the agreement.

The status of Local 571 remains unclear as the National Labor Relations Board ordered a decertification vote by the union last June. A ruling on the outcome has been held up because of ballot challenges. A decision is expected within a few weeks.

Anderson sees Mondale's bid as 'best hope'

John Anderson, who polled nearly 6 million votes four years ago as an independent candidate for President, has declared himself in Walter Mondale's corner for this election.

Anderson, a former 10-term Republican congressman from Illinois who had been chairman of the House Republican conference, told 10,000 University of Illinois students that Mondale represents the nation's "best hope" in this election.

Anderson will head an Independents for Mondale-Ferraro campaign organization as part of what he termed "a new and powerful coalition" opposed to President Reagan's policies.

In another boost for the Democratic ticket, Jesse Jackson met with Mondale and a group of prominent black leaders and told reporters that his support is "wide-based, deep and intense."

Jackson, who galvanized a record black turnout in the spring primaries, said the policy differences he has with Mondale won't deter him from supporting the Mondale-Ferraro ticket "with great fervor."

These were some of the upbeat signs from a Democratic campaign that will move into high gear on Labor Day, the traditional starting point.

Labor Day parade

Mondale and Ferraro will campaign together on Labor Day, criss-crossing the country from New York to Long Beach, Calif., with a stopoff for a traditional small-city Labor Day celebration in Merrill, Wis.

They will then move off on separate campaign schedules with a midweek joint appearance in Portland, Ore.

For President Reagan, Labor Day will be spent at two campaign rallies in California. He has appearances at assorted conventions and business meetings that his staff has termed "presidential" rather than political events, and not charged to the Republican campaign.

Vice President Bush has booked almost as full a campaign schedule as Ferraro, but the Democratic vice presidential candidate continues to draw big and enthusiastic crowds.

clerks, although the membership includes non-medical professionals such as hospital social workers. The union's members and leadership are mostly black and Hispanic.

District 1199 President Doris Turner, her voice hoarse from the marathon negotions that led to the settlement, said the union members can "go back to work with smiles on their faces." She told cheering union members that "we've taught the bosses that you don't mess with District 1199."

RWDSU President Alvin E. Heaps, who had helped rally national labor support for the strike, said "the solidarity of the District 1199 members was an inspiration to the entire trade union movement. They have every right to be proud."

An AFL-CIO Executive Council resolution had called on affiliates to support the New York hospital strikers, and the city's central labor council, especially unions representing municipal workers, had helped rally support.

The strike exceeded by one day the 46-day walkout by 3,500 low-paid employees of seven hospitals that in 1959 transformed a local union of pharmacists into the nucleus for a fast-growing health care union. A recent realignment resulted in the large New York area membership choosing to stay as a district of the RWDSU, while units in other parts of the country are to become a separately chartered National Union of Hospital & Health Care Workers on Oct. 1.

Both New York Gov. Mario Cuomo and Basil A. Paterson, who served as a special federal mediator, contributed to achieving a settlement. From the hospital management viewpoint, a key issue was whether revenues from Medicare and Medicaid patients would be sufficient to cover higher payroll costs.

Both the union and Cuomo contended that the increased reimbursements already budgeted were sufficient to cover any settlement. Cuomo said the state will make adjustments if the economic trends used to project future costs proved faulty.

Also bringing pressure for settlements were two opposite factors—a warning by the hospitals that strikers would be permanently replaced if an accord was not reached and the approaching eligibility for unemployment benefits of the strikers. New York is one of only two states that provide unemployment benefits in long-lasting labor disputes.

One "money-saver" that helped the settlement was no problem to negotiate. The first-year pay raise was made effective on ratification by the union, thus avoiding retroactive pay increases to workers who went through the picket lines. This met a large part of the management insistence for cost reductions.

Pressure on management

Adding pressure on management were warnings from hospital health inspectors that many of the institutions were falling below acceptable levels of patient care and cleanliness.

During the long strike, the diversity of District 1199's membership helped ease the hardships for strikers and their families. Social worker members used their professional skills to help fellow members with special problems. Other professionals outside the unit also donated services, including friendly doctors who provided clinic service after management had forced a cutoff in worker health insurance.

Lawyers provided free legal assistance, the credit union helped with emergency loans, and a unit was set up to assist in resolving landlord-tenant problems.

The strike affected a large portion of the city's non-profit health care facilities, but did not involve municipal hospitals or proprietary profit-making hospitals.

There was one hospital covered by the 1199 agreement where workers — with their union's approval—did not participate in the strike. That was at the Flower-Fifth Ave. Hospital, which specializes in care for disabled children.

Phelps Dodge corporate ties targeted

Denver—The Steelworkers, the largest member of a 13-union coalition striking for a new contract with Phelps Dodge Corp., has launched a corporate campaign to persuade the giant copper producer to come to terms.

Unveiled during the summer meeting of the AFL-CIO Executive Council here by USWA President Lynn Williams, the campaign will target institutional creditors of Phelps Dodge who are also stockholders in the company.

"Many of them hold union strike funds, union pension funds, health and welfare funds," Williams told reporters at a news briefing. "Consequently, union money may be subsidizing the debt of this anti-union company without our knowledge or consent."

Williams pointed out that, by the company's own admission, "Phelps Dodge's financial situation has the company hanging by a thread." He cited Phelps Dodge's just released Form 10-Q report to the Securities & Exchange Commission as documentation of its precarious condition.

"With the help of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. and other unions who have client relationships with Phelps Dodge creditors, the Steelworkers will organize a task force to meet with the firms to discuss their fiduciary responsibilities to us as depositors and investors and as union members," Williams said.

"We intend to question them about the creditworthiness of Phelps Dodge, while we of the labor movement question our continued relationships with these institutions," he said.

The Steelworkers and 12 other unions have been on strike at Phelps Dodge copper properties in Texas and Arizona since July 1, 1983. The company has since widened the gap at the bargaining table by toughening its position. It also is seeking to decertify the unions.

"Despite the criticism of the company by many political leaders and public-spirited citizens at the firm's strong-arm tactics against the strikers," Williams said, "Phelps Dodge has remained indifferent.

To break unions

"The company is clearly not concerned about its public image. Phelps Dodge has only one concern—to break the unions at any cost.

"The Wall Street creditors are the company's only hope of survival. Consequently, we have decided to take our case to Wall Street."

Williams said the USWA has learned from Phelps Dodge's own files that the company has lost $7 million so far this year compared to a $1.6 million profit for the same period in 1983 when there was no strike.

He said that in scrambling for cash, the company restructured its debt to avoid default on $109 million of obligations due in 1985. It did this by issuing 2.2 million shares of convertible exchangeable preference stock to its creditors, he said, using the proceeds to pay creditors.

Williams also noted that preliminary approval has been granted the company for a $200-million industrial development bond issue for pollution control in Arizona where two of its smelting operations are situated. The bond is sponsored by Greenlee County.

"So what we have here is a real possibility that Phelps Dodge, a well-known violator of environmental laws, may get a public subsidy to clean up their voluntary act of polluting the public's water and air," he said.

"What we have uncovered in our research and investigation into the company's financial structure leads to the conclusion that Phelps Dodge has failed to act in a prudent manner towards its stockholders, investors, workers, their community, and the public at large," Williams said.

Economic indicators send a warning

the increase, however. Their real, or inflation-adjusted, compensation fell three-tenths of 1 percent over the same period.

At the same time, unit profits from non-financial corporations—factories, wholesale and retail businesses, services, transportation and utilities—soared 32.3 percent from the year-earlier level after climbing 54.8 percent in the first quarter.

"Big business continues to pile up record profits at the expense of workers and consumers," Oswald charged. Auto makers, for example, are asking higher prices while seeking to deny workers any increase in wages and benefits in their current round of contract talks.

In still another Commerce report, the government said that sales of new houses in July matched June's annual rate of 630,000 units, but far below the February level of more than 700,000. Sales declines in the Northeast and Midwest were exactly balanced by improvements in the South and West.

The report on new house sales followed by one day a National Association of Realtors report that resales of existing houses dropped 6.1 percent in July.

Fixed rate mortgages topped 15 percent in July, well above the 14 percent level that usually chokes off sales. Adjustable rate agreements have averaged 12.9 percent to 13.2 percent, depending on the type.

Reunion in Denver for labor, Mondale

Denver—AFL-CIO General Board members, meeting in advance of the Executive Council's summer session here, hailed the nomination of Walter F. Mondale and welcomed him as the Democratic presidential candidate.

In a resolution, the board pledged an all-out effort to present the facts to trade unionists and their families on why they should support the Mondale-Ferraro ticket and to see that they are registered and go to the polls on Election Day, Nov. 6.

Some two dozen members of the General Board, which was expanded to include state and local central body leaders as well as Executive Council members and top officers of affiliated unions and departments, spoke in support of the resolution, stressing the urgency of organized labor's efforts in this year's election.

On his part, Mondale promised a fighting campaign that will send him "across the finish line as a winner."

Postal union delegates all for Mondale

Las Vegas, Nev.—Delegates to the Postal Workers convention voted a unanimous endorsement of the Walter Mondale-Geraldine Ferraro Democratic presidential ticket and served notice that the union wouldn't be intimidated by management threats of Hatch Act retaliation.

Convention delegates were aroused at a Hatch Act warning given to the editor of an APWU local paper in Texas, Larry Brazell. The local had reprinted an AFL-CIO flyer, "Roll Back Reaganism," and Brazell was told by the Merit Systems Protection Board that any further printing of partisan political material would be considered a "willful" violation "and may lead to your removal from the Postal Service."

APWU President Moe Biller suggested to reporters that the attempted crackdown was the result of a "very unhappy" Postmaster Gen. William Bolger, who was thwarted in an attempt to "provoke a strike" instead of bargaining in good faith on a new agreement to cover some 600,000 Postal Service employees.

Intimidation pattern

Biller said the Hatch Act flap fits a pattern of intimidation by the Reagan Administration in Labor Dept. orders to re-run last fall's election of APWU officers. The Labor Dept. action came just before the July 20 contract deadline.

There was no complaint filed by Biller's opponent for president in that election, but the Labor Dept. included Biller in its order to re-run the elections. In all, 41 union elections will be re-run because testimonial dinners in Biller's home local in New York and other cities allegedly violated Landrum-Griffin restrictions.

APWU publications, which are being screened for Hatch Act violations, already carry a "reviewed in advance" approval by the Labor Dept. due to the election re-run.

In other actions:

- A resolution vowed to use a recent court victory against React Postal Service as a model in winning restrictions on postal work going to private contractors.
- The convention approved a per capita tax increase for the national office tied to future postal pay increases. Delegates had previously voted down a flat $1 increase.
- Delegates collected $1,700 for Las Vegas members of the Hotel Employees & Restaurant Employees who remain on strike at four hotel-casinos and $10,000 for the APWU political action.
- Postal workers were praised by Rep. William Ford (D-Mich.) for having the courage to endorse Mondale-Ferraro and continuing to speak out in the face of Reagan Administration attempts to intimidate them.

Letter Carriers convention adopts flexible merger plan

Las Vegas, Nev.—Trade union unity and encouragement for a merger of the nation's postal unions was a recurrent theme of the Letter Carriers convention here.

Delegates considered various merger resolutions and in the end voted to leave Letter Carriers President Vincent Sombrotto with maximum flexibility in exploring mergers.

The convention urged all NALC branches to affiliate with AFL-CIO state and local central bodies and heard Vincent Sirabella of the Hotel Employees & Restaurant Employees, Dennis Kist of the Theatrical Stage Employees and Gary Eads of the U.S. Air Traffic Controllers on the necessity of solidarity with other unions.

Aid to strikers

Sirabella thanked the NALC for contributing to the victory for Las Vegas hotel-casino workers by making clear to the MGM Grand Hotel that NALC would cancel its convention if the strike were not settled. NALC delegates later picketed the four hotel-casinos still on strike and contributed $4,000 to those workers' relief fund.

Delegates voiced loud and unanimous support for the Mondale-Ferraro ticket after being told the resolution of support was redundant because of the AFL-CIO endorsement. Rep. Ferraro was virtually drowned out by cheers when she spoke to delegates via satellite hookup on the convention's big screen TV.

The convention called off its 1982 boycott of the Combined Federal Campaign, the United Way for federal and postal employees, after assurances the National Right to Work Legal Defense Fund couldn't get CFC contributions unless donors earmarked their funds for it.

A proposal to change the union's current structure of conventions every two years and four-year terms for officers was rejected. Delegates also voted down a resolution limiting the union's ERA endorsement to no involvement with abortion under strong arguments that there was no link between the two.

Delegates voted to contribute $4,000 and work for U.S. asylum for Bernabe Hernandex-Soriano, a Salvadoran postal union president who was tortured and exiled by his government. Convention resolutions also opposed U.S. military aid to El Salvador, Honduras and Guatemala and urged no U.S. support for Nicaraguan rebel forces.

The convention gave the NALC its first minimum monthly dues structure, tied to two hours' pay of a starting letter carrier —currently $20.68—one-third going to the national union and two-thirds to the local. Sombrotto told the convention the revenue would be used to build an audio-visual center and expand the staff of the legislative, education and research departments.

U.S. trade deficit hits all-time high as imports surge numbers do not tell the entire story of how seriously the U.S. industrial base is being threatened by imports. The overvalued American dollar, up about 65 percent against other currencies from four years ago, actually means the imports are entering the country in even greater physical volume that the dollar figures indicate.

The Commerce Dept. reported that oil imports were up a modest 6 percent in July, almost entirely because of a similar increase in oil prices.

Also hard hit was the import-battered iron and steel industry. Imports of steel mill products into the United States skyrocketed in July to 2.7 million tons, about 33 percent of the total market, according to the American Iron & Steel Institute, which noted both figures set records.

The Commerce Dept. report showed that country by country, the U.S. trade imbalance was worst against Japan where the deficit reached $4.7 billion in July.

The trade disadvantage for the United States was $2.04 billion against Western European countries, $1.3 billion with Taiwan, $770 million with Mexico and $1.5 billion with the OPEC countries.

CWA asks talks to head off massive job cuts by AT&T

The Communications Workers called for national negotiations with the American Telephone & Telegraph Co., and the seven regional Bell System companies to discuss the proposed elimination of 11,000 jobs from AT&T Technologies' operations.

In telegrams to AT&T Chairman Charles Brown and heads of the Bell companies, CWA President Glenn Watts expressed shock at the number of job cutbacks—about 75 percent of them union jobs—and charged management with making workers pay for the Jan. 1 divestiture and reorganization of the Bell operating companies.

"We have yet to be shown that AT&T has done all it can to cut waste and reduce costs in other ways before sacrificing thousands of the good, productive people we represent and who have built this company," Watts said.

The projected cutback "is just the latest wave in a series of cuts and layoffs that have already eliminated some 32,000 jobs in less than a year," he observed.

"By its own admission, AT&T is management top-heavy to the point that it is difficult to make good decisions with all the different layers of managers," Watts said. "And this decision on laying off so many production workers seems to bear that out, and even make the problem worse," he stressed.

In calling for negotiations involving AT&T and all the Bell companies, Watts said "It is clear that there hasn't been enough coordination between AT&T and the divested companies in finding ways to preserve jobs and reduce the hardships on workers who have been shuffled here and there, and sometimes out the door, because of the breakup."

CWA represents about 90,000 out of a total of 225,000 AT&T Technologies employees, while the Electrical Workers and several unaffiliated unions represent some 60,000. The vast majority of the remaining employees are managerial.

Competition cited

Management insisted that the cutbacks are necessary to lower costs and allow AT&T to compete better against large computer companies. AT&T Technologies, among other things, makes and sells computers and communications equipment, and includes Bell Laboratories, the research and development center.

Watts pointed out that most of the workers whose jobs are being eliminated originally worked for the local Bell telephone companies.

"They helped to build the vast Bell System, and then they were sent to work for a company that didn't even exist until a few months ago," he observed. "The Bell operating companies are a part of this picture as well as AT&T. They share with AT&T the responsibility for what happens to these people."

Kirkland on Labor Day

Reagan record reflects 'icy disdain'

By Lane Kirkland

This is the 90th observance of Labor Day since Congress set aside the first Monday in September to honor the men and women who do the nation's work, create its wealth, pay its bills and form the backbone of its society.

For three years in a row, the meaning of Labor Day has been dishonored by a President who professes warm regard for working people on that one day and exhibits icy disdain for them on the other 364.

On that record, since this is a leap year, workers could expect a full 365 days of Presidential disregard. But since this is also an election year, we can expect Mr. Reagan's deep concern for the welfare of workers to last another 64 days—until the polls close on Nov. 6.

What happens after that, if he wins another four years in the White House, the last four years make all too clear.

Mr. Reagan is doing his artful best to persuade voters that the fantasies he weaves on television are the reality and that their own experience is the illusion.

Examine the record

So nothing is more important than that workers remember what really happened to them under the Reagan Administration and that they examine the record backward and forward.

He got to the White House by promising to cut taxes and inflation, balance the budget, eliminate the deficit and multiply jobs.

He did cut taxes and inflation. He did it in ways that wounded the middle class, increased the number of poor, redistributed the nation's wealth toward the rich, and unbalanced not only the budget but the whole economy. What he multipled several times over was the deficit. What he eliminated was millions of jobs.

All that, despite the rosy promises, was what the American labor movement foresaw and warned against.

When this Administration came to power, claiming a mandate for the crackpot economic theories of the radical right, we were virtually alone in warning that Ronald Reagan's policies would bring great injury to millions of working Americans and their families.

We denied that phony "mandate" and fought those destructive policies every inch of the way, and we were right.

We said Ronald Reagan would deal with inflation by throwing people out of work. He promised he would not. He gave us the most massive unemployment since the Great Depression.

At the public till

We said Ronald Reagan's tax policies would benefit the rich. He said they would not. He gave his fancy friends a $750-billion tax-cut handout from the public till, at the expense of the average American and the nation's future.

We said Ronald Reagan's tax giveaways, combined with huge and mindless increases in defense spending, were the most reckless and irresponsible fiscal act in our history. He promised they would lead to a balanced budget by 1984. He gave us the largest and the most costly and dangerous federal deficit in history. He has mortgaged our children's future to pay for the exemption of the rich from their proper share of the cost of defending and maintaining a free and open society. The Reagan formula for keeping the radical, blue-nosed right in power is a simple one: Borrow and borrow, spend and spend, elect and elect.

Under that formula, half the taxes we pay do not contribute to the defense or the betterment of our country, but to pay the interest on the huge sums borrowed by Mr. Reagan's Treasury. And because of that borrowing, we pay another enormous tax to private bankers in the form of the highest real interest rates in American history. Those are the most cruel, most regressive and most unproductive taxes of all.

We said Ronald Reagan's "free trade" policies would export American jobs and erode the nation's industrial base. He promised that the invisible hand of the international free market would set things right. He gave us a trade deficit that is now running at $120 billion for this year alone—that is a measure of the jobs, hopes and opportunities that are being drained from this country in a growing flood, year by year.

We said Ronald Reagan's policies would hurt the weakest and the poorest of our people. He promised not to shred the safety net under the "truly needy." He gave us the first increase in the poverty level since the beginning of Lyndon Johnson's "war on poverty."

Surely, he loves the "truly needy"—he has made so many more of them.

We said Ronald Reagan represented the far right of the Republican Party and would seek to undermine and weaken the trade union movement. With an air of injured innocence, he said: "Who, me—a former president of the Screen Actors Guild?" He gave us a National Labor Relations Board stacked with pedigreed union-busters; a Labor Dept. dedicated to the dismantling of Davis-Bacon, OSHA and other worker protections; and a cruel, vindictive campaign to destroy a small union of air traffic controllers and blackball its members. He delivered to the advantage of Neanderthal employers a standing army of the desperate unemployed, some driven even to scab on their brothers and sisters, if need be, just to feed their families.

Reason to be proud

Trade unionists everywhere can be proud of the way we have held our ground and carried on the fight against all onslaughts of the radical right.

We were admonished to lie low and bend with the breeze. We were told that it didn't matter whether we were right or wrong, that common sense and a decent regard for the less powerful could not prevail against the Great Communicator's Hollywood skills and mastery of the media.

We did not heed that advice. We did not try to curry favor or seek a separate peace with Reaganism for the sake of any narrow special interest.

The trade union movement stood against Ronald Reagan and for common sense the first time around, and we are prepared for Act Two.

But this time, we have something else going for us. We have candidates for the presidency and vice presidency whom we had a voice in selecting.

Fritz Mondale was the overwhelming choice of our members for the Democratic nomination, and they turned out in primaries and caucuses from coast to coast to help him win at the Democratic Convention. Our members know him, and he knows them.

And we have known Geraldine Ferraro for many years. She, too, understands the problems and needs of working people, and she knows how to fight for their concerns.

We have a ticket we can be proud of—a ticket that can win in November.

Campaign effort

On Labor Day 1984, we stand at the beginning of a crucial election campaign, and of a new chapter in the long history of our movement. What we do, or what we fail to do, from now until Nov. 6 will largely determine where America is going for the remainder of this century.

Between now and then, our movement has no higher priority than to make sure that our members understand the urgency of the choice before them and turn out to vote in unprecedented numbers.

The size of the challenge is matched by the scale of the opportunity, and we have in our hand one of those very rare opportunities to make a very big difference in the shape of things to come for future generations. I believe that our movement is equal to that challenge.

From coast to coast, our movement is united as never before, and the spirit of solidarity is strong in our ranks.

That is the real source of our strength—and of our confidence that, whatever the odds, we shall prevail.

Donahue on Labor Day

Workplace cooperation still a two-way street

By Thomas R. Donahue

On Labor Day 1984, workers are getting two conflicting messages from their employers and their government.

One is that the world has changed for the better, that the economy is in such wonderful shape that workers should not bother with organizing or joining unions.

The other is that the world has changed for the worse, that the economy is in the grip of unforeseeable change, and that the future depends on the willingness of workers—without their unions—to cooperate with employers and the President is staving off disaster.

Limits of cooperation

But the cooperation of workers is sought in very limited areas. They are asked to cooperate with employers in holding down labor costs and with President Reagan by helping him to win four more years to continue the wonderful things he has been doing since 1981.

Trade unionists have nothing against cooperation, but they take a broader view of what it means.

We would like to see the fullest possible degree of labor-management cooperation in this country, but it must be based on mutual acceptance of the other side's right to exist, acceptance of the bona fides of the other side.

While it must include an acceptance of corporations' needs to be productive and to generate capital for investment, production, payroll and profit, it must also include an acceptance of workers' needs to be undisturbed and unintimidated in their rights to form unions, or to be participants in forms of industrial democracy which would guarantee their dignity and the decency of their living and working conditions.

Until those things are an accepted part of the labor-management scene, it seems to me silly to speak about labor-management cooperation other than as an abstract principle.

Workers are not afraid of change. The trade union movement they have created is an instrument of change, designed to foster change and to manage it, prepared at all times to change itself in whatever ways its members' interests require.

It is not prepared to passively allow others to manipulate change in ways in which the benefits of change accrue solely to employers and investors, as President Reagan has done with the nation's tax structure and foreign trade policy, and as employers are seeking to do with technological innovation.

Certainly, the world has changed. The labor movement helped change it. The essential challenges we face, and the strategies and tactics by which we meet them, have changed enormously.

Labor's unchanged task

But the role of the labor movement has not changed or diminished. It is the same in 1984 as it was in 1948 or 1894. Union members are what they always were: working men and women who have banded together to improve their lot and their country—to improve the human condition in America.

We insist that economic activity should be directed to ends that benefit not only workers, managers and stockholders, but the whole human family, including the young, the old, the sick, the unemployed, the poor and the disadvantaged.

We seek to bring about a fairer sharing of the nation's wealth and a broader participation in its social, educational and cultural resources in order to give every citizen a chance to develop his or her maximum human potential.

To bring about such a world requires the fullest cooperation of labor and management and government, as well—since government alone has the authority and resources to establish specific goals and coordinate the national social and economic policies to get the job done.

Federal role

Mr. Reagan and Mr. Bush repudiate the notion that government has a constructive role to play in helping to shape the economic policies that will decide the future of American society. That is why the labor movement is working so hard to help elect Walter Mondale and Geraldine Ferraro, who share our view of what government is for.

America needs a national industrial policy that does not abandon the field to exploitation by foreign countries and multinational corporations.

If we continue to allow individual corporations to dictate economic developments, and to allow other nations to outmaneuver us on trade, and continue to label anyone in the United States who raises these issues a "protectionist," then all we're doing is arranging the funerals of the steel industry, the auto industry, the garment, textile and electronic industries—and insuring massive, continuing unemployment in the United States.

The choice we face comes down to this: We can establish an industrial policy and a sensible trade policy of our own, or we can have it dictated to us by the already established industrial and trade policies of the other industrialized nations.

There is no question that the labor movement is the one force that can ease the transition from a manufacturing to an information- or service-dominated economy. If we succeed in increasing the level of organization in the service sectors—hospitals, hotels, restaurants, laundries, garages, maintenance and all the rest—they will no longer be the minimum-wage jobs with zero benefits that most of them are today. Where our unions have succeeded in organizing within those industries, the workers they represent have made real progress. But we know that without a union presence, those jobs will never rise above rock-bottom. And as long as we have a government dedicated to minimizing the effectiveness and reducing the influence of trade unionism in the American economy, progress will remain dead slow.

Shorter workweek

The surest contribution that we can make to job creation is to address the question of reducing the standard 40-hour workweek. It is more than 50 years since that standard has moved, more than 30 years since the poorest jobs in the lowest-paid service industries went to 40 hours.

No movement has been politically possible in the bleak years of high unemployment brought about by the Reagan Recession. When the economic climate improves, the time will have come to launch an all-out effort to reduce the standing army of unemployed people that recovery has not so far touched.

These are some of the issues on which the labor movement stands ready and eager to cooperate with fair employers, a responsible administration and a people-oriented Congress. We hope, after the November election, to meet them.

Labor Day 'Friends'

WITH ANOTHER Labor Day upon us, it is amusing to look across the horizon to see the warm-weather friends of the workers coming out of the shadow.

The politicians join the holiday picnics, elbow their way into the parades and dispense glowing statements of support for the working people of America.

Although union members, who initiated Labor Day in 1882, are immune to most of this hypocrisy, a new element has been added in 1984.

Madison Avenue has discovered workers with a vengeance this year. General Motors is running ads in magazines featuring some of its workers. One is even allowed to wear his Auto Workers hat.

The fact that GM has just asked its workers to forgo wage increases in its current negotiations with the UAW is not mentioned. And, of course, there is no reference to the immense profits GM has piled up or the fat bonuses paid executives earlier this year.

This year's top prize for hypocrisy, however, goes to the Adolph Coors Co., which is spending millions on a television commercial that extends greetings from its employees to the working people of America.

The happy "workers," naturally, are professional models, but clearly Coors's ad agency has been looking at the anti-union, anti-worker history of the Golden, Colo., company. The agency knows that the long boycott against Coors products initiated by the AFL-CIO and supported by many other civil rights organizations, has been highly successful.

COORS, you will remember, is the outfit which required its workers to take lie detector tests, undergo searches and suffer other indignities and invasions of their privacy. The company broke a Brewery Workers' local there after the union members, by an overwhelming majority, voted to strike over those issues of civil rights.

Since 1976, Coors has seen its competitive position decline. The company is brewing less beer today than it did eight years ago. The company's per share profits in 1984 are about half of what they were last year.

Coors has tried to counteract the boycott effects, which struck hardest in California, once its most lucrative market, by expanding elsewhere. But the unity of the trade union movement behind the boycott has met the company wherever it tried to market its products.

The new advertising gambit will not help Coors. No matter how they dress up their message, the sponsor is still the same anti-union, anti-worker management.

One on One

THE PRESIDENTIAL election can be won or lost in the next month or so, and not by anything the candidates do or say.

The election, and all that it means to this country, could hinge on the success of the various efforts to register new voters.

Labor's effort is a "one-on-one" campaign which recognizes that a personal approach or one worker to another is immensely more effective than the most eloquent leaflet, editorial or speech.

Ronald Reagan is credited with a "landslide" victory in the 1980 presidential election—quite properly in view of his near-sweep of electoral votes.

His "mandate," however, came from less than 28 percent of the potential electorate.

Reagan polled 50.7 percent of the vote cast, but less than 54 percent of Americans of voting age bothered to cast a ballot.

Public opinion polls quite understandably focus on probable voters. A change of even a few percentage points in the Election Day turnout could translate into a strong swing. In any event, it is bound to translate into a more meaningful "mandate" for the victor.

Uncounted millions

Traditional BLS report skips phantom jobless

By David A. Page

David A. Page is chairman of Regional Research Inc., a nonprofit organization that is concerned with regional economic development. His article appeared on the Op-ed page of the New York Times, Aug. 24, 1984.

Unemployment figures, like all statistics, can be misleading. In the unemployment rate, accuracy depends not just on who you count, but who you don't count.

The Reagan Administration reports the national unemployment rate for July as 7.5 percent, with 8.5 million people unemployed. But the Joint Economic Committee of the Congress reports that 2.5 million people have disappeared from the labor force, and the real jobless rate is 9.7 percent.

In studying employment patterns in a three-state region comprising western Pennsylvania, eastern Ohio and West Virginia over the past three years, we have discovered the same pattern: unemployment figures that look good only when we ignore the phantom unemployed—those who have dropped out of the labor force.

In the first year of our survey, from December 1981 to December 1982, 259,000 people became unemployed, and the unemployment rate went from 11 percent to 16 percent. From December 1982 to December 1983, the unemployment rate dropped from 16 percent to 12.8 percent. However, the number of employed people actually dropped by 8,000 while the labor force of about five million decreased by 194,000 people.

Dwindling workforce

Thus, the 3.2 percent improvement in the unemployment rate was due to people disappearing from the labor force and not to an improvement in employment. When the 194,000 phantom unemployed were added to those being reported as unemployed, the rate returned to 16 percent.

Our analysis for May 1984 shows an additional 95,000 people employed this year. And the reported unemployment rate has declined to 11.2 percent. The number of phantom unemployed has also dropped, to 137,000. Again, when these phantom unemployed workers are added to those people reported as unemployed, the unemployment rate rises to 14 percent.

What has happened to the phantom unemployed? A fraction of them have been retired early and involuntarily, and 2 percent of our population has left the region in the past two years, according to the Census Bureau.

Almost all of the phantom unemployed are still in the region. Having lost their jobs and exhausted their unemployment compensation, they are no longer counted by the Labor Dept., which refers to them as "discouraged workers."

The costs to all

Unemployment exacts heavy costs, socially and economically. The tragedy of a strong working family being torn apart by joblessness needs no elaboration. Beyond that, federal and state governments pay $20 billion a year for every one million unemployed workers (in unpaid taxes and benefits), according to the Office of Management & Budget. At that rate, the 823,000 unemployed workers in our region between December 1982 and December 1983 cost federal and state governments $16.4 billion.

On the national level, 11 million unemployed workers (this includes both the reported and the phantom unemployed) cost our federal and state treasuries as much as $220 billion annually. This figure surpasses our current federal budget deficits of nearly $200 billion.

It is not my purpose here to suggest remedies to the unemployment problem. But the fact that unemployed people in our region alone cost about $16 billion last year, and that unemployment in the nation cost about $200 billion, suggests that the government should explore regional and national policies of reindustrialization aimed at providing work for the permanently unemployed. Doing nothing is the most expensive alternative.

Latin workers bear brunt of austerity policies

Cuernavaca, Mexico — Austerity programs imposed on Latin American countries as a price for gaining loans from the International Monetary Fund and private banks are causing great hardships for workers and the poor and are stretching the limits of political tolerance, Deputy Director Henry Schechter of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Economic Research warned.

"They also seem to neglect alternative types of conditions which could lead to a slowdown of inflation and encourage balanced growth by spreading the burden of austerity to other portions of the society," Schechter said.

His warning was sounded in a paper presented to a conference of 100 labor officials from the United States, Canada, Europe, and Latin American countries. Sponsors of the conference to explore new approaches to the economic crisis in Latin America and the Caribbean were the Inter-American Regional Organization of Workers (ORIT) and the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions.

Loan procedures

Schechter's paper described the procedures followed when a member nation requests an IMF loan. Studies are made of the country's economy and the IMF insists that the country adhere to an "economic adjustment program," generally referred to as IMF "conditionality," designed to assure repayment of the loan by achieving a positive balance of exports over imports and by new borrowing.

Among the conditions, typically, are devaluation of the national currency, a reduction in budget deficits that generally involves reducing social programs, and tighter monetary and credit policies. In addition, the adjustment program often calls for a reduction in workers' real wages.

The resulting social pressures have produced turmoil in a number of countries, Schechter pointed out.

For example, in Brazil the very stringent wage adjustment measure required by the 1983 IMF-approved program in the face of continuing high inflation "led to rioting and burning of crops by sugar cane workers in Guariba in May," Schechter noted.

"At the Fiat plant in Betim, 12,000 workers staged a strike for higher pay which was declared illegal. Government teachers and health workers also have been involved in disputes."

Schechter noted that Argentina has been negotiating with the IMF for months, but has reached no agreement because the democratic government there has refused to adopt measures to lower real wages.

Workers in loan-recipient countries have had little or nothing to say about the terms and growth of the soaring Latin American debt, Schechter said. The large private banks in big industrialized countries, such as the United States, can pretty well set the terms.

"They (the banks) are not interested in people, only the money," Schechter said.

"Yet, through increased unemployment and reduced real wages, workers have borne the brunt of adjustment program austerity."

The IMF adjustment programs have reduced living standards for workers in the debtor countries without exacting equitable sharing of sacrifice from other social groups, Schechter observed.

He urged conference delegates to carry back the message that the labor movements of the various countries can influence their governments, and agendas like the IMF, to pursue less harsh and more effective remedial policies.

"It must be recognized," Schechter stressed, "that IMF adjustment programs which include cutbacks in real wages and rigid restrictions upon imports are not the only possible approach to an attempted restoration of stable economic growth and the ability to meet debt repayment obligations.

"In fact, the success rate of that approach in Latin America is still to be established, and it may turn out to be counter-productive in a number of cases," he said.

His paper detailed the AFL-CIO analysis of the origins and magnitudes of the debt problem. It suggested an alternative approach that would include grace periods on principal repayments, longer loan repayment periods, and limitations on interest rates and commissions or fees for debt restructuring and refinancing.

"With such more liberal restructured debt arrangements, economic adjustment program modifications could be adopted that would reduce the risk of pushing countries beyond the bounds of political tolerance," Schechter said.

Inducing stable growth

"Modifications could be designed to inject more equity and economic balance into adjustment programs and thus increase the likelihood of inducing more stable economic growth. To help maintain domestic economic demand and avoid a contraction in the economy and in employment, programs should avoid cutbacks in already low consumption patterns."

To the extent that debt restructuring and economic recovery permit, Schechter continued, real wages should be restored to levels that prevailed before the austerity programs, and workers should be free to bargain for wage increases as productivity improvements boost the national real income.

Also, the loan-recipient countries should be encouraged by the IMF to improve their tax codes to make them more equitable and effective, he said.

Besides Schechter, the AFL-CIO delegation at the conference included Exec. Dir. William C. Doherty, Jr., of the American Institute of Free Labor Development, AIFLD Assistant Exec. Dir. Jesse Friedman, and AIFLD Regional Director Michael Verdu.

Among the major speakers were ORIT Sec.-Gen. Luis Anderson, ICFTU Gen.-Sec. John Vanderveken, and President Miguel De La Madrid Hurtado of Mexico.

Federation protests Nicaraguan takeover

The AFL-CIO strongly protested the Nicaraguan government's seizure of the trade union headquarters in Managua, and called for the immediate release of a jailed union member.

In a cable to Interior Minister Tomas Borge, Federation President Lane Kirkland charged that occupation of offices of the Confederacion de Unificacion Sindical (CUS) and intervention in its internal affairs are in direct violation of the International Labor Organization's Convention 87 guaranteeing freedom of association.

ILO Director-Gen. Francis Blanchard has also protested the government's action. The takeover occurred last week after CUS delegates to the ICFTU-ORIT conference in Mexico returned to Managua, and found their offices taken over by an oppositionist group within the CUS. They took back control, but government troops moved in and closed the headquarters.

ITU's new officers installed as Labor Dept. certifies vote

Colorado Springs, Colo.—The 10-month battle for leadership of the Typographical Union ended with the Aug. 27 installation of officers after the Labor Dept. dismissed challenges to the June elections by ousted incumbents.

The ITU's new officers—President Robert S. McMichen and Vice Presidents Billy Joe Austin and William J. Boarman—will serve with re-elected incumbents Sec.-Treas. Thomas Kopeck and Vice President Allan J. Heritage until Dec. 31, 1986.

McMichen welcomed the Labor Dept.'s certification of the election, stressing that "it is especially satisfying in that it signals the end of a long and difficult year for all of us in the ITU."

Noting that the union's convention begins Sept. 8, in Atlantic City, N.J. McMichen said, "We will do everything in our power to make that convention a process of healing and reconciliation. It's time to put our differences behind us and get on with the real business at hand, the business of making sure that printers, mailers, and other workers in our industry get the best possible representation," he said.

McMichen defeated incumbent ITU president Joseph Bingel and a key to his 2-1 election victory was his support for merging the ITU with an AFL-CIO affiliate. Bingel wanted to merge the union with the unaffiliated Teamsters.

Initial election

In the ITU election held last November, McMichen bested Bingel by nearly 5,000 votes, but the union's canvassing board prevented him from taking office, citing voting irregularities. It promised to schedule a re-run election after March 1984.

Meanwhile, Bingel and the other ITU incumbents signed a merger document with the Teamsters and scheduled a referendum on that action. Six ITU California members sued in federal court in San Francisco to block the referendum.

Federal District Court Judge Thelton Hendersen issued an injunction, staying the referendum until the elections were held. In late July, he extended the injunction through Sept. 17, a move which effectively prevented the union from holding a rescheduled merger referendum which the Bingel-led board had planned.

The Labor Dept. intervened at the request of McMichen and scheduled a mail re-run ballot covering all five ITU executive council seats.

The losing incumbents challenged the Labor Dept.-supervised elections, charging that the AFL-CIO illegally aided their opponents. The Labor Dept. found the charges invalid and certified the election.

At the swearing-in ceremony, McMichen said he would delay announcing the new "programs and plans I have for the ITU," so that the executive council could center its efforts on the "immediate business" of the union.

California court bars 'con-con' vote

California's Supreme Court has upheld the AFL-CIO's challenge to a ballot proposition designed to compel the legislature to call for a national constitutional convention to act on a balanced budget amendment.

If the 6-1 decision is allowed to take effect immediately, the controversial Proposition 35 will be dropped from the November election ballot—and the threat of a constitutional convention will be eased.

The U.S. Supreme Court isn't in session, but the proposition's sponsors have asked Justice William H. Rehnquist to issue a stay that would prevent the California court ruling from being implemented at this time. It would then be up to the full court next fall to decide whether to review the California court's decision.

Joining the AFL-CIO in challenging the proposition was a coalition of national and state organizations that consider a mandatory balanced budget unworkable and the untried device of a constitutional convention hazardous to American government.

The coalition included religious groups with ties to all the major faiths, state and national civil liberty groups, the State, County & Municipal Employees and the Service Employees, Hispanic and black organizations, women's groups, farmer and senior citizen organizations.

Their target was an attempt to use California's initiative law in a way that the AFL-CIO contended violated both the federal and state constitutions as well as state law.

Since 1975, legislatures of 32 of the required 34 states have passed resolutions petitioning for a constitutional convention. California wasn't among them, and the self-styled taxpayers groups sought to use the state's initiative procedures to force the legislature to do so.

Right-wing efforts

The right-wing group spent—by its own estimate—hundreds of thousands of dollars getting signatures from more than 5 percent of the voters to qualify for a spot on the ballot.

It was the nature of the proposition, not the signatures that led to the court challenge.

If the proposition were approved, members of the legislature wouldn't get paid unless the legislature voted for the balanced budget constitutional convention.

The state's highest court ruled, however, that the proposition was not suitable for the initiative procedure, and amounted to an attempt to coerce the legislature, not enact legislation.

The opinion, by Justice Allen Broussard, said the federal constitution allows for the convening of a constitutional convention only by call of two-thirds of the state legislatures, not through a state initiative procedure.

"It envisions legislators free to vote their best judgment, responsible to their constituents through the electoral process, not puppet legislators coerced or compelled by loss of salary or otherwise to vote in favor of a proposal they may believe unwise," he wrote.

At a news conference in Washington, National Taxpayers Union Chairman James Davidson announced the effort to get the proposition restored to the ballot until the U.S. Supreme Court has considered the issue.

Davidson charged that the California court was "politically motivated" and suggested that its members were angling for appointments to the U.S. Supreme Court in a "Mondale Administration."

Unity spirit marks Labor Day

Walter Mondale and Geraldine Ferraro in New York's annual Labor Day parade. AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue was grand marshal.

Mondale, Ferraro join New York City parade

By Susan Dunlop

Amid a sea of waving flags and banners and cheering unionists, Democratic Presidential candidate Walter Mondale and his running mate, Geraldine Ferraro, joined in the New York City annual Labor Day celebration.

Renewal of the spirit of solidarity among trade unionists marked the holiday observance in the nation's largest city—and in communities large and small across America.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue was this year's grand marshal for the colorful, traditional parade in New York which drew some 500,000 participants throughout the eight-hour course of the march. Donahue formerly was on the staff of Service Employees Local 32B in New York.

Joining him in stepping the parade off to an early morning start with Mondale and Ferraro was AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and Harry Van Arsdale, president of the New York City Central Labor Council. New York Gov. Mario Cuomo and Sen. Daniel Patrick Moynihan, both Democrats, also joined the leading ranks.

They were followed by thousands of cheering union members along the miles-long parade route representing nearly every trade and profession in the metropolitan area and by contingents from organizations that work closely with labor on key issues.

Banners and signs waved by marchers proclaiming their pride in their unions were liberally mixed with banners protesting a wide variety of Reagan Administration policies viewed by the workers as unfair.

Hometown favorite

Union members sent up special cheers for Ferraro, a congresswoman who represents a district in nearby Queens, one of the five boroughs that make up New York City.

The march got off to an early start so that Mondale and Ferraro could make a full coast-to-coast schedule of Labor Day events. From New York, they joined some 9,500 enthusiastic unionists and other supporters at a rally in the small, farm and manufacturing community of Merrill, Wis. The candidates wound up the day at a rally in Long Beach, Calif.

Mondale, in his speech in Wisconsin, called the 1984 campaign a tough test for the future of the nation and stressed that Americans are "not an unfair people, we're an honest, above-board people. . . . We're not a selfish people, we're a caring people."

He warned the crowds that under a second Reagan Administration the burden of tax increases and budget cuts "will fall heaviest on Americans of average means."

Whoever is elected, Mondale said, must squeeze the budget and restore revenues, "but the question is will it be done fairly. . . . Who will pay?"

"I refuse to make your family pay more so that millionaires can pay less," Mondale told the cheering crowd.

New York's Labor Day celebration was one of many organized by unionists across the country.

Kirkland traveled from New York to a Labor Day rally in Detroit attended by some 150,000 unionists and their families, topping even last year's turnout. Joan

Postal talks to resume, House panels set probe

By James M. Shevis

The Postal Workers and the Letter Carriers agreed to resume contract talks with the U.S. Postal Service, but will continue to press for a full congressional investigation into the hiring of a union-busting consultant linked to the head of the USPS board of governors.

The resumption of talks will bring the parties together for the first time since bargaining broke off on July 20, when the unions' old three-year contracts with USPS expired.

Union negotiators ran into a roadblock when management refused to back off its demands to freeze wages of current workers and slash the pay of new hires. Congress later voted to prohibit USPS from implementing the two-tier wage system.

House hearings

Meanwhile, two subcommittees of the House Post Office & Civil Service Committee scheduled joint hearings Sept. 25 and 26 into USPS operations and union charges of conflict of interest among top postal officials.

The decision to return to the bargaining table ended the work of an independent factfinding panel set up under the 1970 Postal Reorganization Act.

Under the law, once parties are unable to reach agreement, a three-member panel is appointed and given 45 days to study the facts in a dispute. After that, the parties have 45 days to consider the panel's recommendations. If no agreement is reached, the dispute may be submitted to binding arbitration.

The decision by the parties to forgo factfinding in an attempt to "narrow and focus the issues" does not change the Oct. 19 date by which arbitration would begin if a settlement is not reached.

Both APWU President Moe Biller and NALC President Vincent R. Sombrotto said they were skeptical that Postmaster Gen. William F. Bolger would relent in his demands for a three-year wage freeze and a 23-percent cutback in the salary scale for newly hired employees.

Sombrotto said he saw "no hope" of a full-scale settlement when talks resumed, and predicted the deadlock ultimately would have to be resolved through binding arbitration.

Auto locals back General Motors, Ford strike calls

Detroit—Auto Workers at Ford Motor Co. and General Motors Corp. formally authorized strikes if satisfactory agreements are not reached by the Sept. 14 expiration of current contracts.

Meanwhile, UAW negotiators met with GM and Ford representatives for informal bargaining sessions. Subcommittees studied individual contract issues, attempting to narrow the differences between the parties.

In separate referendums, workers at GM voted by a 90 percent margin to authorize a strike, while Ford employees authorized a walkout by a 94 percent margin. Votes were conducted at 147 GM locals and 54 Ford locals.

Earlier, the UAW executive board

Key measures tied up

Congress faces legislative logjam

Congress returned from its Labor Day recess for only a brief period before the current session is expected to adjourn Oct. 4 to permit members to get back home for the election. In the remaining legislative logjam, bills most likely to pass are a raft of spending measures that will provide money to keep the government in business at least until January.

Organized labor's concerns for the remainder of the session are not only that several labor-sought measures are acted on, but also that damaging, anti-labor amendments are kept from sure-to-pass spending bills.

Thirteen appropriations bills were up for action, and so far the House has acted on 10 while the Senate has dealt with seven. The remaining measures, including controversial appropriations on defense and foreign operations, may be handled through a continuing resolution, the legislative maneuver Congress sometimes uses to provide money for existing government programs when disputes over specific appropriations stall agreement.

Among the measures organized labor is pressing in the Senate is the "Grove City" civil rights bill that has already cleared the House, 375-32.

Repairing court damage

The bill would amend four civil rights statutes affected by the recent Supreme Court ruling involving Grove City College, Ill. The high court diluted the civil rights protections in education for women, minorities and handicapped and older Americans with its decision that the law denying federal funds to schools and colleges that discriminate against women and minorities applies only to funds for the specific program involved in the discrimination, not to the entire school. The proposed law would make clear that Congress intends the prohibiiton to apply to an institution as a whole.

Although the measure has 63 cosponsors in the Senate, Labor & Human Resources Committee, Chairman Orrin Hatch (R-Utah) has fought attempts to move it to the Senate floor, and opposition senators such as Jesse Helms and John East, both North Carolina Republicans with anti-civil rights records, have waved threats of a filibuster.

Since neither house of Congress is interested in a post-election, lame-duck session, if the bill does not move now, it will be dead for this session.

Also on hold is the controversial immi-

Pressure from Coors charged in firing of regional OSHA chief

By Arlee C. Green

Denver—The political clout of the anti-union Adolph Coors Co. and the actions of a former head of the Occupational Safety & Health Administration were linked at a hearing here to the 1982 firing of Curtis A. Foster, former Denver-based regional OSHA administrator.

Foster charged he was forced to resign because Coors officials pressured Reagan-appointee Thorne B. Auchter, former OSHA administrator, to oust him.

At the four-day hearing before Administrative Law Judge Edward Reidy of the Merit Systems Protection Board, Coors Chairman William Coors denied pressuring for Foster's removal and called the allegation that this company was involved "a bum rap."

Foster's allegation, however, was backed by evidence of four meetings between OSHA and Coors officials.

Company policy

Foster noted in his testimony that the Coors firm had a history of fighting OSHA inspections, and William Coors admitted that it was company policy not to permit OSHA to do general schedule inspections without a search warrant.

Foster charged that John Miles, head of OSHA Field Coordination & Experimental Programs, had told him not to inspect Coors facilities in Golden, Colo. Miles denied having ordered the brewery firm removed from the list, but said he agreed to skipping Coors plants after Foster complained that a federal judge whom they expected to handle the search warrant request had previously denied issuance of such warrants.

A mix-up later resulted in OSHA inspectors visiting a Coors plant, and when Foster explained to his supervisors how it happened, he was berated by Auchter, Foster said.

Key meetings

Foster's attorney, Martin Buckley, produced several letters showing that Auchter and his assistant, Mark D. Cowan, visited with Coors executives prior to Foster's resignation.

Testimony revealed that Cowan met with Mark Wright, Coors health service director, and that Cowan later requested Wright to send the agency a letter detailing Coors's complaints about OSHA. Wright's letter urged OSHA to take action against Foster for "insulting and downright rude behavior" which allegedly occurred during a 1979 informal meeting at which Foster refused to drop an OSHA citation against the firm.

Another document showed that Auchter met privately with a Coors executive on the same day he gave his deposition in the Foster case to MSPB. Auchter also met with Coors officials just prior to Foster's demotion.

Buckley contended it was at these meetings that Coors officials pressured Auchter to remove Foster.

Harry Borchell, OSHA assistant regional administrator, testified that "there was never anything in writing, but we all knew the national office was very interested in what we were doing at Coors. We knew it would not be wise to go out there without letting the national office know."

In an interview with the Associated Press, Auchter called Foster's allegations "an absolute bunch of garbage." Auchter, who headed OSHA from March 1981 to March 1984, left government to become president of B. B. Andersen Companies in Topeka, Kan., a move that stirred controversy because of his involvement in killing two OSHA citations and $12,600 in fines against that firm. The FBI and the Justice Dept. initiated investigations into Auchter's change of jobs.

At the hearing, Auchter acknowledged meeting with Coors officials, saying, "We discussed the direction of OSHA as a meaningful organization. My sales pitch was 'you don't have to deny us entry anymore.' "

Hirings cited

He denied that the Coors connection was a factor in Foster's dismissal. Instead, he charged that it was Foster's improper hiring of four construction specialists in 1979 that led to his firing.

In late 1981, the Office of Personnel Management and the Labor Dept. both held that Foster and Vernon Strahm, OSHA regional administrator in Kansas City had acted improperly in hiring in Denver four union members who had been unsuccessful in getting OSHA jobs in Kansas City, where they lived. The four were transferred to Kansas City after their 90-day training period. In early 1982, Foster's personnel rating was downgraded by Auchter, who cited the OPM's report.

However, the question of the improper hiring was resurrected by Auchter shortly after the inspection mix-up.

Foster has maintained that his Washington supervisors were kept informed about the hirings and that no one told him they considered it improper at the time. He added that no guarantees had been given to the four men that they would be transferred to Kansas City.

ALJ Reidy blocked Foster's lawyer from introducing evidence that prominent Republicans had exercised a pattern of influence over OSHA operations and prevented him from detailing the labor backgrounds of the four men hired. Foster contended in part that it was because he hired workers with union backgrounds that he was fired.

Reidy gave both sides until Oct. 15 to file their final briefs. He is expected to issue a ruling within 60 days after that and from there, either side can appeal to the three-member MSPB.

Auchter out

Thorne G. Auchter, former administrator of the Occupational Safety & Health Administration, has quit as president of the B. B. Andersen Cos. after three months in the job.

Auchter's move to the Topeka, Kan., construction firm after resigning in March from OSHA was clouded by his role in dismissing $12,600 in fines against the firm for job safety violations.

The FBI is investigating whether Auchter violated conflict-of-interest laws by taking the Kansas post. Both Andersen and Auchter had denied any impropriety was involved.

Indiana delegates set wide-ranging legislative agenda

Indianapolis—Measures to protect workers from the harsh effects of sudden plant closings and to increase workers' compensation benefits rank high on the Indiana AFL-CIO's legislative agenda.

Delegates to the state federation's 14th convention set legislative goals for the next two years, elected officers, endorsed candidates in the fall elections, and heard addresses by a number of state and national figures.

Among key resolutions adopted by the 400 delegates to the three-day meeting was a measure urging the Indiana legislature to enact improvements in benefits for workers injured on the job.

The maximum workers' compensation benefit in Indiana is currently $156 a week, among the lowest in the nation.

On plant closings, the convention urged legislation to require advance notification to workers of planned industrial shutdowns, substantial compensation for workers and hurt by shutdowns.

The resolution noted that industrial shutdowns were the most important factor in job losses in Indiana and the Midwest. The state has lost more than 600,000 manufacturing jobs since 1977.

Need for change

In a major address to the delegates, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue stressed the need for a change in the national administration to get people back to work. He urged delegates to do their utmost to help elect the Mondale-Ferraro ticket in November.

Donahue also emphasized support of state candidates who are friends of labor as well as those seeking national office. And he urged an all-out drive to see that union members are registered and vote.

A convention resolution calling for increased political action declared that "what is at stake are the policies, programs, and laws needed to rebuild the state and national economy and social welfare."

State AFL-CIO President Ernest C. Jones and Sec.-Treas. Max F. Wright both were re-elected to new four-year terms, as were 23 vice presidents.

Warm welcome

Enthusiastic greeting for Democratic vice presidential nominee Geraldine Ferraro is led by Sheet Metal Workers President Edward J. Carlough and Sec.-Treas. Cecil Clay, right, at the union's business agents conference in Seattle. The SMU executive board endorsed the Mondale-Ferraro ticket.

Plasterers, Cement Masons elect M.H. Roots to full term

Las Vegas, Nev.—The 45th convention of the Plasterers & Cement Masons voted to retain the union's current leadership by electing the entire slate of international officers by acclamation.

President Melvin H. Roots headed the list. This was his first election to the presidency at a convention. He assumed the top office by vote of the union's executive board, succeeding Joseph T. Power who died in April 1981.

During the convention the union also held an apprenticeship contest. Roots called the mixture of union business and apprentice training "an innovative step" designed to stress the role of young members in the future of the union and to expose apprentices to union democracy.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland told the guests at an apprenticeship awards banquet that organized labor needs to involve young workers or run the risk of missing out on new ideas. Kirkland urged the apprentices to get involved and stay involved, for the good of themselves and their families as well as the rest of America's working men and women.

The first-prize apprenticeship honors went to Glen K. Forman, a plasterer from Local 188 in Fresno, Calif., and Mark Gonzales, a cement mason from Local 337 in Monterey, Calif.

In an address to the delegates, Rep. William L. Clay (D-Mo.) pointed out that organized labor has been in "a state of war" with the government ever since Ronald Reagan was elected President.

Clay cited the consistent anti-labor stance of the federal bureaucracy under the Reagan Administration as well as the cutbacks in social services for America's working poor. He stressed that there is a real opportunity to defeat Reagan in this year's election despite his current standing in the public opinion polls.

Other convention business included updating the union's constitution to reflect current conditions. The union was founded in 1864, and its current constitution dates back more than a century.

Pipe organ strike settlement bars major givebacks

Hagerstown, Md.—Members of Furniture Workers Local 21108 ratified a new contract with the M. P. Moller Pipe Organ Works here, ending a 12-week strike with an agreement that preserves key seniority and insurance provisions the company had sought to water down.

The UFWA members voted 55 to 41 to approve the settlement and began returning to their jobs Aug. 23, ending the walkout that began June 4 after workers rejected a concession-riddled company proposal by a vote of 102-1.

Moller, one of the world's largest pipe organ makers, had demanded damaging changes in seniority rights, including a clause that would have cut recall rights from three years to one. Management also demanded a $200 deductible for medical coverage and had sought to charge workers part of the premium for health coverage for themselves and their families.

Both are crucial issues to workers in the plant where average age is 57 and seniority is 40 or more years.

After the strike began, the local's members turned down three similar company proposals by wide margins.

Recall rights

In the final settlement, three-year recall rights were preserved intact, and the union agreed to a company proposal to include job qualifications along with seniority in recall decisions.

The company agreed to continue paying full insurance premiums, and the parties settled on a $100 deductible for medical insurance coverage, up from no deductible.

The pact also calls for across-the-board wage increases of 19 cents an hour immediately and an additional 19 cents on Aug. 22, 1985, for shop workers and 12 cents an hour in both years for incentive workers. The agreement ends Aug. 22, 1986.

The annual cost-of-living adjustment, linked to the government's consumer price index, will be continued.

During the strike, the 120 UFWA members were bolstered by a rally and march that drew other UFWA members from locals throughout the East.

Michigan study finds

Half of nation's jobless lack health insurance

Ann Arbor, Mich.—Half the nation's unemployed may have no health insurance protection and face risks of deteriorating health as a result, a study by University of Michigan researchers has found.

In a survey of more than 1,330 jobless workers in Detroit, a team of researchers at the university's School of Public Health found that 51 percent had no insurance benefits.

The researchers estimated that for the labor force as a whole the results could mean that at least one third and as many as half of all unemployed Americans have no health insurance protection.

The survey found that 73 percent of those who now have no coverage had health insurance while they were working but lost it when they lost their jobs. The longer the duration of unemployment, the less likely people are to keep their coverage, the study showed.

Chief researcher S. E. Berki stressed that the study shows "that the lack of health insurance is a pervasive, serious and previously underestimated problem among the unemployed."

Faulty Reagan figures

Berki asserted that a study commissioned last year by the Reagan Administration "understated the problem by at least half" in its estimate of how many jobless Americans lack health coverage.

The Detroit telephone survey, conducted in late 1983, was funded by the Robert Wood Johnson Foundation of Princeton, N.J. Working on the survey with Berki were Leon Wyszewianski and Richard Lichtenstein.

National figures for lost health insurance benefits are likely to be even higher than the findings for Detroit, Wyszewianski pointed out. Even though that city is suffering a high rate of long-term joblessness, it is highly unionized and workers—including those laid-off—are more likely to have health insurance benefits, he pointed out.

The researchers also found that workers who have lost both their jobs and their health benefits consider themselves in poorer health than the general population, and with justification.

As workers continue to be unemployed and uninsured, they defer preventive health care, stop treating chronic problems such as hypertension and begin to suffer from the ill effects on health of joblessness, the researchers found.

The study showed that most of the uninsured are men in their prime working years who are the principal wage earners for their families. Of all of those who lost coverage, only a third were able to regain coverage through a spouse's benefits. For every jobless worker with no health coverage at all, the study found that there was at least one other dependent in the same family—mostly children—also without insurance.

Three-quarters of those surveyed who had no insurance were also not covered by Medicaid, the federal health program for the needy.

The study also found that:

- The longer a person is out of work, the more likely he or she will lose coverage. Of those unemployed for three months or less, 31 percent had no health insurance; 49 percent of those laid off four to 12 months had no coverage; and 56 percent of those jobless two or more years were not covered.
- Of the unemployed who still had some insurance, 11 percent expected to lose it by a specific date, and 42 percent had lost their employment-related benefits, but obtained other insurance. Only 9 percent still had job-related health benefits. The remaining 38 percent had coverage unrelated to their employment.

Because 85 percent of all Americans covered by private health insurance get it as a benefit of employment, "the loss of that insurance in times of long-term high unemployment—such as we have just experienced—is an important issue, especially in view of the negative effect joblessness can have on a person's health," Berki stressed.

New York Gov. Mario Cuomo welcomed to the State AFL-CIO convention.

New York federation focuses on elections, legislative goals

Kiamesha Lake, N.Y. — Election-year politics and legislative priorities were the focus of attention for the 1,350 delegates to the 23rd biennial convention of the New York AFL-CIO.

While state and national figures spoke of the crucial fall elections which will determine where America is going for the remainder of this century, delegates took stands on issues close to home as well.

With plant closings costing thousands of jobs in the state, the convention called for legislation mandating prior notification and protection of workers' rights where a shutdown is contemplated.

Another resolution provided for the creation of a pension investment policy group within the state federation to assist affiliates in putting their investments primarily in New York state, and keeping them out of so-called "right-to-work" states where workers are unfairly treated.

Delegates also stressed the need for improvements in the state workers' compensation law. The measure calls for a higher benefit rate and expanded coverage to lift the state into the top 10 provider states. It now ranks in the bottom 10.

In all, 160 resolutions were approved. They ranged from adoption of the Equal Rights Amendment to opposition to a constitutional amendment requiring a balanced federal budget, stricter enforcement of the Occupational Safety & Health Act, and steps to curb rising health care costs.

In a series of workshops, emphasis was on stepped-up voter registration efforts, political education, public relations, organizing, community service, and labor education.

Gov. Mario Cuomo, in an opening address to the three-day session, spoke of the "family of labor," expressing thanks and appreciation for labor support in electing him governor.

Sen. Daniel P. Moynihan (D-N.Y.) assailed the Reagan Administration for its "non-interest" in America's workers and warned delegates not to be fooled by it, but to understand the implications of what another Reagan term would mean.

Dividing America

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland charged that President Reagan has divided America, setting men against women, young against old, the jobless against the employed, the poor against the near-poor, and blacks against whites against browns.

"If he did this in his first term, imagine what he might do in a second, unrestrained by another election," he warned.

Delegates also approved a number of constitutional changes, including an increase in per capita tax from 12 to 15 cents effective next Jan. 1 to meet pressing operating costs and to provide for expanded programs to meet affiliates' needs.

The convention voted to increase the executive council from 29 to 37 members to give greater representation to members, particularly women and minorities.

State AFL-CIO President Edward J. Cleary was elected to his first full two-year term. Cleary had been named last January by the executive council to fill the vacancy left by the resignation of Ray Corbett.

Sec.-Treas. E. Howard Molisani, who chose not to run for re-election, was succeeded by Paul Cole, a member of the Teachers. Molisani was elected a vice president. All other incumbent vice presidents but one were re-elected. In Region 9, Tom Natchuras was chosen to succeed Ed Gray, who retired.

Delegates endorsed 34 congressional candidates, including 24 incumbents. All but two are Democrats.

AFGE delegates vote project funds

Cleveland—Programs to step up union organizing, bargaining, legislative, communications and political action were drafted by delegates to the 29th convention of the Government Employees who bolstered the AFGE agenda with a per capita tax increase.

Monthly payments, currently $5.50, will rise to $6 next Jan. 1 and an additional 50 cents the following year.

AFGE's programs for the next two years were hammered out in a series of policy-making "workshops" attended by delegates where over 180 resolutions were considered and prepared for presentation to the full convention for votes.

The system was a departure from AFGE's past practice where each resolution was taken up on the convention floor by all 1,500 delegates.

The resolutions covered a variety of constitutional changes, and issues such as union internal policy, wages and benefits, labor relations contracting-out, communications and national and international affairs.

AFGE President Kenneth T. Blaylock said that what emerged from the workshop system of handling resolutions "was a much broader set of programs than just those in the interests of AFGE."

Blaylock was re-elected to a fifth two-year term. Also re-elected were Executive Vice President John N. Sturdivant, Sec.-Treas. Nicholas J. Nolan, and Women's Dept. Director Barbara B. Hutchinson. Blaylock and Hutchinson are AFL-CIO vice presidents.

In an address to the convention, Democratic Vice Presidential candidate Geraldine Ferraro told the cheering delegates that one of the nation's major issues today "is not 'big government,' the issue for America is what kind of government we shall have, serving who for what purpose." The real concern, she said "is good government, efficient productive and compassionate in the hands of men and women who believe public service is a high calling."

And in his speech to the delegates, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland assailed the Administration for ignoring the erosion of American jobs and attempts to destroy workers' protections and threaten their unions.

The union's first A. Philip Randolph-Hubert H. Humphrey Award for community service was presented to Sadie Holt of Local 987 at Warner Robins Air Force Base in Georgia.

Awards were also presented to nine local union editors whose publications were winners in the AFGE's newsletter contest.

Other convention speakers included Rep. Mary Rose Oakar (D-Ohio) whose district includes Cleveland, Ohio Gov. Richard Celeste and Cleveland AFL-CIO President Martin Hughes.

Oakar, who has sponsored legislation calling for comparable worth studies covering federal jobs, told the delegates that pay equity is truly a "family issue" because it involves the well-being of "our mothers, our sisters and our daughters."

AFGE President Kenneth Blaylock spells out union's agenda.

Service Employees gain 2,000 in affiliation vote

Salinas, Calif.—The Monterey County Employees Association voted by a 6-to-4 margin to affiliate with the Service Employees.

The affiliation agreement, which brings 2,000 workers into the union, covers nurses, doctors, custodians, clerks and hospital and office workers employed by the county.

In the past year and a half, the SEIU has increased its membership by about 165,000 through affiliation votes, including the California State Employees Association, which brought 79,000 members into the SEIU earlier this year.

Flight of the eagle

The Republican National Committee has deported the American Eagle to Portugal—a move that further threatens to put the American pottery worker on the endangered species list.

It all has to do with the RNC's American Eagle Commemorative Plate being offered as a fund-raiser to a "select group of Americans who have demonstrated their support for President Reagan and the rest of America's Republican leaders."

The main problem is that the American Eagle plate is not made in America. It's being imported from Portugal.

Members of Glass, Pottery & Plastics Workers Local 236A who work for the Lenox China plant in Pomona, N.J., were highly disturbed by the RNC's flight of the eagle. Local President Florence Smith fired off a letter of protest to RNC chairman Frank Fahrenkopf, pointing out that imports are wiping out American jobs.

In his response, Fahrenkopf explained that the project had been put out on bids, but noted that after all, the importer was "a New York-based company."

Specialty steel quotas pressed to replace failed import relief

The Steelworkers and specialty steel industry officials want the Reagan Administration to set import quotas on flat-rolled stainless steel products, charging that the higher tariffs imposed a year ago are "no remedy at all," as imports of those products have surged 68 percent ahead of the 1983 pace.

The union-management coalition urged that President Reagan set quotas on imported stainless steel sheet and strip at the levels which the International Trade Commission recommended in May 1983. At that time, the ITC found the specialty steel industry had been hurt by imports in five product categories and recommended Reagan set quotas to provide relief.

Injury increased

At a Washington press conference, Richard P. Simmons, chairman of the U.S. Specialty Steel Industry and president of Allegheny Ludlum Steel Corp., charged that despite the imposition of higher tariffs on imported stainless steel sheet and strip, the injury to the industry is higher today than a year ago.

Meanwhile, President Reagan must determined by Sept. 24 whether to provide import relief to the nation's basic steel producers, makers of carbon steel which accounts for nearly all the steel production. The specialty steel industry is a small segment of the overall steel industry and produces only 2 percent of the total U.S. tonnage.

Simmons stressed that Reagan's decision could be influenced by the negative results the specialty steel segment has had with the imposition of higher import tariffs. He said his trade group supports the efforts of carbon steel producers to gain import relief. In June, the ITC ruled the carbon steel industry was being injured by imports and recommended that Reagan implement a package of tariffs and quotas.

Simmons pointed out that Reagan's decision on relief for the carbon steel industry could have a backlash on specialty steel products which "will in effect be left 'naked,'" as foreign producers divert production to areas covered by tariffs, such as stainless steel sheet and strip, or by no program at all.

In related developments, the Commerce Dept. issued a "final determination" that a Spanish firm, Acerinox, had average dumping margins of 39.6 percent, considerably higher than the 2.1 percent finding announced in June. The margin represents the difference between the higher price at which a foreign producer sells a product in his home market than on U.S. market. Government investigators found that the Spanish producers had submitted falsified and misleading information.

That case now goes before the ITC which will determine whether the specialty steel industry has been injured. The industry group and the USWA have filed and won eight anti-dumping and countervailing duty cases in the past two years.

Behind the celebrations

Labor Day messages focus on union rights

Labor Day not only honors the men and women who built America and the trade unions they formed to advance the rights of all working people, it also celebrates the fundamental human right of the freedom of association, the AFL-CIO's top officers stressed in their Labor Day radio broadcasts.

Ninety years ago, when Congress designated the Labor Day holiday, trade unions had been celebrating the day for a dozen years as an unofficial holiday and 28 states had enacted Labor Day laws.

"Behind the celebrations, the parades and picnics that have traditionally marked Labor Day is the expression of a universal impulse which Americans regard as a fundamental right," AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland said in his message broadcast over NBC Radio.

"We celebrate on this day the right of freedom of association which is based on the First Amendment to the United States Constitution."

Kirkland pointed out for the radio audience that Americans often think of the First Amendment as guaranteeing free speech, a free press and free religious expression. He noted that the "Founding Fathers, in their deep understanding of the fundamentals of democracy, also included . . . the freedom to assemble from which flows the freedom to form private associations."

Citizens' rights

Simply defined, Kirkland said, "this is the right of ordinary citizens who share common interests to create and control their own institutions, independent of government, as instruments for advancing and protecting their interests." Without that right, he stressed, "plain people are naked before the arbitrary power of the state, the employer, or other potentially hostile forces."

Kirkland noted that freedom of association is the keystone of all other human rights. Without the freedom of association, "freedom of speech is reduced to the right to cry alone in the wilderness; freedom of worship is restricted to private meditation, and freedom of assembly is, literally, pointless." Thus, effective political opposition is impossible, he added.

While freedom of association, is "obviously the bedrock principle of trade unions, it also shields and sustains the entire panoply of human rights that constitute a democratic society," Kirkland said, noting that in Poland, South Africa, Latin America and Asia, workers, resisted by dictators of both the radical right and left, continue their struggle to secure this right to freely associate in trade unions of their own choosing.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue emphasized in his message broadcast by CBS Radio that since the 19th Century, when the first Labor Day celebrations were held, organized labor has remained committed to what Samuel Gompers termed "the grand struggle to make mankind free, true and noble."

Humanizing force

"Now in the 20th Century, the trade union movement . . . remains one of the great civilizing, humanizing, democratizing forces of American life," he observed.

As the labor movement over that span has sought to improve the conditions of life of its members by enhancing job-related conditions and insuring dignity in the workplace, it has at the same time "sought to improve the conditions of life of all workers."

Donahue stressed labor's belief that "the worker at all levels is entitled to a fair day's pay for a fair day's work" and is "entitled to share in the profits that he or she helps to create." Labor's function is to "seek a larger share" for the worker than "market forces" might dictate.

Labor also believes those profits can only be created in a "well-managed enterprise, where both capital and labor contribute to the result and where both participate in the decision-making process," Donahue told the radio audience.

Labor has been the single, most effective voice in support of "the poor, the unemployed, the sick, and the disadvantaged—and so it remains today," Donahue stressed. Through collective bargaining, political activism and legislative action, "we seek a fairer distribution of the nation's wealth. . . ." He pointed out that "confrontation and conflict" are wasteful of the labor movement's energies and resources, and "we deeply desire a cooperative approach to our shared present and future problems."

Donahue added, "we welcome and advocate new methods, new departures to raise living standards and to raise and confirm freedom to new heights. And we remain true to the principles and goals laid down by our founders more than a century ago."

Over the Mutual Broadcasting network, AFL-CIO Vice President John H. Lyons reminded Americans of labor's century of progress in advancing the welfare of all citizens and declared, "Our goal is to create the healthiest, best educated, most productive and most creative society that it is possible for human beings to achieve."

Uncertain future

Lyons, who is president of the Iron Workers, reviewed the trade union movement's struggles, noting that "America's unions fought for free education, and all of America benefited. America's unions fought for safer workplaces, child labor laws, and unemployment compensation, social security and equal rights, and all of America benefited."

For more than a century, American workers have seen the standard of living improve for all and each generation, until now, has been sure that life would be a little better for its children, he said. "For the first time in modern history, hard-working American men and women are not sure that their jobs and their future are secure," Lyons said.

He noted the harm done to the nation over the past four years, the deep scars of unemployment and pointed to this year's elections as a time for choices on the policies that will revitalize basic manufacturing, rebuild the nation's infrastructure, result in a fair system of foreign trade, create a better environment, improve the country's schools and develop industries.

High joblessness still plagues cities

Massive unemployment is still plaguing many of the nation's cities, and their leaders fear it will last far into the future, according to a survey by the National League of Cities.

City officials most often cited the lack of "enough jobs" as the major cause of unemployment in their communities. Other key problems included workers' lack of both basic and specialized skills, layoffs caused by the recession and layoffs due to plant closings.

A wide majority of the officials said local programs could reduce unemployment, but they would need substantial state or federal aid to be effective.

The NLC study was conducted in June and July among 388 large and small cities nationwide, including more than 80 percent of all cities with populations above 200,000.

In a summary of the results, the league stressed that because the nation's aggregate unemployment figures "average out" the picture of joblessness, they mask what may be severe local problems.

Although the national jobless rate was around 7.5 percent while the survey was being taken, the NLC found that 22 percent of the cities reported jobless rates of more than 10 percent, and 45 percent said unemployment was over 8 percent in their localities. Only 11 percent of the cities reported rates below 4 percent.

Unemployment was rated as the "top" or "high" problem on their list of priorities by 62 percent of the cities, and a like number said joblessness will remain a top or high priority problem not only a year from now but also "over the longer term."

The NLC said unemployment is a high priority problem for officials from cities of all sizes and all regions. Among the largest cities, 84 percent expect joblessness to continue to be a severe or serious problem, and more than 50 percent of officials from all regions saw the same dim prospects.

Widespread problem

Minneapolis Mayor Donald Fraser, who heads the league's task force on urban employment, said the survey results show that "substantial and severe unemployment problems are widespread, not limited to just a few communities and not likely to fade away soon."

Fraser said the findings point to the need for a "strong and continuing effort at direct job creation, job training and economic development" in the nation's cities. Local officials believe that effort must include active participation by all levels of government, as well as business, civic, educational and labor groups, he stressed.

The mayor also noted that while three out of four cities in the survey said they need programs for temporary job creation, only one in five has such programs in place.

The cities in the survey identified high school dropouts, dislocated workers, youth in school and welfare recipients most frequently as the population groups with the worst unemployment problems.

The NLC reported that 75 percent of the cities say they have policies and programs now operating to help these groups, but two-thirds of these said their efforts are inadequate to solve the problem. To cut unemployment substantially for these people, two out of three of the cities said additional state or federal aid would be needed to cover half or more of the added cost.

City officials were lukewarm in their assessment of the Job Training Partnership Act enacted in 1982 to replace the Comprehensive Employment & Training Act. Most respondents said JTPA could make "moderate" contributions to solving the unemployment problem in their cities. They split nearly equally when asked whether the transition from CETA to JTPA was worthwhile.

But 75 percent said the lack of a public service employment component in JTPA will "diminish" the importance of the program in their cities.

Three out of four city officials said there is a need for a program that would directly create temporary jobs—other than summer jobs for youth—and most said a combination of public sector and private sector jobs would work best in their cities.

A record Labor Day crowd of 150,000 trade unionists and their families in Detroit's Cadillac Square hears AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland assail the Reagan Administration for attacking social and economic programs that have benefited America's workers. Rallies and parades marked the holiday in scores of cities across the country.

Labor Day celebrations renew solidarity spirit

Mondale, wife of the Democratic candidate, joined in the downtown rally.

In his speech, Kirkland leveled sharp criticism of the Reagan Administration's policies. He stressed that the labor movement has stood its ground against the Administration's assaults on crucial labor, social and economic gains for working people.

At the rally, one of several planned through out the state, AFL-CIO Vice President Owen Bieber, who is president of the Auto Workers, joined Service Employees Sec.-Treas. Richard Cordtz and State AFL-CIO President Sam Fishman in criticizing the back-sliding, anti-labor policies of the Reagan Administration.

Traditional mass

Trade unionists in metropolitan Washington, D.C., kept up their 32-year-old tradition of participating in a Labor Day mass, the oldest of its kind in the nation.

AFL-CIO Vice President John J. Sweeney, speaking at the mass, took exception to President Reagan's recent statements on religion and politics. He pointed out that the President's "wrapping himself in the pages of the Bible" and the "religious judgments" levied on politicians by certain "self-anointed" groups both are "totally inconsistent with the American tradition." Sweeney is president of the Service Employees.

Around the country, hundreds of Labor Day celebrations were organized around events that gave workers time to spend with their families, one of the goals in labor's fight for its own holiday in the 1880s.

The Maine AFL-CIO planned a family outing in Portland that was highlighted by a parade, picnic and hotly contested softball tournament. Boston labor held its traditional Labor Day breakfast, and the Massachusetts State AFL-CIO planned the New Jersey labor organizations held a combined rally, picnic and family day at the beach in Asbury Park, and the Cincinnati Labor Council arranged with the city's popular amusement park for reduced admission and concession rates all day for union members and their families.

In Toledo, Ohio, local labor groups put together a parade and picnic for union members that included a voter registration booth.

In Hampton Roads, Va., the area's Building & Construction Trades Council welcomed Rev. Jesse Jackson to its picnic during his voter registration drive in nearby Norfolk.

Racine, Wis., unionists attended a two-day Labor Fest that included a rally, parade and entertainment and "all-you-can-eat" dinners. The event was dedicated to members of UAW Local 244 who are fighting the closing of a Massey Ferguson Co. plant in Racine.

Live music from a variety of top local bands sparked the Kenosha, Wis., Labor Fest, and in Galesburg, Ill., the city's Trades & Labor Assembly sponsored its 92nd annual Labor Day parade.

A weekend-long festival marked Labor Day in Hershey, Pa., under the sponsorship of the Pennsylvania AFL-CIO. Unionists and their families enjoyed an exposition of union products and services, a parade, a Solidarity Day run and special rates at Hershey Park. AFL-CIO President Kirkland attended the labor-management dinner that opened the four-day event.

Milwaukee unions turned out for the city's Labor Day parade with colorful floats, banners, and cadres of marching members, and New Haven labor celebrated with is own parade and festivities as did workers and unions in Wichita, Kans., and St. Louis, Mo.

The Chattanooga, Tenn., Area Labor Council sponsored its first Labor Day outing in 33 years with a full day of family festivities and entertainment at a local park.

The Multnomah County, Ore., Labor Council also planned to celebrate Labor Day "the old-fashioned way" with a picnic at a local park. And parades and a picnic organized by the King County AFL-CIO marked the day in Seattle.

Los Angeles labor held its traditional Labor Day breakfast, and, typical of a number of events around the nation, Alameda County, Calif., COPE sponsored a fund-raising family picnic.

Congress runs into legislative logjam

gration bill, opposed in part by organized labor, and in full by other groups. The bill was sent to conference after passing both houses, but the conferees are likely to see the measure as too hot a potato for an election year.

The AFL-CIO has said it will not support the bill as it now stands because it contains temporary worker, or "bracero program," provisions that labor views as threatening to existing jobs and worker protections in this country as well as an invitation to employers to exploit temporary alien workers.

A key labor-supported industrial policy bill sponsored by Rep. John LaFalce (D-N.Y.) and Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.) garnered growing support through the session, but its sponsors have decided not to bring it to the floor this year since passage would be extremely difficult.

The House may act on a labor-backed bill on drug patents and generic drugs measures that would lead to lower prices for consumers on some drugs. One amendment to that bill to be offered by Rep. Butler Derrick (D-S.C.) would require country-of-origin labels on all textile and wool products—those "made in U.S.A." as well as imports. Catalogs selling such merchandise would also have to specify the country of origin in product descriptions. The amendment has labor's support, but retailers and importers are expected to mount opposition to it.

Damaging add-ons to the spending bills that labor is on guard against include the discredited youth subminimum wage proposal, and Republican pressure for a constitutional amendment to mandate a balanced federal budget.

On that issue, while 32 of the necessary 34 states have passed bills calling for a constitutional convention aimed at passing a balanced budget amendment, the California Supreme Court dashed hopes of its right-wing supporters by striking a controversial ballot initiative off the state's November ballots. The measure would have stopped the paychecks of any state legislator who voted against the convention resolution.

Labor is also actively opposing "concon" ballot measures in Michigan and Montana.

Other last-minute tactics by Reagan Republicans could include attempts to force through legislation on tuition tax credits and "urban enterprise zones."

Although President Reagan's nomination of Rosemary Collyer as general counsel to the National Labor Relations Board remains bottled up in the Senate labor committee, thanks to strong opposition, an attempt will be made by Republicans to get the Senate to confirm her appointment.

Debt ceiling

On the other side of the aisles, however, Democrats will take advantage of the need to again raise the ceiling on the national debt to point out that the Reagan Administration—which campaigned on a flat promise to balance the budget by 1984—is closing out the year with the highest deficit in the history of any nation.

In other action, the House passed a bill that would provide financial subsidies to U.S. shipyards for construction. The bill did not have labor backing because it would allow shipbuilders to qualify for subsidies for ships built in foreign yards provided they also constructed some similar vessels at U.S. facilities.

UFCW contracts end Kroger lockout

Detroit—The Kroger Co. grocery chain began reopening 45 area stores after signing new contracts with two Food & Commercial Workers locals. The firm had shut down 70 area stores on July 21 when workers strongly rejected the company's takeback demands.

UFCW Local 876, representing 4,200 clerks and UFCW Local 639, representing 625 meat cutters and meat department workers, twice rejected Kroger's stiff demands. The new three-year agreements contain key job security guarantees which the unions had sought including a commitment to keep at least 40 of the 45 Detroit-area stores open for the next three years.

Local 876 said that at least 2,800 of its members would be going back to work. Kroger plans to sell its other Detroit stores.

The new contracts impose a temporary wage rollback, most of which will be "recaptured" by the end of the term.

Health and welfare benefits will be maintained at current levels with the company increasing its contribution by about 5 percent in the second and third year. Pension contributions by Kroger were also maintained for current workers, but scaled down for new hires.

Earlier, Kroger reached agreement with UFCW 951, which represents workers at 12 stores elsewhere in Michigan.

voted unanimously to put both automakers on notice as possible strike targets. UAW President Owen Bieber was authorized to choose a strike target as the talks progressed. UAW represents some 350,000 workers at GM and 114,000 at Ford.

The strike authorizations follow Bieber's rejection of initial offers by the two companies as "meager and totally inadequate," saying they failed to offer job security and substantial wage and benefit increases.

Besides the UAW, the Electronic Workers are bargaining separately for another 24,000 GM employees. IUE also has authorized a strike by a better than 90 percent vote after rejecting the company's last offer.

Postal negotiations to resume as House panels set hearings

There are actually three sets of negotiations under way. The APWU and NALC are bargaining together for about 500,000 of the 600,000 USPS employees while two smaller unions negotiate separately with USPS. The Mail Handlers division of the Laborers has continued to meet periodically with management negotiators. The unaffiliated Rural Letter Carriers is proceeding with a separate fact-finding panel.

In scheduling oversight hearings the House Postal Operations & Services subcommittee and the Postal Personnel & Modernization subcommittee will attempt to determine whether USPS has violated the Postal Reorganization Act that set up the service as a quasi-federal agency.

APWU and NALC accused USPS of retaining a San Francisco law firm whose clients include an accounting firm headed by Chairman John R. McKean of the postal service's board of governors.

In checking into the arrangement, NALC Local 1111 in San Francisco found that McKean played an instrumental role in USPS's awarding of a six-month, $300,000 contract to Littler, Mendelson, Fastiff & Tichy—a reputed union-busting consultant—for negotiations with the unions. McKean's accounting firm and the San Francisco law office do business with each other, Local 1111 reported.

The unions also want Congress to look into the terms of a $62,000 "retirement enrichment" bonus negotiated for Bolger when he leaves USPS in December. The payment was arranged by Robert L. Hardesty, former board of governors chairman, who was later hired by USPS as a consultant.

Interviewed on NBC television's Meet the Press program, APWU's Biller described negotiation of the bonus as a case of "you scratch my back, I'll scratch yours."

In letters to Rep. Ford, who chairs the overall House Post Office & Civil Service Committee, and to Sen. Ted Stevens (R-Alaska), who heads the Senate Operations Committee, Biller charged that the hiring of the San Francisco law firm "at the very least smacks of cronyism and it may very well be illegal."

"It is all the more disturbing to the APWU because the law firm is well known in labor circles as a 'union-busting' firm," he added.

Sombrotto said in a letter to Ford that "given the sensitivity and problems associated with the recent collective bargaining process, it would be in the public interest to determine what influence the law firm has on the labor negotiations and the reason for, and the propriety of, hiring such a firm."

The largest of its kind operating on the West Coast, the USPS consulting firm works almost exclusively for employers determined to eliminate unions.

Federal statutes prohibit government officials from using their office for personal gain or for the enrichment of persons with whom they have business or financial ties.

Free speech issue

AFL-CIO brief backs appeal on libel ruling

A constitutional issue of free speech has made the AFL-CIO an ally of Dun & Bradstreet, the financial news and reporting service, in a case being reviewed by the Supreme Court.

At issue is whether a court may impose punitive damages—in addition to compensation for any actual injury—for a false statement that is made without malice in the belief that it is accurate.

Also at issue is whether the news media —including newspapers, magazines and broadcasters — have greater protection against libel suits than other persons or organizations who speak or write.

In the case before the court, a Dun & Bradstreet financial service erroneously reported that a Vermont building firm had filed for bankruptcy. The service quickly corrected the report when it learned of the error.

The firm, Greenmoss Builders, Inc., had sued in state court for $7,500 in "compensatory" damages and $15,000 in "punitive" damages. The jury verdict awarded the firm $50,000 in presumed actual damages—even though there was no evidence of financial loss—and $300,000 designated as punitive damages.

In upholding the jury award, the Vermont Supreme Court took the position that U.S. Supreme Court precedents limiting defamation awards to actual damages, unless malice was shown, applied only to the media. It held that the Dun & Bradstreet financial reporting services were in a less-protected category.

The AFL-CIO submitted a brief supporting Dun & Bradstreet and arguing that the First Amendment protections against non-proven and punitive damage awards should prevail whether or not the defendant is part of the media.

In explaining labor's interest in the case, the AFL-CIO noted that if Dun & Bradstreet is not entitled to free speech protections accorded to the media, then "neither is the AFL-CIO or its affiliated unions." And if the financial reports at issue in the case are entitled to a lesser degree of First Amendment protection because they deal with "commercial or economic" matters, "so is much of the AFL-CIO's speech and that of its affiliated unions."

A narrow interpretation of the constitutional guarantees of free speech, the AFL-CIO said, "could well increase the dangers faced by the labor movement" from punitive awards not justified by any evidence of damage or malice.

Equal application

In its brief, the AFL-CIO made the point that freedom of speech is equal in its guarantees to freedom of the press, and that the First Amendment's protection doesn't depend on the identity of the speaker.

The only valid distinction between commercial speech and statements made in the news media, the AFL-CIO brief suggested, is when the term commercial speech is limited only to purely commercial advertising.

But in the case before the court, the brief noted, the same erroneous information could have been reported in the New York Times or the Wall Street Journal without subjecting either institution to penalties above proven damages.

AFT delegates outline plan to improve school discipline

The Teachers' 68th annual convention addressed the problem of discipline in the schools in a special order of business, unanimously adopting a seven-point plan for improving classroom conduct.

The resolution calls for development and enforcement of discipline codes in schools, special programs for students with chronic behavior problems, and stronger teacher and administrator training in the area of discipline.

The measure noted that "a frequent cause of disruptive behavior in students is their academic failure and ensuing frustration." It urged measures to provide early identification of such students, coupled with appropriate assistance to prevent academic failure.

The more than 2,400 delegates to the Washington convention also supported greater teacher involvement in disciplinary matters. The resolution emphasized the development of joint union-school board committees on discipline. And it keyed on the legal issues of school discipline, including teachers' and students' rights.

Another resolution approved by the delegates urges congressional passage of the Children's Survival Act to repeal many of the Reagan budget cuts and policy of the Reagan budget cuts.

In other areas, the convention called for re-enactment of and improvements in the Vocational Education Act, opposed state and federal infringement on local authority to evaluate teachers, urged the organizing of school-related workers and stressed the importance of teaching labor history.

The Teachers also approved resolutions supporting pay parity for adult education teachers, the Equal Rights Amendment, the concept of equal pay for comparable work, the right of public workers to strike and full voting rights for the District of Columbia.

Shanker re-elected

AFT President Albert Shanker was re-elected to a sixth two-year term and five new vice presidents were voted into office.

Shanker ran unopposed, heading a slate that included 29 incumbent vice presidents, all of whom were re-elected. The five new vice presidents are Cecil Benjamin of St. Croix, Virgin Islands, Paul Cole of Youngstown, N.Y., Marvin Schuman of Philadelphia, Joan-Marie Shelley of San Francisco and Adam Urbanski of Rochester, N.Y.

Among major speakers at the convention were Steve Allen, the host of AFT's new television series, Inside Your Schools; William J. Bennett, chairman of the National Endowment for the Humanities; and Fred van Leeuwen, executive director of the International Federation of Free Teachers Unions.

TUC warned of election's impact

Brighton, England — This year's American presidential election is crucial for workers and their families, with great implications for the future of the United States and other western countries as well, AFL-CIO Vice President Patrick Campbell declared in an address to the 116th British Trades Union Congress here.

Campbell, who is president of the Carpenters, noted that the Reagan Administration's huge tax cuts benefiting the rich, combined with massive increases in defense spending, have produced unprecedented federal deficits which, in turn, have pushed up interest rates.

As a result, foreign capital — attracted by the favorable interest rates—is increasingly financing the U.S. federal debt, Campbell told the TUC delegates.

"This includes capital from your own country which I am sure you believe should be invested here in the creation of jobs," he said. "This is a problem that we share in common.

"If we in the United States are successful in changing the policies that brought about the huge deficits and record-high interest rates, we shall have won a victory for the workers of both our countries."

In his address to the weeklong convention as the AFL-CIO fraternal delegate, Campbell pointed out the special significance of the coming U.S. election to the American labor movement. He cited the AFL-CIO's endorsement for the first time of a presidential candidate in advance of the party primaries and caucuses.

Uphill battle

"Labor's endorsed candidate, Walter Mondale, succeeded in winning the Democratic Party nomination," Campbell noted, but "he—and we—face a tough fight between now and Nov. 6."

"Whatever the outcome," he observed, "we have learned that there is no substitute for involvement and participation at every level of the political process—and indeed, that we have a duty to do everything we can to strengthen the role of working people in that process."

Campbell's visit represented the 99th annual exchange of fraternal delegates between the two trade union centers. He said the long relationship underscores the commitment to democratic values shared by the TUC and the AFL-CIO.

Against this background, Campbell urged that the TUC and the AFL-CIO work together toward achieving a united Ireland.

During the congress, delegates overwhelmingly pledged their support to their fellow unionists in the coal industry, on strike the past six months for wage and benefit improvements as well as job security.

In a resolution adopted by a nearly unanimous vote, delegates promised to "make the dispute more effective" by refusing to handle imported coal, refusing to transport previously mined coal to electrical generating stations or to handle oil that is being substituted for coal at factories.

British union leaders credited the vote with playing a role in the resumption of talks between the striking miners and the National Coal Board, the government agency that runs the mines.

The Bedrock Principle

JUST 90 YEARS ago, the U.S. Congress set aside the first Monday of September to be labor's holiday. The day had already been celebrated by trade unions for a dozen years as an unofficial holiday, and 28 states had enacted Labor Day laws before Congress acted.

The sentiment behind all of these actions was clear—only a national holiday could properly honor the men and women who built America and the trade unions they formed to protect and advance the rights and interests of all working people.

Behind the celebrations, the parades and picnics that have traditionally marked Labor Day, is the expression of a universal impulse which Americans regard as a fundamental human right. We celebrate on this day the right of freedom of association which is based on the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution.

This element of the Bill of Rights is sometimes overlooked. Americans think of the First Amendment as the guarantee for free speech, a free press and free religious expression. But the Founding Fathers, in their deep understanding of the fundamentals of democracy, also included in that amendment the freedom to assemble from which flows the freedom to form private associations.

SIMPLY DEFINED, this is the right of ordinary citizens who share common interests to create and control their own institutions, independent of government, as instruments for advancing and protecting their interests. Without the shelter of such institutions, plain people are naked before the arbitrary power of the state, the employer, or other potentially hostile forces.

Indeed, in the absence of freedom of association, all the other human rights we celebrate stand equally exposed to arbitrary power. Freedom of speech is reduced to the right to cry alone in the wilderness; freedom of worship is resricted to private meditation, and freedom of assembly is, literally, pointless. Effective political opposition—and therefore democracy itself—is impossible.

So, while freedom of association is obviously the bedrock principle of trade unions, it also shields and sustains the entire panoply of human rights that constitute a democratic society.

In Poland, South Africa, Latin America and Asia—all around the world—workers are struggling to secure this right to freely associate in trade unions of their own choosing. They are resisted by dictators of both the radical right and left.

In America, we use Labor Day to honor this right we have enjoyed for more than 200 years. Our democracy cannot function without it.

—AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland's Labor Day message aired on the NBC radio network.

Industrial Democracy

SINCE ITS EARLIEST DAYS, the labor movement has worked to improve the quality of worklife, to strengthen industrial democracy, and to share responsibility for decision-making—long before the call for these became "fashionable."

Through collective bargaining, political activism and legislative action, we seek a fairer distribution of the nation's wealth and a broader sharing in the riches of the nation.

In the confirmed belief that confrontation and conflict are wasteful of our energies and wasteful of our resources, we deeply desire a cooperative approach to our shared present and future problems.

The 103-year history of the American labor movement shows that labor has been the single most effective voice in this land in support of the poor, the unemployed, the sick, and the disadvantaged, and so it remains today.

On Labor Day 1984, we welcome and advocate new methods, new departures to raise living standards and to raise and confirm freedom to new heights. And we remain true to the principles and goals laid down by our founders more than a century ago.

Balanced budget scheme spells economic disaster

By Press Associates

The political season is sometimes called the silly season and the proposed Balanced Budget Amendment to the Constitution is one reason why.

The proposal to balance the federal budget by constitutional fiat seems almost laughable, especially since its most prominent advocate is Mr. Deficit Spending himself—Ronald Reagan.

Proposals to force the federal government into a fiscal strait jacket without regard to changing economic conditions and policy priorities have been kicking around Capitol Hill for a decade.

Bolstered by backing from President Reagan, it took wing in August 1982 passing the Senate on a 69-31 vote. Weeks later, the House voted 236-187 in favor of the amendment, 46 votes short of the necessary two-thirds.

The proposal, which would require an annual balanced budget unless three-fifths of both houses of both houses of Congress voted to allow a deficit, is now before the Senate and House Judiciary Committees. House Republicans may force it out of committee to a floor vote through a discharge petition as they did in 1982.

At his July 24 news conference, Reagan renewed his call for the amendment, repeating it in his Aug. 25 weekly radio message. He failed to mention that he has had deficits of from $170-$200 billion each year since 1981—triple the red ink of the previous four years.

Try it once

Democrats hold that if Reagan is sincere about balancing the budget, he should actually propose one and let the public know how he intends to accomplish it.

If Congress doesn't enact the amendment and send it to the states for ratification, the states themselves can force a constitutional convention to take it up. Under Article V of the Constitution, if two-thirds of the states, 34, call for such a convention, Congress must convene one. So far, 32 states have petitioned for one.

If this were to happen, a grave constitutional crisis could result, according to a report by the Citizens to Protect the Constitution.

The report warns that such a convention might seek to widen its agenda to include such issues as abortion and school busing.

If a balanced budget amendment were adopted, it likely would spell disaster for the economy, working people, the elderly, the poor, and state and local governments, according to a recent study.

Amendment impact

The study, commissioned by the State, County & Municipal Employees and prepared by Data Resources, Inc., an economic research firm, predicted that imposing a balanced budget amendment beginning in fiscal 1987 would:

- Throw the economy into deep recession, raising unemployment by over 5 million people, lifting the jobless rate to 11.2 percent by 1989.
- Force spending cuts up to 11 times larger than the program cutbacks in the first year of the Reagan Administration. Social security, Medicare and other programs would have to be gutted or eliminated unless the defense program were dismantled, an unlikely occurrence.
- State and local governments would be pushed by revenue losses "into their most severe financial crises since the Great Depression," forcing cuts in such essential public services as police and fire protection, sanitation and education, even if local taxes were raised.

The study assumed that federal taxes wouldn't be raised to balance the budget as the amendment advocates prefer spending cuts over tax hikes.

Reagan's support of the balanced budget amendment, echoed by the GOP's 1984 platform, may be more than just election-year demagoguery to distract attention from his record deficits. It could be part of a Reagan game plan to eliminate social security and other programs that conservatives have been badmouthing since the 1930s.

MEMO FROM COPE

The 1984 National 'Nice Guy' Contest

Below, presidential candidates Ronald Reagan and Fritz Mondale are graded on the "niceness" issue as it reflects, or fails to reflect, in their positions on major voter concerns.

Taxes

REAGAN—Doled out tiny tax cut to average Americans (about $3 a week for a $20,000-and-under income) to justify giving away the store to wealthy individuals (a $9,000 bonanza), Big Oil and other corporations. Wants to tax workers on employer-paid health coverage (foot in door for taxing other benefits). Expected to push new national sales tax on most products you buy, which penalizes average families most.

THAT'S NOT NICE ☹

MONDALE—Urges end to tax giveaways to wealthy persons, corporations, closing down their loopholes, setting fair tax system that requires them to carry reasonable share of load. This would substantially reduce record Reagan deficits. Would not tax worker benefits or add to what average families already pay.

THAT'S NICE ☺

Worker Rights

REAGAN—Turned labor board into forum for management mouthpieces; only President ever to break a union (PATCO); only President to create economic atmosphere of "give-backs" by and/or "take-aways" from workers; only President ever to permit hospitals to charge to Medicare the fees they pay their union-busting consultants.

THAT'S NOT NICE ☹

MONDALE—Would block hospital use of Medicare funds to bust unions; would appoint fair-minded members to labor board; would foster strong, expanding economy that pulls rug out from Reagan-induced management tactic of demanding "give-backs" and ordering "take-aways."

THAT'S NICE ☺

Protecting the Elderly

REAGAN—Tried to slash Social Security benefits $82.5 billion over five years, succeeded in getting $26 billion cut. Cut Medicare, seeks further cuts. Threw scores of thousands of persons off disability rolls.

THAT'S NOT NICE ☹

MONDALE—Has 20-year record of support for strong, generous Social Security. Would seek no cuts in benefits. Would strengthen Medicare and its funding by clamping lid on doctor/hospital charges.

THAT'S NICE ☺

Trade/Industrial Strength

REAGAN—Takes no firm steps to make trade two-way street that benefits U.S. industries and jobs. Leaves U.S. jobs at mercy of unfair foreign competition. No plan, either, to help revive basic industries undermined by one-sided trade arrangements—and the millions of workers who rely on these industries for jobs.

THAT'S NOT NICE ☹

MONDALE—Insists trading partners be as open to U.S.-made goods as our markets to theirs. Backs "content" proposal requiring portion of U.S. parts in foreign products sold here. Would establish business/labor/government mechanism to review problems, come up with plan to revive the basic industries that mean millions of jobs and are essential to national defense.

THAT'S NICE ☺

'Family Issues'/Opportunity

(Definition: Those issues that most affect family security and opportunity . . . like jobs, health, housing, education.)

REAGAN—Millions of families suffered from highest unemployment in 40 years—more than 30 million workers idled one or more times in 1981-83 Reagan-Republican recession. Reagan cut basic "family" programs like health, nutrition, housing, education . . . and higher education loans for children of workers, the needy (so much for the "opportunity society" he's talking about).

THAT'S NOT NICE ☹

MONDALE—Proposes full employment policies; job-creating programs if slump looms; restoration of Reagan cuts in health, housing, education, higher education loans; an authentic "opportunity society" that opens doors to children of workers.

THAT'S NICE ☺

The Jobless

REAGAN—Cut extended unemployment comp for long-term jobless; tried to knock out special aid for those idled because of imports. Once described jobless benefits as "prepaid vacation plan for free-loaders."

THAT'S NOT NICE ☹

MONDALE—Assures adequate benefits for jobless for adequate period to protect their families. Will retain special aid for import-affected jobless, step up training in new skills.

THAT'S NICE ☺

The Deficit

REAGAN—Spent 20 years deploring other President's deficits, then ran up bigger debt in one term than total red ink of 40 years that preceded him. Is expected to seek deficit reduction in two ways: 1. Further deep slashes in programs for average Americans and the needy; 2. by soaking workers with national sales tax, plus taxes on negotiated, employer-paid benefits.

THAT'S NOT NICE ☹

MONDALE—Would cut Reagan's $200 billion deficit sharply by reclaiming billions of dollars the wealthy and corporations don't pay in taxes, but should. Would not let burden fall on average citizens, who already pay fair share. Would not tax worker benefits.

THAT'S NICE ☺

The Needy

REAGAN—Shredded "safety net," clobbered millions. Cut every single program that helps needy Americans and their children—food stamps, school lunches and breakfasts, housing aid, Medicaid, child care, Aid to Families With Dependent Children, others—to tune of $110.2 billion. Now calls for even more cuts. Plunged more than six million additional persons below poverty line.

THAT'S NOT NICE ☹

MONDALE—Would restore Reagan cuts in programs for the needy, resume campaign, sidetracked by Reagan, to eliminate poverty.

THAT'S NICE ☺

So...Who's the 'Nice Guy'?

'For the Future'

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland kicks off the federation's television "Campaign for the Future," and previews for the press the series of 30-second commercial spots being aired this month over 65 TV stations in 24 major cities. The series, developed by the Labor Institute of Public Affairs, focuses on critical issues confronting workers and the nation.

Federation opens TV spot campaign on critical issues

The AFL-CIO launched a nationwide television campaign focusing on critical issues confronting the nation and its workers.

Federation President Lane Kirkland, at a Washington news conference and in a teleconference linking a dozen major cities by satellite, said the campaign responds to "a clear mandate from our membership" to take advantage of the television medium in presenting organized labor's message.

Kirkland said the "Campaign for America's Future" developed by the Labor Institute of Public Affairs consists of a series of 30-second television commercials "that will spell out the issues the labor movement believes are of major importance to the future of our country."

The commercials, supplemented with radio spots and newspaper ads, are being broadcast on 65 stations in 24 metropolitan areas over a three-week span. They cover the issues of education, jobs, affordable health care, fair trade and fair taxes, and equality for women in the workplace.

Three-week span

Commercials in the first "wave," the week of Sept. 10-16, describe the issues in each area of concern. Spots in the second week — Sept. 17-23 — highlight typical American workers speaking out on these issues. The third week — Sept. 24-30 — begins with a special five-minute program that puts the issues into the perspective of trade union history and features a new labor anthem, "Stand With Us, America."

Cities in which the campaign is being aired are Detroit, Flint/Saginaw, Mich., Buffalo, Milwaukee, Pittsburgh, Cleveland, St. Louis, Washington, Chicago, New York, Philadelphia, Minneapolis/St. Paul, Baltimore, Birmingham, Ala., San Francisco, Boston, Seattle, Los Angeles, Nashville, Tenn., Atlanta, Houston, Miami, Dallas/Ft. Worth and San Antonio.

Kirkland said the target cities were chosen so as to reach "our greatest concentration of membership" as well as to communicate with working people generally and the public at-large.

The targeted viewing areas cover about 45 percent of the total U.S. TV market, encompassing more than 38 million households. Of these, more than eight million are AFL-CIO union households.

The number of times the spots are being shown varies from city to city depending on the audience and the time available—107 in Detroit, for example, compared with 82 in Washington and 24 in Birmingham. Spanish language versions of the spots are scheduled in six markets.

In addition, a series of seven 60-second radio spots is running in nearly 100 cities, including most of those targeted for the television commercials, under the sponsorship of 135 local unions and state and city central bodies.

$1 million project

Total cost of the AFL-CIO's television buy is estimated at $1 million, which is being met by AFL-CIO affiliates through a special assessment approved by the Executive Council at its May meeting.

The cost of promoting the TV campaign through commercial and labor press ads as well as radio spots is being borne locally.

After Kirkland's satellite TV news conference linking 12 of the 24 target cities

Court reversals sting social security agency

An internal task force of the Social Security Administration has found that "the agency's credibility before the federal courts is at an all-time low" because of the way it has been fighting appeals by disabled persons whose benefits have been arbitrarily cut off.

The task force, set up last spring to study "a major crisis in litigation" confronting the agency, noted that there are now 50,000 social security cases pending in the federal courts, an increase of some 30,000 since 1981. It reported that there has been a "huge volume of adverse court decisions" and "a dramatic increase in the number of motions or threats to hold the Secretary [of Health & Human Services, Margaret M. Heckler] in contempt."

Bad image

The task force also noted that "a great deal of adverse publicity surrounds many social security litigation cases, and court orders are written in increasingly critical terms."

Recommendations were to stop litigating cases where the facts "are extremely sympathetic to the claimant" and attempt to negotiate settlements or have the cases sent back for further consideration.

The confidential report of the task force was made public after its contents were revealed in a New York Times story by Robert Pear. The Times also reported that the U.S. Attorney for the Southern District of New York, Rudolph W. Giuliani, has informed federal judges in the district and the Social Security Administration that he cannot defend the agency's position in a number of cases where it is seeking to cut off disability insurance benefits.

Bert Seidman, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Occupational Safety, Health & Social Security, observed that the task force report "fully supports" the criticism of the Reagan Administration by the federation, the Save Our Security coalition, and major organizations of the disabled.

Seidman said the Administration's handling of the disability benefit reviews has been "cruel and heartless and has resulted in great suffering and even death for some of the most defenseless people in our country."

What is most disturbing, he said, "is that although the Congress, the courts, the U.S. Attorney, and all people who have sought to assess the situation objectively have come to the conclusion that what the SSA has done is absolutely indefensible, it would appear that the Secretary and the SSA are still determined to do the minimum that they can possibly get away with to rectify the situation."

Among the most shocking actions of the agency under the Reagan Administration has been the purge of mentally impaired persons from the benefit rolls be-

400,000 jobs lost as unemployment remains at 7.5%

By James M. Shevis

Eight and a half million Americans were unemployed last month as the government's official jobless rate remained stuck at 7.5 percent.

The Bureau of Labor Statistics report on the nation's jobs situation offered little to cheer about, the AFL-CIO warned.

"No encouragement can be taken by the fact that unemployment did not increase last month as the apparent stability came from workers dropping out of the labor force as 400,000 jobs disappeared," Research Director Rudy Oswald said.

The August jobless rate matched the Comprehensive plan

Mondale attacks Reagan deficits

Democratic presidential candidate Walter Mondale pressed his attack on President Reagan's economic policies with a comprehensive plan aimed at reducing the Reagan budget deficits, already the largest in history.

Mondale coupled the release of his proposal with a challenge to Reagan—who campaigned in 1980 on promises to balance the budget by 1984—to be as forthcoming in "leveling with the American people."

The blueprint unrolled by Mondale would cut the projected Reagan deficit of $263 billion by 1989 by about two-thirds, or to about $86 billion.

Mondale's plan, which he termed "practical and realistic," calls for tax increases for the richest Americans and a 15 percent minimum tax on corporations as well as carefully managed spending cuts, improved management of an array of government programs, lowered interest rates and the benefits of growth from an economy freed from the drag of the massive deficits.

Restoring Reagan cuts

A projected $30 billion more would be spent on education, job-training, research, trade competitiveness and environmental programs as well as restoration of some social programs slashed under the Reagan Administration. Mondale called such spending essential for "key programs that will enhance competitiveness and fairness in American life." But other spending, he said, would be put on a "pay-as-you-go" basis.

Defense spending would also increase under the Mondale plan, but at a slower rate than Reagan's, and the Democratic candidate stressed that defense outlays would be keyed toward "increased preparedness" and away from "unnecessary procurement."

Savings in the federal budget would come from containment of hospital and doctors' costs in federal medical programs, better management of farm programs, better debt collection—including on taxes—and better overall management of the federal government and its activities.

Mondale's tax program would not raise

Reagan draws heavy fire on copper stand

Pittsburgh—President Reagan's refusal to restrict copper imports is a "devastating blow" to 30,000 American hard rock miners and smelter workers whose jobs are being eroded by the unchecked flood of foreign copper in the U.S. market, the Steelworkers said.

By ignoring the International Trade Commission's unanimous finding that imports are seriously injuring the U.S. copper industry, Reagan demonstrated insensitivity to the needs of copper workers, USWA Sec. Edgar Ball stressed.

These copper workers need their jobs so they can support themselves and their families as productive members of society, he said. The USWA represents a majority of the U.S. copper miners and smelter workers.

Ball, who presented the union's testimony at the ITC hearings earlier this year, stressed the unfairness of imports, which are subsidized by foreign governments. More than half of the imports come from Chile, a military dictatorship that exploits its workers, he pointed out.

"To continue to permit trade to be unfair, without using available remedies to help level the playing field is a travesty of real competition. It holds serious adverse implications for the American future," he warned.

Deep penetration

Imported copper has taken over 26 percent of the U.S. market, the ITC said in June. In its 5-0 ruling the commission held that U.S. copper producers are being seriously injured by the flood of refined and blister copper coming primarily from Chile and to a lesser degree from Peru, Canada, Zaire and Zambia.

In petitions to the ITC, 11 major U.S. copper producers pointed out that subsidies from the governments of Chile and Peru, along with low-interest construction loans from the World Bank, have given an unfair advantage to copper producers in those countries. The commission agreed and recommended that Reagan impose quotas or tariffs.

Last month, Reagan's sub-Cabinet Trade Review Group overwhelmingly recommended that he reject the June 14 ITC finding.

In announcing the White House rejection of the ITC finding, U.S. Trade Representative William E. Brock contended that imposing restraints on copper would raise copper prices and affect fabricating jobs.

The Coalition of Copper Industry Companies, which brought the complaint to the ITC, said that "it's a sad commentary on American trade policy that the one case unanimously affirmed by the ITC was totally rejected by the Administration."

Social Democrats' award cites Steelworkers leader

New York—A renewed commitment by the United States and other western nations to organized labor and greater democracy in the workplace is sorely needed today, Steelworkers President Lynn Williams told the Social Democrats U.S.A.

Williams, recipient of the Social Democrats 1984 Eugene V. Debs Award, said unions face a big challenge in labor-management relations to recognize "the right of workers to have democratic input where their job security" is concerned.

In accepting the award, Williams pointed to labor's long-standing commitment to social justice and its increased political activism, and urged an all-out effort among union members in behalf of the Democratic presidential ticket.

"What we do together between now and November to elect Walter Mondale and Gerry Ferraro will have an enormous impact on the hopes of workers and the future of unions in America and, indeed, in the entire world," he said.

Williams received the award from AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and Social Democrats Chairman Bayard Rustin. The award is named for the former trade union leader who ran for president on the Socialist Party ticket earlier in this century.

In an address to the 400 members and friends of Social Democrats U.S.A., Kirkland charged the Reagan Administration is exploiting religion for political ends.

"The new morality of greed, so garishly displayed at the Republican convention in Dallas, has now been dressed up in a coat of self-righteous piety and peddled over the airwaves by silver-throated Bible-thumpers and a dove-tonsiled 'great communicator' in the most cynical exploitation of religion since the dawn of Prohibition," Kirkland declared.

He also pointed to the "hypocrisy" of the Administration's foreign policy, noting that while "righteously preaching hatred of the 'evil empire,' it is lifting sanctions against the destroyers of Solidarnosc and quietly funding, with trade credits, the arms buildup of the Soviet Union."

Other speakers reflected the range of both domestic and foreign policy concerns.

Support of Sakharov

Tatyana Yankelevich, stepdaughter of imprisoned Soviet human rights advocate and Noble Peace Prize winner Andrei Sakharov, praised the AFL-CIO and the Social Democrats for their support of his cause.

Rep. Charles Rangel (D-N.Y.), national cochairman of the Mondale-Ferraro committee, called for a redoubling of labor's efforts in support of the Democratic ticket.

"We have the registration. We have the heart, and we have the commitment," he said. "And most of all, when things get tough and the tough start going, we have labor to say we're not going to take four more years of what we've suffered already under Ronald Reagan."

Rustin issued a call for solidarity with the Steelworkers who have been unfairly locked out for four months at a Hess Oil Co. refinery in the Virgin Islands, through broad public support for the AFL-CIO boycott of Hess products.

SEIU suit hits dawdling on asbestos peril

The Service Employees, accusing the Environmental Protection Agency of foot-dragging on the asbestos hazard in schools, filed suit in federal court to prod the EPA on a plan of action.

Citing the cancer-causing risk to students and school employees, the SEIU asked the U.S. District Court in Washington to order EPA to issue new rules within 30 days for the removal of asbestos from school buildings.

EPA rules now require only that schools inspect for the presence of asbestos, but do not specify under what conditions it should be removed or how students or employees should be protected during the removal process.

SEIU President John J. Sweeney noted that although Congress this year appropriated $50 million for loans and grants to remove the substance from schools, EPA has failed to take any action to write regulations governing the process.

"In the meantime, thousands of schools have undertaken asbestos abatement activities in a haphazard manner, disturbing friable (flaking) asbestos without safeguards and making it even more dangerous," he said.

Crisis ignored

"It has become obvious that the Reagan Administration either thinks asbestos is not dangerous, or believes the federal government should play no role in confronting a crisis that threatens children and adults on a scale not seen since the polio epidemics earlier in this century."

SEIU represents some 100,000 school maintenance workers across the nation. The union's action is the latest in its long-running battle with the EPA to abate the health hazards posed by asbestos, which was extensively used in schools constructed over the last 40 years and now endangers the health of some 3 million children and 600,000 school employees.

Asbestos is a known carcinogen which causes mesothelioma, cancer in the chest cavity, and numerous other lung diseases, including asbestosis.

The first deaths from school-related asbestos exposure are just now being turned up since the diseases typically take 30-40 years to develop. Children are especially vulnerable because they breathe in and out more frequently than adults.

Cites dangers

SEIU has raised the problem with EPA Administrator William Ruckelshaus over the past several months in an attempt to persuade the agency to issue abatement rules but to no avail. The union filed its lawsuit when those efforts failed, citing the Toxic Substances Control Act.

Sweeney also charged that the asbestos exposure problem has provided incompetent removal contractors a "field day."

"Workers have been observed flushing indestructible cancer-causing asbestos materials down toilets, releasing enough fibers to contaminate an entire city's water supply," he said. "Others have been seen transporting asbestos materials away by private automobile."

An EPA spokesman said the agency is reviewing the union's charges but had no comments on the lawsuit.

Wider impact of Hispanic vote cited

Denver—Voter registration and a strong turnout of the Hispanic union vote Nov. 6 emerged as the top priorities of the Labor Council for Latin American Advancement convention here.

LCLAA President Henry L. Lacayo, an Auto Workers vice president for political action, told the 300 delegates that it is increasingly clear "that Hispanics now have the political clout in several key states to be the swing vote—the deciding vote—in the presidential election, as well as several important statewide and local elections."

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland in his speech to the delegates, stressed the importance of the Hispanic vote, and praised LCLAA's highly successful registration and get-out-the-vote campaigns among Hispanic union members and their families.

"Now political analysts believe the Hispanic vote in Florida, California and Texas will largely determine who sits in the White House next January," Kirkland said.

"You have already shown your mettle by electing outstanding Hispanic candidates to political office at all levels—from the mayor's offices in Denver and San Antonio to the governor's mansion in New Mexico, and to the U.S. Congress. And come November, LCLAA will again be on the front lines," he stressed.

At the LCLAA women's conference held in conjunction with the convention, delegates were addressed by New Mexico's Sec. of State Clara Jones, a Latina. Other conference speakers included Rep. Pat Schroeder (D-Colo.), Colorado Lt. Gov. Nancy Dick, COPE-endorsed Democratic candidate for the Senate; Colorado State Sen. Polly Baca, and AFL-CIO Women's Activities Coordinator Cynthia McCaughan.

Election aided

In his welcoming address to delegates, Denver Mayor Federico Peña pointed out that strong support for him from LCLAA and other labor organizations contributed to his successful election effort.

The urgent importance of registering Hispanic union members was underscored by New Mexico Gov. Tony Anaya in his speech to the convention.

Delegates unanimously re-elected Lacayo as well as Executive Vice President Jack F. Otero of the Railway & Airline Clerks and Sec.-Treas. Oscar Sanchez of the Steelworkers.

Also elected by acclamation were Vice Presidents Maria Portalatin of the Teachers, Alfonso Rodriguez of the Carpenters, Manuel Gonzalez of the Ladies' Garment Workers, Rudy Mendoza of the Communications Workers, Chano Merino of the USWA and Ricardo F. Icaza of the Food & Commercial Workers.

J. J. Rodriguez, UFCW, president of the Los Angeles County AFL-CIO, chose not to run for re-election, and was replaced by Icaza. Alfredo C. Montoya, USWA, continues as executive director.

Other speakers included Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers President Joseph M. Misbrener, USWA Vice President Leon Lynch, Colorado AFL-CIO President Norman Pledger and New Mexico Speaker of the House Ray Sanchez.

Flight attendants ratify 3-year pact with Ozark

The Flight Attendants ratified a new three-year contract with Ozark Air Lines that provides full job security for all 542 AFA members and stipulates that Ozark will not form a non-union airline during the term of the agreement.

The package also provides a 4-percent pay increase on Feb. 1, 1985, along with two 5-cent increases in hourly pay for attendants with extra duties and 10 cents more an hour for expense allowance. The agreement has a lower new-hire scale which merges with regular rates in the sixth year of employment.

AFL-CIO spots

Television campaign focuses on key issues

on Sept. 10, labor officials in those cities met with reporters to detail their participation in the program. St. Louis unions, for example, have pooled some $16,000 for a totally coordinated radio buy. A similar effort by Atlanta unions is estimated at $14,000.

Production costs for the spots are covered in the operating budget of the Labor Institute of Public Affairs. Besides the "issues" campaign, six new episodes of LIPA's "America Works" series are scheduled for broadcast on 150 educational TV stations this month. The half-hour public affairs shows cover the same concerns as the spot commercial campaign.

Rebuts criticism

At his news conference, Kirkland rejected any suggestion that the "issues" campaign is aimed at advancing the cause of any candidate. It's an extension, he said, of the work of LIPA, which was established by the federation three years ago in response to "a very strong sentiment" among labor's local leadership expressed during the initial round of regional conferences.

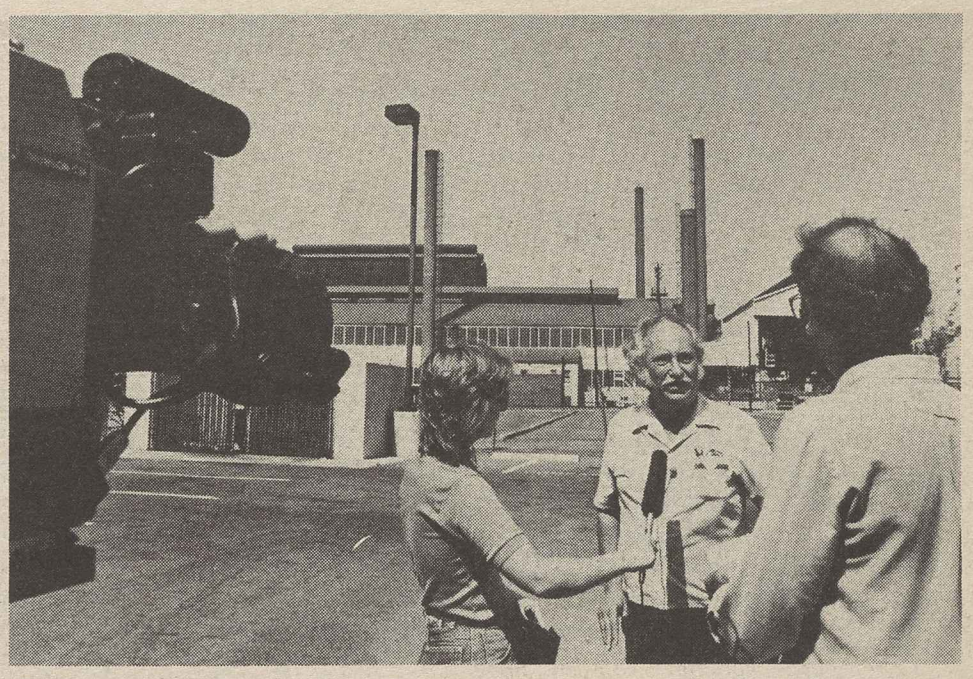
"The most frequently raised point that we heard from local leadership all over the country," Kirkland recalled, "was that we were largely shut out of the dominant medium of communication in this country . . . a medium that, to a growing extent, molds American opinion, and a medium through which most Americans get their information, usually in short bursts.

"Since we have a strong purpose to continue to keep open and active channels of communication with our members and with the public at-large, we clearly cannot afford to ignore or stay out of the primary channel through which our members and the public at-large get their impressions."

Kirkland said labor's earlier hesitance at making use of the television medium was at least partly because it was "somewhat intimidated" by the high costs. But the changing technology of the industry now makes it possible "to get material on (television) on a targeted basis at a tolerable cost," he observed.

The AFL-CIO's "issues" campaign, he said, is not being coordinated with the television efforts of individual unions, such as the Auto Workers.

The UAW campaign "is a very good one," Kirkland said, "and we are very delighted to see them doing it." He cited TV commercial campaigns by other unions, such as the Ladies' Garment Workers, the Communications Workers and the State, County & Municipal Employees, which he said "are addressing urgent concerns in their particular sectors." They are not systematically coordinated with the AFL-CIO campaign, but as affiliates of the federation, "they're also part of this," Kirkland stressed.



On location in East Los Angeles, production crew interviews Cruz Montemayor, one of workers speaking out in AFL-CIO TV campaign on major issues.

Postal unions demand Bolger join stalemated contract talks

Postal unions gave notice to the Postal Service they will not participate in contract talks until Postmaster Gen. William F. Bolger shows up at the table.

President Vincent R. Sombrotto of the Letter Carriers said, "We have received no indication that Bolger is willing to come to the table himself to bargain over the critical economic issues that caused this impasse—wages and benefits. Therefore, I shall not be returning to negotiations."

Postal Workers President Moe Biller, who earlier chided Bolger for not participating directly in the talks, said he stands ready to meet with him but "at this time nothing is scheduled."

Lawyers for the Postal Service and unions met in Washington Sept. 11 to lay the ground rules for resumption of the first negotiations since talks broke down July 20. The meeting focused on narrowing the non-economic issues that separate the parties, and did not touch upon the key economic issues in the dispute.

No new talks were scheduled, though the unions indicated they are ready to negotiate a new pact once Bolger puts in an appearance.

Adequate grounds

If talks do not resume, the contract dispute by law will go to a three-member arbitration panel by Oct. 19.

In a related matter, the Postal Rate Commission recommended an increase in first-class postage from 20 to 22 cents and in postal cards from 13 to 14 cents. The panel also called for a 14-percent hike in regular second-class mail. Most labor publications are mailed out at the second-class non-profit rate.

Federal child care efforts urged

The need for adequate child day care programs is increasing dramatically for working mothers, but the Reagan Administration has drastically slashed federal programs and blocked standards for safe, qualified existing programs, AFL-CIO Vice President Barbara Hutchinson told a House committee.

In testimony before the House Select Committee on Children, Youth and Families, Hutchinson stressed that the AFL-CIO supports enactment of a "massive" federal commitment to programs that would provide early childhood development and quality child care and protection services in communities throughout the nation.

But the Administration has damaged the progress made in child care—particularly for working mothers—by cutting the child care programs from the federal budget and virtually eliminating federal standards for quality, Hutchinson charged.

"Its goal is to have parents rely on the free marketplace," such as for-profit child care centers, and minimal employer-sponsored programs "with church and community groups to fill the remaining, gaping void," she said.

Hutchinson is director of the women's department of the Government Employees.

She pointed out that while unions continue to bargain for child care programs, progress toward the goal is slowed by employer foot-dragging and resistance.

Since "realistically" working mothers must rely on proprietary child care services, they must be improved and regulated, Hutchinson said.

To accomplish this, she told the committee, the AFL-CIO supports measures such as increased funding for provisions in the Social Security Act that aid working families in need of child care services and protect abused and neglected children. Funds for these services were slashed from the Reagan budgets, Hutchinson pointed out.

The AFL-CIO urges the establishment of a federal commission on child care standards and the establishment of a program to help communities establish child care information and referral services, Hutchinson testified.

Organized labor also favors federal funding for training child care workers, she said, pointing out that too often for-profit centers, in order to keep costs down, hire part-time workers, pay minimum wages and offer no benefits, all of which leads to rapid turnover, dissatisfied workers and poorer care for children.

Hutchinson said that unions are pressing for programs to provide before-and-after school care for children of working parents. By 1990, more than 17 million school-age children will be found in working famiiles, and many will have no care at all before or after school. Only a few such programs new exist, and many of them charge fees that are out of reach for lower-income workers.

Hutchinson urged that the dependent tax care credit be examined to determine if it can be made more useful and fair to all families. The credit currently provides $2 billion in support for all families—regardless of income—but does little for middle-income families and even less for low-income families, she said.

Ruling on California scheme sets back 'con-con' campaign

Right-wing backers of the effort to call a constitutional convention to force through a balanced budget amendment were handed a setback when Supreme Court Justice William Rehnquist refused to set aside a California Supreme Court decision banning a "con-con" referendum from the state's November ballot.

The initiative, had it gotten on the ballot and passed, would have coerced state legislators into voting for a petition to Congress for a constitutional convention, supposedly to draft an amendment requiring a balanced federal budget.

Both the amendment and a constitutional convention are strongly opposed by organized labor and a large coalition of other organizations and individuals. The California AFL-CIO was active in the fight against the initiative there.

The last time the United States held a constitutional convention was in 1789 when the original document was drafted.

Arbitration prospect

Justice Rehnquist, who handles such emergency requests from California when the court is not sitting, held that the state court handed down its decision based on "adequate and independent" state ground.

While the decision averts some of the danger of a "con-con" petition passing, right-wing groups also are pressing active campaigns in Montana—where a "con-con" referendum will be on the ballot—and in Michigan. So far, legislatures of 32 of the required 34 states have voted for the petition.

On a separate front, conservative supporters of a balanced budget amendment are still trying to get both houses of Congress to approve a balanced budget amendment.

The measure has been reported out of the Senate Judiciary Committee, and House Republicans are mounting an effort to get their bill discharged from the Judiciary Committee before Congress adjourns in early October. Roughly 190 of the necessary 218 members have signed the discharge petition.

The AFL-CIO has stressed that calls for a balanced budget amendment represent "crackpot" economic policy that would cripple congressional power to fight both recessions and inflation and at the same time threaten 50 years of progressive programs like social security.

Such attacks on important social programs, the AFL-CIO has charged, are the real objective of the amendment's proponents, who include the right-wing National Taxpayers Union and the National Tax Limitation Committee.

The federation—joined by civil rights, senior citizens, and other human rights organizations—has also charged that a second constitutional convention could not only unhinge the delicate balance of power on which the government successfully operates, but also open the door to limitations on Americans' rights and freedoms.

Busting a ghost

The Reagan Administration's Occupational Safety & Health Administration has egg on its face again. This time it's for secretly trying to get a member of Congress to deliver an error-riddled attack on Rep. Dave Obey (D-Wis.) who has been a frequent critic of the agency for not doing its duty.

The speech was ghost-written by OSHA's legislative department.

When a copy was leaked to Obey, he inserted what he called "this pathetic little speech" in the Congressional Record, congratulating his colleagues for not stooping to use it.

Tongue-in-cheek, Obey's introduction to the piece said that "productivity at the U.S. Dept. of Labor has apparently grown so rapidly in recent years that they are now volunteering their services outside the Executive Branch and are engaged in congressional speech writing."

Obey pointed out that the OSHA essay was intended to talk back to strong criticism he had leveled at the agency in August. He charged that the agency has been involved in a cozy relationship with the Coors brewery that has led to a drastic reduction in inspections at its Colorado facilities in spite of evidence of severe safety problems.

OSHA and Coors lawyers, he noted, even worked out a deal to allow the company to continue exceeding—by as much as 250 percent—federal noise standards at one of its plants so that the government could conduct a "study" of the effects of such noise on hearing loss among workers.

OSHA's ghost-writing effort, Obey observed, not only failed to answer his charges, but contained numerous major and minor factual errors, including mistakes in simple addition.

Officials at the agency tried to play down the incident, claiming that some "lower level employees" were just having a little fun because "Obey has been a pain in the neck to us."

In detailing the errors in the proposed speech, Obey quipped that "while we have cut back job training and CETA jobs considerably in the last several years, there are clearly a few make-work jobs left for the unskilled at the Dept. of Labor."

Courts sting social security agency for harsh rulings against disabled cause they failed to reply to an official notice or to fill out a required form.

The 2nd Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals in New York ordered the agency last Aug. 28 to restore benefits to some 50,000 mentally or physically disabled persons who had been cut off under what the court found was a "clandestine policy" of determining eligibility. The decision criticized the Administration particularly for its actions in cases involving the mentally disabled, who the court said would suffer an "ordeal" or "severe medical setback" if forced to battle the government for restoration of benefits.

Shifting tactics

The Times story pointed out that the SSA task force's recommendations dealt with new procedures rather than changes in underlying policy. The Times cited memoranda by agency officials as indicating an effort to avoid unfavorable court precedents and the "adverse publicity" that results from "a tongue-lashing by an angry judge."

In another development, a federal judge found that the SSA had put undue pressure on administrative law judges in disability benefit cases by creating "an untenable atmosphere of tension and unfairness" for those ALJs who frequently ruled against the government's position.

An association representing most of the administrative law judges at HHS had filed suit accusing the Administration of setting illegal quotas for rulings favorable to the government in disability cases. The agency temporarily halted its reviews of the ALJs' individual performances when the lawsuit was filed.

HHS Sec. Heckler last April also called a halt to the disability review process as protests swelled against the Administration's harsh and heavy-handed benefit cutoffs of persons with legitimate and continuing disabilities.

Some 500,000 persons were removed from the disability rolls in the three years of the Reagan Administration's operation of the review program, but more than 200,000 won reinstatement of their benefits after appealing.

Both the House and Senate have approved legislation to overhaul the social security disability review process, but conferees have so far been unable to resolve key differences between the measures:

- Under the House bill, a disabled person would remain on the benefit rolls unless the SSA could prove that his or her medical condition had improved. Under the Senate bill, which the Administration supports, the burden of proof would be on the beneficiary to show that the disabling condition had remained the same or worsened.
- The House bill would require the SSA to apply any federal court ruling on a disability case to all similar cases within that federal court circuit, or to appeal. The Administration refuses to follow this principle and recognizes court decisions as applying only to the specific case. It continues to apply standards rejected by a court to other cases that arise subsequently within the same circuit.

Sharp criticism

This stand by the Administration drew sharp criticism from Giuliani, the U.S. Attorney in New York, in his letter to the judges in the Southern District, the Times noted.

"There has never been any support to my knowledge," Giuliani said, "for the notion that federal agencies within a particular circuit could disagree with and refuse to follow clear rulings of that circuit."

Before his appointment to the U.S. Attorney's post, Giuliani served the Reagan Administration as Associate Attorney General, the third-ranking position in the Justice Dept.

Mondale attacks Reagan deficits

taxes for families with adjusted gross incomes of $25,000 or less, and increases for most working families would be small. Families earning between $25,000 and $35,000 a year would see a tax increase of only about $95 a year, Mondale said, stressing that Reagan won't "answer the question . . . 'who will pay for the Reagan deficit?' " because his answer "is so unfair to Americans of average income. Mine isn't."

Mondale said revenues raised through the higher taxes—which would roll back many of the Administration's juiciest tax breaks and new loopholes for the wealthy and for corporations—will be put into a "deficit reduction trust fund."

Watts, Knecht of CWA slate '85 retirement

Keystone, Colo. — Communications Workers President Glenn E. Watts and Sec.-Treas. Louis B. Knecht announced that they both intend to retire next year to give their successors time to prepare for new contract talks with AT&T.

Watts, an AFL-CIO vice president, made the announcement at the CWA executive board meeting here and in a brief letter to staff members that he and Knecht would step down at the union's convention next July, a year before their three-year terms are due to expire. Both are 64 years old.

Bargaining with the Bell System companies is scheduled to open in mid-1986 and will be the first full-scale negotiations since AT&T divestiture of the operating companies. CWA represents more than a half-million workers at AT&T, the seven regional companies and most local operating companies.

CWA's executive board recommended Morton Bahr, vice president for the union's New York district, to succed Watts, and Executive Vice President Jim Booe as Knecht's successor. The recommendations were enthusiastically endorsed by the board.

Watts is only the second president to lead the CWA. He succeeded to the post in 1974 when Joseph A. Beirne was forced to step aside by the illness that later took his life. Knecht became secretary-treasurer when Watts moved up. Both had earlier held a number of offices in the CWA, including service as district director, assistant to the president, and executive vice president.

Three unions to vote on accord with Merck

Rahway, N.J.—Three AFL-CIO unions representing production and maintenance workers at eight Merck & Co. plants reached a tentative settlement that could end a strike and lockout that idled 4,000 workers since early June.

The tentative settlement with the pharmaceutical company covers wages and benefits for members of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers, Chemical Workers and Clothing & Textile Workers.

Farm Workers rap new bracero plan

Bakersfield, Calif.—The Farm Workers called for defeat of the Simpson-Mazzoli immigration bill that would allow growers to use large numbers of foreign agricultural workers to harvest crops, warning in a convention resolution that the measure would cost thousands of American jobs.

The UFW delegates voiced strong opposition to a provision in the bill for a guest worker program that would bring back all the evils of the disastrous "bracero" abuses of the 1950s and 1960s.

The decision of Rep. Leon Panetta (D-Calif.) to sponsor the guest worker provision is "the greatest single act of betrayal against farm workers and Hispanics by any Democratic politician in recent memory," the UFW charged.

Under the Panetta amendment, farm employers could import temporary workers for up to 11 months a year to harvest crops. The UFW said the influx of temporary workers could swell to 300,000 a year.

Setback for workers

As currently drafted, the Simpson-Mazzoli bill now before Congress would be a huge setback for farm labor, the UFW said.

"The guest worker program contradicts the bill's goal of reducing the flow of foreign workers competing for jobs in the United States, and would . . . depress wages and working conditions for farm workers and workers in other industries," the resolution warned.

To fight this and other "dark forces of reaction," UFW President Cesar Chavez said that the union has developed a "more professional, more coherent political strategy," including a return to the boycott of non-union table grapes that was so successful a decade ago.

Delegates pointed to the anti-labor policies of Gov. George Deukmejian and his "sinister alliance with corporate agribusiness" in California, which have brought the state's farm workers 21 months of "persecution."

$72 million owed

The Republican governor "has brought to pass a terrible toll in human suffering as more than 6,300 farm workers wait for $72 million in back pay owed them by grower lawbreakers and as more than 36,000 farm workers wait for growers to sign contracts after workers voted for the UFW in secret ballot elections," a convention resolution charged.

Although over 27,000 UFW members are working under 161 active contracts, another 36,000 farm workers have voted for the union but are not covered by contracts. They are employed by 16 companies awaiting certification of representation elections by the California Agricultural Labor Relations Board and by 96 companies that are either challenging the ALRB's certification or are negotiating contracts with the union.

The union said that ALRB decisions currently are being appealed in court at a rate of 75 percent. Growers appealed 22 ALRB decisions in the past year, while the union appealed two.

In its resolution, the union accused Deukmejian of being "sweepingly anti-UFW" and determined "to divest the California Agricultural Labor Relations Board of the tools the farm workers need to protect themselves from the ravages of unfettered anti-union agribusiness."

In a report to the convention, Chavez said that the UFW may have to defend itself against the unaffiliated Teamsters in attempts to organize farm workers. The two unions had an agreement that called for the UFW to organize field workers while the Teamsters organized truck drivers and other traditional Teamster farm jobs.

The 10-year agreement ended last March, however, and Chavez told the convention that Teamsters President Jackie Presser has indicated he will not renew the jurisdictional pact.

Mondale endorsed

Delegates wound up their three-day convention by endorsing the Democratic presidential and vice presidential candidates, Walter Mondale and Geraldine Ferraro, as well as a long list of congressional and state legislative candidates in California, Arizona, Florida and Texas where the union has members.

UFW Community Action Dept. Director Roberto De La Cruz, reported that the union helped defeat a number of bills in the California legislature that sought to dilute provisions of the farm labor law. In the past year, the union won a ban on the short-handled hoe in Arizona and workers' compensation coverage for the farm workers in Texas.

15.1 million affected

New study analyzes phantom unemployed

The nation's real jobless rate is 13.2 percent and reflects more than 15.1 million Americans who are without jobs or underemployed, a coalition of labor, religious and public interest groups stressed.

"Despite some improvements in the economic picture during the past year, substantial numbers are still worse off today than they were three years ago," the coalition observed in a report titled Whose Recovery Is It, Anyway?

While the latest official report on joblessness showed a total of 8.5 million—7.5 percent of the labor force—still unemployed, the figures overlook some 1.3 million long-term unemployed who have become too discouraged to seek jobs. Nor do they take into consideration another 5.3 million persons who hold part-time jobs because they were unable to find full-time work.

The coalition released the study on Capitol Hill at the same time the Joint Economic Committee of Congress held its monthly hearing on the official jobless report from the Bureau of Labor Statistics.

The coalition called on Congress to enact federal jobs programs to aid the "phantom unemployed who are not even being counted in the official figures."

Members of the coalition are Americans for Democratic Action, American Friends Service Committee for Community Change, Children's Defense Fund, Full Employment Action Council, Lutheran Council U.S.A., Roosevelt Centennial Youth Project, Rural Coalition, Service Employees, U.S. Catholic Conference and U.S. Student Association.

Rep. Augustus Hawkins (D-Calif.), a JEC member and chairman of the House Education & Labor Committee, called high joblessness in both the BLS figures and the coalition report "unacceptable."

Reagan factor

Not only has the Reagan Administration failed to live up to the provisions of the 1978 Humphrey-Hawkins Full Employment & Balanced Growth Act calling for a reduction of the jobless rate to 4 percent by 1983, but it "is abolishing every jobs program and reducing outlays" for the jobless, he said. This serves only to compound the problem, especially for low-income families, he said.

Howard Samuel, president of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., and secretary-treasurer of the Full Employment Action Council, charged the nation's unemployment rate "is going in the wrong direction." The council spearheaded the coalition report.

Besides the continuing trend of rising joblessness overall, many groups and communities still bear an excessively heavy and disproportionate share of the burden of unemployment and loss of income, the coalition pointed out.

"In a broader, more realistic perspective, reviewing the entire 1981-84 period, the job gains are not nearly as impressive as many claim they have been," the study observed. "The numbers mask rates that are double, triple or more for many groups who must bear the brunt of persistent unemployment and its accumulating effects.

Some study highlights:

- The jobless rate for blacks hovers at 16 percent with nearly 2 million out of work. That is some 400,000 more than in July 1981, when the rate was 14.9 percent.
- Joblessness among Hispanic workers is 10.7 percent, or more than 1.5 times that of white workers, with 672,000 unemployed. In July 1981, their rate was 10 percent, with 591,000 unemployed.
- The 19.7 million manufacturing employees represent half a million fewer than in July 1981.
- The 5.3 million people working part-time because full-time work is not available compares with 4.3 million in July 1981.
- While young people represent nearly 18 percent of the unemployed, they have received fewer than 3 percent of the jobs created since the Reagan recession bottomed out in December 1982.

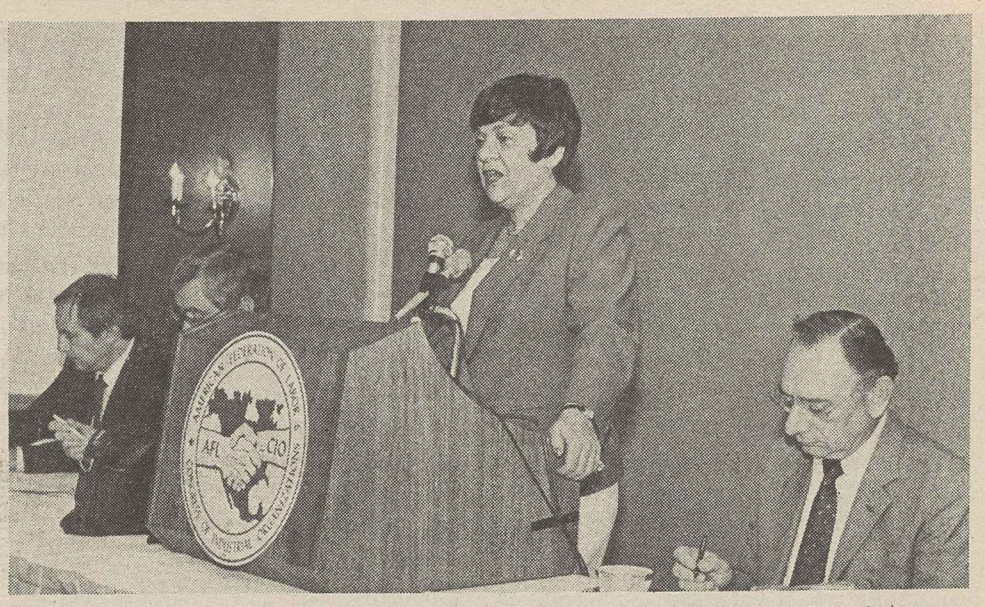
Children suffer

Marian Wright Edelman of the Children's Defense Fund pointed out that one of every five children in the country lives in poverty and that one in six single mothers cannot find a job.

Rev. Charles Bergstrom of the Lutheran Council called on President Reagan and Democratic presidential nominee Walter Mondale to debate the issue of the unemployed and the underemployed—especially minorities, women, the young, and discouraged workers — during their televised debate this fall.

The Roosevelt Centennial Youth Project, one of the 11 organizations sponsoring the conference and the demonstrations held simultaneously at 25 other locations, drew attention to the glaring gap between the jobless rate for black teenagers, 41.7 percent, and that of white teenagers, 15.9 percent.

"We cannot let another four years go by without action, and lose still another generation of teenagers to hopelessness, unemployment and long-term dislocation in their lives," he said.



Votes of trade union women will play a major role in the 1984 elections, AFL-CIO Vice President Joyce Miller declares. At right is ABC News political coverage director Hal Bruno.

Working Women for '84 map all-out register-and-vote drive

Strategies for labor's all-out effort to encourage women union members to register and vote this year topped the agenda for the meeting of AFL-CIO Working Women for '84, an arm of AFL-CIO COPE.

AFL-CIO Vice President Joyce Miller, who heads the committee, told the meeting of some 100 women representing 20 AFL-CIO unions that the group "was specifically organized to get our women union members out to vote."

The committee, as "an integral part of COPE," is working closely with the federation's overall union-member voter registration effort, she said.

The ad hoc committee was formed earlier this year to urge women unionists to support Walter Mondale's bid in the primaries for the Democratic presidential nomination. The committee expanded its activities to work for the Mondale-Ferraro ticket through the elections.

AFL-CIO Vice President Barbara Hutchinson is vice chair of the committee.

In his remarks to the committee, James Kennedy, assistant to AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue, was sharply critical of polls that show Mondale trailing in the presidential race.

While responsible polls may be accurate for the moment and place they are taken, they have been "extraordinarily inaccurate" in predicting long-term results in elections, Kennedy pointed out.

AFL-CIO COPE Director John Perkins told the committee that labor turnout is also crucial in the Senate, House and gubernatorial races.

Low marks for Reagan

Perkins reviewed marginal races in each category in each state, and COPE Special Assistant David Jessup diagramed recent polling on issues of key interest to voters, noting that most survey results show voters—especially women—giving low marks to the Reagan Administration on issues of fairness to low- and middle-income Americans.

Their successful local voter registration and participation activities among women union members were explained by Pennsylvania AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Judith Heh; Marguerite Crampton, Volunteers in Politics director for Maryland and D.C. AFL-CIO COPE, and Holly Ann McCoy of the Food & Commercial Workers.

Other speakers included Joanne Howe, executive director of the non-partisan Women's Vote Project, an organization launched by the Coalition of Labor Union Women and other women's groups, and Hal Bruno, director of political coverage for ABC News, who analyzed the current polling information on the presidential race.

Jobless rate sticks at 7.5 percent level recorded in both May and July, and was still unconscionably high as Administration policies push the nation toward another possible recession.

Oswald pointed out that the BLS report masked wide disparities of joblessness among different labor force categories and various parts of the country.

For example, while last month's unemployment rate among white-collar workers averaged 4.2 percent, the rate for blue-collar workers was more than double, 8.6 percent.

Similarly, blacks experienced far more unemployment than whites, their rate running at 16 percent in August compared with 6.4 percent for white Americans and 10.7 percent for workers of Hispanic origin.

"The Reagan policies of failure to enforce anti-discrimination laws are a major factor in the much higher level of black unemployment and Hispanic unemployment than that suffered by whites," Oswald charged.

"The diverse impact of unemployment and the lack of concern by this Administration is exemplified by the continuation of double-digit levels of unemployment in Michigan, 10.9 percent; Pennsylvania, 10.4 percent; and a nearly double-digit 9.8 percent rate in Ohio."

Last month's 7.5 percent jobless rate is the same as when President Reagan took office in 1981, which shows no improvement in an area of vital concern to the vast majority of Americans.

Slowdown

After a long recession, followed by an uncertain recovery benefiting mostly the rich, the economy has shown signs of faltering over the past two or three months.

BLS Commissioner Janet Norwood told the congressional Joint Economic Committee, "The August data show a moderation in the pace of labor market improvement that we have experienced for more than a year and a half."

While a BLS survey of nonfarm business establishments showed the number of payroll jobs edged up 160,000 to 94.5 million in August, the bureau's household survey showed an unusually large decline of 425,000 in total employment to 105 million.

All of this decline, BLS pointed out, occurred among youths under the age of 25. The disproportionately large drop may have been the result of a later than usual sampling week, Aug. 12-18, during which many young people may have already left summer jobs to prepare to return to school, the government said.

Labor force drops

The civilian labor force, meanwhile, dedeclined by 445,000 over the month to 113.5 million after seasonal adjustment. Youths under 25 accounted for the decline, BLS said.

In its payroll survey, BLS found some employment increase in a few durable goods manufacturing industries, notably machinery, electrical and electronic equipment, and motor vehicles and equipment. There was little change in most other manufacturing industries.

Employment in construction was about unchanged, following large increases in the spring. Within the service-producing sector of the economy, employment rose substantially in wholesale trade and business services.

A trade unionist's appeal for fairness, equality

By Joan Suarez

Joan Suarez is president of the San Antonio AFL-CIO. This Labor Day article appeared in the San Antonio Light.

Labor Day 1984 in San Antonio finds us still looking for the so-called recovery that has been promised for so long. Most of our affiliates in the San Antonio AFL-CIO show a decline in membership from four years ago due to the Reagan Recession, and many of our locals report unemployed members whose jobless benefits have been exhausted because of the long duration without work.

These workers don't count in the eyes of the Labor Dept. They fall from the statistics, and it is easy for the American public to be convinced of rosier economic conditions when the truth in terms of human suffering indicates that the unemployment figure is actually 2-4 percent higher than reported, with no computation of those who are underemployed trying to survive in dead-end, minimum wage jobs, or those who are working part-time but who desire full-time work.

American workers have always been willing to do their part and to participate in tough decisions and sacrifice when necessary for the common good. Under Reaganomics, however, the sacrifices have not been equitable.

Management rewards

For example, after Greyhound management extracted wage concessions from its drivers and mechanics, management was rewarded with increases. That story can be repeated in contract after contract.

American workers will do their share, but we resent inequality of sacrifice on the part of management. We all remember the promise of supply-side economics: Put the money in the hands of the wealthy who will invest in America allowing for reindustrialization.

American workers know well the need for tools and machinery, higher productivity and healthy profits. We also know well that American corporations do not take a long-term view but instead look to next quarter's profit and loss statement.

Instead of the promised reindustrialization and modernization of American manufacturing, we have seen the large corporations engage in a rash of nonproductive corporate mergers which ultimately will eliminate jobs, decrease competition, and increase the economic power of multinational corporations that salute the almighty dollar and plelge allegiance to the United States when it is economically feasible for them to do so.

We know the hardships American workers have endured in the last three years—23 million jobless in 1981, 27 million in 1982 and 27 million in 1983. We know the tensions these conditions create—the increase in spouse and child abuse, the increase in drug and alcohol dependency, the increase in the suicide rate, the increase in the crime rate. We know the trauma of workers losing their homes and their life's savings. Mortgage foreclosures during the Reagan Recession were 116,000 in 1981, 160,000 in 1982, and 178,000 in 1983. The story of family farmers being run off the land is an equal indictment. The rate of business failures went from 28 per 10,000 in 1979 to a whopping 89 per 10,000 in 1982, an increase of 318 percent.

Meanwhile, programs designed to help those in their time of need were stripped away by federal budget cuts. One million lost all food stamp aid, 4 million lost some food stamp aid. The poverty level rose to the highest level in 17 years—15 percent of all Americans. 700,000 of our children lost Medicaid protection at a time when 10.7 million workers lost all or part of their health coverage due to unemployment. Higher education programs were cut by 27 percent and 700,000 of our sons and daughters were affected by cutbacks in low-interest loans for higher education. At a time when Americans needed jobs, funds for unemployment and training programs were cut by $25 billion dollars.

All of these cuts were necessary to eliminate deficits, or so we were told. However, the Reagan deficits for his tenure have surpassed all previous administrations of those "tax and spend" presidents from George Washington to Jimmy Carter. Reagan attempts to mortgage our future for the sake of his re-election effort.

Our children and grandchildren will have to pay the price for the unfair tax policies of this Administration, policies which benefit the wealthy at the expense of working folks. While Reagan talks about the across-the-board tax decreases the statistics tell the real story: 10.4 percent of the total in individual tax cuts went to just .2 percent of the taxpayers—those 162,000 Americans who earn more than $200,000 per year. Meanwhile, the 31.7 million of the neediest people in our society—the 41 percent of the working population who earn less than $15,000 per year—will share cumulatively only 8.5 percent of the tax cut. That is, 10.4 percent shared by .2 percent, while only 8.5 percent is divided among 41 percent. The neediest will receive about $147, while the wealthiest will receive a whopping $22,129 per year.

The tax cuts for the poor, however, have been wiped out by state and local tax increases made necessary by federal budget cuts, and unless there is a change in administration in Washington, it is likely that this group will again have to bear the brunt of federal deficits—in higher taxes and in further budget cuts.

Foxes and chickens

American workers are concerned that the labor laws are no longer enforced since Reagan appointed foxes to guard the chicken coop. We are concerned that safety and health laws are now inoperative. We are concerned that equal opportunity legislation is defunct. We are concerned that this President who delights in quoting Franklin Roosevelt when it is politically expedient has dismantled the fabric of a workable industrial relations policy that has served our nation well for 50 years.

Our members are concerned with the growing numbers of imports that take away our jobs in the needle trades here in San Antonio, as well as in our manufacturing industries. We are concerned that the promise of jobs in high tech might evaporate as we see firm after firm in California's Silicon Valley move their manufacturing components overseas. We are concerned at the thought of going from a relatively self-sustaining, independent, self-reliant nation to a nation dependent upon imports. We are concerned about eliminating the jobs of our designers, our engineers, our craftsmen, our machinists, our builders, and trading them in for jobs manufacturing hamburgers.

We are concerned about Reagan's subminimum wage plan which would take jobs away from our lowest paid women and give them to their sons and daughters—with a clear signal that younger workers are not valuable. In contract negotiations with the Letter Carriers and the Postal Workers, the Postal Service shows the position of the federal government that younger workers should earn less for the same jobs. If this policy is enforced, not only is age discrimination against the young the policy of this Administration, but older postal employees will soon find themselves replaced by bureaucrats eager to trim postal spending.

We are concerned about policies which pit old against young, men against women, black, Anglo, Hispanic, native American and Asian-American against each other. The policies of this Administration have been policies of divisiveness, not policies of healing, and we strongly resent that. Workers want the same rights, the same respect, the same dignity that we afford to other Americans. We believe that all men and women are created equal, and that all should share in the bounty and the promise of America.

Gompers's inspiration

We need to remember Samuel Gompers's stirring lines which remain the inspiration and the aspiration of the American union movement: "What does labor want? It wants the earth and the fullness thereof. There is nothing too precious, there is nothing too beautiful, too lofty, too ennobling unless it is within the scope and comprehension of labor's aspirations and wants. We want more schoolhouses and less jails, more books and less arsenals, more learning and less vice, more constant work and less crime, more leisure and less greed, more justice and less revenge."

Even 101 years after Gompers issued that challenge, we still struggle for the same ideals. We feel the majority of Americans do, too. Working Americans are not better off than we were four years ago. Ominous clouds are on the horizon—clouds of deficits, higher taxes, higher interest rates, higher unemployment and higher imports—all the direct result of Reagan Administration policies.

The American labor movement will do its part—we always have. But let's equalize the load, and let the privileged few—the corporations and individuals who pay no taxes—let all who share in America's bounty in good times assume their share of the burden in these tough economic times.

It's time to return to fairness and equality for all.

Molders gear up voter drive in backing Democratic ticket

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Cheering delegates to the 125th anniversary convention of the Molders endorsed the Democratic presidential ticket of Walter Mondale and Geraldine Ferraro in their bid to win the 1984 election.

The endorsement resolution stressed that the union would conduct an intensive campaign to urge all its members and their families to register and to vote on Nov. 8.

In other action, the 208 delegates voted to streamline their union's structure by reducing the number of elected vice presidents from eight to five. The reduction is to be accomplished through attrition.

President Bernard Butsavage was elected to his first full four-year term, and Sec.-Treas. Andrew J. Swafford was re-elected to his second term. Butsavage, who had been a vice president, was named to the post by the Molders' executive board in 1983 following the death of President Carl Studenroth.

In his keynote address, Butsavage laid the blame for the nation's deepening social and economic problems at the door of the Reagan Administration and its supporters in the "union-hating, reactionary, right-wing movement."

Organized labor has led the fight for over a century for social and economic decency for working people, Butsavage said.

Progress halted

AFL-CIO Vice President James E. Hatfield warned the delegates that under the Reagan Administration "50 years of progress is going down the drain."

Hatfield, who is president of the Glass, Pottery & Plastics Workers, urged union members to work to "turn our country around" and counter the anti-labor policies of the Reagan Administration by "ridding ourselves of Reaganites, Reaganism and Reaganomics."

Delegates also gave a warm welcome to NAACP Executive Director Benjamin Hooks who stressed that the civil rights organization is actively pursuing its own voter registration because "the shape, the complexion, the context of our next Congress" is at stake in the fall elections.

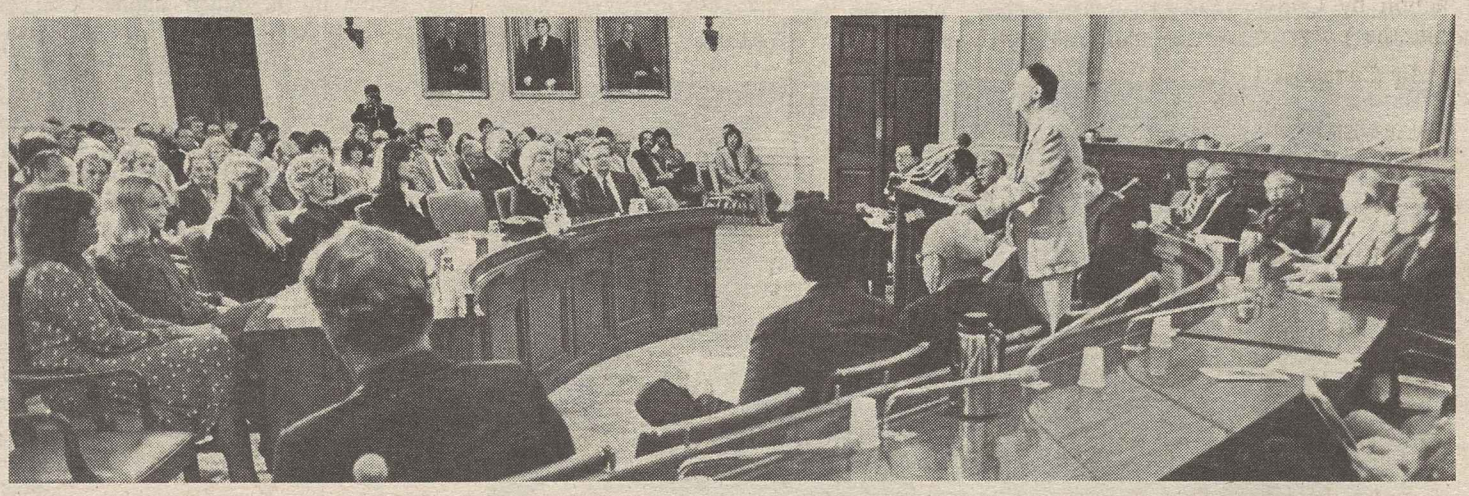
In other major convention action, the delegates elected a five-member merger committee, headed by Butsavage and Swafford, to pursue merger possibilities with another AFL-CIO union.

The delegates also voted to increase strike benefits from a current $45 a week to $65 a week by October 1987. Benefits will increase in $5 increments each Oct. 1, beginning this year when the benefit goes to $50.

Other key resolutions reaffirmed support for passage of an Equal Rights Amendment, the Continental Airlines boycott and Canada's labor-backed New Democratic Party.

The delegates also elected eight vice presidents and a financier-auditor to four-year terms and voted to abolish the vacant posts of executive vice president and assistant secretary-treasurer whose duties have been folded into the offices of president and secretary-treasurer.

Other speakers at the convention were AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept. President Paul J. Burnsky, Industrial Union Dept. Sec.-Treas. Elmer Chatak, and former Occupational Safety & Health Administration director Eula Bingham.



Tribute to Carl Perkins

Colleagues and friends of Rep. Carl D. Perkins, who died Aug. 3, gather in the hearing room of the House Ways & Means Committee for a memorial tribute to the Kentucky Democrat who was a champion of important labor, educational and social legislation throughout his 35 years in Congress. From 1967 to his death, Perkins chaired the House Education & Labor Committee. Opening the memorial service, attended by many trade unionists, is Kenneth Young, executive assistant to AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland who also spoke. The tribute to Perkins was organized by the AFL-CIO and the House Education & Labor Committee.

A Matter of Image

THE REAGAN Administration professes bewilderment when critics accuse it of harsh, uncaring treatment of the least priviliged and most defenseless members of society.

But the Administration's reputation for callousness was acquired the old-fashioned way—by earning it.

Consider the recent internal report of a task force within Reagan's Social Security Administration. It was set up to study a huge and growing backlog of court cases involving the agency and to make recommendations for dealing with it.

This "major crisis in litigation," as the task force called it, was largely of the SSA's own making. It resulted from the overly zealous effort to strike disabled persons from the social security benefit rolls under review procedures mandated by Congress in 1980.

Since the program began, more than 500,000 persons have been told they are no longer eligible for disability insurance benefits. But more than 200,000 were able to win restoration of the benefits on appeal, an indication of the arbitrary nature of the cutoffs.

IT WAS the Reagan SSA's rigid policy of fighting even obviously justified appeals that got it into trouble with the courts to the point where the task force found the agency's credibility to be "at an all-time low."

One appeals court accused HHS Sec. Margaret Heckler of undermining the Constitution's separation of powers principle by defying its orders. Another accused the SSA of cutting off benefits for mentally disabled persons who failed to understand the procedures they were required to follow and the forms they had to fill out.

Courts have awarded more than $560,000 in attorneys' fees in appeals cases where the judges found the government's position was "not substantially justified." And the task force noted that some judges are convinced that the Social Security Administration "will defend any case in court, no matter how terrible the claimant's circumstances."

The U.S. Attorney for the Southern District of New York, a Reagan appointee, says he won't even try to defend the Social Security Administration's position in a number of disability benefit cases.

But how does the SSA propose to solve its problem? Its main concern seems to be with its own won-and-lost record and with the "adverse publicity" it has been getting rather than with the needs of disabled people it is supposed to help.

It intends to screen out cases where the facts are "extremely sympathetic to the claimant," but instead of agreeing promptly to restore that claimant to the benefit rolls, it will try to negotiate a settlement or return the case for "further consideration."

MEANWHILE, legislation that could go a long way toward resolving the situation through an overhaul of the disability insurance program is hung up in the congressional logjam with House and Senate conferees stalemated over key provisions.

The AFL-CIO has urged approval of the House version, which would require the government to show that a disabled person's medical condition has improved before benefits can be cancelled.

The Reagan Administration backs the Senate version under which the burden of proof would fall on the disabled beneficiary.

There are other differences, including a major dispute over funding, but both bills would permit continuation of benefits while a recipient appeals a decision to cut off payments.

The legislation is caught in a "Catch 22" situation, however. Last April, Sec. Heckler suspended the review program pending action by Congress. Now, with no more beneficiaries being cut off, the pressure for new legislation has waned.

In Congress, too, it's a matter of image.

The Bottom Line

Next Congress to decide future of health programs

By Press Associates, Inc.

The eyes of the nation may be on the presidential race, but it is also very important to take a close look at candidates for the incoming 99th Congress.

It is clear by now that President Reagan and his advisers will try to get their runaway deficits under control by breaking up or drastically cutting back the big health and pension programs such as social security, Medicare, Medicaid and disability benefits. They salivate over the tens of billions they could "save."

But Reagan, if he is re-elected, couldn't do it if he lacked the votes in Congress.

That's why the Health Security Action Council, chaired by former Auto Workers President Douglas Fraser, sent a congressional candidate questionnaire to several hundred national and local organizations.

"Questions dealing with Medicare, Medicaid, maternal and child health, and access to health care will be before the 99th Congress as soon as it convenes," Fraser said. "Decisions on health care cost containment and a long-range national health program will need to be faced."

So Fraser's group prepared background material and questions designed to elicit clear answers from candidates. The groups involved were urged to then publicize the candidates' views through press releases, letters to the editor and radio-TV interviews.

Soaring costs

In recent years, the major problems in health care have only worsened. Hospital costs outpaced other items on the consumer price index threefold in 1983. Despite substantial hikes in Medicare premiums and deductibles for the elderly and disabled in the past three years, the program's hospital insurance fund faces insolvency after 1990 due to medical inflation.

An estimated 33 million poor, unemployed and low-wage Americans have no private health insurance protection. Medicaid, the nation's health services program for the poor, provides care for less than half of the estimated number needing help.

Cutbacks in Medicaid and women's and children's health programs have left an estimated 9 million children with no regular health care.

Who bears the cost?

In broad terms, Congress must decide whether escalating health care costs are to be shifted to workers and the elderly, or whether costs should be contained at their source with restrictions on doctors and hospitals.

Here are a few of the questions that will be put to congressional candidates:

- Will you support enactment of federal legislation to control the rising costs of health care and assure Medicare solvency through a plan which applies to federal and state payers of care, as well as Blue Cross and Blue Shield; includes payments to physicians and hospitals; and, encourages development of state cost control programs?
- Do you favor continuation of Medicare as an entitlement program?
- Would you support legislation such as adopted by the House but not the Senate in 1983 which would provide health insurance protection to workers who lost their health insurance due to unemployment?
- Would you support a measure to liberalize Medicaid so that almost all the poor would be assured of protection?
- Would you support legislation that ensures access to Medicaid payments for health services for the working poor not now eligible in many states?

Pinning down the candidates on these questions can help produce a Congress more responsive to the needs of the people.

Winning combination

Pressing for passage of the Civil Rights Act of 1984, which includes strong protection for women's school sports programs, U.S. Olympic basketball gold medalist Cheryl Miller teams with State, County & Municipal Employees President Gerald W. McEntee. Miller joined other women Olympic champions and top disabled athletes in a lobbying effort organized by Sens. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) and Robert Packwood (R-Ore.) and the labor-supported Leadership Council on Civil Rights. The sports champions stressed that the federal law equalizing school spending on programs for men, women and disabled people contributed to their athletic successes.

'Deregulation' plan opposed as bank industry power grab

A banking "deregulation" bill now before the Senate would concentrate too much new economic power in the hands of the banking industry and could place the nation in peril of national financial disaster, the AFL-CIO warned in a letter to Senators.

The measure, introduced by Sen. Jake Garn (R-Utah), was freed up for a vote after the Senate voted 89-3 for a cloture petition to end a filibuster and 95-2 to begin debate.

AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison pointed out in a letter to all senators that although organized labor favors legislation that would close a loophole in current law that allows the establishment of "non-bank" banks that don't take business checking accounts or make commercial loans, but can take in other deposits and make other loans. Such "banks can be set up by large chain stores or other big banks across state lines. That part of the current bill "is outweighed by several other provisions that would be contrary to the public interest."

The Senate bill would put too much reliance on "competition" to produce efficiency, Denison warned.

The more financial institutions have to compete for money—by paying more for it— the more they must seek high returns, and "prudence is lost in the process," Denison said. He cited as an example the near-collapse of Continental Illinois Bank earlier this year—due in large part to large loans to shaky enterprises.

Denison said the AFL-CIO opposed the bill because it would permit closer connections between banks and securities affiliates, allowing banks to underwrite and deal in revenue bonds, commercial paper and mortgage-backed securities. This would lead to "undesirable concentrations of economic power" in the hands of bank holding companies and their affiliates, and create potential conflicts of interest, he warned.

The AFL-CIO also strongly opposes parts of the bill that would give financial institutions additional non-banking powers, letting them get into other ventures. Among other problems, the Federal Reserve's existing regulatory workload would be "overloaded" by the need to monitor these new activities, Denison observed.

He pointed out also that a portion of the bill that would have the Federal Reserve pay interest to banks on Money Market Deposit Accounts and Super NOW accounts would cost the federal government about $4 billion dollars over a six-year period, add significantly to the nation's already skyrocketing federal budget deficit and put more upward pressure on interest rates.

High interest charge

Interest rates also would be adversely affected by another provision that would renew the federal pre-emption of state business and agricultural credit laws. That pre-emption, which expired Mar. 31, 1983, permitted lenders making business and agricultural loans to charge customers a higher rate of interest than permitted by state interest rate ceilings.

The AFL-CIO is backing a House bill, introduced by Rep. Fernand St Germain, that closes the "non-bank-bank" loophole and contains other key protections.

Network videotape pact approved by Musicians

New York—The Musicians ratified a new two-year videotape agreement with the major networks that provides for annual 5-percent wage increases.

AFM President Victor W. Fuentealba said the pact, which covers some 1,800 members, was ratified by a vote of 584-32.

Consumers to benefit

Drug patent measure cleared by Congress

By Susan Dunlop

With three weeks left before a targeted adjournment date of Oct. 4, the House and Senate have yet to act on key spending bills to keep the government operating, and major immigration and civil rights legislation still loom on the abbreviated calendar.

On the plus side, both houses passed a labor-supported measure that will aid consumers by making many widely used prescription drugs available at lower prices.

The new law will speed up the time it takes for the Food & Drug Administration to approve cheaper "generic" versions of brand-name drugs on which patents have expired. Another compromise provision will extend some patents on new drugs.

Generic drugs could save consumers—hospitals, health care plans, and even government health services as well as individuals—as much as 50 to 80 percent compared with brand-name equivalents.

The bill also includes a labor-supported amendment requiring all textile and clothing products to carry country-of-origin labels and catalogs to specify where listed items are produced.

A 29-member House-Senate conference committee has begun work on versions of the controversial Simpson-Mazzoli immigration bills passed by both houses earlier this summer. The bill is named for its sponsors Sen. Alan K. Simpson (R-Wyo.) and Rep. Romano L. Mazzoli (D-Ky.).

Support withdrawn

The AFL-CIO had been a supporter of a fair, compassionate immigration bill that would both stem illegal immigration through employer sanctions and end the exploitation of illegal aliens already long-established in this country. But the federation withdrew its support from the House bill when agriculture and business special interest groups persuaded Congress to tack on an unacceptable expansion of the "H-2" temporary worker program to the House version of the bill. The Senate bill is equally unacceptable.

The AFL-CIO strongly opposes the House-added Panetta Amendment as a new edition of the discredited "bracero" program Congress threw out in the early 1960s. That program not only undermined U.S. jobs and working conditions, but also was the root of shocking abuses of temporary workers.

The federation currently is urging members of the conference committee, if they do report out a bill, to adopt the strongest possible restrictions on any use of temporary workers.

The AFL-CIO is also urging the conference committee to retain in full force the anti-discrimination provisions of the House bill that would make it illegal for employers to discriminate against legal workers.

On the Senate side, efforts to get quick action on this year's key civil rights issues got a boost from the U.S. Olympic team's top women athletes and top disabled athletes. The Olympic and disabled champions told members of Congress in a day of lobbying that many of them would not have been able to excel in sports had it not been for federal law equalizing their school spending on athletic programs for women and the handicapped.

The Senate is expected to consider a measure, dubbed the "Grove City" bill, to rectify a Supreme Court ruling that schools that discriminate against women and minorities in some of their programs—such as athletics—can still get federal money for other programs. The decision involved Grove City College, Ill.

Republican roadblock

Senate action is being held up by opposition from Utah Republicans Orrin Hatch and Jake Garn and North Carolina Republicans Jesse Helms and John East. The House passed civil rights measure 375-32.

Also on the Senate's agenda is a labor-opposed bank deregulation bill. The AFL-CIO, which is supporting a preferable bill on the House side, urged the senators in a letter to reject the measure because it provides only minimal benefits to consumers, but fuels the concentration of even more economic power in the hands of banks and financial institutions.

Also confronting the Senate is the nomination of Rosemary Collyer as general counsel of the National Labor Relations Board, a candidate the AFL-CIO has opposed as inexperienced and unqualified.

Labor Committee Chairman Orrin Hatch planned to bring the matter up in the committee in an attempt to get it to the Senate floor, but Democrats have sworn to filibuster the nomination if it gets out of committee. The threat is important since the Senate is racing to adjourn for election campaigning.

In a related matter, the Senate Judiciary Committee has decided not to consider President Reagan's nomination of his counselor, Edwin Meese 3rd, as Attorney General.

The appointment bogged down over questions about Meese's financial dealings which have been the subject of an investigation by a government-appointed independent counsel.

Uniform jobless aid system sought

The nation's unemployment compensation system—ravaged under the Reagan Administration—should be uniform, fair, compassionate and adequate, the AFL-CIO told a House subcommittee.

AFL-CIO Assistant Legislative Director Robert McGlotten testified at House hearings that the unemployment compensation system should be based on minimum federal standards, including assurance of permanent coverage to all wage and salary workers based on adequate wage standards and without the harsh eligibility and disqualification rules that Reagan Administration slashes in federal programs have forced on many state insurance plans.

McGlotten told the House Ways & Means subcommittee on public assistance and unemployment compensation that to bolster state plans, a permanent federal jobless benefits program of at least 65 weeks duration should be enacted. The restrictive system of "triggers" that now prevent many states from qualifying for federal extended unemployment insurance despite massive joblessness should also be revised to make them fair or eliminate them, McGlotten urged.

Because the artificial "insured unemployment rate"—currently 2.7 percent—is used to determine whether a state qualifies for federal extended benefits or federal supplemental compensation (FSC) McGlotten explained, not one state today qualifies for the program in spite of the fact that 16 states have jobless rates higher than the national average of 7.5 percent, and four have unemployment rates of more than 10 percent.

If Congress does not act to provide for a fair extended benefits program and reverse the damage done by the policies of the Reagan Administration, the situation could grow even worse when the FSC program expires next March.

Protection sapped

To underscore the need for action, McGlotten pointed out that over the past three and a half years, the basic protections of unemployment insurance have been "drastically weakened."

Although the official jobless rate now stands at 7.5 percent, or at least 8.5 million Americans, 70 percent of the unemployed have no unemployment compensation, McGlotten said.

In addition, the purchasing power of unemployment benefits has been eroded 35 percent since the recession period of 1975, duration of benefits has dropped 40 percent—to only 34 weeks in the majority of states—and on top of harsh eligibility rules for qualification for federal benefits, hard-pressed state plans are piling on their own toughened eligibility restrictions.

"During the Reagan Recession, when unemployment reached the highest levels since the Great Depression, the income protection and counter-cyclical stimulus available from unemployment compensation were significantly and purposely reduced," McGlotten charged.

The AFL-CIO also favors improvements in the financing of the unemployment insurance system, McGlotten told the committee. Among such provisions favored by organized labor are federal legislation to set up a reinsurance system to help states meet high costs during times of high unemployment, a requirement that states increase their taxable wage bases to 65 percent of the average annual wage by 1990 and flexible repayment programs for loans taken out by states during periods of high unemployment and recession.

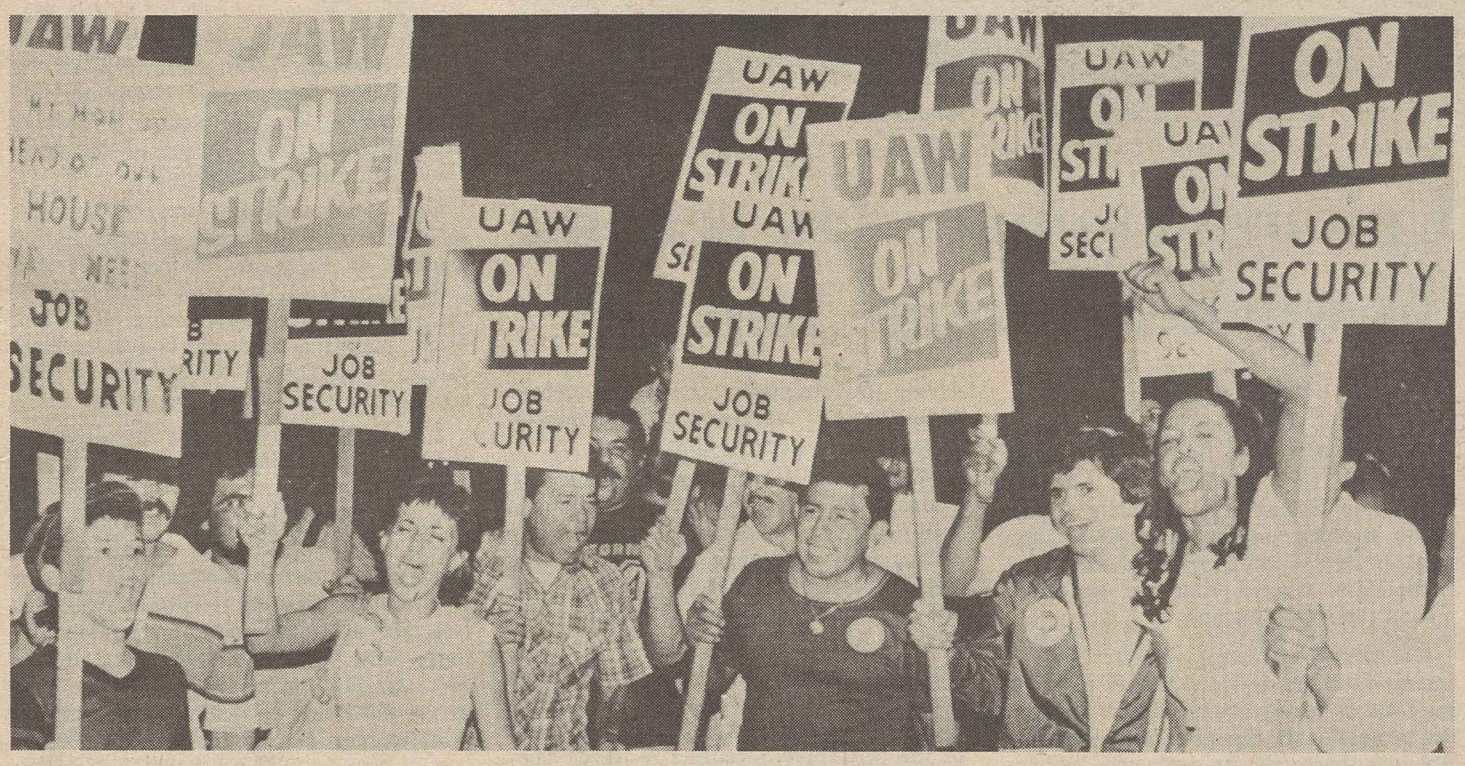
New law bars purge of disabled



Striking Auto Workers in Van Nuys, Calif., show support for union negotiators in General Motors talks.

Benefit rights safeguarded by Congress

By David L. Perlman

Congress unanimously approved a labor-supported bill to protect the social security benefits of disabled workers and prevent any renewal of the brutal purge that was launched early in the Reagan Administration.

Election-year pressure for action helped break a House-Senate deadlock over the shape of the legislation. The final version was close to the measure that had been urged by the AFL-CIO and the Save Our Security coalition.

It sets standards for the periodic review of the medical status of persons receiving social security disability benefits and puts the burden of proof on the government to show that a recipient is no longer occupationally disabled.

The Reagan Administration had launched a disability review procedure soon after it took office, using legislation previously passed by Congress as a mandate to slash the benefit rolls almost in half.

The burden of proof of continuing disability was put on recipients, and the hundreds of thousands of persons disqualified included mentally disabled men and women whose payments were ended after they failed to return forms that were mailed to them requesting information on their current medical condition.

Forced to court

Some 200,000 persons cut off from benefits had to bring court suits to win reinstatement and the courts are still clogged with cases stemming from the Reagan purge.

Expressions of congressional outrage brought a temporary moratorium on the review cutoffs, but a Social Security Administration internal task force noted earlier this month that there are still 50,000 court cases pending and the agency's credibility with the federal courts "is at an all-time low" because of its harsh treatment of the disabled.

The House passed legislation to make permanent changes in the disability review

Reagan scored on refusal to set steel import curbs

By Arlee C. Green

The Steelworkers assailed President Reagan's refusal to take firm action toward rolling back the rising tide of job-ravaging imports that captured 33 percent of the U.S. market in July.

Reagan rejected recommendations of the U.S. International Trade Commission to set a combination of quotas and tariffs on steel imports which the ITC found had seriously injured the American steel industry and its workers.

Earlier this month, Reagan flatly rejected the ITC's unanimous recommendation for import relief for the nation's 30,000 hard rock miners and smelter workers whose jobs are being lost to an unchecked flood of imported copper.

Voluntary effort

In what he called a "new government policy for the steel industry," Reagan said he would ask other steel producing countries to voluntarily hold down "surges" in exports to U.S. markets.

USWA President Lynn R. Williams branded the Reagan plan an "unacceptable substitute" based on "weak and uncertain promises."

Williams charged that the Reagan program "is dependent on the hoped-for good faith of the very foreign governments who have encouraged exports of subsidized and dumped steel to the United States." At a press conference, he stressed that proposals in Reagan's program are "all things he could have been doing all along, but failed to do."

The Steelworkers leader said he was deeply concerned that the President's program, which was embraced by some steel employers, might be a "political promise which is good up to the election," but could be of "no real substance after the election."

Williams said the Administration's plan was not discussed with the union prior to its release, but steel industry officials did participate in White House discussions.

The Reagan program calls for U.S. Trade Rep. William E. Brock to negotiate "surge control" agreements with a number of countries within the next 90 days. Those voluntary agreements will last five years, the White House said. Further, the ITC will monitor the steel industry's efforts at modernization, while the Com-

Auto Workers step up strike at GM plants

Detroit—Talks between the Auto Makers and General Motors Corp., bogged down as the union's selective strikes against the company widened in a contract dispute over job security and wages.

UAW bargainers reported "virtually no progress" in their efforts to reach an agreement with the huge automaker after a number of meetings with management negotiators.

The union stepped up its strikes after GM rejected a UAW counter-proposal laid out by UAW President Owen Bieber and Vice President Donald F. Ephlin, who heads the union's GM department.

Meanwhile nearly 30,000 workers at Cadillac in Detroit, Oldsmobile in Lansing, Mich., Indianapoils Truck, and Flint, Mich., Truck & Bus walked off the job, raising the number of UAW members on strike to more than 92,000.

With the expiration of its contract on Sept. 15, the union selected 13 other GM plants as strike targets as talks on local

Attack on workers

Scheme to tax benefits denounced

The AFL-CIO and its affiliates spoke out strongly against moves to tax workers on the value of their fringe benefits amid indications that such a proposal may be part of the Reagan Administration's post-election scenario.

Union witnesses charged at House hearings that a tax system already tilted against wage-earners would be made even more inequitable if virtually all job-related benefits were considered as taxable income to workers.

The Administration has already proposed to tax health insurance benefits above a specified value, claiming that this would make workers more aware of the need to keep health care costs down.

Now, a Treasury Dept. official testified, the Administration is looking at taxation of worker fringe benefits as a way to raise revenue without the appearance of a general tax increase.

Assistant Treasury Sec. Ronald Pearlman said the issue is being explored as part of the tax recommendations that will be presented to President Reagan after the election. If the President is re-elected, the tax study proposals presumably would be included in the fiscal 1986 budget sent to Congress next January.

Theatening policy

AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison warned that such a tax policy would threaten "programs that fulfill major demonstrable needs and social purposes that affect the great majority of working Americans."

Programs such as health insurance, pensions, day care, education programs and prepaid legal plans have evolved over the years "to achieve specific social goals," Denison said. "They were won through tough decisions based on economics and equity."

Denison was one of a panel of union witnesses appearing before a joint hearing of two House Ways & Means subcommittees.

"Any revenue that Congress attains from taxing fringe benefits will be directly and exclusively taken out of the pockets of working people," he testified. As the trade union movement sees it, Denison said, taxing such fringe benefits "adds up to taxing the same group of people even more."

In other testimony at the hearings:

Mondale sees issues tilting election battle

Walter Mondale and Geraldine Ferraro carried the Democratic presidential campaign to factory gates, shopping centers, college campuses and union conventions.

They hammered away—to cheers from steelworkers and heckling from right-wing student groups—at the issues that could turn around the polls by Election Day.

Mondale talked about steel imports and the arms race, about farm problems and tax fairness—and about a President who shuns substantive debate in favor of television photo opportunities.

Democrats are looking to a series of October debates between the candidates to bring before a national audience a direct comparison between incumbents and challengers.

Reagan agreed to two of the six debates Mondale proposed, but with a panel of questioners rather than the direct confrontation that the Democrats had sought. The first 90-minute debate between the presidential candidates will be Oct. 7, in Louisville, Ky., on domestic and economic issues. An Oct. 21 debate in Kansas City will deal with foreign policy and military issues.

Ferraro-Bush matchup

Ferraro will debate Vice President George Bush in Philadelphia on Oct. 11, also in a 90-minute televised program. Bush said, however, that he considered the occasion as essentially just a press conference, not a matchup with Ferraro. The focus should be "on the top of the ticket," he asserted.

For those listening, the Mondale campaign was demonstrating the spark which polls revealed most voters felt was lacking. In the face of organized heckling at the University of Southern California campus, Mondale spoke over the boos and jeers to give what the New York Times report described as "one of his most forceful speeches."

In Ohio, Sen. John Glenn, who once was seen as the front-runner for the Democratic presidential nomination, was on hand to introduce Mondale and taunt President Reagan's isolation.

In Michigan, Gov. James Blanchard sounded a similar theme. "Ronald Reagan will not stand before an audience like this and answer their questions, even if he has them on cue cards," he said in Detroit.

Ferraro made a campaign stop in Buffalo two days after Reagan had come to the city for a presidential photo opportunity—the dedication of a senior citizen housing project.

The project was built with federal funds under a Democratic program that the Reagan Administration had tried to gut, Ferraro noted.

If Congress hadn't rejected Reagan's proposal, Ferraro told an enthusiastic crowd that filled the city's convention center, "he would have had to have his photo opportunity somewhere else."

At House hearings on moves to tax benefits, AFL-CIO Assistant Research Director Arnold Cantor and Legislative Director Ray Denison.

Unions denounce tax scheme on workers' fringe benefits

ident Robert A. Georgine, appearing as chairman of the national coordinating committee for multiemployer pension plans, said cutbacks in privately funded health and pension benefits "will certainly result in new revenue pressures on federally funded or assisted programs," thus minimizing the revenue gains.

Congress may have legitimate concerns against specially designed benefit plans being used as tax avoidance device by wealthy professionals, Georgine acknowledged. But real abuses can be dealt with by carefully crafted language, he said. As far as workers are concerned, "the very nature of the collective bargaining process—where the employer and the employee have a healthy adversity of economic interest—precludes such abuses."

● Auto Workers Assistant General Counsel Alan Reuther said taxation of existing fringe benefits would amount to cutting the take-home pay of workers. Their tax burden would be increased without any addition to their earnings, he stressed.

"Fringe benefits have helped to make health care, legal services, and education and training available to a broad segment of the workforce," Reuther testified. They have not been used to shelter income from taxation, which is the source of abuse that Congress should properly address, he observed.

● Michael L. Tiner, assistant government affairs director of the Food & Commercial Workers, suggested that Congress should "look to those who benefited most" from the 1981 tax cut legislation for revenue to reduce the deficits that have since resulted.

"Worker benefits negotiated through collective bargaining should not be subject to the vagaries of the tax code," Tiner urged. "Now to help pay for the excesses of the 1981 tax cuts for the wealthy, workers are expected to help balance the budget by alowing Congress to tax their educational assistance program, their group legal service program and their health and welfare program."

Other ideas

The Administration may want to tax worker fringe benefits, but the House Ways & Means Committee has other ideas.

The committee approved legislation that would restore the tax-exempt status of education assistance benefits provided by employers, which expired at the end of 1983. It also approved a bill to continue the exempt status of group legal service benefits that otherwise will expire next Dec. 31.

issues broke down. Chosen were 12 assembly plants and the GM Technical Center in Warren, Mich. A tentative local agreement was reached at one of the plants in Van Nuys, Calif., but workers voted to stay on strike until a national settlement was approved.

The total number of workers now on strike represents about one-fourth of the union's GM membership. The union said its selective, or "mini-strike," strategy had shut down 40 percent of the company's automotive production.

One of the company's responses to the strike has been the layoff of some 16,000 workers at 18 plants in five states that produce parts for the cars not rolling off the assembly lines. The closing of a Flint, Mich., plant that made car bodies for large Buick, Oldsmobile and Chevrolet models accounted for 5,000 of the total.

The UAW walkout is the first against a U.S. automaker since a three-week strike against Ford Motor Co. in 1976.

Key issues in the dispute are job guarantees and wage-benefit improvements. While the union has not specified the size of the wage increase it is seeking, it has rejected as inadequate the company's initial offer of a $600 lump sum in the first year, $300 in the second, and nothing in the third year of a three-year contract. Auto workers earn about $13 an hour.

Profit-sharing

Bieber, the union's chief negotiator, said the parties had resolved some of their differences over the company's "outsourcing," or buying parts from foreign sources, "but we have not resolved the overall problem."

Among other goals, the union is seeking to improve the profit-sharing formula it negotiated for its members in 1982, when they made concessions to aid the company in its recovery. GM earned a record $3.7 billion last year and almost equaled that in the first half of this year, with a profit of $3.2 billion. Management voted itself hefty bonuses earlier this year.

Also continuing negotiations with GM are the Electronics Workers for 24,000 workers at seven plants in Ohio, Mississippi, New York and New Jersey. No IUE workers are on strike.

Economy shows signs of sputtering

A new round of government reports suggested that economic growth in the current quarter may be lower than many analysts had expected.

In its "flash," or preliminary report, the Commerce Dept. said the real gross national product is increasing at an annual rate of 3.6 percent from July through September.

The estimate marks a pronounced slowdown from the 10.1 percent pace set in the first quarter of the year and the 7.1 percent rise for the April-June period. Real GNP is the total output of goods and services adjusted for the impact of inflation.

AFL-CIO Research Director Rudy Oswald said the slowdown in economic growth is discouraging news for the unemployed as they can expect no improvement in the level of joblessness. And, with the growing overvaluation of the dollar and its impact on imports and exports, he warned that workers need to fear more job losses in the months ahead.

"The Reagan Administration will also need to go back to the drawing board and revise upward their projections for budget deficits, as slower growth reduces budget receipts," Oswald said.

Another Commerce report showed that new housing construction plunged 12.8 percent in August, the fourth month of decline this year. The drop confirmed the slowdown evident for several months now as well as the impact of gradually rising interest rates.

Retail sales last month also declined, dropping eight-tenths of 1 percent following a sharp fall in July, and provided another sign of slowdown.

Other reports reflected little or no gain:

● The output of the nation's factories, mines, and utilities slowed sharply in August, rising only two-tenths of 1 percent, as auto and steel production declined, the Federal Reserve Board said.

The Fed's report on industrial production showed a sharp retreat from the increases of nine-tenths of 1 percent in June and July and the rises that frequently exceeded 1 percent over the past 18 months.

● The broadest measure of the nation's foreign trade registered a record deficit in the April-June quarter, $24.4 billion. That surpassed the previous mark of $19.7 billion, which was set one quarter earlier.

Record deficit

After reviewing the second-quarter trade figures, Commerce Sec. Malcolm Baldrige predicted that the current-account deficit for all of 1984 would exceed $100 billion, surpassing his earlier prediction of an $80 billion shortfall.

● The operating rate of the nation's factories, mines and utilities remained at 82.6 percent of capacity in August, the same level as the previous month.

It marked the first time since the fragile recovery began in 1982 that the operating rate did not increase from the previous month. The rate hit a low of 69.6 percent in November 1982, then began rising. There were strong gains of six-tenths of 1 percent in May and five-tenths of 1 percent in July.

The current level is 4.7 percentage points below the high of 87.3 percent reached in 1980.

Still another government report showed that while the majority of states showed some improvement in employment over the year ended in July, jobless rates in 25 states and Puerto Rico rose from June to July.

IUD bargainers win Square D accord

Six unions representing 5,500 employees of the Square D Corp., approved new three-year contracts with the electrical equipment manufacturer after nearly three months of coordinated bargaining steered by the AFL-CIO's Industrial Union Dept.

Although the company pressed for givebacks in the negotiations, "no concessions are in the final agreement," IUD Sec.-Treas. Elmer Chatak said in announcing the settlement. "Our members are protected and the company retains its ability to operate competitively and productively."

The contracts, which took effect Sept. 17 as the old agreements expired, are with the Electrical Workers, Machinists, Molders, Pattern Makers, Sheet Metal Workers and the unaffiliated Teamsters. The IBEW, with 3,500, and IAM, with 1,200 employees are the largest of the six unions.

Highlights of the agreements include a 25-cent hourly wage increase each year, plus a special skilled trades increase of 10 cents an hour in the first year; continuation of the old cost-of-living clause providing a one-cent increase for each three-tenths of 1 percent increase in the government's consumer price index; an early retirement provision; improvements in pension and insurance benefits, and an stock ownership plan for workers.

The contracts cover workers at 25 locations across the country. The largest plants are in Lexington, Ky.; Lincoln, Neb.; Peru, Ind.; Oxford and Middletown, Ohio, and in Milwaukee.

Negotiations were held in Louisville, Ky., because of its central location. The agreements were ratified by locals at membership meetings.

Square D manufactures transformers, panel boxes, and switch gear. Unions representing Square D employees have participated in IUD's coordinated bargaining program for 15 years.

Steel union charges

Reagan import plan just 'weak' promises

merce Dept. and Brock will "rigorously" enforce U.S. trade laws.

Brock told reporters when the White House announced its steel plan that the voluntary trade agreements could reduce import penetration into the domestic market to 18.5 percent. He said, however, that the 18.5 percent figure is "not a target," but only "an estimate" of what the Administration hopes it can do.

By choosing to seek voluntary reductions in imports, Reagan ignored the more effective remedies provided in the 1974 Trade Act.

"From our point of view," Williams told reporters, "the program is all too reminiscent of past failed promises to deal with the steel import problem. Optimism, now, is again based on a mere promise." He said the USWA will "closely monitor the negotiations with foreign governments," but added, "we remain deeply skeptical that this approach can yield acceptable results."

Legislative remedy

Williams stressed that the USWA and the domestic steel producers are still seeking passage of legislation limiting steel imports to 15 percent which is currently stalled in the House Ways & Means Committee. The House Steel Caucus has voted unanimously for a resolution urging immediate action on the bill.

In pressing the union's efforts for passage of the fair trade bill, a delegation of Steelworkers presented House Speaker Thomas P. "Tip" O'Neill with more than 200,000 postcards from USWA members, which declared, "We want work, not welfare" and urged passage of the fair trade measure.

O'Neill said Reagan's program is not the solution to the steel problem. "Going the route he's going is absolutely wrong," he said. "There is a point where we have to protect basic industries. If you allow other countries to dump their steel here, it's absolutely wrong."

Reagan's voluntary restraint program was announced just one day after Democratic presidential candidate Walter F. Mondale had called for mandatory quotas limiting foreign steel penetration to 15 percent of the U.S. market.

Sharp reaction

Capitol Hill reaction to the President's program was sharp. Sen. John Glenn (D-Ohio) said Reagan's program is "hokum, ho-hum and hoodwink" because it provides no meaningful relief, leaves the industry and its workers vulnerable for an indefinite period of time and the "needless suffering and expense" could have been avoided if Reagan "had only kept the promise he made four years ago to enforce our trade laws against unfair imports."

Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) expressed disappointment with the decision, saying, "We need a steel industry for national defense and domestic production. If the American steel industry goes down the drain and we are compelled to rely on foreign imports, the foreign importers will jack up the prices just like OPEC oil did."

Rep. Joseph Kolter (D-Pa.), a member of the House Steel Caucus, said a new study by the Congressional Research Service shows the Defense Dept. will gradually increase its reliance upon foreign steel from 14.4 percent this year to 16.6 percent in 1989. He called this finding a "dangerous situation" in which American defense has a "growing dependence" on foreign suppliers.

Rank-and-file

Rank-and-file Steelworkers expressed their anger at the Reagan plan at the USWA press conference.

Pete Eritano, president of USWA Local 1211 in Aliquippa, Pa., said, "These are the same promises Reagan made four years ago. We have 25 percent unemployment in our town and nearly 66 percent in our local. Our very livelihood depended on Reagan's announcement. I'm insulted by someone handing us the same promise again."

Mike Ally, a member of Local 65 in Chicago, said, "We have 762 members working at U.S. Steel's South Works plant, down from 9,000."

Douglas Rohrer, who is on lay-off from the Jones & Laughlin plant in Youngstown, Ohio, recalled, "I was in the plant four years ago when candidate Reagan issued his promise that 'I will not forget you.' Our company spent $60 million on modernization since then, and now the place is being mothballed. We all feel like we were fooled. We won't be fooled again."

And Bobbie Mackerl of Local 1066 in Gary, Ind., called Reagan's program a "sham." She said her local has shrunk from 6,000 members to 2,500 and she has been laid off several times over the past few years. "When I hear Reagan on television asking if you're better off now than four years ago, all I can answer is, 'Hell no, I'm laid off.' "

House Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill receives a sampling of 200,000 postcards from Steelworkers urging passage of the Fair Trade in Steel Act. USWA President Lynn R. Williams headed the union delegation delivering the cards.

Tile Finishers elect Bombassaro as new president

Las Vegas, Nev.—Delegates to the 24th convention of the Tile, Marble & Terrazzo Finishers elected Gerald Bombassaro to a four-year term as the union's president and secretary-treasurer.

Incumbent President Pascal DiJames, who did not seek re-election to a third term, was named president emeritus. Bombassaro, who was unopposed for the dual office, will begin his four-year term on Jan. 1, 1985.

Bombassaro has been a vice president of the union since 1977. He is president of the union's Local 20 in Pittsburgh.

The 69 delegates also elected seven incumbent and three new vice presidents.

In addition to considering resolutions and adopting constitutional revisions, the delegates discussed current developments in labor and issues affecting their industry.

Machinists greet Mondale with endorsement, cheers

Seattle—Walter F. Mondale received the unanimous endorsement of more than 1,800 delegates to the Machinists convention here—and earned their enthusiastic cheers with a fighting campaign speech.

The convention's theme was "The Voice That Counts," and the resolution endorsing the Mondale-Ferraro ticket called on IAM members to make their voices count at the ballot box in November.

Mondale told the delegates that, unlike Ronald Reagan, he has a plan to reduce the ballooning federal deficit, a plan to restore a fair tax system for the nation, and a plan to end the export of jobs overseas. After describing each of his plans, Mondale demanded of the President: "Mr. Reagan, where is your plan?"

The convention hall roared with that question as delegates joined with Mondale in chanting the demand.

Presidential secrecy

"Every day I meet with the American public and the media," Mondale declared, and talk in depth about my plans. But Mr. Reagan has no plans. Or if he does, he will not tell the American people what those plans are. That is because if they knew what Mr. Reagan's plans were, they would never vote for him."

Mondale told the delegates that he and Geraldine Ferraro would win this fall, "not for ourselves, but for American workers, their families, and the nation."

In a keynote address to the quadrennial convention, Machinists President William W. Winpisinger warned that free unions and collective bargaining will be endangered by "four more years of Ronald Reagan."

Are workers better off than four years ago?

"Not if you are one of those 24 million workers who was unemployed one or more times during the past four years," Winpisinger answered.

"Not if you are one of those ten million still unemployed and have no health insurance or no more employment compensation.

"You are not better off if you are one of these 250,000 IAM members who experienced joblessness at one time or another during the past four years, nor if you are representing some of those 160,000 IAM members who are still marking time in the army of the unemployed," he said.

"You are not better off if you are a typical production worker, whose inflation-adjusted take home pay is less now than it was four years ago. Production workers purchasing power has skidded all the way back to 1962 levels," Winpisinger declared.

"You are not better off if you are an employee of one of some 450 businesses under IAM contract that shut down, moved out, ran away or closed shop on you during the past four years. Nor are you better off if your employer squeezed wage concessions, out-of-pocket health care costs, or disability or work rules changes out of you and your bargaining unit during the past four years," he said.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, addressing the delegates, called for defeat of Reagan's "crackpot economic theories of the radical right."

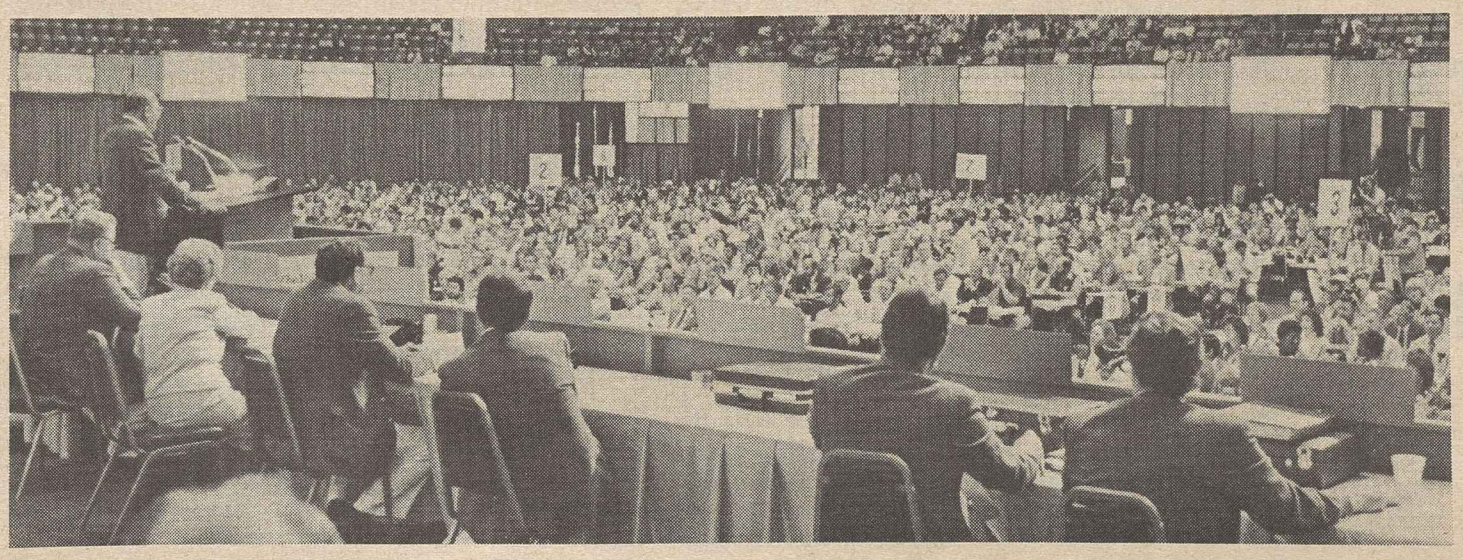
Workers' alternative

The alternative to the union-busting, anti-worker tactics of the Reagan Administration is the election of Mondale and Ferraro, Kirkland stressed.

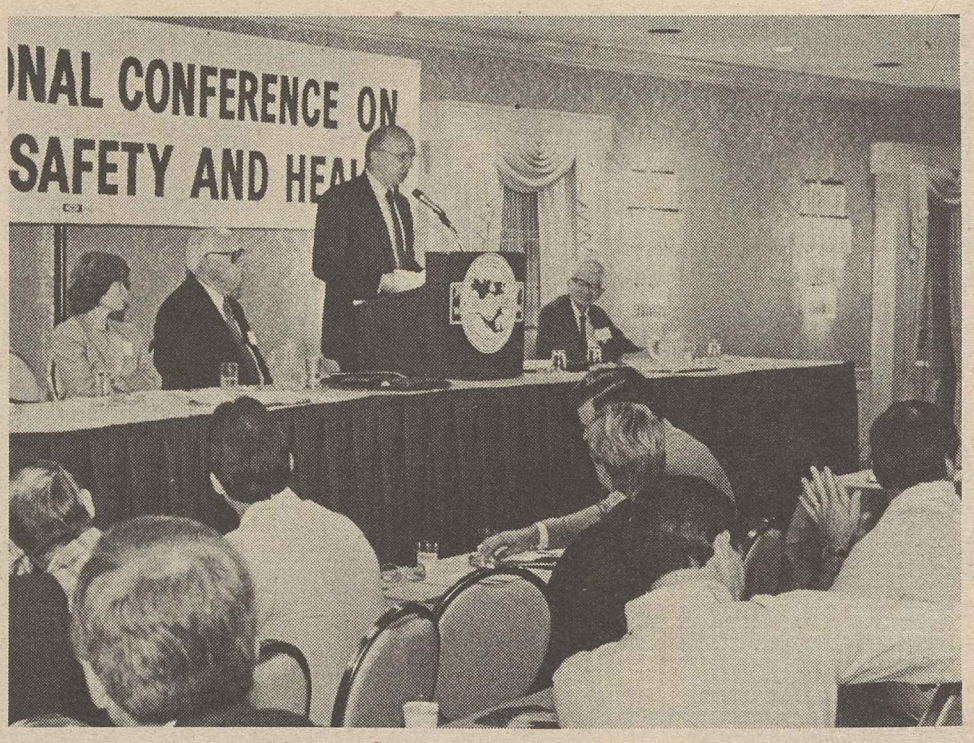
"Mondale demonstrated strong leadership when he refused to bend to the labor-baiters who told him that snubbing the trade union movement was the key to political success," Kirkland said. "He demonstrated strong leadership when he defied the propaganda of free trade, backed domestic content legislation and pledged to stand up for American workers and American jobs," Kirkland told cheering delegates.

AFL-CIO Vice President Joyce Miller spoke of the plight of women under the Reagan "recovery." Miller, who also heads the Coalition of Labor Union Women said Reagan programs and policies have made women the fastest growing poverty group in America.

Later in the convention, delegates were expected to take up the questions of per capita payment adjustment, and increase in the Machinists strike fund and the financing of Placid Harbor, the Machinis education center in southern Maryland.



Machinists President Winpisinger opens the union's convention by stressing the vital role of IAM voters.



Reagan policies on job safety and health have turned back a decade of progress, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue tells the federation's national safety conference.

Reagan record scored

Job safety goals tied to election's outcome

Ousting the Reagan Administration from office in November is labor's first priority in defending workers' health and safety on the job.

That was the message delivered at the AFL-CIO's national conference on occupational safety and health by Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue and Operating Engineers President J. C. Turner, who chairs the federation's job safety committee.

The connection between the November elections and the threat to workers' lives was made by Donahue, Turner and others who charged the Reagan Administration with reversing a decade of progress on job safety and health.

Turner said the election of Mondale will "spark the revitalization of our crusade for occupational safety and health."

Steelworkers President Lynn R. Williams, the keynote speaker, detailed labor's struggle to gain the rights of collective bargaining and workplace safety and health.

"This history is especially important in 1984 . . . because Ronald Reagan is doing his best to stop that progress, to destroy strong unions and to turn the right to a safe and healthful workplace into a privilege granted only if management chooses," Williams said.

Attack on OSHA

Williams reminded the conference that Reagan "told us exactly how he felt" about OSHA in a March 1980 interview with Business Week magazine when he said, "I seriously question the need for OSHA."

"Clearly," Williams said, "the President's work is unfinished. And we had better see to it that it stays unfinished. There is only one way to do that—by electing Walter Mondale and Geraldine Ferraro on Nov. 6."

Kenneth Young, executive assistant to AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, read a telegram from Mondale challenging Reagan's safety and health record. "Every opportunity Ronald Reagan has had to protect worker safety and health, he has chosen to protect the interests of his friends in business instead," Mondale charged.

Mondale co-sponsored the 1970 Occupational Safety & Health Act as a senator from Minnesota. "The first priority of OSHA in a Mondale-Ferraro Administration," he said, would be to "appoint dedicated professionals who believe in the OSHA law and share my concern for the health and safety of workers."

He also reaffirmed his commitment to the people's right to know about toxic chemicals in workplaces and communities and promised to "re-establish our nation as a world leader in occupational safety and health."

Rep. Bruce Vento (D-Minn.), a key sponsor of right-to-know legislation, warned that exposure to workplace hazards is "shortening workers' lives." The risks could be reduced through more research and more effort "on the basis of science," he said, adding that with the Reagan Administration, "anything rooted in science is thrown out the window. Scientific studies are now being denigrated and made a mockery of" by Reagan's "political cronies."

Eroded protections

Dr. Eula Bingham, who headed OSHA under the Carter Administration, told the conference that the erosion of workers' protections under Reagan "is one of the most important reasons to elect a new Administration."

Bingham said that what Reagan thinks and knows about safety and health is reflected in his appointees.

Current OSHA administrator Robert Rowland, whom Bingham called "anti-worker and anti-people," is a tax attorney who served as vice chairman of Reagan's election committee in Texas. Rowland voted against OSHA citations in favor of employers in more than 80 percent of the cases he has heard in his three-year tenure as chairman of the Occupational Safety and Health Review Commission.

Reagan's former OSHA Administrator Thorne G. Auchter, a Florida construction executive who was active in Reagan's 1980 campaign, has been under fire for ordering OSHA in 1981 to drop serious citations and fines against the B. B. Andersen Construction Co. in Kansas City, a Reagan campaign contributor.

Margaret Seminario, associate director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Occupational Safety, Health & Social Security, said Rowland's record at OSHRC shows that he "thinks OSHA has little or no responsibility to protect workers."

She noted a case where OSHA cited a firm for exposing an Electrical Worker to 10 times the legal limit for asbestos. But Rowland held OSHA hadn't shown that workers can get cancer from a short exposure to the mineral and voted to invalidate the citation.

If upheld, Seminario said, it could eliminate legal protections for all workers in asbestos removal operations.

Cost containment bill backed in countering Medicare cuts

Medicare can and should be financed without resorting to cutbacks in benefits and coverage, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison insisted at House hearings.

Denison stressed labor's dissent from the recommendations made last March by a federal advisory panel. The panel's majority proposed to raise the age of eligibility for Medicare coverage from 65 to 67, impose new taxes that would be borne largely by workers, and make the elderly pay a larger share of health care costs.

He told the Ways & Means subcommittee that the AFL-CIO "fully endorses" the minority report presented by the two labor members of the advisory council—President Alvin E. Heaps of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union and Sec.-Treas. Stan Arnold of the Michigan Building Trades Council.

Cost containment

The minority report called for a comprehensive cost containment program for both the private and public health care sectors and said use of general revenue is preferable to putting new burdens on those least able to pay.

Denison reiterated the AFL-CIO's strong support for legislation introduced by Rep. Richard A. Gephardt (D-Mo.) and Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), which would both tighten existing controls on Medicare-covered hospitalization, including the cost of in-hospital physician care, and apply the same controls to hospital charges for non-Medicare patients.

He cited estimates by actuaries that enactment of the measure would result in a surplus in the Medicare Trust Fund until the year 2005 as compared with a projected cumulative deficit of over $150 billion by 1995 if cost increases are not checked.

Legislative alternative

If the legislation is not speedily enacted, Denison said, Congress should authorize general revenue financing as a stopgap measure.

In addition to cost containment legislation, he suggested, Congress could improve the efficiency of the Medicare program by adopting some of the mechanisms that have been worked out at the bargaining table by labor and management to hold down the costs of negotiated health care programs.

"These initiatives include preventive health measures, ambulatory surgery, mandatory second surgical opinions and alternative delivery systems, especially group practice HMOs," Denison testified.

If the Medicare eligibility age is raised to 67, millions of Americans will be left without adequate health insurance, Denison warned.

Reagan challenged on cutbacks by doctor who saved his life

The surgeon who saved President Reagan's life after the 1981 assassination attempt added a postscript to a story the President related in a vote-courting speech to the National Italian-American Foundation.

The grandfather of Dr. Joseph M. Giordano was an immigrant from Italy, the President noted. The doctor's parents had "struggled to make ends meet" and sacrificed to send their son to college and then to medical school. "Because of their diligence, the son became a prominent surgeon in a great hospital."

It was "that son of a milkman," Reagan said, who one day "saved the life of a President of the United States."

Then, with an eloquent pause, "I know this story because I was the patient."

Giordano, who heads the trauma team at George Washington University Hospital, acknowledged the President's tribute in an article in the Sept. 18 Los Angeles Times.

"I know the story, too, because I was the doctor," he said. And while he appreciates the President's tribute to the immigrant virtues of hard work and strong family ties, "there is another part of the story," Giordano stressed. He continued:

"The government social programs enacted over the last 50 years—and so frequently criticized by this President and his Administration—have played a vital role in making this success possible. Although my father bore the brunt of the expense, I received low-interest government loans to help finance part of my medical school education. Many colleagues of mine received even greater government assistance in their education.

"And my profession, stimulated by generous federal funding for biomedical research, has made unprecedented progress in diagnosis and treatment of disease in the last 30 years.

"In contrast to the President, who feels that government programs make people so dependent that they lose initiative, I feel that these programs have enabled people with little resources to reach their full potential.

"These programs are so numerous it would be impossible for me to mention them all. They range from Head Start to housing for the elderly. My parents enjoy a deserved retirement helped by social security, and my father has more than once benefited from the Medicare program.

"Even the civil rights legislation of the 1960s, although primarily designed to guarantee equal rights for blacks, has aided Italian-Americans and other ethnic and racial groups by making discrimination not only illegal but also socially unacceptable.

"It is to be hoped that the President will recognize that millions of other Americans possess the same potential as Italian-Americans. Some will make it on their own. Others will need help. I hope that the government will not abandon the commitment that has meant so much to me and my family."

Panel rebuffs USPS demand on 2-tier pay

An independent factfinding panel recommended that the U.S. Postal Service drop its demand for a two-tier wage system that would put new employees on a lower pay schedule. The three-member panel also called on USPS to give its workers a $2,000-pay raise over the next three years.

"The evidence was not persuasive that a two-tier system is necessary or desirable," the factfinders said in a report. "We recommend that the USPS withdraw its proposal."

The recommendations relate only to issues involving a contract for the 42,000 postal employees represented by the Mail Handlers' division of the Laborers. Two larger unions, the Postal Workers and Letter Carriers, waived a factfinding procedure earlier this month and have attempted to bargain. A fourth union, the unaffiliated Rural Letter Carriers, is awaiting a report on its call for factfinding.

The panel's conclusions, though nonbinding, are also expected to affect the outcome of deadlocked negotiations between USPS and NALC and APWU, which bargain a joint contract for some 500,000 postal employees.

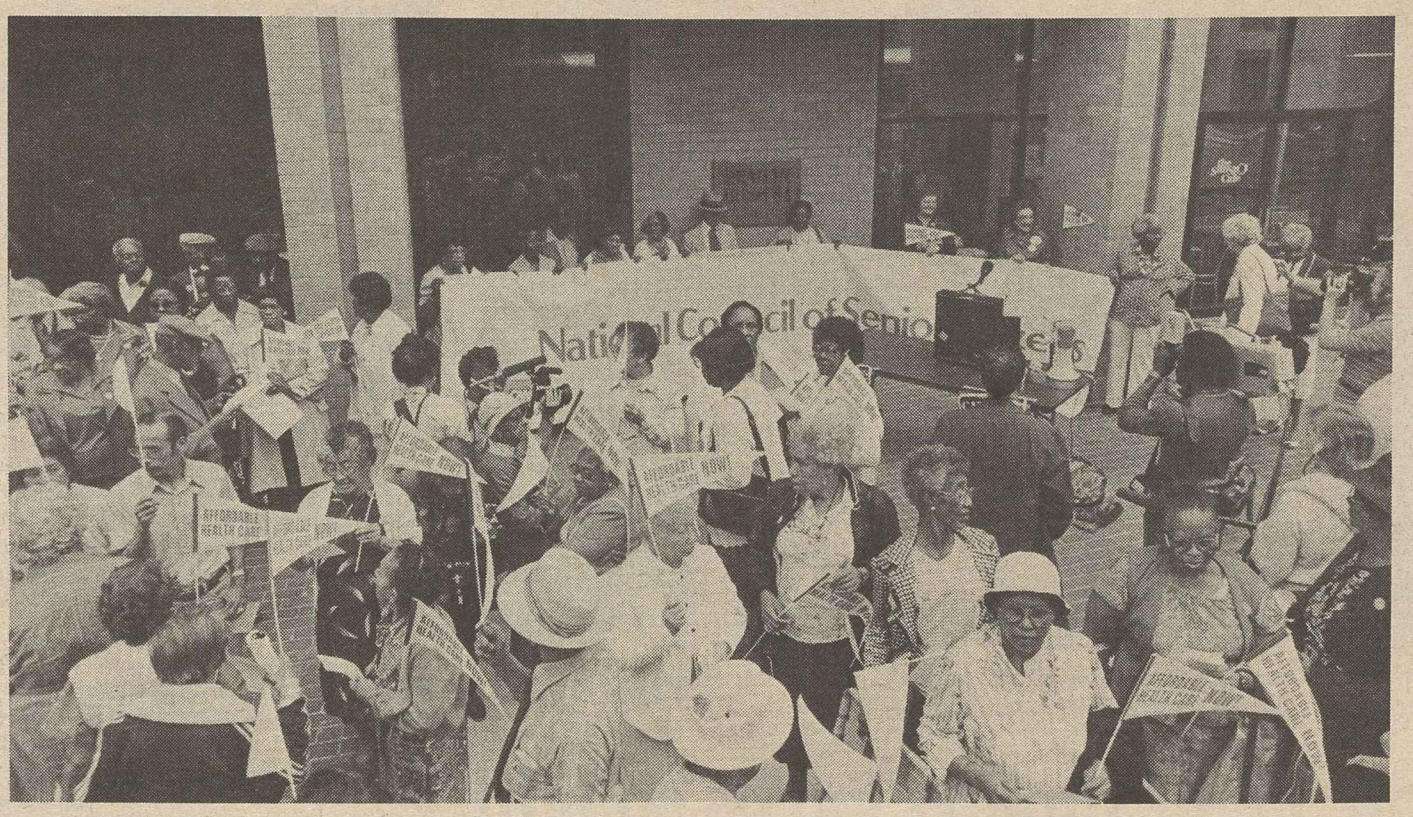
Takeback demands

Negotiations broke down July 20 over the Postal Service's demands for a wage freeze for current employees and a 23-percent lower starting salary for new employees.

Mail Handlers President Lonnie Johnson said the factfinding opinions will "make a breakthrough for all of the unions."

The factfinders' report also rejected USPS's proposal to alter leave policy and cost-of-living adjustments and to eliminate premiums for Sunday work—all key issues in the stalemated contract talks.

Meanwhile, APWU President Moe Biller and Letter Carriers President Vincent R. Sombrotto called for Postmaster Gen. William Bolger to return to bargaining.



Senior Citizens get "no answer" to health care questions at the Reagan-Bush national headquarters.

Seeking answers on health care

Looking for answers to their concerns over health care, members of the National Council of Senior Citizens knocked on the doors of the Democratic and Republican presidential campaigns. While they got a warm welcome and positive answers from Mondale-Ferraro, they got nothing but closed gates from Reagan-Bush.

The NCSC held "Senior Health Action Day" demonstrations in 90 cities across the country, calling attention to the Reagan-Bush campaign's failure to answer its questions on health care issues. The issues included the future of Medicare and Medicaid and hospital and doctors' fee cost containment.

The NCSC, which has 4.5 million members, said it sent both campaigns registered letters on Aug. 27 asking the candidates to answer five key health care questions. Democratic presidential nominee Walter Mondale replied to all five issues "affirmatively" on Aug. 31, but the Reagan-Bush campaign never answered the letter or a later mailgram asking for a reply, NCSC said.

In his letter to NCSC, Mondale promised to protect and improve Medicare and Medicaid without slashing benefits, and to work vigorously for effective, across-the-board health care cost containment.

NCSC Executive Director William R. Hutton predicted that the issues of "saving Medicaid plus holding down costs will have the kind of impact that the social security issue had in 1982." The Reagan Administration proposed a large program of social security cuts that year, but was forced to moderate its demands following a major public storm of opposition.

In Washington, hundreds of NCSC members gathered outside the national Reagan-Bush campaign offices, chanting, "We want answers."

The demonstrators—who got no acknowledgement from the campaign—displayed a "Health Scorecard" indicating "No Answer" from the Reagan Administration in contrast to all "Yes" replies from Mondale.

Later in the day, Mondale spoke to a rally of the NCSC members in Tupelo, Miss., where he outlined his long support of Medicare and Medicaid while he was in the Senate and as Vice President.

In addition to marches and rallies, Senior Health Action Day events in many cities included meetings with state and national officials. Demonstrations spotlighted serious senior health care problems, such as skyrocketing hospital costs and poor nutrition.

ITU looks to Graphic Union merger

Atlantic City, N.J.—Delegates to the Typographical Union convention voted unanimously to direct the ITU leadership to pursue a merger plan with the Graphic Communications Union.

If a merger agreement with the GCIU can't be worked out, the convention called for efforts to seek merger with another AFL-CIO affiliate.

Citing the recommendations of the union's executive council, ITU President Robert S. McMichen said the convention action "gives us the authority and the time to come up with a merger agreement with our most natural ally, "GCIU."

Such a merger would bring virtually all unionized printing industry workers "under one powerful umbrella, and within the mainstream of U.S. and Canadian labor," McMichen said.

ITU has about 75,000 active and retired members, while the GCIU has about 200,000.

Support for the proposition was unanimous after a last-minute revision stipulated that if no agreement could be reached within a certain time with GCIU or another AFL-CIO affiliate, then a "merger/affiliation" document negotiated by the past ITU executive council with the unaffiliated Teamsters would be put out to referendum.

While the convention reached agreement on how to handle the merger question, the process cannot get underway until a federal court injunction barring any ITU merger action is dropped. That injunction was won by several rank-and-file members who opposed the earlier ITU leadership's Teamster bid.

This year's convention proposition on merger gives McMichen 90 days to reach agreement with GCIU or another AFL-CIO affiliate, once the injunction barring merger activity is lifted.

In other convention action, the 200 ITU delegates roundly condemned Ronald Reagan's presidency, declaring in a resolution that his leadership has been harmful to the union's members and working people generally.

The convention unanimously endorsed the Walter Mondale-Geraldine Ferraro Democratic ticket. In convention discussion of the resolution, several delegates noted that the Teamsters are virtually alone among unions in supporting Reagan.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue in his convention address stressed the need to replace Reagan with a man of compassion and concern—Walter Mondale.

Media impact

Donahue observed that the media's negative drumbeat about the condition of the Democratic campaign is having an impact even on some of the party "faithful." "Fritz needs to take tougher positions." he quoted some of the doubters.

Responding to that statement, Donahue declared: "Here is a man who selected a woman as his running mate; he told the nation it is time for the truth about the need to pay taxes; he has taken on the religious extremists, and he has written a prescription for getting us over the Reagan deficits. And the 'smart' money says he should not do any one of those things."

"That is tough enough for me," Donahue said. "That is a tough candidate and that is a winning candidate."

The convention was the first to be conducted by the union's new executive council, comprised of McMichen, newly elected Vice President Bill Boarman and Billy J. Austin, along with Vice President Allan Heritage and Sec.-Treas. Thomas Kopeck. All five, winners of a re-run election overseen by the U.S. Dept. of Labor, were sworn in just 12 days before the convention began.

Nevada federation bolsters campaign for new voters

Las Vegas, Nev.—The Nevada AFL-CIO, gearing up for the fall elections, launched a voter registration drive among union members aimed at lifting the state from last place in the nation in voter participation.

Delegates to the state federation's 38th annual convention unanimously approved a resolution asking each local union to help get out the vote of union families in the November elections.

Rep. Harry Reid (D-Nev.), who was endorsed in his bid for a second term by the convention, told the 140 delegates, "We make it difficult to vote" in Nevada but said this situation could be corrected. He favored making it easier to vote, either through postcard registration or automatic registration when motorists renew their drivers' licenses. The convention also endorsed Democrat Andrew Barbano in his congressional race against incumbent Republican Rep. Barbara Vucanovich.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland drew loud cheers when he said it was time to "get the play-acting" of the Reagan Administration over and done with. "It's time to bring the curtain down on that act," he declared. Democrats Walter Mondale and Geraldine Ferraro are the "real candidates," he said.

The convention called for a continued boycott of six Las Vegas hotel-casinos that have not yet signed union contracts. They are Sam's Town, California Hotel, Marina Hotel, Four Queens Hotel, and two Holiday Inn hotels.

Executive Sec.-Treas. Claude Evans and the federation's six vice presidents were re-elected to new terms of office. President Mark Massagli's term ends next year.

Teachers give Reagan failing grades

According to the Teachers' "report card" on the Reagan Administration, the President flunked his first term and shouldn't be promoted to a second.

The 600,000-member union "graded" the President on six key "subjects" of concern to teachers and the nation, and sent home four "Fs."

The President earned AFT's failing marks in "Arithmetic" for incorrectly claiming he hasn't cut the federal education budget, and in "American History" for "poor retention of the facts" regarding the federal role in education. The union failed Reagan in "Civics" for cuts in programs for the disadvantaged and attacks on civil rights gains, and in "Health" for attacks on worker safety and health protections and his support for plans to tax health care benefits.

Reagan did only slightly better, but still below passing, in "Business" where he got a "D Minus" for failing to recognize the value of education to the future of industry and the nation. He was marked "D" in "Language and Reading Skills" for not understanding a federal commission's calls for education reform.

The President did earn two "A's" from AFT—for "Dramatics" because he "has a real talent for acting," and for "Physical Education," because he is "superb at political football, able to turn bipartisan issues into political battles."

Import issues are addressed by ACTWU President Murray Finley and ILGWU President Sol Chaikin at Senate hearings.

Stronger import curbs sought to salvage U.S. apparel jobs

America's most labor intensive industries face continued erosion unless import restraints are made more effective, the presidents of two big apparel unions told the Senate Subcommittee on International Trade.

Ladies' Garment Workers President Sol C. Chaikin pointed to the loss of 300,000 apparel jobs over the past 10 years. The chief cause, he said, was the "surge of imports from nations where wages are abysmally low and human rights and the right of workers to organize are virtually nonexistent.

Clothing & Textile Workers President Murray H. Finley praised the concept of the Multifiber Arrangement (MFA), which is supposed to regulate access by developing nations to western markets. But he criticized its lax enforcement by the U.S. government.

Finley pointed to double-digit jobless rates in textiles and apparel manufacturing—in both industries higher than a year ago, despite economic recovery and a drop in the national unemployment rate.

While urging "immediate and decisive actions" to curtail imports, Finley said the MFA should be strengthened and not scrapped. "Internationally managed trade is the right way" to deal with world trade problems, he insisted.

Finley also stressed ACTWU's support of union-management's efforts in the men's clothing industry to reduce costs through technological innovation.

Tough competition

Chaikin told the subcommittee that the ILGWU operates in the most competitive industry in America, in which "no single manufacturer represents as much as 1 percent of domestic production and there are more than 25,000 firms engaged in cutthroat competition."

But while U.S. garment workers earn among the lowest wages in domestic manufacturing, importers "have sought out those parts of the world where wages and living standards are even lower."

More than 70 percent of women's apparel imports come from four nations, Chaikin testified. They are "Hong Kong, with an applicable wage rate of $1.18 per hour, Taiwan at 57 cents, South Korea at 63 cents, and the People's Republic of China, where a garment worker earns the U.S. equivalent of 16 cents per hour."

The resurfacing of sweatshops in the U.S. apparel industry, where undocumented workers labor for wages of $1 to $2 an hour, is a byproduct of the "intense competition" from low-wage nations, he said.

International agreements must recognize "the right of all nations to protect their own working people," Chaikin stressed. But "our government does not do so, at least with respect to the apparel and textile industries. We have allowed imports to grow at astronomical rates from year to year," he testified.

Henry Rutz dies at 81, retired AFL-CIO staffer

Bethesda, Md.—Henry C. Rutz, who retired as a representative of the AFL-CIO Dept. of International Affairs in 1968, died Sept. 15 of heart failure at Suburban Hospital in Bethesda, Md. He was 81.

Rutz joined the Typographical Union in 1920 and later served as the fourth vice president of the ITU. He also had been a member of the Teachers and Newspaper Guild.

In 1946, he became a special representative with the AFL working in Germany. In 1955, he was named an international representative of AFL-CIO department.

Survivors include his wife, Elizabeth. Funeral services were held at Christ Lutheran Church in Bethesda, Md.

Rights restored

Disability benefits bill approved by Congress procedure last March. The Senate went part way in the version it adopted in May, but it left the burden of proof of continued disability on the recipient.

One element of the Senate-passed bill was especially objectionable to labor and the social security coalition. It would have allowed the Secretary of Health & Human Services to suspend the cost-of-living increases for disability beneficiaries in any year when the disability insurance trust fund was below a specified level.

In a letter to conferees, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison protested that this would be an "unwise precedent" and a constitutionally dubious delegation of authority to the Executive Branch. He noted that interchanges among social security trust funds have been common. Just last year, Congress reallocated a portion of the disability fund to the Old Age & Survivor's Insurance trust fund "since the disability program was running a surplus."

To cut benefits when the balance changes would be "grievously unfair," Denison said.

In the end, the Senate conferees dropped that provision and also agreed to language specifying that the government can't remove a person from the disability rolls without showing that the recipient's medical condition had improved.

While the Administration had resisted portions of the legislation, the election season and its bipartisan support assures that President Reagan will sign it into law.

There was bipartisan cooperation also in another disability-related bill that has been cleared by a House-Senate conference and scheduled for final approval by Congress.

It amends the Longshoremen's & Harbor Workers' Compensation Act—the federal workers' compensation law that covers persons working in waterfront areas or shipyards.

Employers and insurance companies had complained that a 1972 liberalization of the law had sent costs soaring far beyond estimates and encouraged fraudulent claims.

The effort to work out problems and agree on changes that would be acceptable to all parties involved stretched over two congresses and in the end proved successful.

Benefit ceiling

The new legislation will clarify jurisdiction by limiting coverage to persons working directly on maritime, dock and shipyard operations. It sets a 5-percent ceiling on annual benefit increases and stiffens penalties for fraudulent claims.

It also improves protections for workers by extending the time limits for reporting and filing claims based on occupational diseases. Benefits were also authorized for victims of occupational diseases who do not discover their disability until after they retire, and to their survivors.

In a more controversial legislative area, a House-Senate conference was having only limited success in trying to shape an immigration reform bill that would satisfy the many concerns raised by the House and Senate versions of the bill. The effort was continuing, however.

West Virginia delegates vote support for 75 candidates

Charleston, W.Va. — The West Virginia AFL-CIO convention endorsed 75 candidates for public office and put its support behind four of five state constitutional amendments during a busy two-day meeting here.

The delegates chose not to endorse either candidate in the race for governor in which Democrat Clyde See, a former speaker of the State House of Delegates, is running against Arch A. Moore, a former Republican congressman and two-term governor. See has a 20-percent right COPE voting record, compared to Moore's 42 percent.

The convention endorsed all four incumbent Democratic congressmen — Alan B. Moolohan, Harley O. Staggers, Robert Wise and Nick Joe Rahall — as well as Gov. John D. "Jay" Rockefeller IV in his race for the U.S. Senate seat being vacated by Sen. Jennings Randolph. All five of the candidates addressed the convention.

The state federation delegates also voted support for nine candidates for the State House of Delegates.

The convention also paid tribute to Randolph, who was first elected to Congress in 1932.

The Democratic ticket of Walter Mondale-Geraldine Ferraro received the delegates' unanimous support in a convention resolution acclaiming the national AFL-CIO's endorsement. The resolution assailed the current Reagan Administration as having had the most "devastating impact" on the nation through "meat axe" cuts in social programs that have brought an "explosion of poor people," tax reductions tilted to the rich, and anti-worker bias that has severely weakened the Occupational Safety & Health Administration and packed the National Labor Relations Board with employer partisans.

Vote get-out

State AFL-CIO President Joseph W. Powell called for a strong spirit of trade union solidarity to "rid ourselves of a calloused, misguided and inept Administration" by turning out to the voting booths on Nov. 6.

On five statewide referendum items, the convention delegates supported measures for the establishment of a state lottery; housing bonds of $35 million to provide low-interest loans to veterans; a $50-million-a-year authorization for improvements to schools, roads and public works; and exclusion of intangible property from taxation — a measure that could affect retirees' pension benefits.

In a key resolution, the delegates called on the state to raise the maximum rate for workers' compensation to 133 percent of the state's average weekly wage and to prohibit discrimination by employers against workers who file disability claims.

In an off-year election, the delegates selected Robert L. Kleeh, a Machinist, as the vice presidential replacement for Gerald Keller, an Electrical Workers' member who died earlier this summer.

EPA agrees to open-door meetings

The Environmental Protection Agency has agreed to end its practice of consulting behind closed doors with pesticide manufacturers whose toxic chemicals pose unacceptable health risks to workers and consumers.

The agreement, reached in U.S. District Court in Washington, settles a suit to bar the practice brought against EPA in May 1983 by the AFL-CIO and the Natural Resources Defense Council. EPA Administrator William D. Ruckelshaus signed the accord for the agency.

Federation President Lane Kirkland hailed the settlement, which involves EPA rules on more than a dozen pesticides, as "a major victory for workers and the public."

Under the settlement, EPA agreed not only to stop its evasion of the requirement for public rulemaking, but also to reassess certain pesticides approved after secret discussions with the manufacturers and to seek new safety and health data in making its reassessment.

"If EPA conducts future pesticide determinations in good faith, we have every confidence the result will be better control of these hazardous substances," Kirkland observed.

Federation role

"The AFL-CIO is proud to have played a role in moving EPA to meet its responsibilities to protect citizens from toxic pesticides."

In the 1983 suit, the federation and NRDC charged that EPA excluded the public in determining the health risks of numerous pesticides while the agency met secretly with industry representatives.

EPA will now be required to reassess its rules on the pesticides lindane, benomyl, and paraquat by deadlines set in 1985 and 1986 and to reassess 10 other chemicals by the end of 1986. The agreement also spells out the public information EPA is expected to provide.

The assessments by agency are designed to determine whether the pesticide chemicals cause cancer, birth defects, genetic mutations, nerve damage or other chronic health effects.

In their lawsuit, the AFL-CIO and NRDC charged that private conferences between EPA and the pesticide industry were substituted for the public process required by law for evaluating hazards of pesticides and regulating their use. Thus, the suit warned, the public was inadequately protected.

Reagan's Democrats

TO REAGAN REPUBLICANS, evidently, the only good Democrat is a dead Democrat.

That's the message we get from President Reagan, who used to be a Democrat himself, but now wants all right-thinking Americans to join him in switching to the Grand Old Party.

Reagan made his pitch in Waterbury, Conn., where in an earlier era a huge crowd waited until 3 a.m. to cheer presidential candidate John F. Kennedy at a campaign rally.

He knows from first-hand experience that "it can be a very wrenching thing to change parties," Reagan told the Democrats in the audience. But what else can you do, he suggested, when the party no longer stands for the "good and decent" tradition of Kennedy, FDR and Harry Truman.

In the Kennedy era, Reagan said with emotion, "it seemed like springtime."

What a shame that time has so dimmed the President's memory.

As Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, the late President s brother noted, Reagan wasn't exactly a JFK fan back in 1960. In fact, he was an active participant in something called "Democrats for Nixon."

Not that he was very much of a Democrat in those days. It turns out that Reagan had been voting Republican in presidential elections for some time, but had never gotten around to changing his party registration.

But right after Kennedy was elected President, Reagan registered as a Republican. So much for his "wrenching experience."

IT'S NOT EVEN necessary to have been President to make the list of Democratic heroes in Reagan's rewriting of history. The President is equally effusive in his praise of Hubert H. Humphrey, that gallant battler for the causes and programs Reagan has worked to undermine.

Humphrey didn't quite make it to the presidency, but guess which side Reagan was on when he ran. The President's chief requirement for honoring Democrats, obviously, is that they first be safely dead.

But Reagan is right as can be that Kennedy and Roosevelt and Truman stood for "the interests of the working people."

Indeed they did. They certainly didn't pack the National Labor Relations Board with management consultants who advocate a "union-free" environment. Nor would they have put employer interests above the health and safety of workers.

Neither would Walter Mondale.

Four More Years?

TO RAYMOND JASTRZAB, "President Reagan's decision against steel import quotas is no surprise. We expected him to let us down in our time of need. He sees himself so far ahead in the polls that he doesn't need our help."

Jastrzab is president of Steelworkers Local 2644 at the Bethlehem Steel plant in Johnstown, Pa. He was interviewed by the newspaper USA Today, and these are some of the things he said:

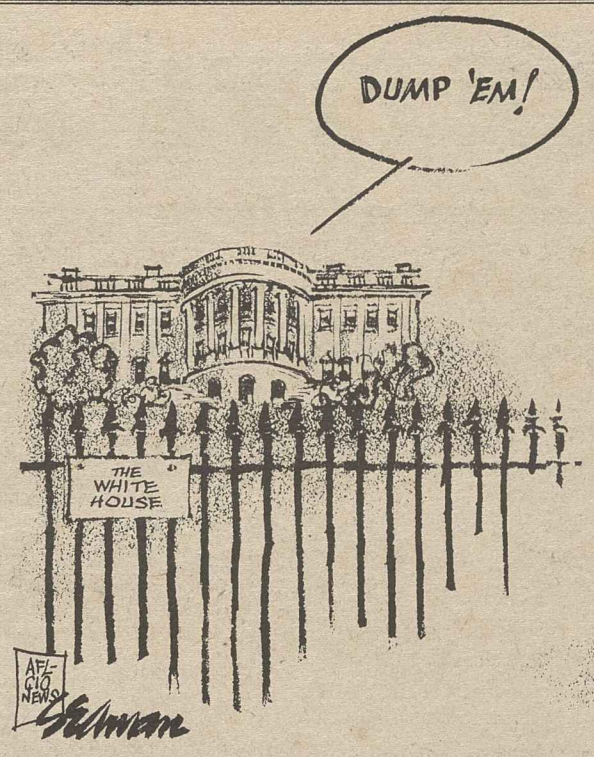
"Everybody says steelworkers make outrageous wages. I make slightly over $10 an hour. Five dollars an hour of our wages comes from cost-of-living allowances, which we are fortunate enough to have. It is not our fault that the consumer price index went up.

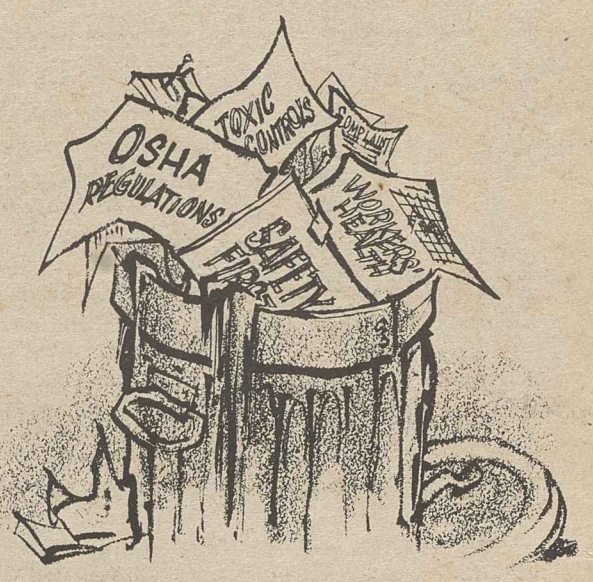
"I know hundreds of people who have been laid off. They have run out of unemployment benefits. They can't pay for their homes.

"President Reagan says there are jobs out there, but how can you pay a mortgage when you make $4 an hour. Those are the only jobs, and in Johnstown, even those have all been taken.

"Steelworkers are being forced down to a lower standard of living. The suicide rate is up drastically, families are broken by divorce, there is an increase in child abuse and alcoholism.

"No one knows whether they will be working next week."





Election issue

Inequity of Reaganomics hits poor, wage earners

By Bayard Rustin

It is now more than three years since the economic programs known as Reaganomics were enacted by a compliant Congress and implemented by an overzealous executive.

The Reagan program, we were told by the President's supply-side theorists, would lead to an expansion of opportunity for rich and poor alike. "A rising tide lifts all boats" was the elegant metaphor used to embellish a program of tax cuts and government restrictions on social spending.

The centerpiece of the Reagan program was the Reagan-Kemp-Roth tax cut of 25 percent. The President's spokesmen and our Chief Executive assured us that this tax cut was equitable. We were told that everyone, no matter what his income, would pay 25 percent less in taxes than before. Everybody would benefit, the President's aides assured us.

Now, more than three years later, it is fair to take a look at the social consequences of the Reagan program. Who were its big winners? And who were its big losers? Did a rising tide emerge? And, if so, did it lift all boats? As the 1984 presidential election nears it is well to ask whether the Administration's program has been fair.

Supply-side results

The answers to a number of these timely and vital questions can be gleaned from a recently published report by the Urban Institute. The Urban Institute is not some politically partisan institution. Over the years it has earned a high degree of credibility through its politically unbiased examinations of social policy, economic trends and urban life. The institute's conclusions about the effects of Reaganomics in the last three years deserve serious attention.

According to the institute study, the real income of the poorest fifth of American families—a disproportionate number of whom are black—has declined by nearly 8 percent since 1980, while the income of the wealthiest one-fifth of American families has risen by nearly 9 percent.

In other words, under the Reagan Administration the poor have gotten poorer and the rich richer.

Nor is the news very good for working Americans. The bottom two-fifths of America's families have lost all the ground they had gained toward equity in the last two decades. And the middle class, those in the middle fifth in terms of income, have had a four-year gain in income which averages out to about $35 per year.

Real income

Overall, the real disposable income of American families has increased only an average of 4 percent in the Reagan years, which is less than half the average gain of comparable periods over the last 30 years.

While there has been some gain in earnings overall, it is largely confined to those Americans who are well off. The poor have suffered a serious erosion in their standard of living. Those in the middle have stayed about even.

So much for the Reagan recovery and the new prosperity. The institute's close examination of "The Reagan Record" indicates that it is characterized by unfairness. It shows that under this President $25 billion has been taken out of the hands of the poorest Americans and transferred into the hands of the wealthiest.

Moreover, under Ronald Reagan the proportion of taxes paid by lower income workers (those in the bottom 40 percent) has risen, while the taxes of the top income group have fallen dramatically.

In this election year, the findings of the Urban Institute should be the occasion of a serious discussion of the so-called "successes" of the Reagan economic program. Reaganomics has taken from the poor, denied advancement to the middle class of working people, and benefited only the rich.

Now if each of these groups votes their economic interests in November, we will have a new President in the White House—one who understands that economic growth is only possible in the context of social justice and equality.

LEGISLATIVE ALERT!

The Hired Guns Who Sell Out U.S. Trade Policy to the Japanese

As the U.S. trade deficit continues to hit record levels, the October 1 issue of the New Republic magazine exposes a sordid story that every American worker should read.

In a nutshell the article details the "selling out" of America in its crudest form. It describes how former U.S. trade officials who, while in government service, feathered their own nests. They did so by bending over backwards to advance Japan's trade interests while serving as U.S. government regulators and then later hiring out as lobbyists for a collection of Japanese corporations. Thus our principal international trade agencies -- the White House Official U.S. Trade Representative (USTR) and the International Trade Commission (ITC) -- which are supposed to look out for U.S. interests, are described by author David Osborne as "virtual training camps for our Japanese competitors, whose roster of lawyers, lobbyists, and consultants reads like an all-star team of former U.S. trade specialists."

Among those well-heeled, ex-government officials who now fight for Japan Inc. are:

*Eric Garfinkel, an attorney who spent most of 1981-82 at U.S.T.R. and then moved to the White House to become the chief international trade lawyer at the Office of Policy Development. While there, he was deeply involved in the 1983 Administration debate over import sanctions against the Japanese machine tool industry. Six months after the case was decided in Japan's favor, Garfinkel left the White House to join a prominent Washington law firm. His most important client? The Japanese Machine Tool Builders Association, which is again fighting a suit by the American machine tool industry.

*Daniel Minchew, former ITC chairman under Presidents Ford and Carter, later admitted to selling out while on the government's payroll. While a member of the ITC, he negotiated a contract with his future Japanese employers. This breach of ethics only came to the government's attention when a Japanese official called State Department to ask why an ITC commissioner was soliciting business from his Tokyo hotel room.

*William Eberle, who was the U.S. Trade Representative under Presidents Nixon and Ford, earned $216,000 lobbying for Nissan in 1983. Steve Lande, a Garfinkel's colleague at U.S.T.R., who was in charge of Japanese negotiations for several years at the agency, went to work for Eberle in 1982.

*U.S.T.R. General Counsel Alan Wolff left to practice law and handle a $200,000-a-year retainer with Nissan within a year after leaving his government post.

The worst case though dealt with another U.S.T.R. veteran John Rehm whose clients have included Toyota, Nissan and Subaru. Rehm also represented Sears Roebuck and Co., which was indicted in 1980 for allegedly concealing $1.1 million in rebates on television sets it bought from Japanese manufacturers. According to the grand jury, Sears sought to avoid the "dumping" tariffs imposed on foreign-made TVs sold under a certain U.S. price by paying more for the TV sets than the actual transaction price. It then got the money back in rebates on items not subject to dumping duties. Rehm was named as an unindicted co-conspirator on the strength of a memo in which he allegedly proposed the rebate scheme. The case has yet to come to trial.

This pattern of musical chairs according to author Osborne, has also had its impact at the ITC. Several years ago, for example, an ITC staff member hired on as a lobbyist with Honda a few months after completing her portion of a report on whether domestic automakers should be given relief.

You can imagine the effect this "golden revolving door" has had on those government regulators left behind, particularly when they see their predecessors earning $200,000 a year from Japanese clients. As Joel Lisker, who formerly directed the Justice Department office where foreign lobbyists are required to register, puts it, "There's some incentive there to try to go easy."

No wonder many in Washington believe that agencies such as U.S.T.R. have become nothing more than a conduit for ambitious young lawyers to "cash in" on their experience in government. And with only their future in mind, you can imagine what the quality of their law enforcement in international trade has been.

In the final analysis, as hired gun Garfinkel describes Japan Inc., "There's no single foreign government that's got the number of hired guns in town that they've got." Only thing is, in his case he and they are one and the same. And the last thing the've got in mind is the interest of American workers. Isn't free enterprise just grand!

WOULD YOU BELIEVE...

Donald Dotson is the infamous Reagan-appointed Chairman of the National Labor Relations Board.

He's the guy who, along with his right wing cronies on the Board, has succeeded in putting labor relations back fifty years. As a result many unions don't bother appealing even the most blatant cases of employer misconduct to the NLRB because they know in advance the verdict they'll get from the Dotson gang. Things are so bad over at the Board that board members are in a public shouting match over the chairman's obnoxious behavior towards other board members. Meanwhile back at the NLRB the case backlog is at record levels.

What next you ask? Would you believe the Donald Dotson Scholarships in Labor Relations (read union busting) from Campbell University, North Carolina! The Dotson scholarships may sound like a joke but we're not kidding. Here's a reprint of a recent solicitation on behalf of the scholarship. If Dotson's reign weren't so tragic for workers' rights, this might be funny.

Next we expect to see Campbell University offering the Ayatollah Khomeini scholarships in political science or how about the Idi Amin endowment for the Humanities?

Mondale presses 'talk sense' strategy

Slams Reagan for trivializing election issues

By David L. Perlman

Walter Mondale talked like a Dutch uncle to affluent college students and like an old friend to union steelworkers.

He talked sense and issues to both groups—and they loved it.

Geraldine Ferraro continued to draw big, enthusiastic crowds in city after city, throwing well-aimed barbs at the Reagan Administration.

For the Democratic candidates, coming from far back in the polls, the campaign was clearly on an upswing.

In Cleveland, it was "fighting Fritz" who had the Steelworkers' convention hall rocking with applause as he ripped into the policies of an Administration which has turned its back on the nation's basic industries and its workers.

Democratic coattails

This President who seeks a "union-free environment" is trying to cover himself with the cloak of Franklin Roosevelt, John Kennedy, Harry Truman and Hubert Humphrey, Mondale scoffed.

"They belong to us," he said to ovation after ovation, "and all they stand for speaks to us. Coolidge and Hoover and Nixon belong to them, and they can have them."

A day earlier, in what more than one jaded political reporter described as the most memorable speech of the campaign, Mondale talked to George Washington University students of President Reagan's attempt to trivialize the election process by ignoring issues of substance—relying on "happy talk" and television images.

"There ought to be a big difference between a presidential election and a pep rally," Mondale insisted.

"This election is about values," he said. "Today, millions of American children are born in poverty. Many go to school hungry. Many don't learn to read and don't learn to hope. And nearly everything we've done as a nation to help these children has been cut back by this Administration."

Win or lose, Mondale said, "I won't permit this crowd to steal the future without a struggle. I won't let them put ice in our soul. They have a right to ask for your vote. But I'll be damned if I let them take away our conscience."

Black students at Texas Southern University in Houston didn't need any reminders about poverty and overflowed the auditorium in as enthusiastic a welcome as Mondale has received in this campaign.

Workers' buying power registers sharp decline

Auto Workers President Owen Bieber and Vice President Donald Ephlin announce tentative three-year agreement with General Motors Corp.

Auto Workers council backs GM settlement

St. Louis—Local union leaders from General Motors plants endorsed the tentative contract negotiated by the Auto Workers and sent it to UAW members for a ratification vote.

The three-year agreement calls for wage increases and what the union termed "an unprecedented job security program" for some 350,000 active and laid-off GM workers.

It was overwhelmingly approved by the union's 300-member General Motors council at a meeting here. The membership vote on ratification is expected to be completed by Oct. 14, the union said.

In addition to the key wage and job security provisions, the contract calls for three additional paid holidays, a $300 annual bonus for workers with a perfect attendance record, increased pension payments and an early retirement plan.

UAW President Owen Bieber and Vice President Donald Ephlin, who heads the union's GM department, described the agreement as "an excellent settlement that makes more secure than ever in history the jobs of our UAW-GM members while providing much deserved economic improvements immediately and in the years ahead."

The settlement, whose details are being withheld by the union until ratification, ended the union's selective strikes against 17 key GM plants across the nation.

The centerpiece of the contract's job security plan is an agreement by the automaker to spend up to $1 billion over the

Price surge beats down real wages

By James M. Shevis

The average worker's purchasing power shrank in August as real earnings dropped sharply—a seasonally adjusted 1 percent—while the rise in retail prices more than doubled over the month.

In its monthly report on earnings, the Bureau of Labor Statistics said that real, or inflation-adjusted, pay averaged $172.19 a week in August compared with $173.92 in July. Average weekly gross earnings, in current dollars, remained the same, $293.92.

The steep reduction in purchasing power was due entirely to the sharp rise of nine-tenths of 1 percent in the government's Consumer Price Index for Urban Wage Earners & Clerical Workers (CPI-W) in August. Both average hourly earnings and average weekly hours were unchanged between July and August.

The August decline in real earnings was the largest monthly drop in a year, and followed a decline of four-tenths of 1 percent in July. Over the year, real earnings were up 1.3 percent.

Before tax bite

AFL-CIO Research Director Rudy Oswald noted, however, that the 1.3-percent rise over the year is before taxes. If social security and federal income taxes are taken into account, he said, the rise is only nine-tenths of 1 percent.

Even with the over-the-year increase, real average earnings are still below the 1979 level.

The August jump in the consumer price index was mainly the result of increases in prices of food and beverages and in the cost of housing. Food and housing accounted for about three-quarters of the overall rise in the monthly CPI-W index.

'Second-term agenda'

Reagan ax poised for more cuts

If President Reagan should be re-elected in November, the Administration's budget ax will swing wickedly in January. Its targets will be whatever non-military programs weren't drastically slashed in the President's first term.

That's the view of "Reagan's Second-Term Agenda" that emerges from a Fortune magazine article based in interviews with Washington insiders, including "the President's closest advisers."

The President may be keeping silent about his post-election plans while he campaigns for re-election. But some of his top aides have been less reticent, Fortune's Washington editor, Peter W. Bernstein found.

The goal is a Reagan victory conclusive enough to enable the White House to claim a "mandate," as it did when it took office in 1981. Then, it used the budget process as a shortcut to push through the bulk of the Reagan program within the first few months of his Administration.

Social programs

Programs for the poor were slashed, tax benefits for business were enacted and the military buildup launched. The architect of the budget cuts, OMB Director David A. Stockman, told Fortune that the big mistake was in not going still further with the spending cuts. "We should have gone after the big boulders—the social insurance programs," he is quoted.

A second Reagan Administration would not make the "mistake" again, the Fortune article suggests.

"It would try to lump most spending-control proposals into one comprehensive package and get Congress to pass it quickly. It's clear where the Reaganites would wield the budgetary ax, although they don't want to advertise their plans in an election year."

A "prime target," the magazine says, is farm programs — despite the assurances Reagan has given to farm audiences on his campaign tours.

Also singled out for "big cuts," the article indicates, are programs to help college students, veterans' health benefits, and government and military pensions.

IAM delegates draft funding, benefit plans

Seattle—The Machinists convention approved a series of changes in the IAM's constitution and adopted resolutions geared to an agenda for progress over the next four years.

The 1,798 delegates voted to amend the per capita tax payment formula, dramatically increased the union's weekly strike benefit payments and provided a funding mechanism for the IAM education center at Placid Harbor, Md.

On the per capita question, delegates agreed to continue the per capita formula at an amount equal to the weighted average hourly earnings of all members on a union-wide basis. That amount is now $11.01 per month with 20 percent or $2.20 per member per month going into the strike fund.

Delegates also voted to give substantial relief to locals whose members earn an average less than $8.50 per hour through a newly devised rebate system. One of the reasons for this special decrease in per capita payment is to encourage organizing of nonunion workers whose wages fall below $6.50 per hour.

Effective next Jan. 1, locals whose weighted average hourly earnings are between $7.51 and $8.50 will have their per capita tax reduced $1 per month; locals with average earnings between $6.51 and $7.50 hourly will get a $3 reduction, and locals with average earnings of $6.50 or less will get a $5 reduction.

Yearly increases

Beginning in 1986, payments will increase 50 cents each year through 1988 for each 5-percent gain in the union-wide average earnings over 1985.

Delegates voted to raise strike benefit payments from the current $40 to $70 per week, effecitve in 1985 and agreed to continue the two-week waiting period before benefits are paid.

In agreeing to keep the union's Placid Harbor education center open, delegates approved a law committee recommendation to invest income from the strike fund —up to $2 million a year—and use the revenues for the facility's operations.

Earlier, delegates unanimously endorsed Walter F. Mondale for the presidency after the Democratic candidate's convention address. IAM President William W. Winpisinger warned that four more years of the Reagan presidency would be disastrous for the union.

On child care

Establishment of a model child care program to serve the staffs of the AFL-CIO and Washington-based unions was explored at a day-long meeting convened by the federation's departments of Community Services and Occupational Safety, Health & Social Security. From left: Anna Padia of the Newspaper Guild; Bert Seidman, director of the social security department; Dan Lazorchick, child care consultant; Teri Domanski, director of the YMCA's Office of Health Enhancement, and Cheri Sheridan, child care consultant.

Connecticut labor to press voter registration campaign

Hartford, Conn.—In a state battered by plant closings, the trade union movement regards the election of Walter Mondale and Geraldine Ferraro essential to restoring economic health.

Delegates to the Connecticut AFL-CIO convention backed up their unanimous endorsement of the Democratic presidential ticket with a call for a registration effort that will assure that every union member is eligible to vote.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue roused the delegates as he zeroed in on President Ronald Reagan's record of attacks on labor, students, retirees and the middle class.

Donahue, along with Sen. Christopher J. Dodd (D-Conn.) and Ted Mondale, speaking on behalf of his father, spelled out the reasons why union members should vote in record numbers in support of the Mondale-Ferraro ticket.

President Reagan had invoked the memory of John F. Kennedy's presidential campaign in nearby Waterbury on the convention's eve, and Donahue charged that Reagan's "scriptwriters" had "hit an all-time low."

It was "deceitful' for Reagan to read lines associating himself with Kennedy's campaign in 1960 "when he opposed JFK every step of the way and campaigned for Richard Nixon."

And it was "deceitful," Donahue added, to pretend that Democrats who switch to Reagan will not be abandoning principle. Certainly, "advocating trickle-down, supply-side economics is different from the philosophy of the Democratic Party that we ought to buld a strong nation from the bottom up, from jobs for workers to adequate educaiton for theri children and improved old-age care for their parents."

Masked recovery

In his annual report to the delegates, state federation President John J. Driscoll warned that the state's recent economic upturn masked several soft spots. He pointed out that one-fourth of all jobs which were listed as new jobs that contributed to the state's low unemployment rate were part-time. He noted the number of workers in Connecticut's higher-paid factory jobs had plummeted by 33,000 since Reagan took office.

The delegates adopted a strong resolution calling for adequate notification by management of the intention to close factories or other places of business, plus payment of severance pay and other supplemental benefits in the event of such shutdowns.

Factory jobs used to represent over 50 percent of all jobs in the state, Driscoll noted, but now due to plant closings and out-of-state consolidations, factory jobs account for only 23 percent of the state's total jobs.

The convention endorsed six candidates for Congress, including all four Democratic incumbents. The two Republican incumbents up for election have COPE voting records below 50 percent on labor issues and their challengers were voted the endorsement.

Endorsements were made for 122 members of the state's General Assembly, including six Republicans who had given strong support to labor's program in the legislature.

Betty L. Tianti, secretary-treasurer and chief lobbyist for the State AFL-CIO, reported a number of gains in the 1983-84 legislative session, stressing that there had been no losses or weakening of state labor laws.

JLC conference explores key issues facing workers

Unity House, Pa.—Major issues facing American workers were explored at the 14th Labor Human Rights Conference of the Jewish Labor Committee's National Trade Union Council. The more than 200 delegates examined the problem of imports, Jewish-black relations and the 1984 political campaign, among other topics discussed.

President Sol C. Chaikin of the Ladies' Garment Workers termed the rise in imports over recent years particularly damaging to labor-intensive industries. The so-called underdeveloped nations have targeted these U.S. industries and have built plants for production of exports.

Human repression

"These industries are subsidized by their governments," Chaikin stressed. "And these subsidies are not just financial—there is repression which keeps labor submissive and union-free. And by keeping wages low, U.S. labor is prevented from being competitive."

He called for "a rational policy of job conservation" as a response to the export-import problems.

The session on the 1984 campaign and Jewish-black relations was addressed by Hyman Bookbinder of the American Jewish Committee and presided over by Norman Hill, president of the A. Philip Randolph Institute.

Hill observed that the Rev. Jesse Jackson's candidacy for the Democratic Party's presidential nomination had served to solidify the participation of blacks in the political process and to demonstrate that the most clearly anti-Reagan vote is the black vote.

Bookbinder stressed that "the issues of jobs, dual primaries, disarmament progress, while clearly enunciated by Rev. Jackson, must not be perceived as black issues alone." He also pointed out that the record of black congressional figures on major issues is consistently liberal and progressive.

The development of the labor movements of the United States and Canada was described by Martin J. Morand, director of the Pennsylvania Center for Study of Labor Relations. And a session on the future prospects of the State of Israel was led by David Freilich, an American who emigrated to Israel and became a captain in the Israeli Defense Forces.

In the election of officers, Sol Hoffman of the ILGWU was re-elected as chairman of the Trade Union Council. The new executive director of the JLC, Martin Lapan, was elected council executive secretary.

Reagan seen delaying stand on pay issue

The State, County & Municipal Employees challenged the Reagan Administration to take a stand on the politically hot pay comparability issue, but the White House probably won't show its hand until after the election, the union warned.

AFSCME's hunch that the Administration plans an unpleasant "December surprise" for supporters of pay equity for women workers has been fueled by statements made by Assistant Atty. Gen. William Bradford Reynolds criticizing the landmark federal court pay equity ruling in Washington State.

In the case decided last September, U.S. District Court Judge Jack Tanner in Tacoma found Washington guilty of sex bias in its pay scales, and ordered the state to upgrade the wages of some 15,000 of its women employees to levels comparable to those paid to men holding jobs requiring similar skills and responsibility. The multi-million dollar suit had been brought by AFSCME.

Reynolds branded the decision "wrong," and called it a "dangerous precedent," pledging to urge the Justice Dept. to intervene in the case on the side of the state's appeal for reversal.

The state has since appealed Tanner's decision, arguing in a brief filed with the 9th Circuit Court of Appeals in San Francisco that it had no obligation to implement the findings of a state-commissioned study which showed a 20-percent disparity in pay between male and female workers in some 80 job categories.

AFSCME has until Nov. 16 to respond to the brief, and oral argument is likely to be held in February 1985 or later.

Diana Rock, AFSCME's director of women's activities, criticized the Administration for its refusal to make public its position on the issue before the Sept. 17 deadline for filing "friend of the court" briefs with the appellate court which will hear the case. The courts usually permit the Justice Dept. to intervene in suits even after filing deadlines expire.

Deferred action

At a news conference following a meeting with U.S. Solicitor General Rex Lee, Rock said the union and representatives of several women's and civil rights groups were told that the Justice Dept. would not intervene in the case by the deadline, but Lee refused to say whether the Administration would act later.

She told reporters that AFSCME has learned that the Justice Dept. has prepared a brief attacking the Washington decision and that it has been sent to the White House for review.

Rock said the union would like to see President Reagan "end his silence" on both the political issue of pay equity and on the legal issue in Washington State.

"If he really wants to end sex-based wage discrimination, he will instruct the Justice Dept. to support the decision in AFSCME versus Washington State . . . if he wants to send a signal to employers that it's OK to discriminate against women, then he should instruct his Justice Dept. to oppose the decision," Rock declared.

If the President doesn't act, she said, the union will assume "he isn't sure whether or not he is opposed to sex discrimination or he doesn't want us to know how he feels until after the election."

More cutbacks due in Reagan agenda

Programs for the poor have been so sharply reduced in Reagan's first term that there isn't much opportunity for further cuts. But "middle-class" entitlements —those you don't have to be poor to get —will come under fire," Fortune reports.

The Administration has already spelled out its prescription for Medicare, including higher charges to be paid by beneficiaries and tightened eligibility requirements. The Administration has also proposed to limit the tax-free health insurance benefits that workers could receive from employers.

But even with some hidden tax increases, deficit reduction in a second Reagan Administration would be mostly rhetoric.

If in addition to a Reagan election victory, the Republicans kept the Senate and scored gains in the House, the Fortune article suggests that "Congress would have a hard time resisting new Reagan initiatives."

For organizing

Steelworkers target high-tech industries

Cleveland—The Steelworkers are looking to new organizing opportunities in high-tech growth industries to replenish membership ranks decimated by the Reagan recession and the industry's shrinking workforce.

Delegates to the USWA's 22nd biennial convention adopted a "future directions" report that proposes to make the union's 23 geographic districts the focus for a largely decentralized organizing thrust.

It looks to expansion both within the USWA's traditional targets, such as smaller "mini-mills" and unorganized can plants, and to groups of other unorganized workers in areas where the union has substantial membership.

The study on which the report was based had been initiated by the late Lloyd McBride and carried on by his successor as USWA president, Lynn Williams.

More than 3,100 delegates, meeting in the city where the union held its first constitutional convention in 1942, represent some one million members—but more than 200,000 of them are still on layoff.

The immediate goal for the union, Williams told the delegates in his keynote address, is to make sure that the membership understands the relationship between bargaining results and election results.

Reagan's rejection

Shortly before the convention opened, President Reagan rejected the recommendations of the U.S. International Trade Commission for a combination of quotas and tariffs on subsidized steel imports that have been wiping out U.S. jobs.

It was a constant theme of speakers during the convention's opening days, echoing Williams's urging that the "all-important" task until Election Day is the defeat of Reagan.

Delegates welcomed Mondale with a sea of placards and repeatedly broke into his speech with ovations.

Reagan "turned his back" on the steel industry and its workers, despite his 1980 campaign promises of help, Mondale reminded the delegates. "He forgot you; now it's your turn to forget him."

His own proposals for the industry, Mondale said, would restrict imports to 17 percent of the domestic market for a five-year period in exchange for a management and union commitment to recycle profits into new plants and hold down prices.

Earlier, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland ripped into the Reagan record and suggested that the President was testing "the limits of the public's gullibility."

Reagan is ducking issues and treating the public "to a happy-hour binge," hoping that the hangover can be put off until after the election, Kirkland suggested.

Williams told the delegates that Reagan policies had left "a terrible hurt in this land." In the October debates, he predicted, "Americans will find out that Ronald Reagan can run, but he can't hide."

The future directions report proposed greater local level involvement in the union's political education role as well as in organizing. It looks also to new techniques and technologies for more effective data banks, opinion surveys, direct mail campaigns, training for voter registration drives, phone bank utilization, fund-raising seminars and expanded participation of retired members.

In the organizing area, the report proposes the development in each USWA district of a two-year plan, setting forth potential organizing targets and detailing the resources needed. A specialized staff at the Pittsburgh headquarters would develop organizing materials and train teams of district organizers.

McBride honored

The convention paid tribute to McBride with a commemorative resolution and film highlights of his career.

Delegates also responded generously with a collection in support of the Phelps Dodge copper strikers, after hearing from retired USWA President I. W. Abel and Angel Rodriguez, president of Local 616 in Morenci, Ariz.

Speakers in the first two days of the convention included Urban League President John Jacob, who termed jobs "the single, central, burning issue in 1984." Unemployment kills people and destroys families, he said.

Ohio Gov. Richard Celeste and other state officials welcomed the delegates. Celeste termed Reagan's refusal to approve import quotas "the white flag of surrender" for American jobs and industry.

ILA's Gleason backs Reagan-Bush ticket

New York — Longshoremen's President Thomas W. Gleason has announced "on behalf of the ILA" an endorsement of President Reagan and Vice President Bush for re-election.

Gleason said Reagan's first-term record has earned him "the opportunity to continue."

AFL-CIO charter is presented to President Henry Nicholas and other officers of the 65,000-member Hospital & Health Care Employees by Federation President Lane Kirkland and Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue.

Federation issues charter to Health Care Employees

The National Union of Hospital & Health Care Employees received its charter as an AFL-CIO affiliate and declared a priority goal of organizing health care workers in every part of the country.

"Our job is to organize the unorganized," President Henry Nicholas said, "help them win salaries and working conditions in keeping with the vital work they do," and strive to make "decent patient care available to all Americans."

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland presented the charter to officers of the federation's newest affiliate, to take effect Oct. 1.

The Hospital Employees had been a division of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union, but the parent union endorsed the charter application as part of an agreement resolving internal differences.

The outcome is that the largest segment of the hospital and health care division—the big New York City area District 1199—will remain with the RWDSU. That's the union which recently ended a 47-day strike with contract gains for about 50,000 workers.

Some confusion is inevitable since the new union's membership across the country—it reports some 65,000 workers in 22 states—is in districts that are offshoots of the original 1199. They have designations such as 1199C in Philadelphia, 1199E in Baltimore and 1199/New England.

In addition to Nicholas, the top officers of the new Hospital & Health Care Employees are Sec.-Treas. Jerry Brown, Executive Vice President Bob Muehlenkamp, Executive Sec. Donna Ford, and Beatrice Crockett-Moore, who was recently named secretary to replace Doris Turner after the New York district chose to stay with the RWDSU. Turner is president of RWDSU District 1199 and had been secretary of the national division.

The newly chartered union will continue to keep its headquarters in New York City.

Organizational asset

RWDSU President Alvin E. Heaps, who is an AFL-CIO vice president, recommended the issuance of a charter at the May meeting of the Executive Council, and it was unanimously approved. Heaps predicted at the time that the new affiliate would be "an organizational asset to the AFL-CIO."

A number of AFL-CIO affiliates bargain for hospital and nursing home workers, who represent one of the growth areas of union organizing. The RWDSU's entrance into this field began when its Local 1199 used its base among New York City pharmacists and drug store employees to launch an organizing campaign among low-paid workers in the city's non-profit "voluntary" hospitals.

An RWDSU Hospital Workers Organizing Committee was set up in 1968 and the national union was formed as an RWDSU division in 1971.

Following the leaders

As the split between the original District 1199 and the national division deepened, members in both categories indicated support of the positions taken by their leadership. Turner and her entire slate of 1199 officers in New York were decisively re-elected. And a recent referendum among members of the new national union supported the new constitution and a per capita structure to fund it.

Nicholas said the Oct. 1 date marking the official chartering of the Hospital & Health Care Employees will find the union's members in cities across the country protesting Reagan Administration cutbacks that have affected Medicare and Medicaid, reduced special programs for pregnancy and infant care, eliminated mental health facilities, and forced layoffs that led to understaffing and reduced quality of patient care.

Michigan stalls balanced-budget drive

Lansing, Mich. — The right-wing drive to add a balanced-budget amendment to the U.S. Constitution stalled in Michigan, and the State AFL-CIO praised legislators who stood up against pressure and "struck a blow for sanity."

A 55-46 vote in the state House of Representatives thwarted an attempt to pry out of committee a resolution requiring the convening of a national constitutional convention unless Congress adopts a balanced-budget amendment and sends it to the states for ratification.

Thirty-two of a required 34 states have passed such resolutions since 1975. If Michigan had become the 33rd state, there would have been heavy pressure on Congress to go along with the amendment rather than risk the uncharted course of a constitutional convention.

In Michigan, the Senate last April approved the constitutional convention resolution by a 23-15 vote—not coincidentally after two successful recall elections targeting Democrats who had supported a tax increase had switched party control to the Republicans.

Democrats control the Michigan House and have a 5-4 majority on the committee with jurisdiction over the constitutional amendment resolution. But there were Democratic defectors on the issue, including a committee member whose vote could tilt the issue.

A Republican legislator, Ruth McNamee, defied a vote by the House Republican caucus instructing her to support the resolution and a phone call from a White House aide. Her vote made it 5-4 against the resolution.

"I realized I don't want the Constitution tampered with," she said in an explanation.

Discharge notion

There was one more hurdle before the legislature adjourned until after the elections—a motion in the House to discharge the committee from consideration of the resolution and bring it to a vote. The motion was beaten, 55-46.

The Michigan defeat eased the pressure in Congress, where the Senate Judiciary Committee has approved a balanced-budget amendment. But even among Republicans, there is little enthusiasm for it except as an election-year ploy to defuse Democratic attacks on President Reagan's huge budget deficits.

The committee-approved measure would require a balanced budget in peacetime, unless three-fifths of the House and Senate approve an exception, and would limit any tax increases to the rate of economic growth over the previous year.

In a letter to senators, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison warned against imposing "unworkable constitutional restraints which are unnecessary for the governance of our society."

The Constitution was established as "a framework for enduring government," he stressed, and the rigid limitations of the balanced budget amendment don't belong there.

In the House, a petition to take the proposed amendment away from the Judiciary Committee and bring it to a floor vote failed to muster the majority needed.

In his presidential campaigning, Reagan has frequently castigated congressional Democrats for blocking action on the balanced-budget amendment. House Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill, Jr., retorted to the most recent White House blast by noting that the budget deficit would be even higher than it is if Congress had adopted intact the the budget that President Reagan submitted this year.

Union Label's Ornburn to close 50-year career

Paul Ornburn, national representative of the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept. will retire Oct. 1 after 50 years of service to the trade union movement.

Ornburn, 69, joined the AFL department in 1934 as a clerk, and over the years held a variety of posts, including responsibility for organizing many of the department's local councils. He also has played a role in all 39 of the national AFL-CIO Union-Industries Shows produced by the department since 1938.

Average family worse off after Reagan tax cuts

A new study by the AFL-CIO Public Employee Dept. offers conclusive evidence that the average American taxpayer is worse off today than when President Reagan took office nearly four years ago.

The study, titled "In Search of the Reagan Tax Cut," is a survey of changes in the total tax burden paid by median-income families in 20 cities between 1980 and 1984. It makes the case that Reagan's so-called across-the-board cut in personal income taxes was neither across-the-board nor a tax cut for the vast majority of working Americans.

"In fact, almost half the cut went to big business and the wealthiest 5 or 10 percent of the population," PED President Kenneth T. Blaylock charged in announcing the report's findings.

The study confirms and updates the findings of a 1983 PED survey in the same communities. Median-income families continued to see their total tax liability go up between 1980 and 1984. The increases, ranging from $10 in Tampa, Fla., to $555 in Fargo, N.D., were registered in 16 of the 20 cities studied.

Offsetting taxes

For these families, increases in state and local taxes plus higher social security and gasoline taxes at the federal level more than offset whatever benefit they had received from the Reagan tax cut.

"The shift in program funding responsibility from the federal government to states and localities is the true Trojan Horse of the Reagan presidency," the study observes.

"The federal tax cut characterized by the President as 'the people's tax cut' has been anything but that. Instead, it has been a vehicle whereby higher state and local taxes have been substituted for revenue formerly collected from a progressive federal income tax.

"The cornerstone of the unfairness of the Reagan presidency may be found in his tax policies."

Reduced costs

Of the 20 cities surveyed, only Los Angeles, Houston, New York, and Minneapolis had tax declines and these were due to changes in assessment of property, property tax credits, or, in the case of Los Angeles, indexation of local taxes.

The other cities in the survey are Tampa, Atlanta, Chicago, Seattle, Indianapolis, Detroit, Kansas City, Omaha, Cincinnati, Milwaukee, Jackson, Miss., Newark, N.J., Fargo, N.D., Portland, Ore., Burlington, Vt., and Charleston, W.Va.

The fact that almost half the Reagan tax cut benefited big business and the rich demonstrates his opposition to fair and equitable taxation through a progressive tax system based on the ability to pay, the study charged in a foreword.

"Rather, the Administration favors an entirely regressive tax system falling most heavily on average working Americans. Thus, it has called for taxes on workers' health insurance benefits, tuition tax credits, new excise taxes on gasoline, and tax credits for employers instead of unemployment insurance for employees.

"In addition, a major overhaul of the tax structure to shift the burden entirely onto consumers and workers is being studied by the Reagan Treasury Dept., which has promised to unveil its findings after the election."

The Reagan tax cut led directly to higher state and local taxes, the study points out. State and local tax increases became necessary when the Administration's huge corporate and personal income tax cuts combined with a too-rapid military build-up to create record-breaking federal deficits.

These deficits, which together with the Federal Reserve Board's tight-money policies produced a severe economic recession, were used to justify drastic cuts in federal assistance to state and local governments.

"This loss of federal aid, along with revenue shortfalls brought on by the Reagan recession, forced most states and localities into an untenable fiscal position," the study observes. "Thus, even minimally compassionate governmental bodies were forced to do what no government wants—that is, to raise taxes."

Snapshot method

In the survey, PED took a "snapshot" of the combined tax bill paid by median-income families in each of the cities. Taxes included major federal, state and local taxes, including water and sewerage charges. For each level of government, the percentage of family income represented by the taxes paid to it was calculated.

As an example, a median-income family in Indianapolis had total family income of $21,303 in 1980, with a total state and local tax bill of $1,880. This amount represented 8.83 percent of the family's income.

In 1984, the same family had total income of $25,932. Total state and local taxes, however, jumped to $2,891, or 11.15 percent of family income.

If 1984 taxes still represented only 8.83 percent of family income, PED observed, then the total bill would have come to $2,289. The difference, $602, represents the net state and local tax increase for this family between 1980 and 1984. After factoring in the federal tax cut, the family still had a net tax increase of $362.

Top cities

The largest increases in the survey were reported in Portland, $555; Seattle, $535; Atlanta, $511, and Omaha, $373.

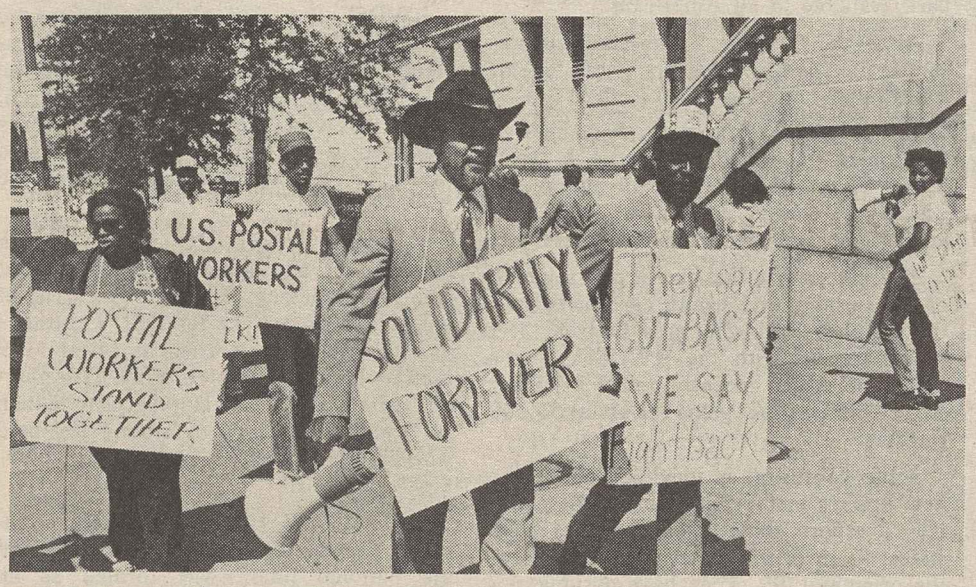
In a conclusion, the PED report anticipates the Administration's response to its findings:

"Taxpayers are better off today, they will say, than they could have been in the absence of any tax cut at all. But that line of reasoning really misses the point.

"The debate at the fedeal level at the beginning of the Reagan presidency was not so much about whether or not there should be a tax cut as it was about how big and what kind of tax cut there should be.

"A different budget could have produced a tax cut targeted toward lower- and middle-income groups and still avoided huge reductions in aid to state and local governments.

"This, incidentally, has been the sort of budget advocated by the AFL-CIO in every year of the Reagan presidency. If such a budget had in fact been adopted, then working Americans would indeed be better off today."



Delivering the message

Postal Workers protest Postal Service demands in stalled contract talks at a march outside the main post office in Washington. Negotiations are stymied by Postmaster Gen. William Bolger's refusal to come to the bargaining table. Bolger and Chairman John McKean of the USPS board of governors were grilled on Postal Service operations and their role in the impasse by two House subcommittees. APWU, Letter Carriers, Mail Handlers and unaffiliated Rural Letter Carriers are resisting management demands for a wage freeze and lower pay scales for new hires. The dispute is scheduled to go to arbitration Oct. 19.

'Talk sense' strategy building new momentum for Mondale

A week earlier, planned heckling by right-wing students at the University of Southern California sought to drown out Mondale's speech. At the Houston college, where most of the students are children of workers, there were no hecklers, Mondale noted with a grin.

Democratic ranks continued to close behind the presidential ticket. Jesse Jackson brought missionary zeal to a voter registration campaign in Maryland, rebuking apathy and political division among Democrats. Sen. Gary Hart introduced Mondale in his George Washington University speech and Sen. John Glenn has introduced him in Ohio appearances.

Wherever Geraldine Ferraro has campaigned, she has drawn local political figures to her side, welcoming the opportunity to be identified with her campaign. In Chicago, she brought gingerly into embrace the two feuding figures of Democratic politics—Mayor Harold Washington and Cook County Chairman Edward Vrdolyak.

Sometimes her path has come close to crossing that of Vice President Bush, and the contrast has been revealing.

Bush, speaking at well-secured auditoriums, told Republican rallies that "America is back. America is standing tall."

In a state with unemployment still at recession levels, Bush suggested that nevertheless, "Ohio seems very upbeat about the recovery."

Ferraro, at an open-air rally in Youngstown, found nothing for the Reagan Administration to boast about in the spectacle of closed plants and jobless workers. "Almost one-third of the people in Youngstown are out of work," she said. "Something is terribly wrong." And she made clear that Walter Mondale and Geraldine Ferraro intend to do something about it.

Federation expresses outrage over killings in South Africa

The AFL-CIO voiced its outrage at the killings of more than 50 unarmed blacks, by South African police and called on the Botha government to open a dialogue with the country's black majority before things get worse.

The deaths occurred when the police attacked peaceful black demonstrations and marches protesting higher rents, increases in electricity charges, and inadequate and inferior black schooling.

The protests coincided with the introduction of a new constitution which excludes the country's 75-percent black majority from the tricameral parliament.

Pieter W. Botha, former prime minister, was unopposed in his election as executive president by the new parliament, which has a separate house for whites, mixed races and Indian South Africans.

Opposing apartheid

In a statement, the AFL-CIO also condemned the detentions and arrests of black leaders whose sole "offense" was their unrelenting opposition to the discredited system of apartheid, or racial segregation.

"Furthermore, these activties are impeding the development of the new emerging unions in South Africa," the federation stressed.

"Thirty-six years after it was proclaimed, apartheid remains a failed, repugnant system that serves only as an instrument of suppression and coercion of the blacks in their long struggle for human rights and equality."

The police attacks occurred in the Vaal Triangle townships of Sharpeville, Avaton and Vereeniging, scene of other riots and police brutality over the years. The worst of it was in Sharpeville where 69 people were killed by police in 1969.

The AFL-CIO's protest over the latest killings followed similar expressions of outrage from other free world unions. In a cable to the South African government, Sec.-Gen. John Vandeveken of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions in Brussels said the organization was "stunned" by the callous shootings.

"The ICFTU expresses horror at and protests against the provocative use of live bullets by the South African police on unarmed people under the pretext of dispersing the so-called rioters," Vanderveken said.

"Such incidents could easily be avoided if the South African authorities heeded the genuine demands of the black majority people in the face of rent increases, bus fare increases, and high levels of direct taxation instead of hiding itself behind the facade of constitutional changes which exclude 75 percent of the people of South Africa."

In Sharpeville, the Johannesburg Star reported, people were hacked to death and burnt alive while others were shot dead by police during the demonstrations. Reports estimated that about 250 people were injured. Women and children were among the dead.

The AFL-CIO pointed out that except for the prompt action of a black churchman who broke ranks and carried a white flag opening up a dialogue between the two sides, the massacre might have rivaled that of the infamous Sharpeville killings of 1969.

"The South African government should follow the example set by this courageous man and open up a dialogue between white South Africa and its fellow black South Africans," the federation declared.

"History shows that no people ever give up the struggle for freedom. The black majority in South Africa will never give up its struggle for full equality and freedom."

Disneyland workers bar pay freeze, launch strike

Anaheim, Calif. — Some 1,800 workers went on strike at Disneyland after voting down a contract proposal calling for a two-year wage freeze.

The workers — janitors, ride operators, ticket sellers, ticket takers, retail clerks and candymakers—belong to five unions: the Bakery & Confectionery Workers, Hotel Employees & Restaurant Employees, Service Employees, Food & Commercial Workers, and the unaffiliated Teamsters.

The decision to strike the amusement park came a week after nearly 97 percent of the workers rejected a management plan that included a three-year wage freeze.

Convention action

IUE backs dues hike to bolster programs

Pittsburgh — The Electronics Workers convention voted to strengthen programs for IUE members that would be funded through a dues increase unanimously endorsed by delegates.

A special rank-and-file committee set up by the union's 1982 convention to examine local wage structures and the IUE financial situation, proposed raising minimum dues by $2.50 to $15.38 a month. Locals whose average wage scale is less than $7 an hour would be exempt from the higher dues structure.

The convention recommendation now goes to a vote of IUE local unions. If approved, the increase would go into effect next Jan. 1.

Describing the need for the increase, IUE President William H. Bywater told delegates: "We're not a business union. We're a union that really has a heart, a union that wants to protect its membership and organize the unorganized."

Sec.-Treas. Edward L. Fire told delegates the dues program, embodied in a series of constitutional amendments, was the most critical issue they faced since it would determine the quality of the union's future.

An address by Mondale's wife, Joan, was greeted by boisterous applause from delegates who unanimously adopted a resolution endorsing the Mondale-Ferraro ticket. Delegates also signed a voluntary pledge to register union voters and work for the election of the Democratic presidential ticket.

Reagan blasted

In his address to delegates, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland branded President President Reagan's economic policies "crackpot theories of the radical right."

Kirkland charged that Reagan "has gone on a happy-hour binge," telling the American people that everything is wonderful.

"He has tinkered with President Lincoln's famous motto and made it: 'If you can fool some of the people all of the time and all of the people some of the time, those are damned good odds,'" Kirkland said.

Other speakers at the four-day convention included Rep. William Clay (D-Mo.), chairman of the House Subcommittee on Labor-Management Relations, and Judy Goldsmith, president of the National Organization for Women.

The Kennedy-King Human Rights award was presented by AFL-CIO Civil Rights Director William Pollard to District 2 and was accepted by Peter diCicco, president of the New England region.

At the traditional IUE women's breakfast, President Joyce Miller of the Coalition of Labor Union Women stressed: "Somebody should tell President Reagan that women are not working for pin money. Pin money may be the size of our paycheck, but that is not why we are working."

Delegates adopted a series of resolutions that addressed the issues of plant closings, robotics and new technology, replacement of strikers with scabs, and support of the 24,000 IUE members currently in negotiations with General Motors Corp.

The convention reaffirmed support for federal and state plant closing legislation that would require employers to give at least two years' notice to workers and their communities before shutting down. The proposed legislation would provide assistance to businesses and communities threatened with dislocation and require employers to make income maintenance payments and continue health insurance coverage to workers who lose their jobs.

Tariff equity

Delegates renewed a call for repeal of existing tariff regulations that allow American corporations to assemble goods outside the United States without paying fair import duties.

Another key resolution urged an amendment to the National Labor Relations Act that would exclude individuals who replace striking employees from the definition of "employee" under the Act. The intent is to reverse the trend of employers permanently replacing economic strikers.

The delegates recommended constitutional changes that would give the IUE executive board the authority to ask locals with less than 25 active members over a six-month period to vote on a merger with a sister local, and a change in the retirement age of union staff from 65 to 70, bringing IUE policy into conformity with federal regulations on mandatory retirement.

Bywater and Fire were re-elected to new four-year terms.

next six years to maintain the salary and benefits of workers laid off because of automation, increased production efficiency, and "outsourcing"—the industry term for subcontracting of work outside the company.

In a summary of the highlights of the contract, the union said the company also pledged up to $100 million to establish new lines of business, or new companies, to employ displaced workers.

The company said it would "use its best efforts to replace jobs which may be lost by outsourcing action, and to create, where feasible, new prospects for growth."

Job security was the union's No. 1 goal this year. Bieber said the new pact goes a long way in meeting that goal through "innovative" means of preserving jobs.

Under a new wage formula, active GM workers would receive immediate hourly increases ranging from 9 to 50 cents, or from 1 to slightly over 3.5 percent, depending on the individual worker's skill level. For most assembly line workers, the raise would average 2.25 percent.

Lump sum payments averaging $700 in the second year of the pact and $725 in the third year would also amount to increases of about 2.25 percent annually.

In addition, workers would get an estimated $1,000 in profit-sharing for 1984, continued cost-of-living adjustments, and a $180 bonus on ratification of the accord.

Both Bieber and Ephlin agreed that the pact would be approved by GM workers. "It's a solid agreement," Bieber said. "I'm confident the rank-and-file will approve it overwhelmingly."

Bieber said the UAW would use the GM settlement as a pattern in talks with the Ford Motor Co. He also restated the union's intention to reopen contract talks with Chrysler Corp., even though its agreement with the company does not expire until September 1985.

Contract pattern

One of the UAW's goals, he said, is to restore the pattern of similar contracts with all three major automakers that prevailed before Chrysler's financial crisis in 1979.

During the week-long strike that preceded the GM settlement, some 92,000 workers at 17 GM plants left their jobs in support of the union's bargaining stance. They have since returned to work.

Meanwhile, the Electronics Workers continued their talks with GM on a new contract for some 24,000 workers at seven plants in Ohio, Mississippi, New York and New Jersey. IUE members are working under an extension of their old agreement.

GM earned a record $3.7 billion last year, and almost equaled that in the first half of this year, with a profit of $3.2 billion. Management voted itself hefty bonuses earlier this year.

Court finds sterilization rule not covered by job safety law

A federal appeals court ruled unanimously that American Cyanamid's "fetus protection" policy which required female workers to choose between sterilization or unemployment does not constitute a workplace hazard under the Occupational Safety & Health Act.

The ruling, by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia, upheld previous decisions by the Occupational Safety & Health Review Commission and by an administrative law judge of the Occcupational Safety & Health Administration.

The court case, brought by the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers against American Cyanamid, grew out of a policy laid down by the firm in early 1978 in which women of "childbearing capacity" were to be excluded from all departments where chemicals judged to be harmful to fetuses were being used.

The company advised its 30 female workers, members of OCAW Local 3-499, that women between ages 16 and 50 would be deemed to be of childbearing capacity and stressed that only seven jobs would be available in the plant for non-sterilized women after May 1978. Those who chose not to be sterilized would have to compete for those jobs or be fired.

Between February and July 1978, five women underwent surgical sterilization. The company, however, changed its policy to cover only the inorganic pigments department where workers were exposed to lead levels harmful to fetuses.

OSHA cited the firm for a "willful" violation of the Safety Act's general duty clause. The company's appeal was sustained by an administrative law judge and upheld by the OSHRC. The review commission ruled the citation failed to allege a violation cognizable under the act.

Outside pressures

It said the act covers only processes and materials that cause injury or disease by "operating directly upon employees as they engage in work or work-related activities. . . . An employee's decision to undergo sterilization in order to gain or retain employment grows out of economic or social factors which operate primarily outside of the workplace."

OCAW pointed out that because the act requires employers to furnish workers with "employment and a place of employment which are free from recognized hazards," the American Cyanamid policy "may be characterized as a hazard to female employees who opted for sterilization in order to remain in the inorganic pigments department."

The appellate court said the moral issues of the case are "of no small complexity," but added that its only task in the matter "is the mundane one of interpreting (the Act's) language and applying its policy."

American Cyanamid's sterilization policy was previously the subject of a sex discrimination suit filed under civil rights and equal opportunity laws. The firm, however, settled out of court with the women involved.

One big league

Members of the National Football League Players Association have lent support to the Air Line Pilots in that union's dispute with Continental Airlines. About 75 members of the NFLPA, including some of the league's top stars, signed a recent advertisement in the newspaper USA Today proclaiming that "NFL pros won't fly the New Continental."

Continental last year declared bankruptcy and canceled its collective bargaining contracts with the Pilots, Machinists and other unions.

"Many of the old pros have been locked out, and rookie captains and flight attendants have been hired at cut-rate wages to take their place," the ad noted. It said the pilots have since reported 152 safety compromising accidents involving Continental, and added:

"That's why the NFL pros won't fly the New Continental."

NFLPA President Gene Upshaw called the players' action an important demonstration that "unions will stick together." Putting it another way, no matter what position they play—or what their craft or trade or industry —union members are all in the same league.

Walter Pidgeon dies, headed Screen Actors

Santa Monica, Calif.—Veteran actor Walter Pidgeon, who was president of the Screen Actors from 1952 to 1957, died Sept. 25 at his home here after a series of strokes. He was 87.

Pidgeon appeared in more than 100 films, including his performance in the Oscar-winning movie Mrs. Miniver in 1942. A native of Canada, he started his show business career as a singer in Boston. He performed in vaudeville before going to Hollywood in 1926.

Pidgeon also had been a member of Actors' Equity and the Television & Radio Artists.

Printing trades unity

Graphic Union points for new merger effort

Miami—Consolidation of unions within the printing and publishing industry was the focus of the Graphic Communications Union convention as 1,210 delegates explored prospects of merging with the Typographical Union and Newspaper Guild.

GCIU President Kenneth J. Brown, in a report on behalf of the union's officers, said, "We have achieved the dream that union leaders and members in our industry have had for nearly a century, that is, to bring about unity . . . in the graphic communications industry."

The GCIU is a product of merger between the Graphic Arts Union and the Printing & Graphic Communications Union in July 1983. GAIU was formed from the merger of the Lithographers and Photoengravers unions in 1964 to form LPIU, which merged with the Bookbinders in 1972. The IP&GCU was formed from the merger of the Printing Pressmen and the Stereotypers in 1973.

Merger with the ITU and the Guild would complete GCIU's efforts to form "one large union" in the printing and publishing industry.

ITU action

ITU President Robert S. McMichen, in a message to GCIU delegates, reported that the ITU convention, held a week earlier, "authorized me to enter into early and substantive negotiations with the GCIU in the hope of reaching a fair and mutually beneficial merger agreement which would unite our two great international unions toward the oft-expressed desire for one big union in the printing and communications industry."

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue, who had spoken at the ITU convention, urged GCIU's delegates "to do everything you can to develop such a merger plan within the next few months."

Newspaper Guild President Charles A. Perlik, Jr., conveyed similar merger sentiments. "We stand ready with complete flexibility," he announced, "to play whatever role seems best calculated to be fruitful in bringing us together in closing the circle between us and the ITU."

Besides merger, key issues of organizing and political action dominated the convention.

GCIU President Emeritus Sol Fishko, former IP&GCU leader, zeroed in on the "policies and practices of the Reagan Administration" which "are so detrimental to our cause and our interests."

He urged the delegates to take home with them "one driving, compelling, all-consuming goal" to elect the Democratic presidential ticket of Walter Mondale and Geraldine Ferraro.

In a filmed message, Ferraro commended GCIU's merger as an example of labor's traditional "coalition building and fair representation." She told the delegates, "in Fritz Mondale and Gerry Ferraro, America's unions have friends they can trust."

Delegates condemned Reagan economic policies as loaded with "inequities, selfishness and disastrous consequences," criticizing its Labor Dept. as "anti-worker" and underscoring the pro-business leanings of its National Labor Relations Board.

The delegates also responded with a collection of nearly $10,000 for the union's political education fund, and more than 400 locals enrolled in the AFL-CIO's one-on-one voter registration campaign aimed at signing up union members.

Organizing effort

Devoting a convention session, plus a special workshop, to organizing, the delegates learned how the union's realigned organizing department with full-time staff in 12 regions across the country can aid local organizing drives.

Resolutions adopted by the delegates:

- Committed the GCIU to work with the AFL-CIO and its Industrial Union Dept. to formulate legislative initiatives to rebuild U.S. industry, create jobs for youth, and retrain the unemployed.
- Pledged to continue lobbying aggressively for a permanent retention of the manufacturing clause of the Copyright Act to combat the threat of exporting 367,000 U.S. jobs in the printing and allied trades.
- Called for arms control negotiations between the U.S. and Soviet Union.
- Condemned the Administration's policies in Central America as "mistaken, immoral and counterproductive."

Other resolutions endorsed passage of the Equal Rights Amendment; backed national health care for all Americans while blasting Reagan's "mean-spirited" cuts in health care for the elderly and assailing legislators who have supported cuts in the nation's social security system.

Unions press for protections in sale of Conrail by Congress

In the wake of a Dept. of Transportation announcement narrowing the field of bidders to purchase Conrail, unions representing Conrail workers said any final deal on the federal freight carrier will have to protect employees' interests.

Transportation Sec. Elizabeth Hanford Dole said prospective purchasers of Conrail had been reduced from 13 bidders to three: the Allegany Corp., Norfolk Southern Corp. and an investment group led by hotel executive J. Willard Marriott and members of the Bass family of Fort Worth, Tex.

Among bids cut out of the anticipated sale by the DOT announcement was one by Conrail's 39,000 employees, represented by the Railway Labor Executives' Association.

Dole said she has asked the Justice Dept. and Treasury Dept. to review the three bids before she makes any recommendation to Congress on the sale. She said the "three principal criteria" in choosing the final offer will be which bid would put the railroad in the strongest financial condition, best preserve service and provide maximum return to the taxpayer.

However, RLEA Chairman Fred A. Hardin, president of the United Transportation Union, said, "there is every good reason to believe" that the successful bid would include the employees' proposal and "would ensure the employees' interests in an absolute continuation of the railroad."

Railway & Airline Clerks President Richard I. Kilroy said, "The stake of the union employees is clear, unmistakable and not to be ignored in the eventual disposition of Conrail."

Pay below par

The unions and Conrail management reached a 39-month agreement in 1981 which included 12 percent wage deferrals that left pay levels at Conrail "substantially below that in other major railroads," Kilroy said.

"With Conrail now a healthy and profitable property, BRAC's position is explicit that this wage level must be remedied in the arrangements that return Conrail to private ownership," Kilroy said.

Employees also own a 15 percent share of Conrail purchased under an employee stock option plan set up in 1978.

Since Conrail was created in 1976 from the bankrupt Penn Central and five other railroads, Congress has invested about $7.6 billion in the freight system.

Conrail now has an estimated net worth of $5.7 billion, including physical plant, rolling stock and other assets. With projected net profits of $400 million in 1984 and about $3 billion in depreciable assets, the railroad is expected to be nearly debt-free after transfer to the private sector.

Bids by the current contenders hover in the area of $1 billion in cash, another billion from the surrender of investment tax credits and operating loss carryovers, plus any reimbursement to employees for stock and wage deferrals that remains to be worked out through negotiations.

UFCW cites 23% gain in organizing over '83

The Food & Commercial Workers organized 23 percent more workers in the first half of 1984 than in the same period last year, UFCW President William H. Wynn reported.

Nearly three times as many professional, finance, health care, insurance, footwear and packinghouse workers joined the UFCW in the first six months of 1984 as in the same period in 1983, the union said.

Overall, 25,044 workers voted to be represented by the UFCW through June of this year, or 22.9 percent more than the year before.

Wynn credited part of the surge to the "anti-worker policies of the Reagan Administration" which have caused "more and more workers to realize that sticking together is the only way they can get fair wages and decent working conditions."

Wynn also charged that the National Labor Relations Board had been "destroyed" under this Administration.

Surge in prices sends real wages into sharp decline

A companion index, the Consumer Price Index for All-Urban Consumers (CPI-U) rose five-tenths of 1 percent. The difference between the two indexes reflects the fact that CPI-W uses house prices and mortgage interest rates in its housing component while CPI-U uses a rental equivalent. CPI-W is the basis for most cost-of-living adjustments in union wage contracts and some federal transfer payments.

Over the year, CPI-W was up 3.6 percent. Over the three months ended in August, however, the index rose at an annual rate of 5.9 percent, suggesting a gradual intensification of inflation. One important factor is a firming of energy prices, with gasoline falling less in August than in the two preceding months and electricity and natural gas prices rising sharply for the second consecutive month.

Food prices increased seven-tenths of 1 percent in August, with prices for fruits and vegetables jumping 3.5 percent. Meat, poultry, fish and eggs as a group advanced seven-tenths of 1 percent after three months of decline.

A 2.8-percent rise in homeownership costs reflected a 3.5-percent increase in mortgage interest rates and a 1.7-percent advance in home purchase prices. Rents rose five-tenths of 1 percent. Compared with a year earlier, home-ownership costs were up 2.1 percent and rents 5.3 percent.

Clothing costs spurted 1.8 percent, following a rise of eight-tenths of 1 percent in July. The August rise was the largest monthly increase since March 1980.

New car prices rose four-tenths of 1 percent and used car prices fell four-tenths of a percent. There was a large rise for auto finance charges over the month.

Medical care costs advanced moderately, three-tenths of 1 percent. There was a surprising rise of eight-tenths of 1 percent in house furnishings, an item which has shown little or no upward movement for some time.

Schedule of Studies Center courses

The George Meany Center for Labor Studies will offer seven institutes and workshops during October and November. The schedule:

Containing Health Care Costs, Oct. 9-12—A conference on how to protect union members from increasing health-care costs. Approaches include collective bargaining, community coalitions, negotiating with insurers and health care providers and the role of the federal government.

Use of Micro Computers in Negotiations, Oct. 22-26—An introduction to small computers, introduction to word processing for contract revisions and using outside data bases.

Organizing II, Oct. 28-Nov. 2—An advanced class in selecting and carrying out organizing strategies, training organizing committees and dealing with the employer's anti-union offensive.

Computers for Local Unions, Nov. 18-21—A briefing for union officers before purchase of computers for their unions.

In-house Opinion Polling, Nov. 18-21—A workshop on preparing written and telephone questionnaires, training volunteer pollsters and evaluating the results.

Organizing Techniques I, Nov. 25-30—A review of the mechanics of an organizing campaign with video-taping of participants in action.

New Staff, Nov. 25-Dec. 7—A two-week program to help newly elected union officers and newly appointed staff members make the transition from on-the-job activists to full-time union representatives.

AFL-CIO unions using the center's facilities for their own leadership training programs include Food & Commercial Workers, Oct. 9-12; Carpenters, Oct. 14-19; Asbestos Workers, Oct. 15 and 22; Communications Workers, Oct. 16-19; CWA Editors, Oct. 14-19; Teachers, Oct. 24-26; Railway & Airline Clerks, Oct. 28-Nov. 2.

The American Institute for Free Labor Development will bring 40 trade unionists from Latin America to the campus Oct. 7 for five weeks of labor studies.

More information about these or other labor studies classes is available from Fred K. Hoehler, Jr., George Meany Center for Labor Studies, 10000 New Hampshire Ave., Silver Spring, Md. 20903; telephone: 301/431-6400.

About Our Values

Walter F. Mondale talked to students of George Washington University on Sept. 25 about values and commitment. These are some of the things he said:

IT'S NO SECRET that I'm the underdog in this race. And when a candidate gets behind, he gets a lot of advice.

I have been advised to ignore issues, to choose slogans over substance. My answer is no. There is a big distance between Pennsylvania Ave. and Madison Ave. And there ought to be a big difference between a presidential election and a pep rally.

I have been counseled to cut loose from my history, to desert the forgotten Americans I have always fought for. My answer is no. I would rather lose a race about decency than win one about self-interest. I would rather fight for the heart and soul of America than fight for the bonuses of the Fortune 500.

You are said to be self-content, materialistic and devoid of social commitment. You are supposed to have no sense of history. You are accused of having an attention span no longer than a television commercial.

That's quite an indictment. I don't believe it. But suppose some people did.

Imagine a presidential campaign based on those assumptions about your generation.

Believing you to be selfish, they would pander to your supposed greed. Their message would be: Be glad for what you have—and be blind to those who have little.

Their message would be all sizzle and no substance; all happy-talk and no straight talk; all blue skies and no blueprint; all television and no vision.

I do not know which is worse: the emptiness of such a campaign or the cynicism about the American people that it implies. I do not know which is more damning: their contempt for the issues or their condescension toward our people.

THIS ELECTION is not about jellybeans and pen pals. It is about toxic dumps that give cancer to our children. This election is not about country music and birthday cakes. It is about old people who can't pay for medicine. This election is not about the Olympic torch. It is about the civil rights laws that opened athletics to women and minorities who won those gold medals.

This election is not about sending a teacher into space. It is about improving teaching and learning here on Earth. This election is not about the size of my opponent's crowds. It is about the size of his deficits. This election is not about Republicans sending hecklers to my rallies. It is about Jerry Falwell picking justices for the Supreme Court.

This election is about our values.

Today, millions of American children are born in poverty. Many go to school hungry. Many don't learn to read and don't learn to hope. And nearly everything we've done as a nation to help those children has been cut back by this Administration.

There are Americans roaming the streets and sleeping on grates, bag women and broken men—and thousands of them plunged into that tragedy because this Administration threw them off the disability rolls.

OUR COUNTRY is peddling guns around the world. The African drought has brought massive starvation, but this Administration is shipping them less food and more weapons.

The Republicans say they're for family values. But families don't disown their weaker children. What would we think of parents who taught their kids to think only of themselves and not to care for their brothers and sisters? What would we say about parents who lived in high style and left their children in debt as a result?

In this campaign, I will do everything I can to focus our nation on these questions, whatever the political consequences. It must never be said that in 1984 we did not know what we were doing.

I won't permit this crowd to steal the future from our children without a struggle. They have a right to ask for your vote. But I'll be damned if I'll let them take away our conscience.

Benefits outweigh costs of anti-poverty programs

By Press Associates, Inc.

Public programs to help the poor and disadvantaged waste taxpayers' money. The anti-poverty programs launched in the 1960s have done little to help people and may even do harm by causing dependence. Right?

That's what President Reagan thinks and it's wrong. Berating poverty programs has long been a favorite pastime of conservative politicians and propagandists. Reagan, who portrays government as the problem rather than a potential problem-solver, claims the War on Poverty made things worse for the poor.

President Reagan led the budgetary assault on the whole spectrum of social programs, claiming all the while that the poor haven't been hurt by the cuts.

But those who believe that social programs don't work should examine the recently released results of a 22-year study of the effects of a preschool education program in Ypsilanti, Mich., on the lives of its disadvantaged participants.

The landmark study, beginning in 1962, followed the lives of 123 children from poor families, many headed by single parents on welfare. Few of the parents had graduated from high school.

Preschool training

Half the children in the study were given a year or two of high-quality preschool education beginning at age three. The program emphasized active learning and problem-solving, and included teacher visits to the home. The other group of children didn't participate in the program, but followed the traditional path of schooling.

Today, the children are over 20 years old, and the contrasts between the two groups are dramatic, according to the study, which was funded by foundation and government grants and titled "Changed Lives."

Looking at just the cost-benefit results, the program paid off for society as well as the participants. The reduction in crime alone saved society an average $3,100 on each person in the preschool group. This doesn't even include the savings from less welfare use, lesser needs for remedial education, and the taxes which jobholders pay.

The study's major findings included:

- Two out of three of the young people in the preschool group graduated from high school, while only half in the no-preschool group graduated.
- On a test of functional competence at age 19, 61 percent of the preschool group scored average or above average while only 38 percent of the other group did this well.
- The 38 percent rate of enrollment in post-secondary education for the preschool group was nearly double the rate for the other group.

Intelligence results

- Only 15 percent of the preschool group were classified at some time during their school years as mentally retarded, while 35 percent of the no-preschool group were so classified.
- The detention and arrest rate for the preschool group was 31 percent compared to a 51 percent rate for the other group.
- At age 19, 50 percent of the preschool group were employed, while only 32 percent of the no-preschool group held jobs.

In other words, the report concluded, a quality preschool program offers an opportunity to escape from the cycle of poverty. The federal Head Start program, one of the Great Society programs begun in the 1960s, is among such programs with proven track records.

Government at all levels should do more, not less, to expand opportunities for all citizens. Compassion for the less fortunate has long been an American trait. Giving them a helping hand toward self-reliance through a government program should be regarded as a worthy investment in human beings.

Real 'Family Issues'? MONDALE

President Reagan and his ultra-conservative allies constantly preach about "family issues" as if they have a corner on the market of concern about the family.

What they're really talking about, though, are single issues, and they try to force their beliefs about these single issues on the entire population.

What are the real "family issues?"

- That good jobs be plentiful
  (That's not how it's been under the Reagan Administration. More than 30 million workers were hit by unemployment in the 1981-83 Reagan-Republican recession. Millions who've gone back to work have had to settle for jobs that pay much less than the jobs they lost. They and their families suffer.)
- That our children get the best possible schooling
  (Reagan and the Republicans have cut or tried to cut every important program of aid to public schools—general aid, special programs for handicapped and disadvantaged children, vocational education.)
- That our children may attend college
  (Because of Reagan...

Tax Justice? MONDALE

Taxes will be boosted in 1985 . . . and everybody knows it.

There's no other way to keep the nation from drowning in Ronald Reagan's sea of red ink . . . his all-time high $200 billion deficits.

Key question: Whose taxes will be raised?

Reagan Track Record on Taxes

Engineered lopsided across-the-board tax cuts in 1981. Result:

- Cuts threw a bone to average Americans, about $125 a year.
- Cuts served a side of beef to wealthy Americans . . . nearly $9,000 to those making $100,000 and up.
- Cuts gave a whole herd to Big Oil and other... less than...

REAGAN vs. WORKERS

Reagan track record on unions

- Opposes reform of labor laws to protect workers' right to organize, speed up union representation elections, prevent employers from stalling and from discriminating against union activists.
- Only President ever to break a union, PATCO, the air traffic controllers. Threw 11,000 persons out of work. (None of complaints that drove PATCO to strike has been addressed adequately since Reagan broke the union. As a result, present controllers now make exactly same complaints, are moving toward unionization.)

The issue is the future ★★

On November 6, Americans will choose between two candidates for President . . . and between two programs and two policies. Above all . . . we will choose between two visions of the future.

One . . . Walter Mondale's . . . promises fairness to all Americans. The other . . . Ronald Reagan's . . . assures continued favor to wealthy Americans.

One . . . Walter Mondale's . . . represents the values and aspirations of average Americans—family, work, responsibility and compassion. The other . . . Ronald Reagan's . . . is shaped by the values of the rich and by the ambitions of the corporations.

One . . . Walter Mondale's . . . stresses adequate aid to Americans in need and restoration of the programs that help them. The other . . . Ronald Reagan's . . . preordains further retreat from our national responsibility to those who need assistance.

One . . . Walter Mondale's . . . foretells opportunity for all Americans. The other . . . Ronald Reagan's . . . forecloses opportunity for far too many Americans.

At stake within this encompassing issue of the future of this nation and its people are many issues of particular concern to working people and their families. The record of Ronald Reagan and the program of Walter Mondale on these issues follow.

Jobs

MONDALE—Urges full employment policies with teeth in them to encourage job-creation so all may work. To avert another recession like Reagan's, would trigger special job-providing programs that sustain economic growth. Believes full employment is basis of strong economy.

REAGAN—More than 30 million wage-earners suffered one or more episodes of unemployment in Reagan-Republican recession 1981-83, losing $336.1 billion in earnings. President proposed no jobs programs for those laid off and tried to stymie plans advanced by trade that benefits our workers and industries as well as countries we trade with.

REAGAN—Talks "free trade" in a world where it doesn't exist. Opposes "content" plan to require certain portion of U.S.-made parts in products sold here, save American jobs. Permits almost unrestricted flood of foreign goods that continue to wipe out millions of U.S. jobs.

Reviving Basic Industry

MONDALE—Proposes business/labor/government consultation to aid basic industries through hard times largely caused by unfair foreign competition. Would ...okay loans if absolutely needed to safeguard industries ...national defense

These campaign flyers are available from National COPE to international unions, local unions and state and local councils that wish to reproduce them for union members. Only change would be to add name, officers of sponsoring union group. For set of flyers, call COPE (202) 637-5114.

At the Steelworkers convention in Cleveland, Democratic presidential candidate Walter Mondale rips into President Reagan's anti-worker policies.

House probe cites labor law failure, 'politicized' NLRB

By David L. Perlman

America's workers can't rely on the protections of federal labor law and can't trust the fairness of the National Labor Relations Board, a congressional investigation concluded.

A report by the House Subcommittee on Labor-Management Relations is the strongest indictment ever made by a government body of the weaknesses of the 49-year-old law that established collective bargaining as a national policy and said workers can choose union representation without intimidation or retaliation.

That well-intentioned law, the National Labor Relations Act, has become an obstacle to collective bargaining, the subcommittee found. And "in the past three years, the perception of a neutral and objective NLRB has been shattered" by what the report terms "the politicization of the board."

The subcommittee, headed by Rep. William Clay (D-Mo.), monitors the functioning of federal labor law. Its latest round of hearings, last June, found a deteriorating situation had reached the crisis stage.

Lawbreaking by management "has significantly increased, as have sophisticated strategies to circumvent and manipulate the law," the report showed.

As for the NLRB, its "administrative morass" has resulted in the largest backlog of cases in its history. Its pro-management tilt has led to "a massive loss of confidence on the part of workers and unions in the fairness of its deliberations."

Misread intent

The board's "reinterpretation" of labor law, the Clay subcommittee concluded, "is inconsistent with the congressional intent to encourage and protect the collective bargaining process."

Just by using procedural delays, NLRB elections and unit determinations can be stalled for months. Unfair labor practice cases, subject to appellate court reviews, can and do drag on for years.

Over the past three fiscal years, the period from filing of an unfair labor practice charge to the issuance of an NLRB decision has grown from an average of 484 to 627 days, and it averages nearly a year and a half after the board's decision before it is enforced by a federal court.

The NLRB's case backlog was sharply criticized in a parallel report by a Government Operations subcommittee headed by Rep. Barney Frank (D-Mass.), which was adopted unanimously by the full committee.

Even more damning was an analysis by the Food & Commercial Workers on NLRB decisions.

The UFCW documented a pattern of sharp departure from precedents set and accepted by previous boards whose members were appointed by both Democratic and Republican presidents.

Tool of management

Under the Reagan Administration, UFCW President William H. Wynn said, "the NLRB has been reduced to little more than a management tool."

Its chief function, Wynn charged, "is to delay, deny and destroy the right of employees to freely and fairly organize and win union representation."

Wynn said the UFCW has decided to avoid the NLRB procedures as much as possible, relying on economic strength to protect workers' rights, "because we can no longer get any justice from the NLRB."

The Clay subcommittee report noted a growing sentiment among unions that have been frustrated by the labor law's inadequacies to scrap the National Labor Relations Act entirely, eliminating restraints

Focus on issues

Debate gives Mondale chance to pin Reagan

Walter Mondale and Geraldine Ferraro looked to the start of nationally televised debates to focus the last month of the presidential campaign on election issues.

Mondale and President Reagan will appear together on Sunday night, Oct. 7; Ferraro and Vice President Bush will be matched on Thursday, Oct. 11.

But it will be up to a panel of journalists to turn the 90-minute programs into debates over issues. The Democratic candidates had sought a face-to-face confrontation for the debates, but the Republicans insisted on a news conference format.

The Oct. 7 debate on domestic issues, nevertheless, gives Mondale his first opportunity to puncture the "cocoon" which the White House staff erected to shield the President from the risk of a vote-losing blunder.

So long as Reagan holds a lead in the polls, his handlers tell reporters frankly, it "doesn't make sense" for him to argue the issues that Mondale raises.

The Reagan campaign was so pleased with the television coverage when Bush officiated at an emotional, flag-waving naturalization ceremony in Miami that it arranged a rerun in which the President would be the star.

Once again, new citizens and their families were given Reagan-Bush signs to hold up for the cameras. Reagan welcomed them to "a happy country."

In New Brunswick, N.J., that same day, Mondale spoke to a capacity crowd that overflowed a downtown theater and spilled into the rainswept street, keying on presidential leadership.

"Good intentions aren't enough," Mondale stressed. A President who shows by his offhand comments that he doesn't realize that nuclear missiles can't be "recalled" after they've been launched just hasn't prepared himself.

As for Reagan's aborted attempt to switch responsibility for the bombing of the U.S. Embassy in Lebanon to his predecessors in the White House, Mondale said Americans expect more than buck-passing from their presidents.

Kirkland to spur union vote drive in nine-state tour

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland will meet with union members in nine states this month during a modern-day version of a whistle-stop political campaign tour.

His goal is to encourage the biggest possible Election Day turnout by members of AFL-CIO unions in support of the Mondale-Ferraro presidential ticket and other labor-endorsed candidates.

Kirkland and a small staff will travel by "Solidarity Van," an office-on-wheels, stopping overnight at various meeting locations. The tour will begin in Connecticut on Oct. 12 and wind up in Wisconsin on Oct. 26. Many of the stops will be in congressional districts, where the effectiveness of labor's get-out-the-vote drive could be decisive.

Senate scuttles key civil rights bill

The Senate's Republican majority scrapped a House-passed anti-discrimination bill that was needed to repair the damage to civil rights enforcement inflicted by a Supreme Court decision earlier this year.

A majority of the Senate had signed up to co-sponsor the bill which was the chief legislative goal of a coalition of civil rights groups. It passed the House last June by a one-sided 375-32 vote.

But when push came to shove, the obstructionist tactics of a group of right-wing senators and the Reagan Administration's hostility to the House measure prevailed.

After the civil rights coalition refused to settle for a "compromise" drastically weakening the legislation's coverage, the Senate gave up the effort. It voted 53-45, largely on party lines, to drop the measure from the continuing funding bill needed to keep the government functioning after Congress adjourns.

Scope of bills

At issue is whether Congress intended in its various civil rights bills to prohibit discrimination by institutions receiving federal funds or assistance, or merely in those specific programs involving federal aid.

In its Grove City College decision involving the ban on sex discrimination in the educational assistance law, the Supreme Court gave a narrow reading to the provision. Its interpretation of congressional intent, on which the decision was based, clearly threatened provisions in the Civil Rights Act and other laws that barred discrimination based on race, religion, national origin, age or handicap by recipients of federal funds.

The AFL-CIO was among the first groups to support the legislative drive. "We will do all we can to assure its passage," President Lane Kirkland pledged when the bill was introduced.

When it was before the House, President Reagan criticized the bill as "too broad," but the Administration waited until it got to the Senate to press its objections.

At DPE conference on health care, Dr. Philip Caper of Dartmouth, Service Employees President John Sweeney and DPE Director Jack Golodner.

Harmful side effects detected in corporate health care trend

Boston—The corporatization of health care services is permanently changing the way health care is delivered in the United States, with both patients and workers in the health care field getting shortchanged, unions were warned at a conference here.

The takeover by investor-owned corporations stirred the most vigorous discussion at the two-day meeting, sponsored by the AFL-CIO Dept. for Professional Employees. Joining the 160 trade unionists were experts from academia and the medical profession.

While the conversion of health care facilities into businesses is a relatively recent trend, Dr. Arnold Relman, editor of the New England Journal of Medicine, predicted that the majority of health care services in the United States will be corporate-owned by the end of the century.

In a keynote speech, Service Employees President John Sweeney said that during the 1990s five or six nursing home chains will operate most of the facilities.

"Medicare is soon to come under a blistering attack," Sweeney warned, "and if Ronald Reagan is re-elected President we will see public fund cutbacks that will force already indecent salary levels and patient care standards into a pit of obscene proportions.

"We can succeed in our battle with corporatization, if we are willing to link patient care reform with organizing zeal."

Sweeney, whose union represents some 275,000 health care workers, said the only hope for a decent and caring health care system in America lies in organizing and mobilizing the seven million health care employees that remain unorganized.

Polarization

Prof. Charles Craypo, chairman of the economics department at Notre Dame University, pointed out that the business takeover of health care systems has led to the polarization of both health care delivery and of health workers' annual earnings, with a few people at the top making fortunes while others earn very little.

Greg Devereux, health policy specialist with the State, County & Municipal Employees, observed that three things generally happen when a corporation takes over a health care facility—uncompensated care is cut, facility rates are increased, and staffing is reduced.

Other issues discussed at the conference were the occupational hazards that confront health care workers, the care of long-term patients such as the mentally ill and the aged infirm, and the consequences of efforts to control costs in the industry.

Dr. Stephen Zoloth, associate professor at New York's Hunter College School of Health Science, warned that "hospitals are dangerous places to work" and that the "push has come from organized labor" to get health and safety precautions installed at health care work sites.

"There are insidious, long-term health hazards" in hospitals, and a "severe amount of underreporting" of those hazards, William Borwegan, SEIU occupational safety and health coordinator, observed. Health care workers need a bill of rights which would include their right to know about and investigate health hazards, he declared.

Health care cost containment was examined from the perspective of workers who are affected by the implementation of cost control measures. SEIU Research Director Cathy Schoen pointed out that the current system in use for Medicare cost containment has sometimes encouraged hospitals in the "impulse" to lay off workers and to hire part-time workers.

Dr. Philip Caper, professor of public policy at Dartmouth Medical School, made the point that what enters into medical decision-making may be the biggest key to the reduction of health care costs.

Rep. James M. Shannon (D-Mass.), a House sponsor of the labor-supported Kennedy-Gephardt health cost containment bill, told the conference that "our goal should be focused on getting a national health care system, pure and simple." The time is ripe for developing such a system because "the illusion that an American family will not suffer financial doom because of an illness has been broken down," Shannon said.

Mondale, Ferraro endorsed

Paperworkers blast Reagan labor policies

Detroit—A call for reform of the nation's labor laws and tax policy coupled with an endorsement of Walter Mondale and Geraldine Ferraro topped the agenda of the 1,569 delegates to the Paperworkers' convention here.

A resolution on labor law reform called on Congress to beef up the penalties against companies that violate federal labor laws. It also urged that firms buying out unionized plants be required to recognize the union and be bound to existing contracts.

The delegates also adopted a resolution demanding the restoration of corporate income taxes coupled to simplification of the federal tax codes and elimination of tax subsidies that encourage plants to move jobs overseas. Paperworkers President Wayne E. Glenn told delegates that the Reagan Administraiton has "practically eliminated the corporate income tax."

This was the union's third constitutional convention since the merger in 1972 that formed the union from the Pulp, Sulphite & Paper Mill Workers and the Papermakers & Paperworkers. It was also the union's centennial year, and delegates were shown a 40-minute film on the founding of the organization.

The resolution endorsing the Democratic presidential ticket of Walter Mondale and Geraldine Ferraro cited their strongly pro-labor voting records in Congress.

Different path

The resolution stressed that both candidates are eminently qualified and that it is time to seek a different path—one that is not filled with high unemployment and reduced food aid and health care for the poor and needy.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland echoed the expressions of the delegates when he said, "Between now and Nov. 6, our movement has no higher priority than to make sure that our members understand the urgency of the choice before them and turn out to vote in unprecedented numbers."

In his address to the convention, Kirkland recalled that when the Reagan Administration came to power the AFL-CIO was virtually alone in warning that Ronald Reagan's policies would bring great injury to millions of working Americans and their families.

Auto Workers President Owen Bieber, addressing the convention, blasted Reagan for his record on issues of importance to working men and women: the unfavorable changes in the National Labor Relations Board, attacks against Social Security benefits and unjust tax law revisions.

Election results

Glenn, Sec.-Treas. John M. Defee, and eight incumbent vice presidents were re-elected by the delegates to four-year terms. Three new vice presidents were elected. They are Clifton King of Bush, La., Eldon Hebert of Madawaska, Me., and Fran Pothier of Huntington Beach, Calif.

The convention approved a constitutional change to the effect that local contracts will stand as ratified if local members vote down the agreement but then fail to get the necessary two-thirds vote for strike authorization.

Allen succeeds Owens at Professional Athletes

Douglas F. Allen, executive director of the U.S. Football League Players Association, has been elected secretary-treasurer of the Professional Athletes by that union's executive board. He succeeds Brig Owens, who returned to private law practice.

Allen will retain his post in the USFLPA, which is an affiliate of the FPA. He played linebacker for the Buffalo Bills after graduating from Pennsylvania State University in 1973. Allen was an AFL-CIO regional COPE director for New York and New Jersey for six years before being named assistant to the executive director of the National Football League Players Association.

Economic index signals slowdown

The government's best gauge of future economic activity reflected a sluggish economy, and other reports provided further evidence of the slowing.

The Commerce Dept.'s index of leading economic indicators rose five-tenths of 1 percent in August after two months of decline. Only four of the 10 indicators reported for the month showed increases.

The six indicators pointing to a downturn were the length of the average workweek, the number of companies reporting slower deliveries from vendors, contracts and orders for plant and equipment, building permits, sensitive material prices, and the money supply.

The plus signs were rising stock prices, an increase in business formation, fewer initial claims for unemployment insurance benefits, and higher orders for manufactured goods.

In addition, the Commerce Dept. substantially revised downward the July drop in the index to a decline of 1.8 percent rather than the eight-tenths of 1 percent initially reported. This made the July decline the worst since a 2.2-percent drop in September 1981. The June decline was revised from a drop of 1.3 percent to a 1.1 percent decline.

In a separate report, the Commerce Dept. said August factory orders fell seven-tenths of 1 percent, the second drop in three months. The decline was caused mainly by slowdowns in non-durable industries ranging from paper to toothpaste.

A survey of purchasing agents showed that new orders for materials and services declined last month for the first time since December 1982. The monthly survey of agents at 250 industrial companies also showed that expansion in employment had halted.

"Employment plateaued, neither growing nor declining, while production levels were also down moderately," the National Association of Purchasing Management said.

Housing sales drop

Other negative economic news came in a Commerce Dept. report that sales of new single-family homes fell 8.1 percent in August to a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 569,000, the lowest level in a year. The August decline followed a revised decrease of 2.2 percent in July to a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 619,000.

Analysts, including Michael Sumichrast, chief economist for the National Association of Home Builders, predicted a further drop in home sales in coming months.

"Sales are going to decline a little bit more this year, but much more next year," Sumichrast said. "We're looking to a drop of 25 percent next year. Our scenario is for increasing interest rates."

The Commerce Dept. also reported that spending on new building rose a mere two-tenths of 1 percent in August after two months of declines, apparently reflecting the rise in interest rates earlier this year.

Another sign of the slowing economy was a sharp drop of 10 percentage points in the volume of help-wanted advertising in major newspapers across the country during August. The Conference Board, a business-oriented group, said the drop was the steepest in more than three years.

Musicians ask bargaining equality

Musicians employed by hotels, lounges and nightclubs should be classified as employees with the same bargaining rights as other workers, union witnesses urged at House hearings.

Court interpretations of federal labor law have left most working musicians in a "no man's land," AFM President Victor W. Fuentealba testified before the House Subcommittee on Labor-Management Relations.

Because musicians working on temporary engagements can be classified as "self-employed," the establishment that hires them is able to avoid dealing with the union that represents them, Fuentealba said.

The union has urged Congress to enact changes in federal labor law to recognize the special employment conditions for musicians on the same basis that it recognized in 1959 amendments to the Taft-Hartley Act the unique employment problems of the construction and apparel industries.

Jack Golodner, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. for Professional Employees, told the subcommittee that both his department and the AFL-CIO support legislation sought by the Musicians as well as a separate bill pressed by the Teachers that would restore full bargaining rights to college faculties.

With adjournment near, there is no likelihood of action on the legislation by this Congress. But Golodner told the House panel that action is overdue to make the protections of federal labor law and the commitment to collective bargaining at least as meaningful for artists, teachers and professional employees as it is for other employed people."

Montana court bars 'con-con' ballot question

Helena Mont.—The Montana Supreme Court dealt a major setback to the ultra-conservative campaign for a constitutional convention for the purpose of mandating a balanced federal budget. In a 6-to-1 decision, the court struck an initiative on the proposal from the state's Nov. 6 ballot.

The ruling was the fourth major defeat in recent weeks for supporters of the labor-opposed "con-con."

With the Montana defeat, there is virtually no chance this year for backers of the scheme to obtain enough state legislative endorsements to force a national constitutional convention. So far, the "con-con" drive has gained 32 of a needed 34 state resolutions calling for a national convention.

AFL-CIO Vice President Gerald W. McEntee, who heads the federation's Committee on the Budget, the spearhead of labor's opposition to the convention scheme, called the Montana development "a serious setback for the proponents of the balanced budget amendment."

McEntee, who is president of the State, County & Municipal Employees, pointed out that previously many states had acted on the balanced budget amendment proposal "with little understanding of the issue."

Such an amendment, he warned "would cost the U.S. economy $260 billion in federal funds the first year, if adopted," and the idea of a convention "would open up a constitutional can of worms."

The AFL-CIO is part of a national bipartisan coalition, Citizens to Protect the Constitution, that is opposing the constitutional convention drive.

Unconstitutional initiative

The Montana ballot question, which was challenged by the public interest lobbying group Common Cause, would have ordered the state legislature to adopt a resolution calling for a constitutional convention and to stay in session—without pay—until it did so. The state's high court held that the initiative was unconstitutional under both state and federal law.

In September, the California Supreme Court struck down a similar question from that state's ballot, and the U.S. Supreme Court refused to intervene.

Earlier this year con-con supporters in Washington failed to get enough signatures on a petition to place the issue on that state's ballot. In Michigan, two efforts to get the legislature to act on a resolution failed.

On the federal level, supporters fell short on a petition to gain the discharge of a balanced budget amendment resolution from a House committee.

Auto Workers set Oct. 12 target for new Ford contract

Dearborn, Mich.—Bargainers for 115,000 members of the Auto Workers employed by Ford Motor Co. set Oct. 12 at noon as their goal for reaching agreement on a new contract with the nation's number two auto maker.

Stephen Yokich, the union's chief negotiator with Ford, stressed that the date was not a strike deadline, only a target for wrapping up the new pact.

The UAW's old contract expired Sept. 14, and both sides agreed to extend it. The extension includes a provision for a three-day strike notice.

The parties resumed main-table talks Oct. 1 after nearly a month of inactivity as the union and General Motors reached a tentative agreement Sept. 21 ending a strike at 17 GM plants.

As was the case in the GM talks, the union's top goal with Ford is to obtain job security for its members.

GM agreed to the creation of a $1 billion fund to aid workers who lose their jobs due to outside contracting, automation, and productivity increases.

Meanwhile, the union announced it will strike General Motors of Canada on Oct. 17 unless agreement has been reached on a new contract covering its 36,600 members there.

In other industry bargaining, International Harvester Co. and the UAW agreed to an indefinite contract extension and recessed their talks. Their contract covering 13,000 active and 15,000 laid-off workers expired Sept. 30.

The union plans to bargain with other truck manufacturers, including Mack Truck and Volvo White, before returning to the table with Harvester.

Ferraro rouses delegates to Illinois state convention

Rosemont, Ill.—"While Ronald Reagan is stuck in the past, Fritz Mondale has a vision of the American future," Democratic Vice Presidential candidate Geraldine Ferraro told cheering delegates to the 100th anniversary convention of the Illinois AFL-CIO.

In her speech, the New York congresswoman, running with Walter Mondale, dramatized the differences between the Democratic and Republican national tickets and urged the 2,000 unionists at the convention to continue voter registration and get-out-the-vote efforts.

The delegates themselves were critical of the Reagan Administration in a series of resolutions stressing the damage done to Illinois workers and the nation by the Administration's social and economic policies.

Also approved were a series of resolutions setting the state labor movement's key legislative goals for the next two legislative terms.

State AFL-CIO President Robert G. Gibson, in his speech to the delegates, stressed that the gains made for working people in the state were most often chalked up when the state legislature had a Democratic majority. In contrast, workers found themselves most often in "a fight for survival" when the assembly was under Republican control, he said.

'Happy hour' binge

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland told the convention that while the President is campaigning under a strategy of "duck the issues" and "treat the public to a 'happy hour' binge" in hopes the hangover can be put off until after the election, millions of Americans are already feeling the pain, including "tens of millions" who still "bear the scars of the unemployment his policies inflicted on them."

Kirkland also stressed that some 8.5 million Americans remain jobless. "They have been bypassed by Mr. Reagan's vaunted recovery," he asserted, "even as the steam is going out of it, and the unemployment rate is in its third month of stagnation."

Ferraro, in her remarks to the delegates, contrasted Mondale's record with that of President Reagan:

"While Ronald Reagan was making movies in Hollywood, Fritz Mondale was a champion of civil rights and social justired in 1974, died Sept. 15 after a heart attack. He was 76.

Voter registration

In action on resolutions, the delegates called for continuation of new state voter registration rules that have permitted easier access to registration. They also called for improvements in the state's workers' compensation and unemployment insurance programs, and for strengthening of the state's prevailing wage law.

Other measures opposed attempts to consolidate police and fire services in localities and any state legislation that would interfere with the collective bargaining process.

The convention also urged full political action rights for public employees, and improvements in pension programs for municipal employees.

The delegates called for selection of a labor representative on the state's citizens' utility board and deplored attempts by the state commerce commission to meddle in collective bargaining in the utility industry.

Other speakers at the three-day convention included AFL-CIO Vice President Joyce Miller, national COPE Director John Perkins, Sen. Alan Dixon (D-Ill.), State Atty. Gen. Neil Hartigan, and Gov. James R. Thompson (R).

Ford fills in at Labor Dept. as Donovan prepares for trial

Labor Sec. Raymond J. Donovan's indictment has left Under Sec. Ford B. Ford in charge of the department.

President Reagan gave Donovan an unpaid leave of absence while he defends himself against criminal charges of grand larceny and fraud in connection with a New York City subway project.

Donovan is the first Cabinet member ever indicted while holding office.

Ford won't have the title of acting secretary, but as the number two person in the department he has filled that function in Donovan's absence. Ford is a safety engineer and industry consultant from California, who held a state post when Reagan was governor. He came to the Labor Dept. in 1981 as assistant secretary for mine safety and was named under secretary last year.

Donovan's indictment covers events of 1979, when he was executive vice president of the Schiavone Construction Co. in New Jersey.

Bronx District Atty. Mario Merola told reporters that Donovan had joined in a scheme to pad the bills of a subcontractor and overbill the New York Transit Authority for work done on a subway tunnel. He said the fraud was "in the range of $8 million" and was also used to inflate the percentage of subcontracting to minority-owned firms.

Six current executives of the Schiavone firm were indicted along with Donovan. One of the subcontractor officials indicted was also charged in a separate indictment with a mob-related murder in 1978.

Donovan pleaded not guilty to all the charges and told reporters the indictment was politically motivated and "not worth the paper it was written on." And Reagan angrily charged "a lynch atmosphere" in the "allegations and charges . . . that have been made on so many people of our Administration."

Donovan headed the Reagan campaign in New Jersey and was a major fundraiser before he was named Secretary of Labor after the 1980 election.

William R. Probey dies, retired AFL-CIO staffer

Gaithersburg, Md.—William R. Probey, an AFL-CIO field representative who retired in June 1974, died Sept. 15 after a heart attack. He was 76.

Probey worked from 1933 to 1957 in the accounting departments of the AFL and the AFL-CIO and from 1957 until his retirement, served as a field representative. He had been a member of the Office & Professional Employees and Field Representatives Federation.

House probe hits labor law failure, politicized NLRB

on unions as well as the relatively ineffective restraints on management.

The law's failure "is recreating the same conditions that led to the enactment of the law in the first place," the congressional report noted. It threatens a return to the "disruption and upheaval" that marked labor relations in an earlier era of the nation's history.

"We understand the frustrations expressed by union witnesses," the subcommittee said. Both the law and its administration are in need of repair. "The serious crisis in labor-management relations must be addressed," the panel insisted.

Republican members of the subcommittee filed a minority report contending that labor law is working well and collective bargaining is healthy.

Their rebuttal charged the sumcommittee majority with political motivation for its findings and said an expanded workload has been a factor in the NLRB's admittedly growing backlog of cases.

Senate Republicans scuttle key civil rights bill

Sen. Orrin G. Hatch, chairman of the Labor & Human Resources Committee, was a principal foe of the legislation and his chances for delaying tactics increased as the adjournment deadline neared.

Civil rights supporters saw the must-pass funding resolution as the most practical to get the measure to a vote, and Senate Democratic Leader Robert C. Byrd (W.Va.) proposed it as an amendment.

On a 51-48 vote, the Senate moved to allow the amendment despite a challenge by the Republican leadership that it was "non-germane" and therefore could not be taken up. The Senate then voted 92-4 to limit debate in an effort to choke off a right-wing filibuster.

But Hatch and other foes had more success with other delaying tactics, including some 1,300 proposed amendments. When negotiations failed to produce an acceptable compromise, a key Republican sponsor of the bill—Sen. Bob Packwood (Ore.)—said "with a heavy heart" that the battle was lost and moved to drop the civil rights measure from the spending bill.

Democrats opposed the abandonment, but the motion carried by 53-45 vote.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), the other principal sponsor, said the rejected compromise would have amounted to merely "a fig leaf over the denial of civil rights."

Limited effect

Its effect would have been to remedy the Supreme Court decision only as it applied to sex discrimination in educational institutions—without dealing with the implied extension of the court's decision to other forms of discrimination and bias in other institutions receiving federal aid.

The fight will be continued in the new Congress, Kennedy pledged. "Shame on this body," he said angrily. "Shame on this body."

Congress was still two days from adjournment when the AFL-CIO News went to press, and the final fate of a number of bills was still undecided.

It appeared certain, however, that immigration reform legislation was dead. A House-Senate conference had broken up in disagreement, unable to resolve the issue of assuring that persons of obviously foreign background who are legally in this country won't be discriminated against because of measures aimed at illegal aliens. And despite some changes from the original House version, the conference compromise or importation of farm workers for temporary employment still bore a clear resemblance to the discredited bracero program of an earlier era.

In some other actions:

- The House passed two labor-supported bills affecting fringe benefits. One measure renewed the tax-exempt status of educational benefits provided by employers, up to $5,000. The law originally excluding such benefits from taxation had expired at the end of 1983. The other bill would extend a tax exemption for group legal services provided to workers. Unless Congress acts, benefits will be taxable after this year.
- In a Democratic-sponsored "put-up-or-shut-up" challenge to President Reagan, the House voted 411-11 to require the President to submit a balanced budget each year. The President could also submit an alternative unbalanced budget, but would have to include a specific plan and timetable for achieving a balanced budget in the future.

GOP blocked

Later, the House defeated a Republican attempt to allow the Reagan-supported balanced budget constitutional amendment to be taken up as an amendment to a pending trade bill.

The House-passed measures were still awaiting Senate consideration when the AFL-CIO News went to press. Congress was working for a final adjournment by Oct. 6. The new 99th Congress, to be elected on Nov. 6, is scheduled to convene on Jan. 3, 1985.

Jellybean Blues

Joe Glazer, who has brought his songs to picket lines and union conventions, entertains lunchtime strollers in the nation's capital with songs from his newest album, Jellybean Blues II—an update of his 1982 spoof of the Reagan presidency. The new songs include "Teflon Man," in which Reagan explains why "nothing sticks to me." He's the Teflon Man who gets out of every jam. Accompanying guitarists joining in the al fresco concert are Joseph Uehlein of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. and Steve Jones, a former Farm Worker.

Steelworkers adopt changes in financial and election rules

Cleveland — Measures designed to streamline the union's financial operations and elections procedures and to encourage mergers with other organizations were adopted by the more than 3,100 Steelworkers convention delegates.

The convention voted to cap the USWA strike fund at $200 million. The fund, now at $218 million, pays benefits at a rate of $60 a week per member.

Under the USWA constitution, 20 percent of monthly dues over $6 per member goes into the strike fund. The amendment provides that once the fund reaches $200 million, dues money that normally goes to the strike fund will be channeled into the union's general fund. The distribution would revert to the old formula when the fund drops to $180 million.

And any time the union's general fund drops to $18 million, $2 million will be transferred from the strike fund.

In another constitutional change, delegates voted to drop special elections for international officers if a vacancy occurs with more than two years left in a four-year term. The union's executive board is now authorized to fill vacancies until the next regularly scheduled election.

The move to end the special elections grew out of the situation following the death of former USWA President Lloyd McBride last year, two weeks before the half-way point in his term. The board appointed then-USWA Secretary Lynn A. Williams as temporary acting president and the union held a special election which Williams won.

In other action, the delegates approved a constitutional measure permitting the executive board to act on mergers and to waive—for no more than four years—application of parts of the USWA constitution to the other organization. The measure also assures that the merging organization will be able to maintain key provisions of its existing constitution.

In other resolutions, delegates stressed the need for strong national plant closing legislation to assure that workers' interests be considered in all shutdowns and endorsed passage of the Equal Rights Amendment to the U.S. Constitution.

Mondale speech

Earlier in the week-long meeting, the delegates cheered a speech by Democratic presidential candidate Walter Mondale and pledged an "all-out effort" among USWA members for the election of the Mondale-Ferraro ticket.

In a companion measure, the delegates adopted a resolution strongly condemning the damaging policies of the Reagan Administration and urged his defeat for re-election "in the name of 50 years of social progress."

Convention speakers included AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, Urban League President John Jacob, Ohio Gov. Richard Celeste, Rep. John Murtha (D-Pa.), Ontario New Democratic Party Leader Robert Rae, International Metalworkers Federation Gen. Sec. Herman Rebhan, and William Sirs of the British Iron & Steel Trades Confederation.

Yale University workers press strike for pay equity

New Haven, Conn.—Some 1,700 clerical and technical workers remain on strike against Yale University, seeking a settlement that will eliminate race and sex pay discrimination.

Hotel Employees & Restaurant Employees Local 34 went on strike Sept. 26 after negotiating for 11 months to gain an initial contract with the university. Yale's final offer to the union fell far short of the increase the union says is necessary to achieve pay equity for women and minorities.

Women make up 82 percent of the 2,650-member unit and minorities account for 17 percent. The unit includes secretaries, research assistants, telephone operators and computer programmers. Their average salary is $13,424.

The local's picket lines are being honored by the 950 members of HERE Local 35, the food service and maintenance unit, resulting in only one dining hall of 13 remaining open for students.

Students and faculty support groups have formed backing Local 34's efforts to get a fair contract. To honor the picket lines, instructors have moved some 500 classes off campus to locations that include churches and a theater.

Yale administrators, who had insisted their pre-strike proposal was the final offer, have now agreed to further bargaining. Pressure to get the university officials back to the bargaining table was the focus of a rally by 3,000 supporters shortly after the strike began.

Other goals

Besides the improvements in wages, the union is seeking increased health and pension benefits and assurances that there will be no layoffs during the term of the contract.

Lucille Dickess of Local 34 said the final offer "in no way addresses the issue of discrimination of women and minorities. The union finds this unacceptable."

"Women are not used to asking, and now we're asking," Local 34 negotiator Pearl Moore said. "The commitment is very strong.'

Carmen appoint Daniels to succeed O. P. Channell

Kansas City—Thurston S. Daniels has been named secretary-treasurer of the Railway Carmen to fill out the term of Orville P. Channell, Jr. who is retiring Sept. 30. The term runs through the union's 1988 convention.

Daniels, 58, a carman apprentice with Missouri-Pacific Railroad, joined Lodge 114 in North Little Rock, Ark., in 1947. He became the lodge chairman in 1962 and in 1973, was elected vice general chairman of Carmen's Missouri-Pacific board, moving up to general chairman in 1976.

Channell has served as secretary-treasurer since 1972. He also held several other union posts and had been assistant to the president of the AFL-CIO Railway Employee Dept. from 1969 to 1972.

Teachers call for legislation on faculty bargaining rights

The disruption of higher education collective bargaining rights that resulted from a 1980 Supreme Court decision could hamper educational reforms and productivity, the Teachers warned at House hearings.

Testifying in support of legislation that would overturn the effects of the high court's Yeshiva University ruling, AFT Vice President Irwin Polishook said college teachers should be provided full guarantees of federal labor law even though they participate in some decisions on curricula and standards.

Polishook told a House Education & Labor subcommittee that, in effect, the Yeshiva ruling classified faculty members of private colleges as management, thereby stripping them of their collective bargaining rights.

"The Supreme Court decision is predicated on an idealized and false view of the university in which the faculty is truly in control," he testified.

"Because of its requirement that there be a faculty inquiry into the extent of faculty influence in each case, the average faculty will find it impossible to muster the resources necessary to defend against the contention that their role in educational decisions makes them managerial employees."

Although the decision applied to Yeshiva specifically, it has stalled organizing and bargaining at many other private institutions. Public universities, which are not covered by the federal labor law, were not affected.

Polishook, a history professor at City University of New York, pointed out that declining enrollments and shrinking economic resources in higher education have "exacerbated the natural tension in faculty-administration relationships" and have sharply reduced faculty influence in decision-making.

'Broken promises' report

Reagan cuts diminish programs for elderly

The Reagan Administration's "relentless assault on social programs for the elderly" has slashed every form of federal assistance that most older Americans rely on, according to findings released by the National Council of Senior Citizens and the State, County & Municipal Employees.

NCSC Executive Director William R. Hutton said that the survey "put to rest the myth that Reaganomics has been fair to older Americans. The cold hard truth is that since Ronald Reagan took office, federal spending for the elderly has been slashed by $24 billion."

In releasing the results of the analysis, AFSCME President Gerald W. McEntee said the report is "a clear warning" for older Americans about President Reagan's policies and what a second Reagan term would do to senior citizens in the future.

Dire warning

"Four more years of a Republican Administration will probably see even deeper cuts in social security, Medicare and other senior citizen programs which help maintain retirement income security for millions of people," McEntee warned.

Hutton stressed that Reagan's "tax cuts for the rich and budget cuts for the poor and aged have left an 'age gap' in the nation."

The report, titled "Broken Promises: A Report on the State of the Elderly During the Reagan Administration," includes a state-by-state analysis of programs for older citizens over the period since 1981.

NCSC said the study details how Reagan budgets have forced severe cutbacks in those programs and services for the elderly. The impact of the Reagan budget is measured in terms of fewer dollars spent, loss of services or participants and reduction in average benefits or costs.

Hutton cited deep slashes in Medicare and Medicaid, along with reductions in eligibility for food stamps, senior housing, nutrition programs, legal services, transportation and other support services needed by the elderly.

"Broken Promises clearly shows that not one major program serving older Americans improved during the Reagan Administration's four years in office in either the level of services or the quality of services provided," Hutton charged.

The report pointed out that the cumulative four-year loss in major programs for older Americans amounts to $24 billion, or $900 for everyone age 65 or older.

The cuts have grown during each of the last three years from $2.3 billion in fiscal year 1982 to a projected $7.6 billion in fiscal 1985, the study showed.

Another key finding is that under Reagan, the largest dollar cuts came in social security benefits, $9 billion, and Medicare, $12 billion—the two programs most relied on by older citizens, NCSC said.

The study pointed out that the largest percentage cuts under the Reagan budget were felt in such aid to the low-income elderly as the subsidized housing program, down 30.3 percent; food stamps, down 7.5 percent, and Medicare, down 7.1 percent.

Wide impact

As a result of the Reagan cuts, the study showed, nearly 400,000 fewer older Americans receive food stamps, over half a million lost Medicaid coverage, 160 million fewer meals were served under federal nutrition programs, and there are nearly 6,000 fewer federally subsidized housing units for the elderly than would be available had the cuts not been made.

The survey stressed that because many older persons depend on a variety of federal programs to maintain an adequate standard of living, the cumulative effect of such cuts, "can be devastating," and "shred the safety net for needy older citizens."

The study noted that most older persons have lower incomes than the general population. The median income for all older Americans was $6,593 in 1982, compared to $12,387 for people 25 to 64.

NCSC researchers took issue with some studies showing that the dollar income of some older Americans is rising. The NCSC said its findings puts those studies "in perspective" by making clear that higher incomes "do not necessarily translate into higher living standards when vital federally supported programs—such as health care and nutrition are being cut."

NCSC's William Hutton and AFSCME President Gerald McEntee release findings on how Reagan cutbacks have harmed programs for the elderly.

Back pay due

The Postal Service wants to cut the pay of newly hired workers, but it admits that it owes money to former employees under a court settlement of overtime pay claims from violations of the wage-hour law.

Workers employed between May 1974 and October 1982 have already received nearly $393 million under the settlement, leaving some $7 million awaiting former employees who have not yet been located.

Persons who think they may be eligible should send employment data covering their postal service, including social security number and present address, to: Payroll Processing Branch, Postal Data Center, P.O. Box 63, Minneapolis, Minn.

Washington delegates vote 10-cent boost in per capita

Olympia, Wash. — Delegates to the Washington State AFL-CIO convention approved a 10-cent increase in the monthly per capita tax starting next Apr. 1 but added a unique formula for reducing the payment as affiliation grows.

The measure calls for a one-cent reduction in the per capita tax for each gain of at least 3,000 new members affiliated with the federation, up to a maximum reduction of five cents. The current monthly per capita payment is 50 cents.

State AFL-CIO President Marvin L. Williams, in his keynote address to the nearly 500 delegates, assailed the Reagan Administration for its "anti-labor policies." He particularly denounced Reagan's National Labor Relations Board for its anti-union bias and its attitude of "labor can wait."

Williams called the application of "cost-benefit analysis" to the Administration's handling of occupational safety and health standards a "cold-blooded calculation of how many workers must be killed or injured before protections are required." He warned that "organized labor has a long memory, and we shall not forgive or forget what Ronald Reagan has done to our people and our country."

President Robert F. Harbrant of the AFL-CIO Food & Allied Service Trades Dept. urged the delegates to step up organizing efforts in their unions to "turn around" membership losses and bring the benefits of organization to workers in expanding sectors of the economy.

The delegates acted on some 60 resolutions including support of collective bargaining rights for state troopers and adoption of health and safety standards for video display terminals. Other measures called for programs to advise students on their rights as workers, fair trade laws, plant-closing legislation and a national industrial policy.

A series of workshops on key labor issues included discussions of political action, safety and health legislation, the impact of new technology, federal job training programs, and the "gender gap" between the opinions of women and men as it affects political action.

For the first time, the convention included a "youth day" for 20 students sponsored by local unions. The students—most of whom had never attended any function held by organized labor—were guests of the convention on its opening day.

Kirkland to spur union vote drive in nine-state tour

The emphasis will be on meeting with shop stewards and rank-and-file members of local COPE committees, as well as local union and central body leaders.

His goal, Kirkland said, is to spur a "one-on-one" campaign among members of AFL-CIO affiliates for a big election turnout.

Arrangements for meetings are being made by the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization & Field Services. In some of the locations, members of the AFL-CIO Executive Council and labor-endorsed candidates will take part. All meetings will be open to press coverage.

Kirkland's schedule, subject to last-minute revisions, includes these events:

Friday, Oct. 12—Hamden, Conn., at noon, and Waterbury, Conn., at 6 p.m.

Oct. 13—Springfield, Mass., noon.

Oct. 14—Albany, N.Y., noon.

Oct. 15—Kingston, N.Y., noon; New York City, 5:30 p.m.

Oct. 16—West Caldwell, N.J., noon; Neptune, N.J., 7 p.m.

Oct. 17—Trenton, N.J., noon; Philadelphia, 8 p.m.

Oct. 18—Pittsburgh, 7:30 p.m.

Oct. 19—Akron, Ohio, noon; Cleveland, 7:30 p.m.

Oct. 20—Sandusky, Ohio, 12:30 p.m.; Toledo, Ohio, 7 p.m.

Oct. 22—Detroit, evening.

Oct. 23—Lansing, Mich., noon; Grand Rapids, Mich., 7:30 p.m.

Oct. 24—Chicago, evening.

Oct. 25—Rock Island, Ill., 1:30 p.m., Rockford, Ill., 8:30 p.m.

Oct. 26—Kenosha, Wis., 4 p.m.; Milwaukee, 8 p.m.

Imports push trade deficit higher

The government reported the nation's foreign trade deficit soared another $9.9 billion in August, bringing the imbalance for the year so far to a record $83.7 billion. The trade deficit is expected to total $130 billion this year.

The August deficit reflected a continuing flood of imported steel, foot-wear, and other goods that has cost thousands of American jobs.

For the first eight months of 1984, the nation's trade imbalance has already topped the record deficit for all of last year, $69.4 billion. Commerce Sec. Malcolm Baldrige conceded there is little chance for much improvement in the near future.

The worst faltering came in July when the import surge pushed the deficit over the $14-billion mark, setting a monthly record.

Steel imports of 2,516,000 tons in August, accounted for more than 30 percent of the U.S. market for the second month in a row.

The Commerce Dept. reported that imported steel from January through August amounted to 17,629,000 tons, up 72.3 percent from the same period last year.

A week before the August figures were released, President Reagan flatly rejected recommendations by the International Trade Commission for a combination of quotas and tariffs on steel imports. Instead, he called for "voluntary" restraints by foreign suppliers.

Assessing the damage

Democratic presidential candidate Walter Mondale charged that Reagan's record budget deficits are causing the trade problem by driving up interest rates and inflating the value of the dollar. Mondale also accused Reagan of failing to protect American jobs from the onslaught of imports.

The government reported a 33.4-percent climb in shoe imports over year-earlier levels in August as 69 million pairs of foreign-made shoes entered the country. Shoe imports now account for about 70 percent of the U.S. market, according to industry findings.

For August, imports totaled $27.9 billion, down 16.7 percent from the July record of $33.5 billion. Exports of American goods also declined 7.2 percent in August to $18 billion.

Government studies show that for every $1 billion in trade deficit some 25,000 American jobs are lost.

The American Iron & Steel Institute warned that the steel import situation is at "crisis levels," and called for "swift action to stop this blatant attack on the domestic steel industry."

The steel industry currently is operating at 57 percent of capability, with tens of thousands of Steelworkers on layoff. Many steel plant communities are on the brink of financial disaster.

Market penetration by steel imports averaged 25.8 percent in the first eight months of 1984, compared with 19.5 percent in the same 1983 period.

Major suppliers of last month's steel imports were Japan, the European Economic Community and Canada.

Petroleum and some non-oil imports declined in August, but shipments of foreign autos rose 1.5 percent from July levels to $2.57 billion, capturing more than 25 percent of the American auto market.

The job search goes on

Evidence of continuing high unemployment and substandard wages surfaced again as streams of applicants turned out for scarce jobs. News of the economic "recovery" obviously has yet to reach thousands of job seekers.

In San Pedro, Calif., the chance of landing one of 350 dockworkers' jobs lured an estimated 50,000 applicants, while 840 desperate workers applied for a single laborer's job with the Washington County, Md., roads department.

In California, lines of job seekers in cars, vans and on motorcycles extended more than 10 miles when a makeshift drive-through employment office opened Sept. 23 to distribute application forms for the waterfront jobs. The vehicles began lining up two days earlier in response to the announcement of the job openings.

The mass turnouts follow similar responses of job seekers for a few openings earlier in Baltimore, Buffalo, Chicago, Akron, Ohio, and other locations that still haven't recovered from the long Reagan Recession.

EPA hit for failure to issue asbestos removal standard

Asbestos in the nation's schools is a "hazard many believe will kill more children than polio," Service Employees President John J. Sweeney warned at House hearings.

"Nature has played a dirty trick on us" by not producing highly visible, debilitated children to "motivate our federal government to act," Sweeney told a House Commerce subcommittee. "Instead, we must wait 20 to 30 years for the body count because asbestos-related diseases take so long to develop."

Sweeney charged that the Environmental Protection Agency has transformed "a very bad situation into an environmental catestrophe" by alarming parents about asbestos in the schools without offering regulations requiring safe removal of the substance or protections for students, teachers and workers.

The EPA, meanwhile, told the same subcommittee that it would not be seeking funds for asbestos clean-up in schools in either fiscal year 1985 or 1986, despite Congress's authorization in August of $600 million for asbestos removal over the next seven years and its appropriation of $50 million for fiscal year 1984.

Dr. John A. Moore, EPA's assistant administrator for toxic substances, said the agency believes that if federal funds were made available now, school systems might wait to obtain such funding rather than act quickly to remove the asbestos hazard.

The agency has not produced a standard on asbestos. Moore contended in his testimony that "attempts to come up with standards for identifying and removing asbestos didn't work. It has to be done on a case-by-case basis."

The agency, however, estimates that some 14,000 schools nationwide may contain asbestos and up to 15 million persons may be regularly exposed to asbestos in the schools and other public buildings.

The SEIU petitioned the agency in November 1983 for an asbestos standard, and in February 1984 the EPA said it was granting the petition. However, last month the union felt forced to seek a court order giving the agency 30 days to issue the new rules on the removal of asbestos from school buildings.

In a related development, a federal district judge in Philadelphia has approved a class action suit on behalf of the nation's school systems against 55 asbestos manufacturers. This would be the first nationwide class action for property damage arising out of a product liability question.

AFGE hails ruling on 3-year dispute over contracting

Unions representing federal workers are entitled to use grievance procedures to challenge management actions that violate the government's own regulations and adversely affect employees, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit ruled.

Its 2-1 decision is an important victory for the Government Employees in a refusal-to-bargain dispute that involved the issue of contracting out to private firms work performed by federal workers.

The origin of the case was the refusal three years ago of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission to consider any provision dealing with the contracting out of work in its negotiations with the AFGE local representing its employees.

Management's stance

The union had merely sought a provision requiring the agency to follow the government's own regulations for determining whether contracting-out of work would be "cost effective." EEOC argued that anything to do with contracting was strictly a management prerogative.

The Federal Labor Relations Authority backed the union position, but the EEOC appealed its ruling.

AFGE President Kenneth T. Blaylock hailed the appellate court decision as a vindication of the union's three-year battle.

The government's position was that it could violate its own standards for contracting out "with impunity," Blaylock noted. But under the appellate court decision, he said, charges that an agency violated applicable laws or regulations may be raised by unions as grievances and brought before a third-party arbitrator for resolution.

The appellate court said the right to file grievances is guaranteed by law, under the Civil Service Reform Act.

Steelworkers victory

Court upholds curbs on arsenic exposure

A federal appeals court ruling upholding an Occupational Safety & Health Administration standard to curb worker exposure to arsenic was hailed as a major victory by the Steelworkers.

The decision will "give a terrific boost" to USWA members working in the copper and lead smelting industry, the union's safety director, Michael Wright, said. The USWA joined OSHA in defending the arsenic standard after it was challenged in court by several of the leading smelting firms.

Arsenic, a by-product of the smelting process, can cause lung cancer and other serious health problems.

The 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals found that OSHA had produced sufficient evidence of a "significant risk" to workers' health to justify a 50-fold reduction in the maximum permissible exposure limit of airborne arsenic.

The court held that the evidence supported OSHA's compliance requirement for engineering controls to meet the exposure limit of 10 micrograms of arsenic per cubic meter of air.

The decision, written by Judge Harry Pregerson, noted that the federal job safety law requires the agency to set a standard that assures no worker will suffer an impairment of health.

OSHA determined, in issuing its standard in 1978, that the 10-microgram exposure limit was technologically and economically feasible for the industry.

Following the Supreme Court's benzene ruling in 1980, the appeals court remanded the arsenic standard back to OSHA so the agency could produce more evidence of "significant" risk to workers' health from arsenic and evidence on the feasibility of engineering controls.

OSHA reopened the public record and in January 1983, published the final statement justifying the 10-microgram limit on arsenic by detailing the significant risk. The agency did not open the record as to whether that level was technologically and economically feasible.

Industry contended that such a limit was neither technologically nor economically feasible. The appellate court, however, ruled that the safety law is "technology-forcing." Thus, OSHA only needs to present evidence "that companies acting vigorously and in good faith can develop the technology," for it to be able to "require industry to meet standards never attained anywhere."

TV debate gives Mondale chance to pin down Reagan

The contrast in styles marked the vice presidential campaigns as well.

Geraldine Ferraro brought excitement to the campaign trail, while Bush pursed his lips and deplored what he termed "personal attacks" by the Democratic candidates such as suggesting "that the President doesn't know the facts."

Ferraro held an impromptu campaign seminar on the workfloor of a Chrysler assembly plant near Rockford, Ill.

Turning to the assembly line workers gathered to greet her, Ferraro said she was "absolutely floored" by a poll showing substantial support for Reagan among workers.

"I'm not here for a photo opportunity," the Democratic vice presidential candidate said. "You're going to make a decision on who's going to run the country, I want to know why one-third of you are going to vote for Ronald Reagan."

When they found out she really meant it, some of the workers raised questions that had bothered them or their fellow workers. When some said Jimmy Carter is to be blamed for Iran, Ferraro noted all the hostages were saved. Who takes responsibility for the American deaths in Lebanon, she asked.

Straight talk

"You say Ronald Reagan believes in a strong America. Well so do Fritz Mondale and I. We want to increase defense spending, but we're not talking about paying $900 for a 13-cent nut."

On abortion, that emotional issue that has divided many voters, Ferraro responded directly: She would not have an abortion, "but if I were raped, I'm not sure I would be that self-righteous." But "that decision would be mine," she said. "I wouldn't leave it to you to make," she said pointing, "or to you or you."

She talked about the support she and Mondale had given to the federal loans and guarantees that enabled Chrysler to stay in production. "You don't turn your back" on people who have stood up for you, she chided Reagan supporters.

When she left, a pollster would have been hard put to find a Reagan-Bush voter among the several hundred UAW members who had gathered around.

Under prodding by reporters, Bush made public his federal tax returns for the three years that he has been in office.

The returns pointed up the value of the Reagan tax cuts for persons in high income brackets. In 1981, Bush paid nearly half his income in taxes. His rate dropped to 24 percent in 1982. And last year, when his adjusted gross income was $142,117, his tax bill was only $18,305—about 13 percent.

Union member retirees cited as effective political resource

The role of union retirees in the labor movement and the need to make use of their experience, talent and energy were the focus of a day-long conference sponsored by the AFL-CIO Executive Council's Committee on Retired Union Members.

Federation Vice President William W. Winpisinger, chairman of the committee and president of the Machinists, stressed that senior citizens are becoming a significant political force and have proven to be invaluable allies who are willing to donate their time and energies. He urged that unions maintain contact with their retirees through clubs and special activities.

Kenneth Young, executive assistant to AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, pointed out that if the nearly 50 million Americans over age 55 would all go to the polls in November, they would represent nearly half the total vote. Two-thirds of the senior citizens do vote, he noted, and the remaining one-third "should be real targets for registration and get-out-the-vote programs."

COPE Director John Perkins told the audience of union and senior citizens' representatives that with less than six weeks until the November elections, the two groups must get the message out that despite President Reagan's image, "nice guys do not make the type of budget cuts this president has made."

William Dodds of the National Council of Senior Citizens made his first appearance as the new national director of Senior Citizens for Mondale-Ferraro. He stressed the need to get retirees to volunteer their services by contacting the state and local contral bodies. Executive Director William Hutton and Eric Shulman of the NCSC also spoke at the conference.

Bert Seidman, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Occupational Safety, Health & Social Security, reminded the conference participants that the Reagan cuts in programs for the elderly are only part of what should be stressed to union retirees. He also noted the cuts in programs that aid children and other age groups.

Guild's wire service unit ratifies pact to aid UPI

New York—Newspaper Guild members employed by United Press International voted 454 to 164 to accept a new contract which will initially cut wages by 25 percent, then gradually restore them to current levels by the end of 1985.

The Guild's Wire Service local, which represents about 950 of UPI's 2,000 employees worldwide, renegotiated the existing contract to aid the international wire service in reducing its financial losses. The firm's management and non-union workers had already taken 25-percent pay cuts.

In exchange for the contract concessions, Guild members will receive 6.5 percent interest in the company, and a comparable amount of a new satellite-to-home broadcasting enterprise UPI is launching, plus a seat on the board of directors and a second seat on the executive committee.

A Reagan Legacy

SOME OF THE DAMAGE that President Reagan and his appointees have inflicted can be speedily repaired by a new President.

Within hours after taking office, Reagan's successor could bring in a Secretary of Labor whose concern is the welfare of workers. And a new president could quickly appoint an OSHA administrator who refuses to compromise health and safety in the workplace, who believes that textile workers and chemical workers also have a right to life.

Because of overlapping terms, it would take longer to restore the National Labor Relations Board to its traditional role as an impartial enforcer of federal labor law. But in time it would be done, just as the Reagan Administration was gradually able to put its pro-employer stamp on the present NLRB.

But Supreme Court appointments are for life, and that's one big reason why a second Reagan term would be such a disaster for the nation.

THE LAST Democratic Administration had no Supreme Court vacancies to fill, which is highly unusual. President Reagan was able to make one appointment, which tilted a middle-of-the-road court to the right.

But almost certainly, the age of the present Supreme Court justices will allow the next president to make appointments that will shape the direction the court is to take for a generation to come.

As of next month, five of the nine justices will be 76 or older. The two youngest, it happens, are the most conservative. The names that have been mentioned as potential Reagan appointees to the Supreme Court include right-wing ideologues who have made clear their desire to overturn landmark decisions of the past and move the clock back.

The one-man, one-vote concept established by the Warren Court could then be reversed, a Reagan supporter gleefully suggested in a recent public radio discussion. In fact, he went on to suggest that a more conservative court might quite seriously question whether the Bill of Rights prohibitions against Congress passing laws abridging basic freedoms are necessarily binding on states.

Judging by the Republican Party platform, Walter Mondale isn't out of line in suggesting that Rev. Jerry Falwell's doctrines would be strongly reflected in a Reagan-appointed Supreme Court.

To a lot of people, that would be all to the good. But to most of us, it's pretty scary.

Bitter Brew

GOOD UNION MEMBERS don't drink Coors beer. The AFL-CIO boycott has nothing to do with the extreme right-wing views of the Coors family. It has everything to do with the rights of workers who until 1977 were employed at the firm's Colorado brewery under a union contract.

They struck that year because management refused to renew the contract unless they gave up protections they had achieved in past contracts—such bread-and-butter issues as seniority in shift assignments, job bidding, layoffs and recalls.

They struck because the company sought a contractual right to compel any worker to take a lie detector test or submit to a body search.

They struck because the Adolph Coors brewery, in the words of a complaint issued at the time by the Denver office of the National Labor Relations Board, sought "to discredit, undermine and subvert" their union.

The strike was by a local union directly affiliated with the AFL-CIO, but it quickly became the cause of the entire labor movement. It still is.

The strike was broken by a decertification election in which strikers were not allowed to vote. The boycott was not broken. Nor will it be.

Minorities, poor fall victim to sacking of safety rules

By Press Associates, Inc.

The Reagan Administration's many-sided assault on environmental and job health and safety protections is well documented. But less is known about the disproportionate impact on minority and low-income Americans.

Just as President Reagan's budget cuts and tax changes have been most harmful to minorities and the poor, so have his weakening and non-enforcement of environmental and workplace health rules, according to a report by the Urban Environmental Conference, an alliance of labor, minority and environmental organizations.

Titled "Reagan, Toxics and Minorities," the report again raises the issue of fairness, which has become central in the 1984 elections.

The 57-page report focuses on five areas which disproporationately affect minorities' health. It said that minority workers are hit hardest by failures in workplace health and safety regulations since they are often forced by economic circumstances and discrimination to take hazardous jobs.

Black workers face 37 percent more risk of illness and 20 percent more risk of death due to their jobs than white workers. They are 50 percent more likely to be severely disabled from job injuries and illnesses.

Callousness

The elimination of federal safety and health grants aimed at minority worker education and training under Reagan's OSHA was cited as an example of the Administration's insensitivity.

OSHA's backpedaling on standards to protect workers from life-threatening exposure to toxic substances often disproportionately affects minorities. An example is the Administration's moves to emasculate the 1978 cotton dust standard through "cost benefit" review. Cotton dust, which causes brown lung, is a minority health problem since 25 percent of all textile workers, and up to 60 percent in some areas, are black.

Even after a Supreme Court ruling in favor of worker protection more than two years ago, the case is still being dragged out by the Administration.

The report also noted that:

- Minorities tend to live in those areas with the most serious toxic pollution problems—urban, industrial communities exposed to air and water pollution, or rural areas poisoned by pesticides.

Minorities suffer

Existing and proposed hazardous waste dumps are poorly regulated by Reagan's Environmental Protection Agency, and the burden of contaminated groundwater often falls on minority communities. A General Accounting Office report found that three of every four toxic dumping sites in the Southeast were in communities where blacks are a majority.

- Lead, a highly toxic substance found in paint, gasoline, food and its containers, endangers the health of nearly 8 million urban children, most of them black. The Administration engineered large cuts in lead screening programs for children and stalled gasoline lead content standards.

- Of the nation's 5 million migrant and seasonal farm workers, 75 percent are Hispanic and 20 percent are black. Pesticide poisoning is probably their biggest occupational health problem.

The Reagan EPA is allowing increased use of pesticides under special exemptions, failing to enforce existing protections.

- Many American Indians are endangered by their proximity to abandoned uranium mill tailing sites. The Reagan EPA ignored cancer risk estimates in setting its weak standard for radon exposure from these sites in Indian reservations.

These and other findings led to the report's conclusion that "in his health and safety policies, as in other areas, President Reagan has violated the civil rights of minority Americans and made a lasting contribution to the perpetuation of inequality and unfairness in the United States."

LEGISLATIVE ALERT!

98th Congress: Rundown on Workers' Issues

As the 98th Congress moved toward adjournment, its legacy of legislative achievements for America's workers is a mixed bag. More often it was GOP defiance or threats of Reagan vetoes that prevented congressional action on legislation to help working families, the unemployed, protect worker rights, assist the elderly or aid the disadvantaged. Unions fought pitched battles with Reagan lobbyists and congressional conservatives over the right-wing legislative agenda to turn back the clock on labor standards by 50 years. When we won, it was grass-roots lobbying that often made the difference. Where we lost ground, credit Reagan and his right-wing congressional cronies. What follows is a snapshot report card on the 98th Congress.

Workers' Rights

Bankruptcy Law Reform—to reverse the Supreme Court "Bildisco" decision in order to protect union contracts—enacted into law despite opposition from Hatch, Thurmond, Helms, etc.

Hobbs Act Amendment—a conservative scheme to have feds police picket line conduct. Blocked in committee despite best efforts of Senate right-wingers, East, Grassley, Thurmond, etc.

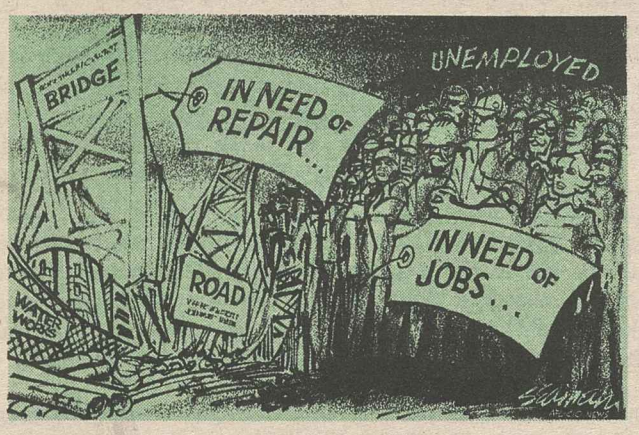
Union Political Rights—Sen. Helms's efforts to silence political voice of unions. Beaten badly in Senate.

Subminimum Wage for Youth—legislated wage discrimination. Even White House lobbying couldn't get a Senate floor vote for Sen. Percy's pet project.

Davis-Bacon—a right-wing Republican attack on this federal fair wage law was beaten decisively on the House floor, thanks to the Democrats.

Plant Closing Protections—stalled in House; opposed by GOP in House and Senate.

Product Liability Bill—a Reagan-backed, Republican-sponsored "take away" of legal rights for injured workers. Pending floor action in the Senate.



Unemployed Workers

Mortgage foreclosure assistance for the jobless—passed House; killed by Senate Republicans as Reagan threatened veto.

Health care coverage for the unemployed and their families—passed House; killed by GOP Senate as Reagan threatened veto.

Unemployment Benefits — a Democratic-sponsored expansion of this program to help the long-term jobless was scaled way back by Senate GOP efforts.

$3.5-billion Jobs Bill—to create 350,000 jobs in repair, maintenance, and restoration of public facilities. Passed House; killed in Republican Senate.

Industrial Policy—a plan to make sense out of national economic policy-making and provide financial assistance to ailing and developing industries. Reported by House committee; House and Senate Republicans opposed it.

Immigration—curb on illegals who take jobs from U.S. workers. House passed crippling amendments slowed bill; House-Senate conference in deadlock.

Trade

Domestic Content Bill—to put limit on auto imports and restore American auto industry jobs. Passed House; smothered by Republicans in Senate Commerce Committee.

Caribbean Basin Initiative — as imports surged, this Reagan scheme will export more

U.S. jobs by letting in even more cheap imports. Enacted into law thanks to defections by House Dems.

Trade Adjustment Assistance — as U.S. trade deficit reached record levels this bill would have expanded retraining assistance program for workers made jobless by imports. Passed House; cut back by tight-fisted Senate Republicans.

Buy American — amendment to weaken made-in-USA preference in highway construction bill. Passed by GOP-controlled Senate, rejected by Democratically controlled House.

Budget and Taxes

Balanced-Budget Amendment — Reagan's gimmick to decimate domestic spending programs and scar the U.S. Constitution. Pending in Senate; no action likely in House.

$700 Tax Cap—as budget deficits zoomed, a Democratic Initiative to regain lost tax revenues from the wealthy who reaped bonanza from Reagan tax cuts. Passed the House; killed by GOP Senate.

Tax Withholding—loophole closing reform to raise revenues and reduce budget deficits by making wealthy and corporations pay their fair share of tax on dividend, interest earnings. Enacted into law in '82, repealed in '83.

Enterprise Zones—another $1 billion tax giveaway for big business even as budget deficits neared record $200 billion level. Passed GOP Senate; derailed by House Democrats.

Taxing Fringe Benefits—Reagan's scheme to tax worker's health benefit plans to balance the budget. No congressional action taken.

Aid to Education—Senate and House Democrats tried to restore steep Reagan cuts in education by Senate Republican budget scalpels prevailed.

Tuition Tax Credits—another Reagan move to undercut national commitment to public education and drain the U.S. treasury of about $1 billion a year in revenue; killed in Senate.

Elderly, Consumers, Civil Rights

Social Security—Reagan's plan to cut $82 billion in benefits was scrapped early, but 1983 financing reform bill was amended to increase the retirement age and early retirement penalty.

Medicare—cost increases pushed through by GOP Senate scrambling to cut Reagan budget deficits.

Natural Gas Decontrol—Reagan's plan to accelerate deregulation would cause even higher energy prices. Even Senate Republicans wouldn't go for it.

Alaska Oil Exports—Reagan-backed flimflam to sell cheaper U.S. oil to Japan so we could import more OPEC oil. Stopped by House; bill still in conference.

Higher Phone Bills—Reagan plan to let telephone companies charge a $2-$10 monthly access fee for long distance service. House

'Jump!'

Democrats' bill to block it rejected by GOP Senate.

Fighting Discrimination—bill to overturn Supreme Court "Grove City" on sex discrimination. Implications for other civil rights laws. Easily passed House; killed in Senate by Republican majority.

Ban on Insurance Discrimination—thwarted by crippling amendments when reported by House committee thanks to GOP-Insurance Lobby teamwork.

Martin Luther King Holiday—Reagan flip-flopped on this, finally signed it into law despite one-man stand against it by Sen. Helms.

A New ERA—introduced in House but no action as Sen. Hatch turned Senate hearings into a year-long circus.

Workers lead surge to Mondale

Baltimore rally protests Reagan trade policy for failing to curb job-gutting imports of clothing and textiles.

Debate flaws hurt Reagan, tighten race

By David L. Perlman

In America's workplaces, a strong surge of support for the Mondale-Ferraro candidacy is transforming the presidential election.

That's the word COPE Director John Perkins was getting in the aftermath of the Mondale-Reagan debate. It came from shop stewards and COPE volunteers, local and international union officers.

Walter Mondale's clear superiority in the nationally televised matchup with President Reagan had an "immediately visible impact" on the campaign, Perkins said. It solidified Mondale's support among traditional Democrats, strongly swayed many who had been uncertain or apathetic about the election, and raised doubts among some workers who had declared themselves Reagan supporters.

Television and newspaper reporters were finding a similar reaction among other segments of the electorate.

There was an astonishing consensus among Democratic and Republican strategists, and among columnists and commentators across the liberal-conservative spectrum, that Mondale outshone the President.

Reagan flubs

Where Reagan fumbled questions from a panel of reporters and stumbled into obvious errors of fact, Mondale showed his solid grasp of the issues and projected himself as alert and able.

For the first time, millions of potential voters were able to hear both candidates respond to the same questions on matters as complex as the budget, as emotional as abortion and religion, as important as leadership.

The issues of foreign affairs and military goals, although touched on briefly, will be the subject of the second and final debate, to be held Sunday, Oct. 21. It will also be sponsored by the League of Women Voters.

As the AFL-CIO News was going to press, the vice presidential debate between Geraldine Ferraro and incumbent George Bush was about to get under way. The Reagan campaign staff had originally sought to downplay the matchup insisting that the election was for the presidency. But after the Reagan debacle, the GOP's hope was that Bush could stem the hemorrhage of voter support by at least holding his own.

In the most direct clash between the two

Social security coalition assails Reagan's record

By Susan Dunlop

Ronald Reagan broke his 1980 campaign promise not to cut social security, so his latest eleventh-hour campaign pledge not to slash benefits further is "less than honest," members of Congress and representatives of labor, the elderly and women's groups charged.

At a news conference in the U.S. Capitol, Rep. Claude Pepper (D-Fla.) and Sen. Daniel P. Moynihan (D-N.Y.) sharply challenged President Reagan's assertions—made in the national debate with Democratic Presidential nominee Walter Mondale—that his Administration had not tried to gut the social security program.

Despite campaign pledges not to cut social security benefits or Medicare, President Reagan moved swiftly after his election to seek massive cuts in benefits, Pepper charged.

While a storm of protest stopped the most drastic of Reagan's proposals, about $19 billion in benefit cuts were enacted at the Administration's insistence, Pepper pointed out.

The President's new promises not to cut social security benefits must be weighed against the record of the 1980 promises that "were not kept," Pepper said. "Those who depend on social security and Medicare can hardly afford to gamble on so slender a reed as to depend on promises that have been so easily broken as in the past," he added.

Moynihan noted that supporters of the social security program "have had to fight" doom and gloom predictions from the Reagan Administration as to the permanence of "the right of Americans to their earned retirement and medical benefits under social security."

Whatever happens in the election, Moynihan said, Congress "is going to see that those rights are met."

AFL-CIO Vice President William W. Winpisinger stressed that the issues of social security and Medicare concern not only retirees, but also younger workers counting on those programs when they retire.

Less than honest

Citing Reagan's 1981 proposals for a 25 percent slash in social security and "savage" cuts in Medicare and disability, Winpisinger charged that the President's new round of promises not to gut the programs are "less than believable." Reagan "has misled us before, and he's being less than honest with the American people," he charged.

Winpisinger, who is president of the Machinists, chairs the AFL-CIO's Committee on Retired Union Members.

100,000 protest job-destroying Administration

Clothing & Textile Workers members and other unionists turned out 100,000 strong in demonstrations across the country to protest Reagan Administration trade policies that have unleashed a flood of job-destroying textile and apparel imports.

The 58 demonstrations in 27 states were organized Oct. 10 by ACTWU local unions to dramatize the beating their industries have taken from imports and to underscore President Reagan's failure to honor a 1980 campaign promise to protect their jobs from trade-related destruction.

At a news conference to launch the day of demonstrations, ACTWU President Murray Finley and Sec.-Treas. Jack Sheinkman stressed that as a candidate, Ronald Reagan had promised Republican Sen. Strom Thurmond from the textile state of South Carolina that as president he would preserve American jobs in the textile and apparel industries.

But Reagan quickly broke that promise, the ACTWU officers said, "through a combination of actions and inactions directly affecting foreign trade," that have cost the jobs of nearly half a million textile and apparel workers just since he entered office.

"Our industry is being eaten alive by imports from low wage countries because our President has failed to keep the promise he made to achieve orderly international trade," the union officers charged.

House, Senate contests heating up

Democratic candidates for the House and Senate had a lot to cheer about after the Mondale-Reagan debate changed the script for the presidential election.

If the debate had propelled Reagan to a runaway victory in November, as the polls threatened, the fallout almost certainly would have affected the marginal congressional contests.

It could have been another disaster for working Americans.

Four years ago, Reagan's presidential victory helped the Republicans become the majority party in the Senate for the first time in 28 years. It helped the GOP gain 33 House seats, leaving the Democrats with a small paper majority but passing effective control to a conservative bloc.

With such a Congress, it took only a few months for the Reagan White House to push through a recession-breeding economic program that brought double-digit unemployment to America's workers.

Democratic comeback

Two years later, a 26-seat Democratic gain in the House broke the Reagan majority and forced at least a partial correction in course. A few repairs were made in the tattered safety net. Give-and-take negotiations again became part of the legislative process.

The Senate was less affected. While all 435 House members stand for election every two years, the six-year terms for senators result in approximately one-third of the Senate being chosen in each congressional election.

In 1980, with Reagan on the ballot, Democrats held 24 of the 34 seats at stake and lost half of them. In 1982, their comeback year, they held 19 of the 33 Senate seats at stake. The party lineup after the election was unchanged at 54 Democrats to 46 Republicans, although there was a modest gain for mainstream Democrats.

This year, the pattern is reversed and

Housing trust merger wins SEC approval

The Securities & Exchange Commission has approved the merger of the AFL-CIO's two investment vehicles—the Mortgage Investment Trust and the Housing Investment Trust—enabling the combined new trust to launch a national effort to stimulate union-built and financed housing.

In its Oct. 1 order, the SEC specifically found that the terms of the merger are "fair and reasonable" and "consistent" with the investment policies of each trust.

The SEC's action followed the decision by boards of the two trusts to combine their resources for more effective operation. The 20-year-old MIT has not been accepting new participation due to tax problems that have since been resolved in the trust's favor.

The HIT was established in February 1983 as a separate and distinct entity to serve as a vehicle for the investment of union funds and qualified pension funds in union-built housing—presently emphasizing single-family units. The MIT lent the bulk of its funds for multi-family construction.

In its first year of operation, the HIT has grown to about $45 million in participants' investment. MIT's portfolio was valued at approximately $60 million at the end of September. Thus, the new trust resulting from the SEC-approved merger has more than $100 million in assets.

Jobs generated

During its 20-year life span, MIT underwrote some $450 million in new construction, providing more than 26,000 new union jobs, generating $100 million in tax revenue, and adding about 15,000 units to the nation's housing stock.

John Evans, the trust's chief executive officer and financial manager, pointed out that the long-term loans in which the trust invests are federally insured.

The expanded trust, which keeps the name Housing Investment Trust, makes its loans at market rates so that the yield to pension funds is competitive with alternative investments. Most recent yields have been around 11 percent, Evans said.

To date, the HIT has negotiated $41 million in long-term mortgage financing for single-family housing and nursing homes in various parts of the country. Projects that have been funded or await funding are situated in Cleveland, Oriskany, N.Y., Boston, Long Island, Honolulu, Minneapolis, and Minnetonka, Minn., and Des Moines, Wash.

At its meeting in August, the HIT board voted to expand from 17 to 21 members to increase the number of organizations and industries represented. When all seats are filled, the board will include 10 union trustees, 10 management trustees, and a neutral chairman.

Labor trustees

Currently, the labor representatives are AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue, Carpenters President Patrick J. Campbell, Service Employees President John J. Sweeney, Bakery, Confectionery & Tobacco Workers President John DeConcini, Operating Engineers President J. C. Turner, and President Robert Georgine of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept.

Management members include Bernard Young, Prudential Building Maintenance Corp.; George Miller, Mason Contractors Association of America; H. D. LaVere, Thunderbird Homes; Marvin S. Gilman, Renewal Planning Associates Inc., and Peter Ellis, a management consultant for the Operating Engineers' health and welfare fund and for the Laborers' trust fund.

Floyd H. Hyde, former Under Secretary of the Dept. of Housing & Urban Development, is the neutral chairman.

For more complete information about the Housing Investment Trust, including charges and expenses, prospective investors should send for a prospectus to the AFL-CIO Housing Investment Trust, 815 - 16th St. NW, Washington, D.C. 20006.

Apprentice Sherry Mitchell of Salt Lake City perfects a test project at the Plasterers & Cement Masons first international contest in Las Vegas, Nev. The 37 finalists participating in competition were winners of local and state apprenticeship contests in the United States and Canada. Taking the first-place prize for plasterers was Glen K. Forman of Fresno, Calif., and Mark Gonzalez of Castroville, Calif., took first place in the masons division.

Textile union assails Reagan for assault on job safety law

Toronto—The Reagan Administration's campaign to cripple the federal job safety law came in for scathing criticism at the United Textile Workers convention here.

In a resolution approved by the 250 delegates, the convention charged that Occupational Safety & Health Administration investigations have declined sharply during the Reagan years, thus endangering the lives of UTW members and other workers.

Many UTW members work with synthetic fibers or are exposed to asbestos or cotton dust and are likely candidates for cancer and related illnesses if levels are unchecked.

UTW President Francis Schaufenbil called defeat of President Reagan in this year's election of critical importance to the union's members. Convention delegates heartily endorsed the Walter Mondale-Geraldine Ferraro Democratic ticket, and pledged to turn out the union's vote in November.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue and Sec.-Treas. Shirley Carr of the Canadian Labor Congress warned of planned attacks on labor programs in their respective countries if a further swing to the political right occurs.

Other speakers included Rick Hundley, labor coordinator for striking members of the Air Line Pilots at Continental Airlines, and UTW General Counsel D. Bruce Shine.

In a report to delegates, Schaufenbil described the union's financial situation as healthy. He spoke of the need to redouble organizing efforts in the face of anti-labor campaigns by management and a National Labor Relations Board dominated by Reagan appointees who have tilted the board against workers.

Both Schaufenbil and Sec.-Treas. William Foley were re-elected to new four-year terms. Fifteen vice presidents also were elected.

USWA drops banks aiding Phelps Dodge

Pittsburgh—The Steelworkers stepped up their corporate campaign against Phelps Dodge Corp. and pulled $11.5 million in strike-funds investments from two major banks that lend money to the giant anti-union copper producer.

USWA President Lynn Williams said the union withdrew $10.8 million from Chase Manhattan Bank and $750,000 in securities from Manufacturers Hanover Trust Co. The funds will be moved to other banks.

The withdrawals are part of a multi-union campaign, launched in August, to urge institutional creditors to examine their business dealings with the company where 13 unions have been on strike for 15 months. The USWA has the largest number of members in the dispute.

Williams said the USWA decided to pull out its money following meetings with the two banks to question their continued loans to Phelps Dodge at a time when the company has lost millions of dollars.

"As a matter of sound financial principle," he said, "we should not keep our funds in any institution which has such a dubious loan policy."

Meanwhile, voting in a decertification election supervised by the National Labor Relations Board began at four Phelps Dodge plants in Arizona.

NLRB ruling

Earlier this year, the NLRB regional office in Phoenix ruled that Phelps Dodge strikers—who were permanently replaced by the company—could not vote in the elections, but some 2,000 scabs can.

The unions have appealed the NLRB's decision barring the Arizona workers from participating in the elections as well as a similar ruling applying to the company's El Paso, Tex., facility, where a decertification election has been held.

Results will not be announced until after the NLRB rules on the appeals.

Unions striking Phelps Dodge, in addition to the Steelworkers, are the Boilermakers, Carpenters, Chemical Workers, Electrical Workers, Machinists, Operating Engineers, Painters, Plumbers & Pipefitters, Railway Carmen, United Transportation Union, Morenci-Clifton Metal Trades Council and the unaffiliated Teamsters.

House, Senate contests heating up

the Republicans have 19 Senate seats on the line to 14 for the Democrats. Early this year, Democrats saw an outside chance of achieving the six-seat gain needed to take control of the Senate. Mondale's improved presidential prospects again make that a possibility, although admittedly remote.

The boost from the debate "will change the course of Senate races," a Democratic campaign official told the New York Times. His Republican counterpart acknowledged that some Senate seats the GOP hopes to win "if the President has a tremendous victory" would "become very iffy for us" if Reagan's margin shrinks.

Role of voters

Registration of new voters and turnout at the polls will clearly affect the election outcome—in some cases, determine it.

Four years ago, 54 percent of voting age Americans cast presidential ballots. That compares with 54.4 percent in 1976 and 55.7 percent in 1972—and with the 38 percent turnout in the 1982 congressional elections.

Voter registration has been a high priority this year for both parties and for committed groups ranging from the labor and civil rights movements to the Moral Majority and an array of single-issue organizations. The Republican Party, its coffers overflowing, has pumped $8 million and getting them registered. The Demo- into identifying potential Reagan voters— cratic budget is half that amount.

A number of states have made registration easier, as the AFL-CIO has long urged. In Illinois, where voters once had to go to county registration offices during specified hours, volunteers are now able to register new voters in door-to-door canvassing. In downstate communities, Republicans have been countering with television and radio commercials carrying the message, "Don't let Chicago's politicians decide the election."

In southern states, where black organizations have been pressing voter registration, the Reagan campaign has been active in pushing up white registration.

Because registration is not by party in many states, the tally for new registrants can't be accurately compiled. Pre-debate samplings of newly registered voters found Reagan leading Mondale—but by less of a margin than among the total voter potential. Among new voters, according to the Washington Post-ABC News poll, 36 percent say they are Democrats, 25 percent say they are Republicans and 35 percent call themselves independent.

State contests

Almost lost sight of in the focus on the national election are the state battles, which in bread-and-butter terms are so vital to a large segment of the trade union movement. The impact on public employees is obvious. But construction workers are affected by prevailing wage laws, industrial workers by occupational health and safety standards, and all workers by issues ranging from "right-to-work" laws to unemployment benefits and workers compensation.

All but six states will elect one or both houses of the legislature. Alabama, Louisiana, Maryland, Mississippi, New Jersey and Virginia are the exceptions.

Thirteen states will choose governors. Democratic-held governorships are up in Arkansas, Montana, North Carolina, Rhode Island, Utah and West Virginia. Republican governorships are at stake in Delaware, Indiana, Missouri, New Hampshire, North Dakota, Vermont and Washington.

States where incumbent governors cannot suceed themselves or are not seeking re-election are obvious candidates for turnover.

Party labels

Party labels have less of an impact at the state level. Thus in traditionally Republican Vermont, former Lt. Gov. Madeleine Kunin, a COPE-endorsed Democrat, is a strong contender to replacing the retiring Republican governor, Richard A. Snelling. Likewise, normally Democratic Rhode Island and West Virginia are targets of strong Republican efforts this year. In both states, incumbent Democrats are not running for re-election.

In all contests—for Congress as well as state office—incumbents start with a big advantage and most will be re-elected.

Ticket-splitting is common and voter identification with political parties has clearly slipped.

Nevertheless, the top of the ticket has an influence and there are perhaps 75 House districts and possibly 10 Senate contests that are seen as two-party battlegrounds.

Clear choice for nation

IUD delegates press support for Mondale

Hollywood, Fla.—The nation faces a clear choice between another damaging Reagan term or a course of "sustained growth, full employment, peace and a decent fair society" with the election of Walter Mondale and Geraldine Ferraro, the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. declared in a key convention resolution.

The measure adopted by the department's 16th biennial convention stressed that, along with the top of the Democratic ticket, "we must elect a Senate majority and a reliable House majority able and willing to address the needs of the vast majority of Americans who have been left out in the anti-worker, anti-women, anti-children and anti-minority program of Reagan and Reaganomics."

Mondale and Ferraro offer "leadership to a better future" and stand for fairness, jobs, a strong defense, workers' rights and a strong, competitive industrial economy, the IUD resolution stressed.

In contrast, it ticked off the Reagan Administration's record on the issues:

- The worst period of unemployment since the Great Depression.
- White House leadership and encouragement in union-busting.
- Widening gaps between rich and poor Americans and hastening of the decline of America's middle class
- The highest federal budget deficits, trade deficits and interest rates in history.
- Undermining protections for worker safety and health and attacks on major labor standards.

Industrial policy

IUD President Howard Samuel, in his keynote address to the convention, said the nation urgently needs an industrial policy to cope with many of its worst economic woes. But he warned that no such help could be expected from a second Reagan Administration.

"The effects of Reagan's economic policies have made long-term trends even worse," Samuel declared. "High interest rates, high deficits and an over-valued dollar have put our entire economy under pressure."

The nation's import-battered manufacturing sector is "in trouble" and won't improve "until we change our attitudes about our role in the international economic area and about the relationship between government, labor and industry," he warned.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland also focused on the failures of the Reagan Administration, charging in his address to the delegates that the nation "has been on the wrong road for four years."

"Mr. Reagan would like you to believe that he had nothing whatever to do with any recession—but the recovery is all his, the product of his hands-off, free-market economic policies," Kirkland observed.

He warned that while the economy appears active, manufactured imports are pouring in and "a lot of money is changing hands, but it's all in one direction: out. A lot of jobs are being created—in other countries."

The nation has a choice between letting other nations "dictate our economic future . . . in which working Americans will see their incomes and living standards decline" or establishing "sensible industrial policy, coordinated with a rational trade policy," to create decent, well-paying jobs and a secure future for middle class working men and women, Kirkland said.

The agenda of the convention included four panel discussions on topics of major concern to the department, augmented by the adoption of resolutions on the issues. The panels were:

- Labor-Management Relations, chaired by Electrical Workers President Charles H. Pillard, with Service Employees President John J. Sweeney and Clothing & Textile Workers Sec.-Treas. Jack Sheinkman.
- Health and Environment, chaired by Operating Engineers President J. C. Turner, with Eula Bingham of the University of Cincinnati, President Joseph M. Misbrener of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers, American Lung Association President Jeanne Malchon and Machinists President William W. Winpisinger.
- Industrial Policy, chaired by President Samuel, with former Labor Sec. Ray Marshall, President Sol C. Chaikin of the Ladies' Garment Workers, Eddie Williams of the Joint Center for Political Studies, President Lynn Williams of the Steelworkers, Rep. John LaFalce (D-N.Y.) and Transport Workers President William G. Lindner.
- Organizing, chaired by Rubber Workers President Milan Stone, with IUD Sec.-Treas. Elmer Chatak, Don A. Zimmerman, member of the National Labor Relations Board, and former NLRB General Counsel William A. Lubbers.

Samuel and Chatak were re-elected to new two-year terms of office, and the delegates also re-elected 22 vice presidents. Newly elected as vice presidents were Government Employees Executive Vice President John Sturdivant and ILGWU Sec.-Treas. Jay Mazur.

At Capitol Hill press conference, IAM President William Winpisinger assails Reagan's broken promises on social security and Medicare.

gan's broken 1980 campaign pledges against the Administration's actions after it took office, called the President's new round of promises, a "political deathbed conversion exactly four weeks before election."

NCSC members "have little faith" in promises made by Ronald Reagan" because he has shown that they can be "broken as quickly as he makes them."

AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman pointed out that Reagan had been a foe of social security even before becoming President, "saying he preferred a private system."

The "draconian" cuts the Administration has sought, Seidman said, are "well in line" with that philosophy.

Former Social Security Commissioner Robert Ball warned that "in addition to the question of believability," Reagan's latest statements do not include a pledge to maintain cost of living increases or to keep hands off Medicare, the government health plan to aid the elderly.

Former Health, Education & Welfare Sec. Arthur Flemming called the social insurance system "a compact with the American people." It requires a "president who will live up to" that compact. Flemming is a chairman of the labor-supported Coalition to Protect Social Security.

President Reagan, he charged, either "does not believe in social insurance or does not understand it."

Other speakers at the press conference included Auto Workers Legislative Director Dick Warden, Jack Ossofsky of the National Council on Aging, Mel Glasser of the Health Security Action Council, Linda Tarr-Whelan of the National Education Association and Maxine Forman of the Women's Equity Action League.

Health care unions hit NLRB ruling

Leaders of unions representing health care workers called for a full congressional review of a recent National Labor Relations Board decision they say will result in increased labor strife and deny hospital workers the right to organize.

At a hearing of the House Subcommittees on Labor-Management Relations and on Manpower & Housing, the union witnesses agreed with Service Employees President John J. Sweeney that the NLRB's August decision involving St. Francis Hospital in Memphis represents "a triumph of ideology over law."

In that decision, the Reagan-appointed board majority overturned a longstanding NLRB policy on the way appropriate bargaining units are determined. The board sided with an employer that had adamantly refused to bargain with Electrical Workers Local 474 which had won a representation election for a unit of 43 maintenance workers.

"It illustrates better than any other case the present dangerous trend of presidential appointees who are out to subvert the law they are sworn to uphold," Sweeney charged.

Report adopted

At the hearing, called to monitor the effectiveness of the nation's labor law, the Labor-Management Relations panel adopted a report on the failures of the National Labor Relations Act. It also pointed out that the St. Francis decision has created great uncertainty about the status of bargaining relationships in health care.

"The decision will undoubtedly cause confusion and instability in health care bargaining units for years to come," the panel observed.

In its August decision, commonly called St. Francis II, the NLRB not only repudiated all board precedents in regard to health care bargaining units since the 1974 amendments to the NLRA, but offered only vague speculation as guidance to the direction the board would take in future hospital representation cases. A big backlog of such cases await NLRB action.

The 1974 amendments extended coverage of the NLRA to non-profit hospitals for the first time. Congress inserted several unique provisions requiring union notice on strikes and picketing as well as special contract notice and mediation procedures. And although it was not written into the law, Congress issued a warning against the "proliferation of bargaining units."

The result has been far fewer such units in the health care field than in other industries, a fact that makes it more difficult for unions in the field to organize.

Since 1974, health care workers could organize and win union certification in any of seven appropriate units—physicians, registered nurses, other professional employees, technical employees, business office employees, service and maintenance workers, and skilled maintenance employees—provided they could prove the existence of the requisite "community of interest" on the job.

St. Francis II reversed that standard, and stipulated that in the future bargaining units will be decided on a basis of "disparity of interest" and divided strictly along professional and nonprofessional lines unless disparity can be shown. The NLRB established no guidelines and said future decisions will be made on a case to case basis.

Strikes foreseen

President Henry Nichols of the Hospital & Health Care Employees stressed that the 1974 amendments were an attempt to avoid strikes in the industry, but the NLRB's latest actions will "guarantee strikes" as the only way for workers to organize.

Sweeney said employees won't sit and wait for the NLRB to make a decision on whether they can organize but will take some kind of self-help action.

Donald S. Wasserman, director of collective bargaining services for the State, County & Municipal Employees, charged that the decision will impede organizing in the private sector. The burden of proof that there is a disparity of interest will fall on the employees, he warned.

Job illness legal aid plan launched

The Industrial Union Dept. and a group of its member unions have formed an Occupational Health Leagal Rights Foundation to help gain fair compensation for workers harmed by work-place exposure to toxic substances.

IUD President Howard D. Samuel said the foundation will aid in coordinating and supporting lawsuits brought on behalf of these workers. Another goal is to encourage companies to remove workplace health hazards by making their continuation a potential major financial burden.

Samuel said the foundation initially will become involved in compensation cases where an important legal precedent could be established, cases involving hazards from toxic substances not previously associated with the occupational diseases, and cases on behalf of workers who have been unable to obtain adequate legal representation.

State workers' compensation systems, Samuel charged, generally fail to live up to the concept that workers should have a means of obtaining fair and adequate compensation for work-related injuries and illnesses without having to bear the costs and delays that go with lawsuits.

He said the foundation will work to educate workers about workplace hazards, where to seek assistance and how to enforce their rights.

Steelworkers President Lynn R. Williams and Clothing & Textile Workers Sec.-Treas. Jacob Sheinkman are on the foundation's board of directors, which is still being expanded.

Samuel said funding for the program will come from unions and other groups, with possible additional funds coming from a small percentage of the costs recovered in successful law suits backed by the foundation.

Debate victory spurs Mondale's campaign presidential candidates, Mondale ripped into Reagan's record of broken promises on social security.

In debating President Carter four years ago, Reagan had scoffed at the suggestion that he would cut Medicare. "There you go again," was his much-quoted jibe at Carter. But in fact, Mondale noted, Reagan did indeed propose and partially succeed in reducing Medicare benefits.

He did push through some social security cutbacks, including a cutoff of benefits to surviving children attending college. And he proposed deep cuts that Congress rejected, Mondale noted. The rejected proposal included a 40 percent slash in social security benefits for persons retiring at age 62.

Reagan's stumbling reply only served to reinforce doubts. It was "outrageous," Reagan fumed, for Mondale to "claim that somehow I am the villain who is going to pull the social security checks out from those people who are dependent upon them."

He went on, "Now social security, let's lay it to rest once and for all. I told you never would I do such a thing. But I tell you also now social security has nothing to do with the deficit. . . . If you reduce the outgo of social security, that money would not go into the general fund to reduce the deficit. It would go into the Social Security Trust Fund. So social security has nothing to do with balancing a budget or erasing or lowering the deficit."

Direct connection

In fact, the federal budget counts the social security payroll tax as income and social security benefits as expenditures so Reagan is completely wrong about a large multi-billion dollar segment of the federal budget.

The next day, Mondale forced the Reagan Administration into what appears to be a significant policy switch by noting that the President merely said he wouldn't cut payments of anyone already drawing benefits. He had used the same phrasing in the past, carefully leaving open the possibility of a cutback in the benefit formula for persons not yet at retirement age.

Before the debate, the White House had ignored Mondale's charges and statements. But now, press aide Larry Speakes came out to insist that "the President will never stand for reduction of social security benefits for anybody—those now getting it or future recipients." Mondale should be "ashamed" for suggesting otherwise, he said indignantly.

Under questioning, Speakes acknowledged that the President had not previously made such a commitment. But he had spoken with Reagan and had been authorized by the President to make such a commitment. As for the more limited statement Reagan made during the debate, Speakes told the reporters, "Strike all that."

New commercials

An immediate aftermath of the debate was a Republican decision to air a new series of Reagan television commercials seeking to portray the President as a vigorous, forceful leader.

A much-quoted front-page story in the Wall Street Journal had spotlighted the previously unmentionable issue of the campaign—the President's age.

"Until Sunday night's debate, age hadn't been much of an issue in the election campaign," the article noted. "That may now be changing. The President's rambling responses and occasional apparent confusion injected an unpredictable new element into the race."

It was like the fable of the Emperor's New Clothes, when a child's comment allowed the populace to acknowledge that the emperor was naked. Suddenly, the President's competence had become an election factor.

The GOP response has been to put Reagan back before enthusiastic picked audiences, to resume the photo opportunities which made up the presidential reelection campaign before the debate.

For Mondale, the task was clearly to keep the momentum going in the knowledge that there was still a lot of catching up to do. But there was a contagious exuberance in the crowds that came out to greet him and in the warmth of the applause for Mondale and Ferraro as they darted in and out of the Columbus Day parade in New York to shake hands.

Vice President Bush marched in the parade, also. His supporters, clustered on one corner, greeted him with the Republican shout of "Four more years."

From the other side of the street came the louder response, "Four more weeks."

NMU delegates press action to revitalize merchant marine

New York—The National Maritime Union's 19th convention called on the federal government to complete the eight-point program for the revitalization of the American merchant marine announced by President Reagan at the union's 1980 convention.

Nearly 300 delegates representing NMU members on ocean-going ships, lakes and river boats and in shoreside military bases, factories, packinghouses and offshore drilling installations around the country and in Puerto Rico and Panama took part in the three-day convention.

Appearing on the first day of the convention, Labor Sec. Raymond J. Donovan defended the Administration's record on maritime issues, declaring that "the decline of the merchant marine did not begin on our watch." He predicted that the eight-point maritime program will be completed in the next four years if President Reagan is re-elected.

Presidential endorsement

At the close of the convention, the delegates voted to endorse Reagan's re-election.

In other actions, the convention approved a joint NMU-City of Miami training program using Job Corps funding to provide jobs for unemployed young inner-city people aboard foreign-flag cruise ships operating out of Florida ports. The NMU currently operates two such Job Corps training programs in California.

Miami Commissioner Miller Dawkins, a former NMU seaman, told the delegates that lack of employment is the underlying cause of the riots and unrest that have afflicted the Florida city. He said the Miami city government fully backs the union proposal to train unemployed American youths for hoteling jobs aboard the cruise ships, now manned almost completely by foreign workers paid as little as $1.65 a day.

NMU President Shannon J. Wall told the convention these foreign ship-lines should come under the jurisdiction of U.S. labor laws and standards. He said the union is initiating legislation for that purpose.

The delegates also approved a $10 a month dues increase and adopted a number of resolutions. Among other things they called for:

- An end to government endorsement of American-owned flag-of-convenience shipping and the tax benefits accorded to these "runaway" ship operators.
- Safeguards for seamen's pension rights and implementation of employee stock sharing in the event of government approval of shipline proposals to "cash out" their ship operating subsidy contracts.
- Job protection for shoreside workers employed by government contractors in turnovers of such contracts.
- Extension of GI Bill benefits to merchant seamen who served during World War II and succeeding conflicts.
- A government review of the abolishment of the 200-year-old marine hospitals with a view toward restoring eligibility for care in government hospitals to active merchant seamen and those injured in war.

Reagan cites facts 'that aren't so'

Social security and Medicare weren't the only topics that caused President Reagan to stumble over the facts in his debate with Walter Mondale.

Take defense spending—by far the largest segment of the federal budget. According to Reagan, two-thirds of the amount goes to pay and pensions. "You have only a small portion going for weapons," the President said.

In fact, the largest component of the defense budget is weapons procurement and development. Only one-third goes for military and retiree pay and benefits.

The President insisted that the economic program in place will achieve a balanced budget by 1989. A reporter panelist noted that the Congressional Budget Office "has some bad news . . . they project that the deficit will continue to climb," reaching $279 billion in 1989.

Reagan scoffed, "I do not, and very frankly, take seriously the Congressional Budget Office projections because they have been wrong on virtually all of them."

In fact, the nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office has been consistently closer to the mark in its projections than the President's Office of Management & Budget.

Reagan boasted of the job gains during the economic recovery of the past two years, without relating them to the huge job losses of the recession that preceded it.

He insisted that his tax policies were fair to rich and poor alike. But a study by the nonpartisan Urban Institute found that "the bottom 40 percent of taxpayers are paying proportionately more of their income in taxes, with most of the increased burden falling on the poorest 20 percent of families, whereas the top 60 percent are paying proportionately less."

Poverty error

The President was wrong in comparing poverty rates in the Reagan and Carter Administrations. He said more people are getting food stamps under his Administration, when in fact the correct figure is 400,000 fewer.

At one point in a discussion of abortion, the President gave credit to "the then Democratic governor" of California for signing into law a bill to punish the "murder" of a fetus. Reagan apparently forgot that he was the governor who signed the bill and that it amended a more permissive abortion law he had earlier signed.

New Hampshire aims for full-time leadership

Bedford, N.H.—Delegates to the New Hampshire AFL-CIO convention cleared the way for a full-time leader by voting to establish the position beginning in 1986.

In resolutions approved at the three-day meeting, delegates directed the federation's executive board to study the salary and job duties and report its recommendations to affiliates by next February. The convention also called for a special one-day convention in May 1985 to vote on the matter.

The action recognizes the need for a full-time person to handle legislative duties, besides expanding member programs.

State AFL-CIO President Harland Eaton and Sec.-Treas. Saverio Giambalvo both are part-time officers. Delegates voted to amend the constitution reaffirming an executive board decision to subsidize Eaton's salary. Eaton now divides his time between the federation and Operating Engineers Local 98 in Manchester.

In other internal matters, the convention voted to enter into a financial agreement with the Concord Labor Temple Association to provide a permanent headquarters for the federation. It also approved holding biennial conventions, with one-day COPE conventions in the off-years.

Guest speakers

The 200 delegates considered a heavy agenda of state, local, and national issues, endorsed candidates for political office, and heard from a number of speakers, including AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue.

Lambasting the "anti-labor legislation" tied to the Reagan Administration, Donahue charged, "This President has directed a concerted effort to weaken the unions, to reduce our bargaining power, to encourage employer opposition to unions, weakened worker protections, and turned the National Labor Relations Board over to the bosses."

Delegates reaffirmed their opposition to so-called right-to-work proposals that are expected to be introduced in the next legislative session and resolved to use every available resource for their defeat. RTW forces have tried since 1975 to add New Hampshire to the list of right-to-work states.

Resolutions were also adopted on workers' compensation, unemployment benefits, arbitration, voter registration, and lobbying techniques.

Rep. Norman D'Amours (D-N.H.) was endorsed in his fight to defeat Sen. Gordon J. Humphrey (R-N.H.) for the Senate. Also backed were Democrats Dudley Dudley and Larry Converse in their campaigns for the state's two House seats. No endorsement was made in the gubernatorial contest.

America's Foreign Trade Crisis

By Mark Anderson

The United States is facing an unprecedented crisis in international trade. Over the last four years, U.S. exports have dropped and imports of foreign products have soared. The sharp deterioration of the international economic position of the United States has had a profound and negative impact on scores of domestic industries and millions of American workers. Left unchecked, this trade crisis poses a serious threat to the industrial base of the United States and the standard of living of all Americans.

The "hands-off" attitude of the Reagan Administration, based on a naive devotion to free markets that don't exist, has only served to accelerate America's decline. This fixation on textbook free trade has nothing in common with the world trading system, does not reflect the trading practices of other countries, and does nothing to solve America's trade problems. The U.S. trade deficit, influenced heavily by an overvalued dollar that has risen 65 percent against the currencies of our major trading partners, has increased almost fourfold since 1980 and will exceed $120 billion by the end of this year. Poor enforcement of U.S. trade law, ill-conceived monetary and fiscal policies, laws that encourage overseas production, and the absence of an effective industrial policy have all contributed to this serious problem.

The AFL-CIO believes that the goal of U.S. trade policy must be the attainment of a fair trading environment that allows this nation to remain an advanced and diversified economy. "Fair trade" means that the interests of the United States must receive greater emphasis in both the domestic and international initiatives of the nation's international trade and investment policy. To promote full employment and rising living standards, the United States must retain its manufacturing, agricultural, and service industries. Foreign trade policy and domestic economic policy must promote—not undermine—this goal.

The author, Mark Anderson, is an economist on the staff of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Economic Research.

The Size and Makeup of the Trade Deficit

Tragically, the policies of the last four years, rather than helping, have contributed significantly to the massive trade deficits the United States faces today. The dimensions of this problem are startling. The U.S. merchandise trade deficit for 1983 reached a record $69 billion, almost double the level experienced in 1980. This economic decline is accelerating in 1984, with the deficit expected to reach $120 billion by the end of the year. These deficits represent a significant drain on the economy and are responsible for the loss of millions of jobs.

While the huge total figure is chilling in and of itself, a look at the composition of the trade deficit reveals an even darker picture.

In fuel trade (oil, gas, coal), the sector that has largely been responsible for our trade deficit in the past, the U.S. position has improved over the last four years. In 1980, the United States registered a deficit of $78 billion for this sector. By 1983, this had been reduced to $51 billion, a drop of 35 percent. While exports rose moderately, imports were significantly lower. Yet during this same period, America's overall trade position deteriorated sharply.

In 1983, the United States recorded surpluses in only two merchandise trade sectors—agriculture and chemicals—but at levels considerably lower than in 1980. The U.S. trade position in manufactured products collapsed.

Between 1980 and 1983, manufacturing exports fell 8 percent, while manufactured imports increased 30 percent. In 1980, the United States enjoyed a surplus of $12.5 billion in this sector. By 1983, this surplus had vanished and the nation recorded a deficit in manufacturing trade in excess of $38 billion. This has already been exceeded in the first half of this year, and for all of 1984 the deficit in manufactured goods is expected to reach $84 billion. Put another way, the United States will suffer a cumulative deficit in this most important sector of about $128 billion over the last four years, as compared to a trade surplus of $1.7 billion in the preceeding four years. The United States has basically become an exporter of raw materials and commodities and an importer of finished goods.

Trade and Jobs

The impact of this growing trade deficit on employment is devastating. Despite the recent expansion of the U.S. economy, there are 1.3 million fewer manufacturing jobs than in 1979. Estimates of jobs lost or not created in recent years due to the trade imbalance go as high as four million.

As dramatic as these numbers are, they may very well understate the impact of trade on U.S. employment. Many trade-related employment estimates are based on assigning a certain number of jobs for each billion dollars of net exports. For example, the U.S. Dept. of Commerce has frequently assigned 25,000 jobs for each billion dollars of exports. The use of these ratios, however, does not take into account the composition of trade and, given the labor intensity of U.S. imports and the capital intensity of U.S. exports, invariably minimizes the job losses caused by imports.

In addition, because of low labor costs in many of the countries where U.S. imports originate, a dollar of imports displaces more than one dollar of U.S. production of the same item. A factor which has made dollar-denominated measures of trade even less reliable is the sharp rise in the foreign exchange value of the dollar. The appreciation of the U.S. dollar raises the foreign price of exports, and cheapens the U.S. price of imported goods. An appreciating dollar, therefore, increases the employment loss per billion dollars of U.S. imports.

Despite this lack of accurate information, the negative impact of trade is painfully clear to millions of unemployed workers and scores of devastated communities.

What's Gone Wrong?

Twenty years ago, trade had little impact on the health of the American economy. The huge size of U.S. domestic market, the absence of meaningful international competition and the overwhelming superiority of U.S. industry and agriculture confined discussions on trade to college courses in economic theory. Acceptance of the notion that free trade was beneficial and protection evil was universal. Given the international dominance of the United States, such an approach was quite sensible.

Conditions, however, have changed dramatically over the last two decades. The advent of floating exchange rates and the sharp increases in oil prices during the 1970s have had a profound impact on the world economy. Improvements in communications, shrinking transportation costs, the widespread transfer of technology and capital, and resulting growth of transnational enterprises have also served to vastly increase the volume of world trade and significantly alter traditional trading patterns.

Twenty years ago, only 25 percent of U.S. manufactured goods had import competition. Today, nearly all U.S. products are subject to international competition. In that same period, the proportion of the gross national product (total national sales) composed of imports and exports has more than doubled.

This internationalization of the U.S. economy, coupled with the unwillingness of the government to adopt policies reflecting the changed situation, is having an increasingly negative impact on American industry and workers.

Free Trade and Protectionism

In 1984, the United States will record the largest trade deficit in history—more than $120 billion. Manufactured goods will account for more than two-thirds of that total. This grim economic reality, part of a longer term trend, has not occasioned any fundamental change in U.S. trade policy. As in 1960, adherence to the principles of free trade remains the government's basic policy position. The fact that as a practical matter free trade no longer exists is somehow overlooked.

The 1982 Economic Report of the President stated:

> "Competitiveness that is impaired by market forces should not be restored by raising tariffs or subsidizing export industries. Such actions simply protect the trade-dependent industries, inviting them to postpone the steps necessary to meet world competition while raising costs to consumers and reducing choices available in the marketplace. This Administration remains determined to keep both the U.S. economy and the world economy committed to free trade principles."

The 1982 trade deficit totaled $42 billion.

In 1983, when the U.S. trade deficit reached $69 billion, the Economic Report of the President stated:

> "Trade-distorting measures, whether they take the form of protection against imports or the promotion of exports, hurt the country which adopts them as well as other countries, even when they are a response to foreign trade-distorting practices. If foreign governments limit imports from the United States and we respond in kind, the initial results will be further reductions in economic efficiency at home and higher domestic prices. If foreign governments subsidize exports, depressing world prices for U.S. products, a countersubsidy by the United States will depress prices still further. The belief that departures from free trade are automatically called for if other countries do not play by the rules is a fallacy."

The tragedy of this approach is that the U.S. is frequently left defenseless in the international arena. By emphasizing, even rhetorically, the "value" of free trade, questions of national interest tend to be dismissed, or at least relegated to a lower status, and success is measured not by the health of the domestic economy, but by one's adherence to a theoretical construct.

Free-trade theory is based on principles first espoused by British economist David Ricardo in the early 1800s. Ricardo argued that a totally free exchange of goods between countries would lead to maximum utility and, therefore, universal benefit. Each nation should utilize its own comparative advantage and specialize in the production of goods in which they are relatively more efficient, and to import those goods where their production capability is relatively inefficient. His famous example involved English wool (England had a lot of sheep) and Portuguese wine (Portugal enjoyed a superior grape growing climate).

Notwithstanding the fact that international commerce in the 20th Century is somewhat more complicated than trading wool for wine, the assumptions on which free-trade theory is commonly based bear little resemblance to conditions found in today's world.

The assumptions found in the standard model include full employment, perfect competition, perfect mobility of factors of production internally but not internationally, given resources, constant technology, no transportation costs, and many others. Basically, it's a static model attempting to describe a dynamic world.

Unemployment is undeniably real. Perfect competition can't account for state trading companies, transnational enterprises, or government intervention and subsidization. The static nature of the model doesn't deal with international capital flows. Ricardo did not consider swings in currency valuation. In the real world, there are unfortunately winners and losers, and the United States is increasingly going down in defeat.

These facts of life, and many others, make free trade as a foundation for public policy not just irrelevant, but harmful. The only policy truly compatible with this frame of reference is a policy of inaction so that the market can do its work. That the market really doesn't exist is somehow forgotten. Hence, the charges of protectionism over any action taken by the United States, however small that action may be.

It should be clear by now that our trading partners have a different conception of what "free trade" is all about. Other countries see trade as a means to the larger goal of balanced economic development and full employment. While it is true that tariffs have been lowered through successive rounds of multilateral trade negotiations, a new array of non-tariff barriers has developed—quotas, stringent inspection requirements, discriminatory standards, buy-national policies, export subsidies, industrial targeting programs, and trade arrangements such as performance requirements, coproduction, offset and barter agreements.

Continued attempts by the United States to negotiate the reduction of these measures have just not been successful, and our own market remains wide open to an ever-increasing volume of imports.

Poor Enforcement of U.S. Trade Remedy Law

This trade policy framework has led to a situation where there is reluctance to apply existing laws designed to protect American industries and workers from the negative aspects of trade.

U.S. trade law is structured both to provide relief to industries injured by imports and to counteract foreign unfair trade practices. The statute designed to relieve injury, the so-called "escape clause," Section 201 of the Trade Act of 1974, has never been effective. Petitions under Section 201 require expensive and extensive documentation. The criteria used by the International Trade Commission (ITC) in making determinations are so vague that findings of injury seldom result. For example, earlier this year, the ITC did not find injury in a case brought on behalf of the domestic shoe industry and its workers. This finding was reached at a time when imported shoes had captured 70 percent of the American market, and thousands of workers had been laid off. Further, even if the ITC finds injury on the facts and recommends some form of relief, the President frequently decides not to implement the commission's recommendation.

Many of the same problems exist with respect to the statutes dealing with "unfair trade practices," the anti-dumping and countervailing duty laws. Anti-dumping laws are designed to deal with situations where foreign products are being sold in the United States for less than the price at which the products are sold in the exporting country. Duties can be assessed to make up the difference in price. The countervailing duty law permits the imposition of duties to offset the foreign subsidy of products exported to the United States. It is designed to eliminate the unfair advantage that foreign manufacturers enjoy over U.S. producers because of a government subsidy. In addition to these statutes, there are provisions in U.S. trade law, known as Section 301, that authorize the President to take all appropriate action when the policies or practices of a foreign government are found to be unjustifiable, unreasonable, or discriminatory, and which burden or restrict U.S. commerce. Despite these laws, relief is often too little, too late, or not at all. Even for those with access to the financial resources and expertise to seek relief, the time-consuming procedures do not accomplish the intended result.

The U.S. government, despite ample opportunity, has rarely initiated action under any of our trade laws. This abdication of responsibility derives in no small measure from its adherence to a doctrine that views any government intervention as a violation of free-trade principles.

Importing Goods/Exporting Capital

Numerous tax loopholes and incentives encourage American companies to move abroad. The tax deferral on overseas profits permits U.S. companies to defer paying taxes on such income until it is returned to the United States. The result is that profits frequently remain abroad and are used for the expansion of foreign-based facilities.

The foreign tax credit allows U.S. companies to subtract from their federal tax obligation taxes paid in a foreign country. This provision gives companies a significant incentive to produce abroad. In contrast, corporate taxes paid to the state of New York, for example, are treated as a deduction for federal tax purposes rather than as a credit.

The Overseas Private Investment Corporation (OPIC) is an "independent" government corporation that insures international companies and banks against losses from expropriation, war, revolution, and currency inconvertibility. By removing risks, this agency encourages American firms to invest abroad rather than make investments of similar magnitude in the United States.

The Foreign Sales Corporation (FSC) tax gimmick, requires companies to establish offices, maintain bookkeeping operations and keep bank accounts outside the United States in order to qualify for tax breaks that are supposedly designed to promote U.S. exports.

Items 807 and 806.30 of the tariff schedules reduce tariffs on foreign products containing American parts thus encouraging overseas assembly.

The Generalized System of Preferences provides zero tariffs for some 3,000 products from about 140 nations and territories. In operation for the last 10 years, this program was intended to help the less developed countries by temporarily giving their goods special access to the U.S. market. As a development tool, the program has been a disaster, with 88 percent of its benefits concentrated in 15 countries. Just three so-called "needy countries" (Taiwan, Hong Kong and South Korea) receive about 50 percent of GSP benefits. To make matters worse, protections in the program for import-sensitive U.S. industries have not been effective, and American workers are paying the price through plant shutdowns and unemployment.

Foreign Trade Practices

In contrast to laissez-faire policies of the U.S., other countries manage their trade and investment flows to achieve maximum national advantage. Their focus is on domestic ramifications of trade, not adherence to a 19th-Century economic doctrine. A few examples:

- When France was recently being flooded by large quantities of Japanese video cassette recorders, customs procedures were changed to require each recorder to be individually inspected at one small customs station. A quota agreement with Japan was quickly reached.
- Italy restricts the import of Japanese autos to 2,200 cars a year.
- Japan places severe import restrictions on leather goods.
- Taiwan frequently conditions foreign investment on export requirements.
- Brazil severely limits the importation of general aviation aircraft and heavily subsidizes its own exports.
- The United Kingdom maintains strict quotas on shoe imports.
- Government-owned telephone companies in other countries refuse to buy imported products.

The list could go on and on. In general, however, the principal policies employed by other countries include high tariffs, import quotas, export incentives, discriminatory procurement, state-owned enterprises, direct government subsidies, government-supported research and development, barter trade requirements, coproduction and export requirements for foreign investment and subsidized financing.

None of these measures has anything in common with free trade or free markets. Rather they are explicit repudiations of the notion that trade and economic and industrial development exclusively reside in the private sector.

The Overvalued Dollar

A major factor in America's trade crisis has been the sharp rise in the foreign exchange value of the dollar.

The appreciation of the dollar raises the foreign price of U.S. exports and cheapens the U.S. price of imported goods. From July 1980 to July 1984, the exchange value of the U.S. dollar increased by almost 65 percent relative to the currencies of other major developed countries. Moreover, sizable devaluations in many developing countries further increased the value of the dollar on foreign exchange markets.

This massive increase in the dollar's exchange value has been a significant contributor to the collapse of the trade position of the United States. The appreciation is no different than a 65 percent tax on exports and a 65 percent advantage for importers. That the dollar is overvalued is now almost universally acknowledged. It is clear that this currency misalignment is posing severe costs for American industry and workers and makes discussions on the need to increase competitiveness almost irrelevant. Should workers in export or import competing industries take a 65 percent pay cut in order to restore their products' international competitiveness? The problem is not with American workers or industry, but with the policies of their government.

A major, if not principal, cause of the overvaluation of the dollar is the irresponsible fiscal and monetary policies of the Reagan Administration. Huge tax giveaways and unfinanced increases in defense spending have led to the enormous budget deficits facing America today. Together with the tight-money, high-interest-rate policies of the Federal Reserve Board, these budget deficits have kept U.S. interest rates high, encouraging massive capital inflows and thus keeping the dollar artifically strong. These same capital inflows have to some degree slowed the capital exporting countries' economic growth by reducing their own pool of investment funds. Their slower growth rates have reduced their ability to purchase American goods.

Another aspect of this fiscal and monetary tragedy is that as American firms find themselves being priced out of the international market due to the overvalued dollar, they may view relocation overseas as a viable alternative. Given the relative openness of the American market to foreign goods, further U.S. employment losses could occur.

Third World Debt Crisis

The same policies that have led to the overvalued dollar have significantly increased the magnitude of the debt crisis facing many developing countries, adversely affecting American trade. High U.S. interest rates have raised debt service costs for these countries, reducing their ability to buy American goods and increasing their need to acquire dollars through exports to the United States. The World Bank reports that the total debt of developing countries has risen from $607 billion in 1980 to an estimated $810 billion in 1983.

The financial rescue packages put together by the International Monetary Fund (IMF) and other lending consortia have contained conditions that have further restricted trade, hurting workers in both the Third World and the United States. In the first place, these loan packages have included requirements that debtor countries reduce government expenditures and restrict imports from the United States and other countries. Thus, employment and growth in American industries that produce for export have suffered. Secondly, the developing countries have been forced by the IMF to expand their exports (which count as imports in the U.S. balance of trade) in order to obtain enough foreign currency to meet their debt service payments. This has been accomplished in part through a program of export-industry subsidization and other incentives which amount to "buying" a larger world share for their products.

One result has been a deteriorating U.S. trade balance. For example, the U.S. trade balance with the largest Latin American countries has gone from a surplus of $5 billion in 1980 to a deficit of $12 billion in 1983. At first glance, these short-run solutions may seem to have produced large advantages for the developing countries at the expense of U.S. employment and production, but in the long run their effects will be negative. The dictates of the banks and the IMF distort the path of economic development that may be otherwise rational or optimal for many countries in the Third World. For example, an emphasis on growth of industries that produce for export may come at the expense of production of basic goods that are in high demand domestically and are necessary to meet the basic needs of indigenous populations.

Labor Rights and Wages

The tremendous growth of transnational enterprises in the post-war period has introduced fundamental changes in how the production process is organized. The ease with which firms can transfer technology and capital from one country to another, together with improvements in communications and transportation, has made labor costs a major element in any investment decision.

Given the relative openness of the U.S. market, there is little disincentive for companies to locate in countries with low wages, poor working conditions, and restrictions on trade unions. From the sewing of baseballs in Haiti to the assembly of calculators in Taiwan, the labor-intensive aspect of production of many of the goods sold in the United States is done offshore.

In January of this year, G. H. Bass and Co., the famous Maine shoe company, announced the closing of its North Jay, Maine plant laying off 250 workers. A principal reason for the closure, according to Bass' parent corporation, is lower foreign wages. U.S. shoeworkers average $5.27 an hour while Taiwanese, Korean, and Brazilian workers average less than $1.50 per hour.

Developing countries themselves promote these factors as a way of encouraging investment. In a recent speech before the House of Representatives, Rep. Donald Pease (D-Ohio) quoted the following excerpts from brochures developing countries offer to prospective investors:

"From Malaysia: The manual dexterity of the oriental female is famous the world over. Her hands are small and she works fast with extreme care. Who, therefore, could be better qualified by nature and inheritance to contribute to the efficiency of a bench-assembly production line than the oriental girl . . .? Labor rates in Malaysia are among the lowest in the region and female factory workers can be hired for approximately United States $1.50 a day.

"From Thailand: One of the major factors that recommends Thailand to the investor over other countries in the region is an abundant supply of cheap and trainable labor.

"From Colombia: Low cost labor: This is without doubt the chief incentive offered by the ZFIC as the salaries are more or less the same as those that prevail in the industrial zones in the Far East (U.S. $2.10 per day including social security). . . . Male and female workers are easily obtained due to the high rate of unemployment, rapid increases of population and the emigration from the rural zones to the cities."

What Should Be Done

While there is no single answer to the trade problem, a useful beginning would be the recognition that U.S. national interest and adherence to free-trade theory is often incompatible. America must realize that it does not operate in a world of "free trade" characterized by the free market determination of trade flows according to traditional notions of comparative advantage. Other countries manage their trade and investment flows to achieve maximum national advantage. Their rejection of 19th-Century economic doctrine when it interferes with their domestic objectives is neither fair nor unfair, but sensible national policy.

With this in mind, the U.S. government must undertake a variety of specific actions to deal with the trade crisis.

First and foremost, U.S. trade law must be strengthened to reflect international trading realities. It is time to recognize that the principal approach to trade problems taken by the government—encouraging other countries to stop what are considered to be objectionable practices—has failed. While negotiations take place, injury to the American economy continues.

Secondly, the U.S. government must deal with the problems trade creates for the domestic economy.

Earlier this year, for example, Special Trade Rep. William E. Brock, in a speech before the National Press Club, said that Japan was risking its entire trading relationship with the United States by refusing to adequately relax its quota on U.S. beef exports. He said the issue "has taken on a symbolic quality way beyond its substance." This is exactly what is wrong with the U.S. approach. In 1983, the United States had a large surplus in agricultural trade with Japan, quotas or not. The overall trade balance with Japan however was in deficit by almost $22 billion due to the tremendous imbalance in manufactured goods. That is the trade problem with Japan, not beef. Attention should be directed at substantive problems, not symbolic issues.

To help accomplish this policy reorientation, legislation is urgently needed to tighten and streamline the laws designed to relieve industries and workers injured by imports.

It is clear that the so-called "fair" and "unfair" trade remedy statutes need improvements. Both "fair" trade laws designed to alleviate trade-induced injury and "unfair" trade laws designed to counteract dumping and subsidies should have better procedures and more effective remedies.

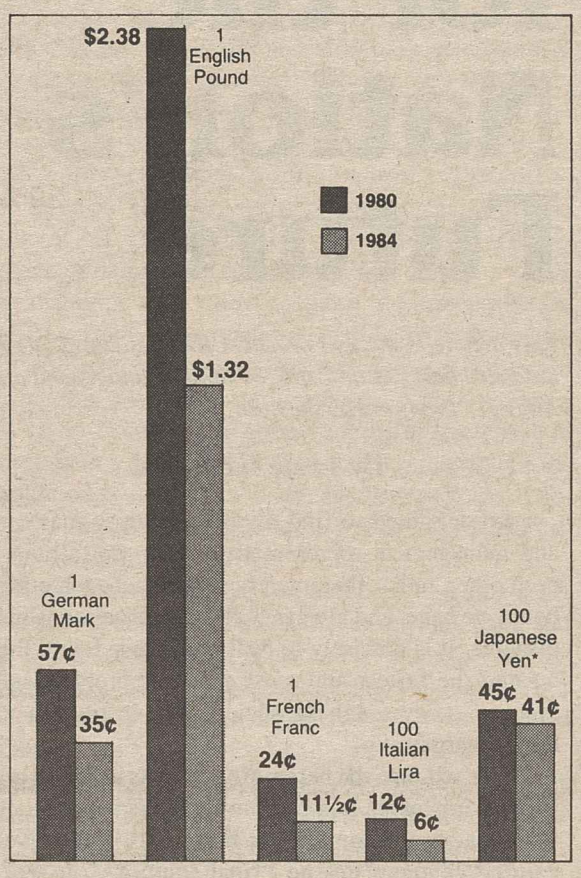
Value of Foreign Currencies in U.S. Dollars

Changing Currency Values Undermine the Competitiveness of U.S. Products

July 1980-July 1984



*In July 1978, 100 Yen were worth 50¢.

The escape clause provisions of the Trade Act should be revised to assure quick relief from trade injury. When U.S. producers lose sales to foreign producers and reduce their production and workforces accordingly, they know only that trade has injured their business operations. Workers feel the injury in the resulting layoffs. At this point, the injured parties don't know if the injury was caused by so-called "unfair" trade practices, by "fair" trade practices, by the rising value of the dollar, by foreign currency devaluation, or a combination of these causes. All they know is that the injury is trade-related. They should be able to receive temporary relief from the injury. And they should receive help from the government to make their case under the appropriate provisions of the Trade Act that deal with relief measures for specific "unfair" and "injurious" trade practices. Many aspects of foreign subsidy programs and dumping activities are more readily ascertainable by U.S. government agencies than by private parties injured by trade.

For this purpose, the statutory improvements should accomplish three major objectives: (1) to assure that the ITC evaluates more quickly and accurately the impact of imports on an industry and its workers through more specific criteria; (2) to fashion a specific remedy to alleviate temporarily the adverse effect of such imports; and (3) to provide that the President may not overturn the determinations of the International Trade Commission except with the explicit agreement of Congress.

Many of the same problems exist with respect to "unfair" trade practices, and procedures for dealing with them also are in need of an overhaul.

Another important step would be to clarify and strengthen the authority and procedures designed to identify and eliminate unjustifiable or unreasonable trade policies or acts by foreign governments.

The U.S. response to foreign unfair trade practices has proven futile in most cases. The Trade Act of 1979 supposedly authorizes the President to act when another nation's "act, policy or practice . . . is inconsistent with trade agreements" or unjustifiably "burdens or restricts U.S. commerce." In short, when the other nations have unfair practices that affect U.S. exports, this statute is supposed to be a meaningful remedy.

But the detailed, lengthy procedural requirements, the refusal of the U.S. government to act even when the requirements are met, and the failure of the General Agreement on Tariffs & Trade process to recognize U.S. rights generally make U.S. law ineffective as it is presently structured.

In addition to steps that would help all industries hard hit by imports, the AFL-CIO believes that legislation should be enacted to deal with the problems of specific industries:

- Domestic content laws to help assure that the United States remains a producer of automobiles.

- Steel import quotas, provided the steel industry undertakes modernization measures.

- Action to reduce the job-destroying influx of garments, textiles and footwear now inundating U.S. industry.

- Legislation to revive the U.S. maritime industry to substantially increase the portion of cargo carried in U.S.-flag ships and to assure a strong U.S. shipbuilding base, thereby enhancing the national security.

- Policies to maintain and re-establish domestic electronic telecommunication and television industries.

The Overvalued Dollar

To address the problem of the overvalued dollar, and indeed the future health of the American economy as a whole, a fundamental restructuring of monetary and fiscal policy is essential.

It is clear that President Reagan's supply-side, trickle-down experiment has failed. The huge budget deficits—$195 billion in 1983 alone—created by these misguided policies have helped raise interest rates, thereby contributing to the overvalued dollar. Policies should be enacted to restore adequate tax revenues by reviving the corporate income tax as a major contributor of these revenues and closing loopholes that allow wealthy individuals to escape their fair share of taxes. The rapid build-up in military expenditures must also be curbed.

In California's Silicon Valley, Qume, a computer-peripheral subsidiary of ITT, closed a plant making printers and memory devices, laying off 600 workers. Production was shifted to Puerto Rico and Taiwan. It was reported that workers at Qume earned $8 to $10 an hour including benefits. Labor costs in Taiwan for similar workers average $1.50 an hour.

At the same time the tight money policies of the Federal Reserve Board must be redirected and standby credit control authority enacted.

While these overall policy changes are needed to correct the fundamental conditions that have led to the current exchange rate imbalance, there are specific actions that can be taken now to lessen the damage.

- First, the United States should pursue a policy of currency market intervention, both unilaterally and in conjunction with other countries. The Reagan Administration's inaction in this area is simply an abdication of responsibility.

- Second, attention should be focused on the Administration's refusal to invoke Section 122 of the Trade Act of 1974 which requires the President to impose a surcharge, quotas, or combination of both "whenever" fundamental international exchange rate problems or balance of payments problems dictate. Given the volatility of currency markets, the imposition of quotas would probably be the preferred course of action. While action need not be taken if the President determines that it would be contrary to the national interest, he is required to consult with Congress on that determination. The failure to do even that is but another example of the "do-nothing" attitude that prevails in the U.S. government.

It should be emphasized, however, that even if the problem of an overvalued dollar is solved, the United States will continue to experience difficulties unless appropriate reforms are made in the areas of trade and industrial policy.

Industrial Policy

The adoption of a rational and coherent industrial policy is of major importance to the future health of the American economy.

An effective industrial policy to rebuild American industry and achieve sustained, balanced economic growth requires a supportive environment of general economic policies for rapid sustained growth and job creation, including an adequate, equitable revenue base and low interest rates.

The government has maintained a basically "hands-off" or "laissez-faire" policy toward domestic industrial development and international trade. Other countries have implemented aggressive industrial and trade policies, with substantial success. In steel, auto, electronics, railcars, aircraft, and a host of emerging industries, Japan, the advanced industrial countries of Europe, and the new industrial countries have applied a wide spectrum of strategic government support—from low-cost credit to protection from import competition and government assistance in technology development. Manufacturing is most important for the health and balance of the U.S. economy, particularly the production of basic commodities which are essential for other production and have national defense implications. Area and regional difference in needs, wealth, and resources also must be taken into consideration in economic policy matters.

Part and parcel of any trade and industrial policy are a series of actions that will promote investment in the U.S. and provide assistance for workers displaced by trade, and ensure that workplace rights are strengthened.

- The Trade Adjustment Assistance Program, gutted by the Reagan Administration should be restored to provide adequate compensation to those unemployed because of trade and to improve training, job search and relocation aid for those displaced workers.

- Tax loopholes and incentives for multinational companies to move abroad should be ended, the tax deferral halted, and the foreign tax credit and Foreign Sales Corporation statute repealed.

- The Overseas Private Investment Corporation, a government agency that insures private investment abroad should be terminated. By insuring the capital transactions and facilities of huge multinational banks and firms abroad, it has significantly contributed to the export of American jobs.

- Current government emphasis on the negotiation of bilateral investment treaties to ease the export of American capital must be redirected. Emphasis should be placed on furthering the interests of the U.S. economy and U.S. workers, not multinational enterprises.

- The United States should end its support of loans from the IMF that require the borrowing countries to curb imports and push exports to pay their debts. In place of this approach, which has harmful repercussions on the U.S. and other economies, the IMF should be urged to promote balanced growth in both borrowing and lending countries.

The Generalized System of Preferences should be repealed. At minimum, Congress must make import-sensitive items ineligible for GSP, limit its access to those countries that can realistically be considered developing nations, and exclude communist nations from the program.

Items 807 and 806.30 of the tariff schedules reduce tariffs on products containing parts produced in the United States. These provisions serve to export American jobs and should be repealed.

American laws that prohibit bribery of foreign officials must be strictly enforced instead of weakened. In those countries that seek to attract industry through the exploitation of workers, international agreements are needed to improve labor standards. Existing codes of conduct for multinational enterprises must be strengthened to protect the rights of workers employed by these firms and to provide effective remedies when those rights are denied.

Export promotion is an important function of trade policy, and any program must carefully consider domestic priorities. The Export-Import Bank's funding should be maintained until other countries cut or eliminate their subsidy programs. Funds should also be made available for the domestic purchase of U.S. products to offset foreign subsidies. There should be assurance that a portion of U.S. raw material exports be processed in this country, so that the export of grains, logs, and other products is conditioned upon specific domestic processing.

In the case of grain exports, the U.S. government should be the negotiator through an established "wheat board" similar to the Canadian model.

The prohibition on Alaskan oil exports should be maintained, and U.S.-flag vessels should retain the essential role of distributing the oil to all regions of the country.

Restrictions should be placed on the importation of vital basic chemicals, such as ammonia and nitrogen, to insure a healthy domestic industry.

The export of capital, technology, and price-sensitive items which results in damage to the U.S. economy should not be promoted.

The nation must assign top priority to the channeling of resources to modernize private and public facilities and restore the national economy to a condition of balanced growth and full employment. Otherwise, the country will continue to lag in productivity growth and international trade. It will continue to leave significant portions of its human and machine resources idle for extended periods of time. It will continue to suffer a reduction in the standard of living of its people.

The AFL-CIO believes that the adoption of these measures—trade law reform, a restructuring of monetary and fiscal policy, active intervention in international financial markets, and the enactment of industrial policy—will help solve the trade crisis and result in achieving the basic goals of our economy: full employment and balanced economic growth.

Shaping Policy for the Nation's Future

This article is the text of AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland's remarks to an Expo '84 labor-management dinner, Aug. 31, 1984, at Hershey, Pa.

By Lane Kirkland

I am delighted to find myself among so many union and management representatives who are talking with each other, rather than merely at or about each other. No doubt we have, and always will have, issues on which we disagree. It is precisely to deal with those issues that we created the fairest and most effective problem-solving system yet devised in our society—the institution of collective bargaining.

Those who see the bargaining table as a theater of conflict are mistaken. It is a forum for resolving conflicts, in ways that are just and fair to both sides. Collective bargaining contemplates no "final solutions." It seeks no more than a mutual agreement that both parties can live with for a fixed period of time. Then they re-examine their goals, readjust their agreement, and look ahead to the next round.

There's nothing easy or automatic about this process. It's a two-handed tool that won't work unless both parties want it to work. It's a tool for reasonable people who set achievable goals and who concede that their side is not the only one that has a right to life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness.

So it seems to me axiomatic that at this point in our country's economic and social history—when vast changes in technology, markets and trading patterns are disrupting the economy as never before—we need more

Joseph D. Keenan: Labor's Ambassador in War and Peace

By Francis X. Gannon, University Press of America, Inc., 4720 Boston Way, Lanham, Md. 20760. 200 pages. $11.50, paper; $20.75, cloth.

The subtitle of this recent book—"A Portrait of a Man and His Times"—sums up the two major functions fulfilled by this important labor biography.

Joseph Keenan, from the beginning of his career until his death at 87 in July, was one of the best-liked and most-respected leaders in the labor movement. Yet outside of labor, his important contributions to both national and labor history are little recognized.

At the same time, organized labor's pivotal roles in America's war effort and the rebuilding of Europe after World War II have been largely ignored by historians.

Gannon's book affords Keenan the recognition that he deserved—but never sought for himself—as both a labor statesman and in service to his country, and it documents accurately the participation of working people on the job and through their unions in the girding of America for war in the 1940s.

Of particular importance, the book examines in detail the role played by the American trade union movement—much through Keenan's efforts on the scene in Europe—in the rebuilding of the German trade unions smashed by Hitler almost immediately after he came to power.

Forty years later, German trade unionists speak with gratitude and admiration of Keenan's work for their revitalization. They point out, as well, that because Germany's trade unions were able to regain their feet fairly quickly after the war ended, they were able to participate vigorously in the shaping of the nation's new government and to insist that their long-held democratic traditions serve as a model for its structure.

As this book makes clear, without Joe Keenan's steady hand and his insistence on guaranteeing freedom of association and all trade union rights to German workers, that fierce voice for democracy might not have been heard.

The author points out that the biography is intended to be an overview of Keenan and his career rather than a definitive, scholarly account of his life and times.

Gannon effectively makes the point that although—and perhaps because—Keenan had no hunger for personal publicity—his numerous achievements far outstrip his fame.

Keenan was born in Chicago in 1896, joined Electrical Workers Local 134 there as an apprentice in 1914, became the local's recording secretary in 1928, and from 1937 to 1951 served as secretary of the Chicago Federation of Labor. He was elected secretary of the IBEW in 1957, a post he held until his retirement in 1976. He served as president of the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept. from 1975 to 1979.

In 1948, Keenan became director of COPE's forerunner, the AFL Labor's League for Political Action, and from 1951 to 1954 he also served as secretary of the AFL's Building & Construction Trades Dept.

A supporter of the merger, Keenan was elected to the Executive Council of the newly formed AFL-CIO in 1955 and was re-elected at each federation convention until his retirement. Among his key roles on the council was his chairmanship of the Housing Committee. His strong interest in affordable housing for working people bolstered the effort to create what is now the AFL-CIO's Housing Investment Trust.

But among the responsibilities closest to Keenan's heart—and those that secured him a place not only in labor but also in American history—were his services during World War II as the AFL's representative on the and better collective bargaining, not less.

That's why it is unfortunate that some misguided members of the business community have elected to kick over the bargaining table in the delusion that labor-management affairs are better conducted as a monologue. Present company excepted, of course, too many employers are seeking first to silence their employees by destroying their unions as an effective force in the workplace and in the community.

Too many, individually and through their trade associations, have proclaimed their determination to oppose by every means—fair and foul—the efforts of their employees to form and to join unions. They have demonstrated bitter opposition to any change in the nation's basic labor law that would make it responsive to the needs and desires of workers. They have applauded and taken full advantage of the Reagan Administration's systematic weakening of the government agencies created to protect the moral and statutory right of free association, the cornerstone of democratic freedom.

At the same time, they proclaim a warm desire for labor-management "cooperation in order to increase productivity," as if productivity were no more than increased exertion and lower expectations on the part of workers. That kind of cooperation simply means acquiescence in management's definition of the problem, management's formulation of the goal, and management's choice of objectives, strategies and solutions. We are, of course, unable and unwilling to oblige.

The labor movement has been around for a long time, and it is not going away. It is built for the long haul, and even its most immediate goals are by no means narrow and exclusive. Behind the question of how to improve our economic condition is the larger question of to what end human economic activity ought to be directed.

Trade unionists on Labor Day 1984 remain loyal to the goals that Samuel Gompers spelled out before the first Labor Day in 1894 when he responded to the question: "What does labor want?"

There is an old canard that his reply was simply "more," which has comforted many whose own selfishness has been justified, in their own eyes, by that spurious text.

What Gompers said was this:

"What does labor want? We want the earth and the fullness thereof. There is nothing too precious, there is nothing too beautiful, too lofty, too ennobling, unless it is within the scope and comprehension of labor's aspirations and wants.

"We want more schoolhouses and less jails; more books and less arsenals; more learning and less vice; more constant work and less crime; more leisure and less greed; more justice and less revenge. In fact, more of the opportunities to cultivate our better natures, to make manhood more noble, womanhood more beautiful, and childhood more happy and bright."

With that as our credo, we have sought, first, to improve the wages and working conditions of our members and to insure respect for their individual dignity and security on the job. This we do through collective bargaining.

Second, we seek to make life better for all the members of our democratic society. This we do through legislative activity and political activism.

We insist that economic activity cannot be regarded as an end in itself, defined by abstract numbers on individual corporate balance sheets. We say it should be a tool to advance the whole human enterprise, to bring about a fairer sharing of the nation's wealth and a broader participation in its social, educational and cultural life. It should be a means toward providing every citizen with a chance to develop to his or her maximum potential.

To bring about such a world requires the fullest cooperation of labor, management and, yes, government—which alone has the means to establish and coordinate the social and economic policies needed to guide America into the next century.

Do the people of Pennsylvania and the people of the United States need a steel industry, an auto industry, a garment industry, an electronics industry? Do companies need profits and workers need paychecks? Can we get along without any of these things, and if so, for how long?

Every successful industrial nation except the United States has asked these questions and answered them in ways that profoundly affect the life of every American. Every such nation but our own has put in place a coherent national industrial policy designed to advance, promote, preserve and protect particular industries or groups of industries—new and old, sunset and sunrise—in its own national interest. These national policies are augmented by well-conceived, complementary trade policies, often with the United States as the targeted market.

What America has, by comparison, is a collection of mini-policies that never add up to a maximum national effort. Thus, we have policies that encourage the flight of American capital overseas, hiding from U.S. taxes, wage rates, and work, health and safety standards. Our specialty has been to export capital to those places in this world where workers are docile, hungry and willing to work for pennies per hour. There is no end to that supply.

Yes, we have a trade policy—it operates only on the inbound shipping lanes. We have an administration that brags of a strong dollar, a dollar so strong that it can attract goods from every corner of the earth and prevent sales of U.S. goods in foreign markets.

At home, we encourage what can only be described as corporate cannibalism, an orgy of leveraged buyouts, asset-stripping, factory-closing, paper-exchanging, and profiteering that takes no account of the interests of workers or customers, communities or the nation as a whole.

The same economic wizards who invented the one-way trade policy resist the concept of a coherent national industrial policy. Hands off, they declare; let the markets function. But they blink at the various ad hoc sectoral policies already in place to protect and preserve the most politically-sensitive areas of our economy.

Do the bankers make foolish loans to tin-horn dictators of the right and left? Never fear, the banks will be bailed out by an array of agencies designed just for the purpose. There is a national policy to support the housing industry, although the Reagan Administration is allowing it to wither on the vine. There is no bigger federal program of sectoral support than the collection of agencies designed to foster and protect American farming.

When the Continental Bank of Chicago went bust, a handful of government officials were able to put together a fast rescue operation that makes the United States the major owner of the bank. But when Chrysler nearly went belly-up, and hundreds of thousands of jobs were at stake, it took an act of Congress and some mighty heavy legislative lobbying to provide only guarantees for new loans to save the company. The government and all investors profited handsomely from that deal.

America still has a choice. We can establish a sensible industrial policy, coordinated with a rational trade policy, whose first priority is the creation of new, well-paid jobs and the securing of a broad middle-class of working men and women. Or, we can let other industrial trading nations and the less-developed world dictate our economic future, a future in which working Americans will see their incomes and living standards decline.

We can easily become a nation of paper-shufflers, launderers, and fast-food dispensers, dominated by a small group of very rich financial institutions which owe their loyalty only to making bigger profits.

Faced with that prospect, labor believes we have a legitimate claim on the goodwill and cooperation of every management able to see beyond next year's earnings report.

We, for our part, are prepared to clasp any hand that is extended to us from the business quarter in the interest of protecting American jobs and security, building America's industrial future, and strengthening the collective bargaining process.

We await any takers.

National Defense Advisory Commission created by President Roosevelt. During that period he also was labor vice chairman of the War Production Board where he was the linchpin in efforts that assured stable labor relations throughout the war and kept the nation's war production humming.

Keenan went to Germany almost immediately after the war ended as labor adviser to Gen. Lucius Clay.

For his services, Keenan was awarded the nation's two highest civilian awards, the Medal of Freedom and the Award of Merit.

Gannon's account of Keenan's service over those years is meaty and satisfying, particularly in his use of Keenan's own recollections and those of major national figures who worked with him.

Among his contemporaries, Ambassador W. Averill Harriman observes in the book's preface that Keenan's name "became a legend both in wartime and beyond" because of his "commitment to the national interest over any parochial or limited concerns, an open and friendly manner which immediately set others at ease; and a belief in the fundamental decency and good will of other human beings."

Gannon says virtually all of Keenan's associates concur in that assessment of his personality and his approach to his duties. They also stress his tenacity to a cause in which he believed, and his unflagging—but not ungentlemanly—opposition to individuals or issues that attacked his deep personal beliefs or the labor movement he loved.

That grit, Gannon shows, was particularly apparent in Keenan's energetic political activities for Labor's League and later COPE.

Keenan was clearly a staunch anti-communist, but he was equally an opponent of the tactics of Sen. Joseph McCarthy, and he lost no love for Sen. Robert Taft either over his red-baiting or labor-hating.

But among the politicians who irked Keenan most was Richard Nixon. In the 1950s Keenan saw the then-Congressman Nixon as the personification of the worst anti-labor anti-progressive forces of the country.

Keenan later likened the AFL's role in the 1950 elections to "a rookie ballplayer coming up for his first year in the big league." But the hard knocks that year—such as Taft's re-election—taught labor a lesson, he said.

"It taught us that we should let no political organization just give us a candidate and tell us we can take it or leave it."

What Do Unions Do?

By Richard B. Freeman and James L. Medoff, Basic Books, Inc., 10 East 53rd St., New York, N.Y. 10022. 293 pages. $22.95.

At a time when the labor movement is facing challenges of historic dimensions, Richard B. Freeman and James L. Medoff have produced one of the most important books about unions to be published in the post-war era.

The two Harvard economists have done original research that the labor movement has long needed to prove that it is a positive force in American society. Writing in clear language, Freeman and Medoff have produced a book every trade union activist should read.

They have gathered in one place the most valuable information available on the impact of unions on productivity, wage scales, corporate profits and the political process. They look with objective eyes at the factors of seniority, membership participation, corruption and non-union workers.

Unlike many other academic observers of unions, Freeman and Medoff analyze the social and democratizing role performed by unions as well as the purely economic.

They put all these factors—positive and negative—on their scholarly scales and conclude that unions are a force for good.

In summing up their research, the economists find that for organized workers unions provide "higher wages and benefits, as well as a voice at the bargaining table and on the shop floor."

Many non-union workers realize that because of the threat of union organizing "their wages and working conditions are better than they might have been, although generally not as good as they would be under collective bargaining, while others will find that their economic position is worse as a result of unionism."

Employers at organized establishments "will see that while unionism is associated with a lower rate of return on capital and less managerial flexibility, the extent to which a union is a liability or an asset depends crucially on how management responds to it."

The authors also conclude that "non-union employers will learn that while the benefits of being union-free generally exceed the costs of union avoidance, the former are often overstated and the latter are often understated."

"Finally," Freeman and Medoff write, "the general public will see that in the economic sphere, unions reduce wage inequality, increase industrial democracy, and often raise productivity, while in the political sphere, unions are an important voice for some of our society's weakest and most vulnerable groups, as well as for their own members."

In the current blizzard of anti-unionism encouraged by a hostile, retrogressive Republican Administration, it is especially important to have this book.

Freeman and Medoff approach labor as friendly critics. They have analyzed all the anti-labor propaganda; they have looked at labor's failings and errors; they have looked at the inauspicious future. Still, they offer hopeful, sound evidence that the labor movement will survive the era of Reagan as it survived earlier periods of stress and strain.

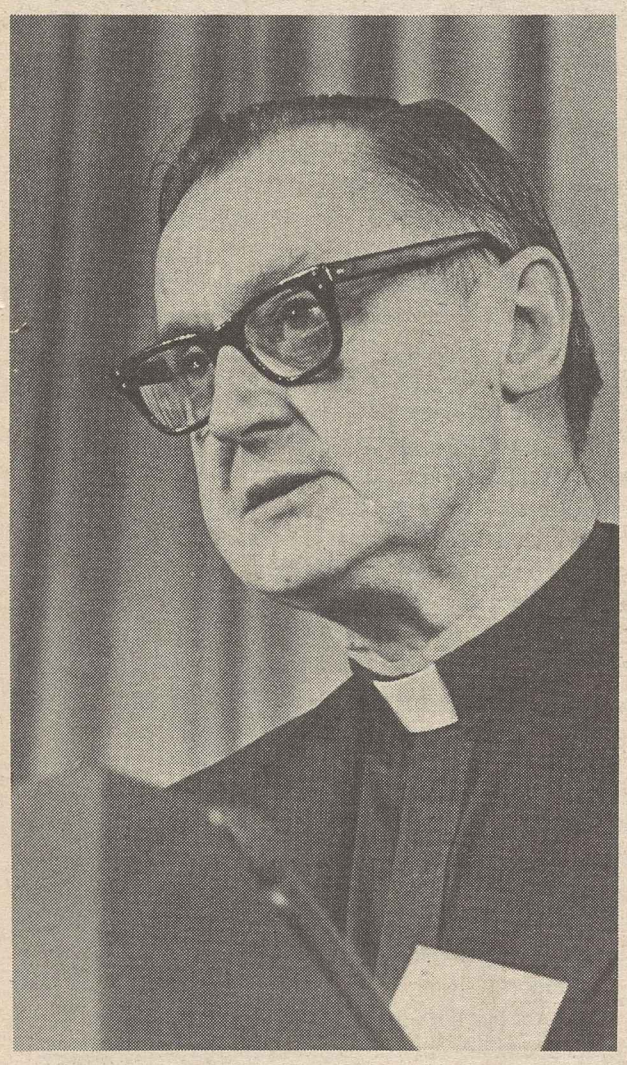
Without Fear or Favor: George Higgins On the Record

By Gerald M. Costello, Twenty-Third Publications, Mystic, Conn. 06355. 284 pages. $9.95.



"I will be happy to go . . . on a moment's notice, if you think my presence there would serve a useful purpose."

That was Msgr. George Higgins's response to a recent request that he travel to a city where a dramatic strike of 17,000 union workers had been marred by widespread assaults upon peaceful pickets by private security guards and local police.

"A moment's notice" is the lead-time characteristically required for Msgr. Higgins to enter a fray where human values are at stake.

His interventions on behalf of those in need of help or in defense of principles needing a champion have been not only immediate in response, but also "without fear or favor," appropriately, the title of Gerald M. Costello's study of the man former Supreme Court Justice Arthur Goldberg describes as "a confidant of labor leaders and working people, of presidents and Cabinet officers, of cardinals and priests, of clerical colleagues of other faiths, of lay persons, Catholic and non-Catholic, and of intellectuals."

Although the book has been classified as "biography," Msgr. Higgins has stated the book is not that. The author describes his work as a "journalist's study" of the role Msgr. Higgins has played in the Catholic Church in the United States and in the lives of thousands of people his ministry has touched.

The insights Costello brings to his study are gleaned from the best possible source, Msgr. Higgins's own words presented for more than 35 years in his syndicated weekly column, "The Yardstick", and in articles, lectures, correspondence and interviews.

As a young priest finishing doctoral studies at Catholic University in early 1944, Father Higgins was asked to spend the summer months in a temporary position with the National Catholic Welfare Conference, predecessor organization of the current U.S. Catholic Conference and the National Conference of Catholic Bishops.

That temporary appointment lasted more than 36 years. In the intervening period between his casual initiation and his retirement, George Higgins became one of the most influential members of the Catholic Church in the United States and one of the most respected supporters and interpreters of collective bargaining as an element of modern society.

When Msgr. Higgins as a church representative insists that in today's complex world there can be no truly free society without a free trade union movement, he is in good company. The same conviction has been asserted in papal encyclicals dating back to Pope Leo XIII's "Rerum Novarum" in 1891 and even earlier to the writing of German Bishop Von Kettler. The principle has been repeated and expanded upon by every pontiff and in the last fifty years, most recently by Pope John Paul II in his major document on "Human Work."

The principles of social reform, social justice and social reconstruction enunciated in those papal documents —and expressed in different form and language in national legislation and trade union programs—have been expounded through the years by those associated with the official conferences of the U.S. Catholic Church and in official statements from national Protestant and Jewish organizations.

Some of the Catholic representatives like Msgr. John A. Ryan, Fr. Raymond McGowan and Bishop Francis J. Haas, have been singled out by Msgr. Higgins for special and repeated recognition as having made significant contributions to the process of translating into common usage the general values of generic statements. To that list, current reviewers of the great contributers to social justice invariably add the name of Msgr. Higgins.

The unique role the Monsignor has played in the institutional life of organized labor and organized religion is to explain by word and example the intertwining of their roots, their value systems and their necessity. His intellectual capacity, his philosophical depth, his knowledge of history in the fields of his broad-ranging interests and his communication skills may be matched by others in their particular areas of specialization. But to those attributes, Msgr. Higgins adds the unique ability to plunge into raging controversy while being accepted by the contending antagonists as an advocate only of truth and justice.

Because justice more often than not is on the side of the oppressed, the disadvantaged, the handicapped, the poor and those who work, and because unions so often are the advocates of those struggling groups, here and abroad, Msgr. Higgins frequently is found allied with the labor movement.

He also can be included among those who agree with AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland that higher standards of conduct and performance should be considered the norm for unions and their leaders. The straight-shooting Monsignor does not hesitate to note departures from that norm.

Whether it is the plight of coal miners in Harlan County, Ky., farm workers in California, hotel workers in Las Vegas, or Polish workers who are members of Solidarnosc that calls for his personal involvement, Msgr. Higgins has shown he is ready "on a moment's notice."

Why he is that available, why he is so willing to lend his voice and being to social justice needs is the point of Costello's study.

This small, authoritative volume traces the influences that shaped this unique personality and highlights the contributions he has made as churchman and labor confidant. It examines the reasons he moves easily in and out of various communities and disciplines and why he is deemed a towering figure in the fields of labor-management relations, interracial justice, ecumenism, and international affairs.

Costello renders an important contribution of his own in underscoring that throughout his multifaceted career, Msgr. Higgins is first and foremost a religious-oriented individual. While pushing and prodding church leaders and institutions into action in support of social needs, the Monsignor never loses sight of his conviction that the spiritual life should be the major preoccupation of the church.

That basic concept is what makes Lane Kirkland's observation about Msgr. Higgins being the labor movement's "parish priest" an apt description of George Higgins's life and career. He is a priest, active in the world because of that calling.

In his acknowledgements, Costello notes prominently the role of William Kircher, former AFL-CIO Director of Organization, in making possible the preparation of the book. Costello also recognizes properly the contribution Kircher made in obtaining Msgr. Higgins's involvement on behalf of the United Farm Workers of America whose president, Cesar Chavez, frequently credits both Higgins and Kircher for having aided immeasurably that union's progress against tremendous obstacles.

"Without Fear or Favor" should be required reading for everyone concerned with social justice, social progress, social order or for anyone who wonders why Msgr. Higgins maintains—week in and week out—that healthy, vigorous collective bargaining is essential to assure the attainment of all those objectives.

Contract Administration

By Bob Repas, Bureau of National Affairs, Inc., Washington, D.C. 20037. 247 pp. $17.50.

This book presents an excellent discussion of the role of union stewards and the enforcement of collective bargaining agreements through the grievance procedure. Repas, who has been teaching union members for more than 35 years, has written a book that gives a thorough analysis of the issues without being too lengthy or theoretical. He combines historical and legal background with current issues and adds useful hints for stewards on how to carry out their duties successfully.

The book starts by tracing the development of unions, stewards, and collective bargaining. The major labor laws are summarized, and current legal issues such as lie detector tests and freedom of information acts are touched upon. The various responsibilities of stewards are described, including their roles as political educators, organizers, and communication links between workers and union officials.

Next, the book discusses grievances and grievance procedures. Repas describes tactics for resolving disputes and problems stewards may encounter with management, workers, and their own union. The unique features of grievance handling in the public sector and the building trades are also reviewed.

Arbitration is examined in the third part of the book. The author gives helpful advice on how to select arbitrators, prepare cases, and save time and money.

Finally, the book examines some of the newer aspects of contract administration including the influences of "quality-of-work programs."

No single book can prepare a steward for all possible problems, but Contract Administration gives a solid foundation for any steward to work from. It is a valuable tool for steward training and labor education in general.

Labor in America: A History, Fourth Edition

By Foster Rhea Dulles and Melvyn Dubofsky; Harlan Davidson, Inc., Arlington Heights, Ill. 472 pp. $15.95, paper.

Prof. Melvyn Dubofsky of the State University of New York at Binghamton, has performed a noble service in bringing up-to-date the history of labor originally written by Foster Rhea Dulles.

As a result, this volume is the only comprehensive history of the labor movement that covers developments through 1982. The revision, therefore, enables the reader to relate the pressures of the current decade with the many crises faced previously by labor through its long history in America.

The strength of the Dulles-Dubofsky volume is its accessibility. Relatively short for such a comprehensive subject, the book is easily read and well-organized.

Everything is here from the earliest development of workers' attitudes in colonial days, through the different efforts to form national unions, the Knights of Labor and International Workers of the World, and the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations.

Everything is told with sympathy and understanding for the struggle and conflict American workers have endured to build their democratic union structure.

Architects of Fear

By George Johnson. Jeremy P. Tarcher, Inc., Los Angeles, 252 pp. $13.95.

George Johnson, a former reporter for The Minneapolis Star, has expanded a series of articles he wrote about political and religious fringe movements to make this book.

The groups profiled are grouped on the far right of American politics and have one thing in common—a deep belief in conspiratorial theories and a sick strain of paranoia.

While reading the diatribes of such thinkers as Robert Welch and Lyndon H. LaRouche, Jr., is an instant cure for insomnia, the subject of this book is important.

The many enemies that these political crazies target include trade unions. While these organizations are small, they are often dangerous because of their blind zeal.

These zealots believe they alone understand the revealed truth—they allow no challenges, no opposition and no alternatives. This book reinforces the long-held belief that the greater danger to American democracy comes from the far right.

'Recovery' skips unemployment lines

By James M. Shevis

The President says everything looks fine,
But he ought to check the view from the unemployment line.
And I want to know, where's that recovery?
Everybody must have recovered, except me.

The view from the unemployment line is dreary and disheartening. And if President Reagan really believes that Americans never had it so good, he is far mistaken.

Take that from those who have been there.

Five unemployed workers lifted their voices in desperation at a Capitol Hill press conference following the government's release of the September jobless rate. They described in human terms the impact of the nation's continuing unemployment crisis on their lives and communities.

"I've come a long ways to tell you there is no recovery," said Mildred Jackson of Philadelphia, a 40-year-old mother of four. She was laid off in June 1983 from her job as a sewing machine operator at a clothing factory and except for a two-month stint with the city recreation department this summer, she hasn't worked since.

Help needed

"We need jobs and we must have them. Until we get them, we're counting on our elected officials to give us help, to give us our just due," she declared.

Jackson and the others told reporters they expect to endure more hardship before the needed help comes through. She long ago ran out of unemployment benefits, and faces the prospect of having her utilities shut off.

The press conference was the second called by a coalition of religious, civil rights, and labor groups, including the Full Employment Action Council, which issued a report, "Everybody Must Have Recovered, Except Me," which adopts the title of a folk song written especially for a Cleveland rally sponsored by the coalition last month.

The report found that while the official government jobless rate was 7.4 percent in September, the actual rate was much higher—13.2 percent—once the "discouraged" workers and persons who could find only part-time jobs were counted.

It's tough all over

Even the highly educated are having trouble finding work. Marialba Martinez, 28, a native of Puerto Rico, is bilingual and has a degree in journalism from the University of Maryland. She came to the nation's capital six months ago, looking for a job in public affairs. She's still looking.

"My battle has been with the bureaucracy," she said, as she described the red tape involved in getting a government job rating. Even after obtaining a rating, she found that many agencies aren't hiring because of budget cutbacks.

"The election is a factor, too," she said. "People can't make up their minds about hiring. A lot of professionals like myself are unable to find work. So if I as a professional person am having such a hard time, I worry about those with less education and qualifications."

Meanwhile, she has no steady income, no health insurance, and receives no unemployment benefits because she has not been in Washington long enough to qualify.

Todd Smith, who opened the press conference with the folk song he wrote, singing and playing it on his guitar, was president of Electronics Workers Local 777 at Westinghouse Co.'s Cleveland plant until it was shut down in 1979. He has intermittently worked as a musician most of his life, and after the closing decided to devote his music to the service of the labor movement.

Part-time work

Smith, 38, keeps body and soul together also with occasional cabinet-making work. He serves on the Cleveland United Labor Agency's cultural arts and education committee and has sung at rallies, demonstrations, conventions, and on picket lines across the country.

"I work only part-time, so I guess I don't count. There are lots like me in Cleveland," he said.

The Bureau of Labor Statistics, which computes the monthly jobless rate for the nation, does not count as unemployed those who take part-time jobs because they are unable to find full-time work.

Leila Podmore worked at the Warner & Swasey Precision Tool Co. in Cleveland for 18 years until she was let go two years ago in a mass layoff. A member of the Machinists, she worked as a machine operator.

Podmore has been through a job search program sponsored by local unions, but has been unable to find work. Since she is not eligible for social security benefits, she took early retirement "just to survive," she said.

Corporate insensitivity

"I had given my all to the company, and it didn't give a damn for me. It didn't care for any of us," she said.

Terrence Robinson lives in Washington. He attended high school but did not graduate. He has been looking for work since May. A younger sister and brother are searching for jobs also.

Robinson, a 19-year-old black, said joblessness, crime and drugs go hand in hand in his neighborhood. "I don't want any of that. I just want to work, and help my mother who is unemployed, too," he said.

The Full Employment Action Council pointed out in its report that the number of unemployed blacks has risen since Reagan took office and the number of households headed by unemployed black women has increased dramatically.

The council called for emergency legislation to help the unemployed, endorsing the Community Renewal Employment Act, the Hawkins-Kennedy Youth Incentive Employment Act, and the National Employment Priorities Act, a plant-closing bill, pending in Congress.

Jobless rate remains stuck at 1980's 'intolerable' level

After four years of Reaganomics, American workers are finding they are no better off as the nation's jobless rate last month stayed virtually where it was when President Reagan took office.

The Bureau of Labor Statistics reported the civilian unemployment rate in September was 7.4 percent, only a slight improvement over August's 7.5-percent rate and for all practical purposes unchanged from the 7.5-percent level in January 1981, when there were 8,740,000 jobless.

"For five months, the unemployment level has been stalled at the level Ronald Reagan said was 'intolerable' in 1980," an AFL-CIO statement observed.

"He was right then. To call it 'good news' now that 8.5 million people are out of work is wrong."

While employment has grown by 5.3 million since Reagan took office, this was not fast enough to reduce unemployment over the past four years and only half as fast as the 10-million jobs added during President Carter's term, Federation Research Director Rudy Oswald pointed out.

The BLS report for September showed a drop of 125,000 jobs in the manufacturing sector, the first significant monthly decline in nearly two years. A total of 740,000 factory jobs now have been lost since July 1981.

BLS Commissioner Janet L. Norwood told the congressional Joint Economic Committee that "only about 40 percent" of 185 industries had increased employment last month. That was the lowest percentage since the trough of the 1981-82 recession, she said.

Current economic growth is about 3.6 percent and "is not sufficient to reduce unemployment further," the AFL-CIO statement noted.

"Instead, American workers face a threat of another economic downturn in the months ahead."

The 7.4-percent September jobless rate reflects unemployment among civilian workers, and was not much different from the 7.5-percent levels of July and August. Based on a separate measure that counts the armed forces stationed in the United States among the employed, joblessness last month was 7.3 percent of the workforce, down from 7.4 percent in August.

Neither measure accounts for the so-called "discouraged" workers—those who no longer look for jobs because they believe none are to be found—or those who are employed part-time because they have been unable to find full-time work.

More than in 1981

While the number of discouraged workers declined by 98,000 in the third quarter to a seasonally adjusted 1.2 million, the total still was greater than the 1.1-million discouraged workers counted in the first quarter of 1981 when Reagan took office.

Meanwhile, the number of workers employed part-time because full-time work was not available for them rose to 5,496,000 in September from 5,324,000 the month before.

The drop in the official jobless rate last month was concentrated among women, while the rate for adult men edged up to 6.5 percent in September from 6.4 percent in August, BLS reported.

Masters, Mates strike to defend tanker contracts

Some 500 members of the Masters, Mates & Pilots took their strike against five U.S.-flag tanker companies into its second week as they sought to defend themselves from blatantly anti-union activity by the operators.

MM&P, an affiiate of the Longshoremen, began the walkout Oct. 3 when the companies refused to honor contracts the union says are still in force.

The deck officers' union reached new three-year pacts with major dry cargo liner operators in July after previous agreements expired. The tanker companies, however, unilaterally announced it would not renew their agreement with the union. Instead, they cut wages an average 40 percent, did away with all health benefits, and reduced pension and vacation benefits.

The companies are Marine Transport Lines, Maritime Overseas Corp., Keystone Shipping, Trinidad Corp., and Moore McCormack Bulk Transport. Together, they operate about 60 vessels, including 18 under charter to the government's Military Sealift Command.

The union has filed suit in federal district courts in New York and Philadelphia against one of the companies, Marine Transport Lines, alleging breach of contract. The union has taken the position that its contracts with the companies contain an "evergreen" clause that extends them a year beyond the June 16, 1984, expiration date.

California labor targets ballot issues

Oakland—A ballot proposition to redraw state legislative and congressional district lines in California was denounced by the State AFL-CIO as dangerous and destructive to worker rights.

"It would result in 'right-to-work' laws and everything the anti-labor forces want out of Sacramento," Executive Sec.-Treas. John F. Henning warned at the California AFL-CIO's 15th biennial convention.

Under the plan, which will appear as Proposition 39 on the Nov. 6 California ballot, a commission of retired appellate and state Supreme Court justices would assume the duty of reapportioning districts now done by the state legislature.

State Senate President pro tem David Roberti called the scheme "an attempt by Republicans to do what their numbers won't allow them to do at the ballot box, that is, to displace the majority party and take control of the legislature."

The 600 delegates to the three-day meeting voted unanimously to oppose the proposition.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue, in a major address to the convention, warned of the consequences of a Reagan re-election and called on California union activists to do their utmost in support of the Mondale-Ferraro ticket.

"Electing Walter Mondale and Geraldine Ferraro won't solve all our ills," Donahue said, "but it is an indispensable first step. To win that election, we have to tell our members the truth about Reagan, Reaganism and Reaganomics."

Also addressing the convention, Joan Mondale, wife of the Democratic presidential candidate, sharply criticized the Reagan Administration's insensitivity to the needs and rights of workers.

"We can't let this continue," she said. "We need a President who understands that this country believes in justice for all—not privileges for some."

Among other speakers were California Lt. Gov. Leo T. McCarthy, Atty. Gen. John Van de Camp, State Assembly Speaker Willie Brown, Jr., Director William Pollard of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights, and Frank Harding of the Labor Council of New South Wales in Australia.

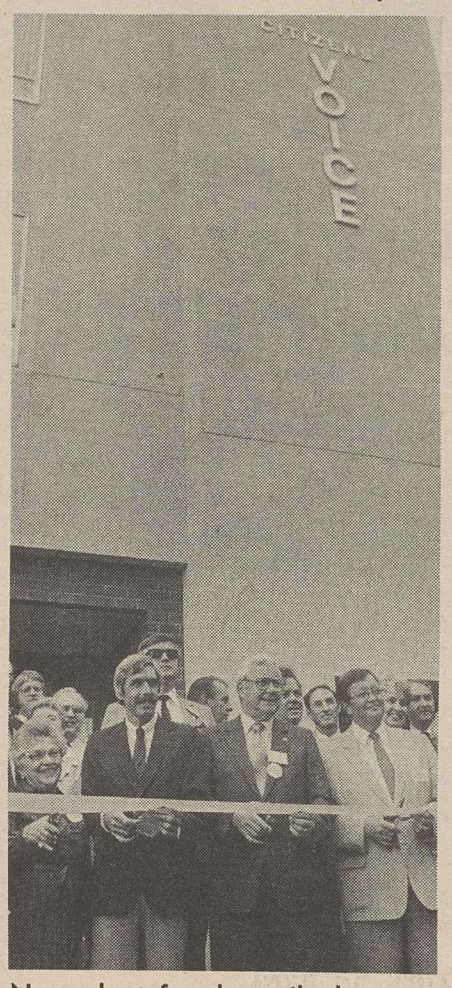
In other business, delegates amended the state federation's constitution to raise the per capita tax from 20 to 25 cents a month, effective Nov. 1. They also endorsed candidates for state legislative seats and in 45 congressional districts.

Henning and the federation's president, Albert J. Gruhn, both were re-elected without opposition to two-year terms. The convention also returned to office all 34 incumbent vice presidents. Charles Yelkey of Transit Union Local 256 in Sacramento was elected to fill a vacant 35th position.

Strike newspaper thrives, moves into modern plant

Wilkes-Barre, Pa.—Local and international union officials ceremonially snipped a ribbon into a dozen pieces Sept. 29 as Wilkes-Barre's newspaper unions formally opened the modern new plant in which they now are publishing their daily newspaper, the Citizens' Voice.

The ceremony and a public open house took place just a week short of six years from the day about 180 of the unions' members struck the long-established Times Leader, owned by the Capital Cities chain and situated just down the block from the new Citizens' Voice plant.



New plant for the strike-born newspaper, Citizens' Voice of Wilkes-Barre, Pa., is officially opened with a ribbon-cutting ceremony.

When the walkout began, Times Leader management turned the struck paper into an armed camp and continued publishing with unorganized personnel and strike-breakers, some from other papers in the chain.

The unions—locals of the Newspaper Guild, Pressmen, Stereotypers and Typographical Union—put out the first edition of the Citizens Voice just three days into the strike using rented equipment and leased quarters and machinery in several locations.

In the union-strong Wyoming Valley, the Citizens' Voice was an immediate success, quickly outstripping the Times Leader in both paid advertising and circulation. It continues to do so.

The paper's officials said they began looking for new facilities in 1983 because of its growing demand.

With the new plant, production of the six-day-a-week tabloid for the first time is taking place under the same roof instead of being spread between sites 10 miles apart.

The new plant is a reconstructed department store warehouse. In it, employees in all departments are working with some of the most up-to-date computer-based publishing system available.

A newly rebuilt, seven-unit press has nearly three times the capacity of the old six-unit machine. Its speed of 48,000 copies an hour is just short of the Citizens' Voice's daily circulation.

Among visiting union officials taking part in the dedication of the new plant were William J. Boarman, vice president, ITU; Charles A. Perlik, Jr., president, TNG; and Leon Wickersham, executive assistant to the president of the Graphic Communications Union.

Demonstrations assail job-killing trade policy

Among that string of broken promises was the Reagan Administration's quick refusal shortly after taking office in 1981 to continue restrictions on shoe imports.

In 1981, the union said, 50 percent of all shoes sold in the United States were imports. But today the tally is up to 70 percent, "and another American shoe plant goes out of business every week," the ACTWU officers said.

The union charged that the Reagan Administration has not only failed to save jobs and quell the tidal wave of clothing imports—doubled since President Reagan took office—but also has opened the flood gates even wider by refusing to negotiate fair trade agreements with low-wage countries and actively seeking to cut existing tariffs.

The Reagan Administration is filled with "ideological free traders," but "the rest of the world doesn't run on 'free trade,'" the union pointed out.

Widespread protest

Anger over the Administration's anti-U.S. worker stance drew protesters to the rallies organized by ACTWU in large and small communities.

At a demonstration typical of many, ACTWU Local 1733 officials in Paterson, N.J., told protesters that the city has lost 1,000 jobs in textiles and apparel alone just since Reagan took office.

In Paterson, site of the bitter 1913 strike by silk and dye workers' unions that are the ancestors of Local 1733, the protesters were joined by Mayor Frank Graves and Ernestine Bradley, wife of New Jersey Democratic Sen. Bill Bradley.

New York Gov. Mario Cuomo joined protesters at the rally in New York City after procaiming the day "Buy American Day." The City Council also approved a unanimous resolution in support of the demonstration and its goals.

Demonstrators at the Baltimore rally cheered Sen. Paul Sarbanes (D-Md.) who joined the protest and proudy demonstrated the ACTWU union abe in his suit jacket, stressing his concern over the rising tide of imports.

Speakers at each of the rallies pointed to data supplied by ACTWU showing that textile and clothing imports rose by 25 percent in 1983 over 1982, by 44 percent in the first seven months of 1984 over the same period last year, and by 62 percent in July 1984 alone compared to the same month a year ago.

In terms of jobs lost between 1980 and the end of 1983, ACTWU figures showed that the hardest hit states have been in the South, particularly North Carolina, South Carolina and Georgia, and the Mid-Atlantic region including New York, New Jersey and Pennsylvania.

Also badly battered were Texas, Massachusetts and Michigan, but ACTWU's data showed that virtually every state has suffered job losses in the thousands.

ACTWU also stressed that there has been "no economic recovery" from the deep Reagan Recession in spite of an apparent increase in U.S. clothing and textile sales.

Between 1982 and 1983, the union said, imports grew by 25 percent while domestic apparel cuttings actually fell by 1 percent.

World labor welcomes Turkish leader's release

The AFL-CIO and other international labor organizations welcomed the release of President Abdullah Basturk of the Turkish Labor Federation (DISK) after more than four years of imprisonment.

Basturk was jailed following the military takeover in Turkey in September 1980. The International Confederation of Free Trades said that Basturk's release still "does not satisfy union critics of Turkey's sad record on human and trade union rights."

More firms shifting health care costs to workers

A new government study shows a growing number of employers are shifting employee health insurance costs to their workers.

A Bureau of Labor Statistics survey of medium and large firms reveals that although employers generally paid the full cost of providing benefits, "relatively more employees shared in the cost of health insurance in 1983 than in 1982."

AFL-CIO Economist John Zalusky's analysis of the report, titled Employee Benefits in Medium and Large Firms, 1983, notes:

"There has been a rapid increase in the number of workers who are paying for a share of their own health care coverage and an increase in the portion they are paying for a share of their dependent coverage. The deductibles have also increased.

"If this information is an indication of industries' preferred method of offsetting increased health care costs, it bodes ill for the future of American workers.

"This approach seems to assume that workers can control their health care costs, when the likely worker response will be decreased use of health care. That is, because of the added costs, workers will avoid treatment until the problem becomes serious."

Study available

The BLS study, which is available through the U.S. Government Printing Office in Washington, is based on data collected from firms employing at least 100 or 250 people.

The fifth in an annual series, the survey looks at 11 major private sector employee benefits paid for at least in part by employers. It covers a cross-section of the nation's private industries employing 20 million full-time workers.

It was designed to provide the Office of Personnel Management with information on private sector practices for use in comparisons with benefits paid federal workers.

The 11 benefit groupings are paid lunch and rest periods, holidays, vacations, personal and sick leave, sickness and accident insurance, long-term disability benefits, health and life insurance, and private pension plans.

In addition, data were collected on 18 other employee benefits, including stock, savings and thrift, and profit sharing plans; nonproduction bonuses; employee discounts; educational assistance; relocation allowances, and free or subsidized parking.

Information in the study is presented separately for three occupational groups—professional-administrative, technical-clerical, and production workers. For the second year, the survey reflects a drop of about 600,000 in production worker employment within the scope of the study.

The survey does not separate union and non-union firms nor does it go into the cost of benefits. As Zalusky points out, however, "one can clearly see the size of various benefits, and based on this kind of information those engaged in collective bargaining can see where their benefit package stands relative to other workers.

"Most employers do not want to be leaders in the benefit areas, and labor representatives don't want their membership to lag behind the patterns unless the tradeoffs are fairly sound.

"Additionally, with more and more employers looking for cafeteria-style benefit packages as a means of cutting costs, the union needs to know what a basic package should include. Those involved in negotiations should find this study very helpful."

Some of the highlights of the report:

- On average, employees received about 10 paid holidays a year.
- 94 percent of all employees had some protection against loss of income due to short-term disability—either sick leave or sickness and accident insurance, or both.
- Virtually all participants in health insurance plans were covered for most categories of expenses related to hospital and medical care. Life insurance was provided for nearly all workers, most commonly for an amount equal to their annual earnings rounded to the next $1,000.
- Funeral leave, military leave, subsidized parking, and full or partial defrayment of educational expenses were available to at least three-fifths of the employees.
- 40-hour straight-time weekly work schedules applied to 84 percent of the employees covered by the survey. Nineteen percent of the professional-administrative employees, 27 percent of the technical-clerical employees, and 7 percent of the production workers had shorter workweeks.

South Carolina labor bolsters Mondale drive

Myrtle Beach, S.C.—Political action—pressing for a strong turnout of union voters to elect the Mondale-Ferraro ticket—topped the South Carolina AFL-CIO convention agenda.

The 250 delegates underscored their support of Democratic presidential candidate Walter Mondale and running mate Geraldine Ferraro and pledged to continue their "full-scale registration, education and get-out-the-vote campaign to generate maximum turnout and support by union members" for the "pro-worker" Democratic ticket.

The endorsement resolution stressed that Mondale "stands squarely with working people" on isues important to workers and their families including jobs, fair trade, safety and health, education, tax fairness, equal rights, social security and other issues.

Ronald Reagan, the delegates declared, based on his record is "demonstrably against them."

Delegates also pledged to work for the election of COPE-endorsed candidates for state and local races.

State AFL-CIO President Randy Kiser in his report to the convention stressed the key differences between Mondale and Reagan and between their views of the nation's future.

One vision of America, Walter Mondale's, Kiser said, offers fairness to all citizens and it represents "the values of average middle-class Americans—family, neighborhood work, responsibility, concern for those at the bottom of the ladder."

In contrast, Ronald Reagan's vision, "assures continued favor to wealthy Americans," and is shaped by the values "of the priviledged among whom he has lived and whose advice he seeks, and by the imbitions of the executive suite," Kiser warned.

Rep. Butler Derrick (D-S.C.) scored Reagan for promising tohold down textile imports but instead permitting them to rise to record highs, throwing many South Carolina workers on the unemployment lines.

In key resolutions, delegates called for improvements in the state's wage and hour laws and condemned the union-busting tactics of Continental Airlines.

November's Stakes

THE ENTIRE strategy of the Reagan campaign is designed to trivialize the underlying issues and reduce the election of the President of the United States to the dimensions of a high school popularity contest.

But it won't work with the trade union movement.

Our faith in democracy and our continued optimism about this election are based upon our confidence that the people cannot be altogether fooled for long.

We have been on the wrong road for four years.

Mr. Reagan would like you to believe that he had nothing whatever to do with any recession, but the recovery is all his.

Yes, there is a lot of economic activity. Vast quantities of manufactured goods are moving, but they're moving only one way: in. A lot of money is changing hands, but it's all in one direction: out. A lot of jobs are being created—in other countries.

Mr. Reagan seems to believe that this is because American industrial workers are paid too much and work too little—thus his cure of union-busting and insecurity enforced by a standing army of the unemployed.

ECONOMIC ACTIVITY cannot be regarded as an end in itself. It should be a tool to advance the whole human enterprise, to bring about a fairer sharing of the nation's wealth and a broader participation in its social, educational and cultural life.

Every successful industrial nation but our own has put in place a coherent national industrial policy designed to advance, promote, preserve and protect particular industries or groups of industries—new and old, sunset and sunrise—in its own national interest.

We have policies that encourage the flight of American capital overseas, hiding from U.S. taxes, wage rates, and work, health and safety standards.

We export capital to those places in this world where workers are docile, hungry and willing to work for pennies per hour—and there is no end to that supply.

We have a trade policy that operates only on the inbound shipping lanes—and that has produced another record trade deficit this year—and a loss of nearly 3 million jobs.

Do the bankers make foolish loans to tin-horn dictators of the right and left? Never fear, the banks will be bailed out.

When the Continental Bank of Chicago went bust, a handful of government officials were able to put together a fast rescue operation that makes the United States the major owner of the bank.

But when Chrysler nearly went belly-up, and hundreds of thousands of jobs were at stake, it took an act of Congress and some mighty heavy lobbying to provide only guarantees for new loans to save the company.

AMERICA STILL has a choice. We can continue to allow other industrial trading nations and the less-developed world to dictate our economic future, a future in which working Americans will see their incomes and living standards decline.

We can become a nation of paper-shufflers, launderers and fast-food dispensers, dominated by a small group of very rich financial institutions which owe their loyalty only to making bigger profits.

Or, we can establish a sensible industrial policy, coordinated with a rational trade policy, whose first priority is the creation of new, well-paid jobs and the securing of a broad middle-class of working men and women.

That is what is at stake in November. And if not enough Americans understand that today—if too many are distracted by Mr. Reagan's soothing happy talk and circus politics—then our job is to make them understand.

Our job is to push the real issues to the forefront. Our job is to educate.

Older Americans worse off than they were 4 years ago

By Press Associates, Inc.

The past four years of Reagan cuts in domestic programs have had a serious impact on a very vulnerable part of the population—America's 26 million elderly.

A major research survey, titled "Broken Promises: A report on the state of the elderly during the Reagan Administration," includes a state-by-state breakdown of what has happened to programs serving older Americans since 1981. It was released at a Washington news conference by the National Council of Senior Citizens and the State, County & Municipal Employees.

The report listed $24 billion in cuts in programs including Medicare, social security, meals to the elderly, food stamps, senior housing, transportation and legal services. The cuts over four years added up to an average $900 for each person age 65 or over.

A sample of program cuts in 10 states:

California—As in every state, the largest dollar cuts were in Medicare, $1.4 billion, and social security, $778 million, part of cutbacks totaling $2.4 billion. In addition, 12.5 million fewer meals were served to the elderly under the federal food commodities program. Also, 96,006 elderly lost Medicaid coverage, and 8,096 fewer seniors received food stamps.

Trims in Florida

Florida—$1.4 billion in cuts included $836 million from Medicare and $524 million from social security. Some 8.8 million fewer meals were served; 18,526 seniors lost Medicaid coverage, and 12,604 fewer elderly received food stamps.

Illinois—Cuts totaling $1.2 billion included $652 million from Medicare and $423 from social security. Also, 5.8 million fewer meals were served; 12,830 elderly lost their Medicaid, and 17,722 were removed from the food stamp rolls.

Michigan—Cuts of $959 million included $537 million in Medicare and $341 million in social security. The cutbacks included 7.1 million fewer meals for seniors; 15,277 cut from Medicaid and 17,362 removed from the food stamp rolls.

Missouri—Cuts totaling $542 million included $298 million in Medicare cutbacks and $194 million from social security. Further, 4.3 million fewer meals were served to the elderly; 11,539 lost Medicaid coverage, and 6,621 fewer seniors received food stamps.

New Jersey—$812 million in cuts included $432 million in Medicare and $306 million in social security benefits. In addition, 4.1 million fewer meals were served; 10,155 elderly lost Medicaid coverage, and 8,452 fewer received food stamps.

New York hit hard

New York—$2.3 billion in cuts in programs serving the elderly included $1.1 billion in Medicare and $714 million in social security. It included 15 million fewer meals served to senior citizens; 62,437 stricken from the Medicaid program, and 29,834 fewer get food stamps.

Ohio—Cuts totaling $1.1 billion included $566 million in Medicare benefits and $396 million in social security benefits. It aso included 5.2 million fewer meals served to old people; 15,316 who lost Medicaid coverage, and 18,521 who lost eligibility for food stamps.

Pennsylvania—$1.5 billion in elderly program cutbacks included $788 million from Medicare and $522 million from social security. It included 7 million fewer meals served to seniors; 21,617 who lost their Medicaid, and 17,570 fewer food stamp recipients.

Texas—Cuts amounting to $1.2 billion included $641 million in Medicare benefits and $407 million in social security benefits. Cuts also included 9.3 million fewer meals served the elderly; 39,616 who lost Medicaid coverage, and 19,863 fewer getting food stamps.

Having suffered large cutbacks in programs vital to their health, welfare and dignity, senior citizens understand that today they are worse off after four years of Ronald Reagan.

Disneyland pickets

Strike by 1,800 Disneyland workers continues at the Anaheim, Calif., amusement park. The workers, resisting a pay freeze and elimination of health and welfare fringes for new hires, are members of five unions—the Bakery & Confectionery Workers, Hotel Employees & Restaurant Employees, Service Employees, Food & Commercial Workers, and the unaffiliated Teamsters. In the third week of the strike, the California supreme court lifted a curb on picketing.

Open to organizing

White-collar discord shows sharp increase

White-collar workers are growing increasingly unhappy with the way their companies are managed and the unrest could bolster union organizing, a management consulting firm is warning its clients.

Opinion Research Corp. said that in studies of attitudes of middle managers, supervisors, professionals, clericals and hourly workers, it found that across the board over the last ten years, these white-collar employees have been steadily lowering the marks they give employers.

Among the most discontented are clerical workers, making them a "prime target for union organization," the consulting firm said.

ORC based its conclusions on studies of the attitudes of about 250,000 employees at some 200 firms. The survey compared employee attitudes in the periods 1970-74, 1975-79 and 1980-84. Many of the sharpest drops have occurred since the mid-1970s.

Organizing aid

Although ORC's purpose in making public its findings is clearly to alert its business clients of the potential for organizing among their employees, the results are beneficial to the growing number of AFL-CIO unions representing and serving office, technical and professional workers.

The survey, titled Supervision in the 80's: Trends in Corporate America, found that only 49 percent of the clerical workers surveyed rate their firms as "one of the best" or "above average" as a place to work compared to 62 percent five years earlier.

Asked to rate their supervisors, only 46 percent of the clericals rated them "very good" or "good" compared to 54 percent in the earlier period.

The office employees were even more critical of the top managers with only 36 percent giving them highest marks compared to 50 percent in mid-1970.

Only 44 percent of the clericals surveyed currently believe their supervisors deal fairly with all employees, and only 21 percent think their companies apply policies and rules the same way to all employees. Both percentages are down significantly from 1975-79.

Poor outlook

Only 19 percent of the clerical workers questioned—down from an already low 25 percent five years ago—rate their chances of advancement as "very good" or "good."

Clericals are increasingly discontented with their pay. In the most recent period studied, only 45 percent gave their firms the highest ratings, compared to 52 percent in the 1975-79 period. The decline reflects a reversal of what had been improving attitudes since in the 1970-74 period when ORC found that only 34 percent of the clericals were satisfied with their pay.

Clericals are also less happy with benefits, with 67 percent currently giving their firms highest ratings compared to 72 percent five years earlier and 81 percent in the first half of the decade, ORC said.

Another consulting firm, Hay Associates, reported similar concerns over pay.

Hay found an even sharper drop in satisfaction with pay among clerical workers to only 33 percent in 1983 from 60 percent in the mid-1970s.

The firm also noted that dissatisfaction with fairness in pay distribution was widespread among most of the 100,000 managers, professionals and clericals surveyed. Only 20 percent of those workers said they believed their pay levels corresponded to performance levels or to their "merit" as employees.

Federal air controller group votes to merge with AFGE

Leesburg, Va. — Members of the unaffiliated National Air Traffic Controllers Association voted to merge with the American Air Traffic Controllers of the Government Employees.

The merger bolsters AFGE's effort to organize controllers nationwide.

NATCA President Jack Crouse said more than 70 percent of the unit's members at the big control center voted to merge with the AFGE council. The center, 35 miles west of Washington, employs 308 controllers and about 100 supervisors.

Crouse said at a news conference that he was pleased with the unit's vote "to join with the rest of the nation and organize as part of" the AATC.

"It has become clear," he said, "that the Federal Aviation Administration is going to continue to meet with the airline groups in an attempt to expand the capacity of the air traffic system without seeking input from the controllers who must deal with that traffic on a constant basis."

AFGE President Kenneth T. Blaylock welcomed the unit's decision "to join the efforts by air traffic controllers all across this country to organize a bargaining representative under the AFGE banner."

The AFGE controllers' council announced in July that the union had already begun filing petitions with the Federal Labor Relations Authority for elections to represent controllers at a number of facilities.

Prior to the merger, NATCA had filed to represent employees at the Leesburg center.

David Kushner, organizing director for AFGE, said the union has filed 16 petitions for representation elections nationwide, with three more petitions ready for filing and campaigns are underway to gain signatures on representation petitions at 13 other facilities.

Kushner pointed out that while federal labor law requires unions to get signatures from 30 percent of the employees of the facility on an election petition, "many of the petitions we've filed have had signatures from 75 and 80 percent."

The FAA, which employs the nation's 13,500 controllers, has asked the FLRA to determine that AFGE must have a "nationwide" unit of controllers — which would require a petition signed by 30 percent of all 11,400 of the air traffic controllers. The federal labor agency is expected to decide the issue this month.

Air traffic controllers have been without union representation since 1981 when members of the Professional Air Traffic Controllers Organization (PATCO) struck and were fired by President Reagan. The union was later decertified.

Fatal grain elevator blast linked to safety rule delay

The need for an effective federal grain dust standard has been underscored by a Sept. 19 grain elevator explosion in Knoxville, Tenn., which killed three workers and injured 11, Robert Harbrant, president of the AFL-CIO Food & Allied Service Trades Dept., said. The workers were members of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union.

In a letter to Assistant Labor Sec. Robert Royland, head of the Occupational Safety & Health Administration, Harbrant noted that the Con Agra blast in Knoxville was the 13th such explosion this year. He urged OSHA officials to "launch an immediate and thorough investigation into the cause of this workplace tragedy."

Harbrant charged that "this tragedy serves as yet another cruel reminder of the consequences of a White House that caters to special interest politics." He noted that after years of inaction, OSHA issued a proposed standard which was watered down by the White House Office of Management & Budget to suit the industry's special interest.

The proposed standard gives the industry a choice of methods of controlling the volatile dust accumulations, including sweeping, while dropping the option of setting a maximum limit on dust accumulation.

OSHA now projects that it will issue a final standard by next spring.

Harbrant's statement noted that in Australia, which has strict controls on grain dust accumulation, there has been only minor explosion in 60 years. This compares to the U.S. record of 374 explosions which killed 205 workers and seriously injured 814 over the past 26 years.

Texas project aids laid-off workers

Beaumont, Tex.—The Human Resources Development Institute has joined with the Texas Employment Commission in helping workers displaced by plant closings and cutbacks return to the workforce.

The joint project, started in mid-September, provides a wide array of re-employment and support services through a one-step worker assistance center in Beaumont, tailored to the needs of long-term workers who have faced a sudden job loss.

HRDI, the federation's training and placement arm, worked closely with the Texas AFL-CIO in planning the program and seeking funding to support its services. As a result of these efforts, Texas Gov. Mark White awarded the program $200,000 in employment funds under provisions of the Job Training Partnership Act.

A first priority for the project will be working with the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers, Electrical Workers, and Office & Professional Employees in planning assistance for some 1,400 workers who will be laid off from the Port Arthur, Tex., refinery of Texaco, Inc., over the next few months.

In other services to laid-off union members, HRDI conducted two worker assistance workshops in Beaumont. Service Employees Local 706 assisted in a workshop for 110 workers who lost their jobs at the Baptist Hospital, and the Bakery & Confectionery Workers aided in another session for 40 workers displaced by a layoff at the Rainbo Bread Company.

Main goal

"Our overriding goal is to demonstrate what can be accomplished by integrating the resources . . . concerned with serving dislocated workers," HRDI Executive Director Mike Arnold said. "This joint project is the first JTPA program administered directly by HRDI."

The close cooperation of the Sabine Area AFL-CIO, the Building & Construction Trades Council and the Texas AFL-CIO strengthened the project's ability to assist laid off workers in the Beaumont, Orange and Port Arthur areas, Arnold said.

The joint project, coordinated by Manuel Zamora, HRDI's regional representative, provides outreach, counseling and job search services, while the local employment offices aid in job placement and training referrals. The center's services are augmented by assistance from community groups, local unions and employers.

The key program services include:

- Thorough assessment, using methods developed specifically for dislocated workers, to identify skills that can be transferred to other occupations.
- Job search assistance, including classroom training to equip participants with the skills to conduct effective job searches.
- Response to emergency needs, using a special fund to pay for such essentials as health services or expenses necessary to start a new job.

SEIU wins new contract for 1,150 licensed nurses

Minneapolis—Members of Service Employees Local 113 ratified a new three-year agreement with Health Employers, Inc., which represents 17 Minneapolis-St. Paul, Minn. area hospitals. The agreement covers 1,150 licensed practical nurses.

The contract, which runs through Sept. 30, 1987, provides hourly pay increases of 4.5 percent the first year, and 4 percent in each of the final two years. Monthly pension benefits will increase from $6 to $8 and tuition reimbursement was improved. Shift differential pay increases from 43 cents per hour under the previous contract to 50 cents by the third year of the new agreement.

Reagan hit on latest anti-worker appointment

By James M. Shevis

President Reagan's recess appointment of Rosemary Collyer as general counsel of the National Labor Relations Board "is consistent with the Administration's contempt for employee rights in general and the right to organize in particular," the AFL-CIO charged.

Reagan announced the appointment even though Collyer, 38, failed to win confirmation of the Senate before it adjourned for the year Oct. 12. Senate Democrats had blocked confirmation after organized labor cited Collyer's inexperience and anti-union bias.

Reagan has used the same tactic in getting other appointees into office, most recently in the case of Robert A. Rowland's recess appointment in July as head of the Occupational Safety & Health Administration.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue said Collyer's record is in line "with the background and habits of the Administration's first three appointees to the NLRB"—Chairman Donald Dotson and Members Patricia Diaz Dennis and Robert Hunter.

Collyer's appointment is effective until Congress meets again in January. At that time, it may be extended through the first session of the new Congress, which would last through December 1985, while the Senate again considers the nomination. The White House said that if Reagan wins reelection he will renominate Collyer.

Reagan originally named Collyer to the $69,600-a-year job last April when the four-year term of William A. Lubbers ended. The nomination languished in the Senate because of strong labor opposition to it. The Senate Labor & Human Resources Committee had not even brought the nomination to a vote when Congress disbanded last week.

Because Acting General Counsel Wilford W. Johansen's temporary appoint-

Mondale narrows gap as voter shifts reshape campaign

By David L. Perlman

The presidential election is wide open and volatile as the candidates prepare for their second debate, political analysts are finding.

Walter Mondale's come-from-behind campaign has muddled the polls and caused millions of voters to take a second look at the candidates and issues. A lot of them, apparently, are still making up their minds.

Opinion samplings found a shift to Mondale after the first presidential debate, with a significant bloc of traditional Democrats returning to the party fold. A tracking poll found that among the same group of respondents support for Mondale increased just after the first debate and increased still further the following week.

A mid-October Washington Post-ABC poll showed Reagan still with a substantial lead, but found one-third of the voters "less than certain" of their choice. A large share of the "soft" Reagan voters said they have a favorable opinion of Mondale and think that he would be more likely than Reagan to keep the United States out of war.

Final debate

The foreign policy debate on Oct. 21 gives President Reagan a probable last chance to erase the public memory of the first debate, when he appeared confused and ignorant against a forceful and competent challenger.

Republican apologists explained that the President had been force-fed too many facts before the first debate, and promised that the error wouldn't be repeated. For the second debate, they said, he would take the offensive—armed, presumably, with rhetoric rather than facts.

Vice President Bush took the attack in his debate with Geraldine Ferraro, scoring points with those already committed to the Reagan-Bush ticket, but leaving a trail of dubious assertions and allegations that put him on the defensive for the better part of a week.

As an example, Bush insisted that Mondale and Ferraro had said the Marines killed in the destruction of the U.S. Embassy in Lebanon had "died in shame."

Pressed by reporters, Bush first insisted his statement was correct. When the demands for documentation continued, Bush found a statement by Mondale charging that Reagan policies had "humiliated" the

Labor bills approved as Congress adjourns

Labor-supported bills to protect the tax-exempt status of workers' fringe benefits, promote modernization of America's steel industry and close the door tighter against racketeers who prey on unions were among the measures passed in the final days of the 98th Congress.

There's another list, too, of important bills that died with adjournment and will have to begin the legislative route anew when the 99th Congress convenes in January.

This unfinished-business list includes the civil rights bill that the House passed overwhelmingly last June, but the Republican Senate let die. A host of job-creating measures the House passed and the Senate ignored are also on the list, including a domestic content requirement for automobiles. The new Congress presumably will make a fresh start at shaping an immigration bill that will be perceived as both fair and effective—and that can command majority support in the House and Senate.

Congress missed its adjournment deadline by a week, but the delay allowed time to complete action on some measures on labor's agenda.

While the tax-exempt status of long-established fringe benefits is assured through permanent legislation, some newer forms of union-negotiated benefits have had only temporary tax-free status, awaiting a more studied congressional decision on permanent legislation.

Last December, the expiration of temporary legislation made educational benefits provided by employers to workers and dependents subject to tax as if they were part of cash wages. The Auto Workers are among the unions that have negotiated such benefits in many of their contracts.

Democrats look to gain Senate seats

If mid-October projections hold up, this election will diminish the 55-45 Republican majority in the Senate. And if Walter Mondale succeeds in closing the presidential election gap, a Democratic Senate becomes a strong possibility.

One-third of the Senate is chosen every two years and for the first time since 1978, the election arithmetic gives the Democrats an edge. Nineteen seats held by Republicans will be at stake on Nov. 6, to 13 for the Democrats. A 14th Democratic seat has already been retained by Louisiana Sen. J. Bennett Johnston. He won election to his third term on Sept. 29 by receiving more than half the total vote cast in the state's unique and non-partisan open primary.

A five-seat pickup, resulting in a 50-50 tie, would allow the Democrats to organize the Senate if they also won the White House. Geraldine Ferraro, as vice president, would then become the presiding officer of the Senate, able to cast tie-breaking votes. A net gain of six seats would be needed if George Bush were again the vice president.

Important result

Senate elections aren't sporting contests, even though political journalese sometimes gives that impression. A Democratic Senate would mean that Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), with a 94 percent "right" COPE voting record, would become chairman of the Labor & Human Resources Committee. He would replace Sen. Orrin G. Hatch (R-Utah), who was in accord with labor's position on only 9 percent of key votes.

Open seats, where an incumbent is not seeking re-election, are always prime candidates for takeovers.

That's certainly the case in Tennessee, where the personally popular Senate Republican Leader Howard H. Baker, Jr., is stepping down. His seat is the most likely prospect for a Democratic takeover.

It's possible, although less likely, in the Texas seat opened by the retirement of Republican Sen. John Tower, and in the Massachusetts seat being given up by Demo-

Rubber Workers see hope in Mondale election victory

Hollywood, Fla.—Delegates to the Rubber Workers convention voted "no confidence" in the economic policies of the Reagan Administration and called for election of the Mondale-Ferraro ticket.

URW President Milan Stone, in his keynote speech, assailed the Reagan Administration for policies that have hurt working people while favoring the wealthy and corporate interests. He called for election of a president "who will represent all the people, not just the fortunate few."

The delegates to the triennial convention also kicked off a celebration of the URW's 50th anniversary, marking the union's founding on Sept. 12, 1935. Special guests included several URW members who were delegates to the founding convention.

Stone said the union today owes its gratitude to those first members who have "given us so much upon which to build," but the URW "will not rest on the accomplishments of the last 50 years. We will build on them and make the URW an even better union."

The URW and other industrial unions have "gone through some pretty sad times during the last three years," Stone said, citing growing tire and rubber imports and a shrinking domestic industry.

In response, the union has streamlined its operations, while keeping up its services to locals and bargaining a 1982 round of master agreements with the major tire and rubber companies, Stone said.

Stone re-elected

The delegates re-elected Stone by acclamation to a second three-year term. Others unanimously re-elected were Sec.-Treas. Donald C. Tucker and Vice President Joseph J. Johnson.

Also elected were 15 members who serve with the top three officrs on the union's executive board. A constitutional amendment adopted by the convention will reduce the total size of the board to 14 by 1987.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue stressed to the delegates the importance of labor's get-out-the-vote campaign among union members.

With strong support from labor and from the traditional Democratic coalition, the Mondale-Ferraro ticket can win, Donahue asserted.

Convention resolutions condemned the Reagan Administration for gutting the trade adjustment assistance program, and urged adoption of a fair international trade policy that recognizes the concerns of domestic workers.

The delegates underscored their support of auto domestic content legislation in the United States and Canada, and called for adoption of a national reindustrialization policy.

A resolution urged enactment of plant closing legislation that would require employers to face their responsibilities to the workers affected by a closing.

The delegates called for health care cost containment legislation in the U.S. and expressed support for measures to improve the Canadian national health care system.

Other speakers at the convention included Canadian Labor Congress Sec.-Treas. Shirley Carr, AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. President Howard Samuel, Sec.-Gen. Michael Boggs of the International Federation of Chemical, Energy & General Workers, A. Philip Randolph Institute President Norman Hill, and President Hisao Suzuki of the Japanese Rubber Workers Union.

Ford settles, too

UAW approves pact with General Motors

The Auto Workers ratified a new three-year agreement with General Motors providing job security and economic gains for some 350,000 employees in the United States, but UAW members in Canada struck GM operations there after rejecting the firm's latest offer.

Approval of the GM pact covering U.S. workers was announced Oct. 14 just hours after the union arrived at a tentative settlement for 114,000 workers at Ford Motor Co. plants.

The accords with GM and Ford, the nation's two largest auto companies, are closely parallel, providing identical wage and benefit improvements. At both companies, the union won novel job-protection measures such as a job bank to retrain laidoff workers.

UAW President Owen F. Bieber called the job security provisions "far-reaching," and said the pacts provide "significant economic gains immediately and in the years ahead."

The strike of some 36,000 Canadian workers could have an immediate impact on GM's U.S. production because of the close integration of the company's North American operations. Many of the U.S. plants are dependent on Canadian-made parts for GM products.

Different needs

GM's latest offer, patterned after the U.S. settlement, was rejected by the Canadian UAW members because of a difference in perceived needs. They are seeking substantial, up-front, pay increases rather than the strong job security guarantees that were the key to the U.S. agreement.

At Ford, the job security plan, labeled the "protected employee plan," commits the company to provide up to $300 million over six years for the job bank and for continuation of paychecks in the event of layoffs. The amount at GM is larger, $1 billion, because of the larger workforce.

Final results of the union ratification vote on the GM pact showed 57.7-percent approval. There were 138,410 votes cast in favor and 102,528 against.

Meanwhile, the union announced it will ask the Chrysler Corp., to open the current contract covering more than 70,000 workers in the United States. The present agreement is due to expire Oct. 15, 1985.

UAW Vice President Marc Stepp, director of the union's Chrysler Dept., said the decision was made unanimously by the UAW Chrysler National Council.

Job security

"The council identified 'job security' as the primary demand in seeking a new contract," Stepp said. "A new nine-person negotiating bargaining committee has been elected, and given a mandate to seek a new contract that puts Chrysler back into the pattern with GM and Ford."

Agreements with Chrysler have deviated from the pattern since 1979 because of the automaker's perilous financial condition. But the firm has recovered and improved its position in recent years.

Aside from the difference in the amounts the companies agreed to put up for their respective job security funds, the only variances between the Ford and GM contracts have to do with seniority and plant closings.

At Ford, workers with one year's seniority as of Sept. 15 who are laid off will have no break in their seniority rights. Ford also agreed not to close any of its plants during the next three years. Both GM and Ford had agreed to such a moratorium in their last contracts, but the provision was not renewed in the GM pact.

Wage increases at Ford are the same as at GM—one pay raise at the start of the contract averaging 2.25 percent, followed by lump-sum payments equal to 2.25 percent of annual pay in the second and third years. The agreement also continues cost-of-living adjustments and a profit-sharing program.

The union's 160-member Ford bargaining council, made up of local presidents and plant representatives, approved the new agreement on Oct. 17, paving the way for the rank-and-file ratification vote. Results are scheduled to be announced Oct. 28.

GM is also negotiating with the Electronics Workers on a new agreement to cover some 24,000 employees represented by the union at seven U.S. plants.

Output drop raises recession fears

A sharp six-tenths of 1-percent decline in the nation's industrial production last month—the first monthly drop in nearly two years—"highlights the fragility of the recovery, and points to the danger that another recession may already have started," the AFL-CIO warned.

Job cutbacks can be expected to follow the drop in output, both the manufacturing and mining industries are being "devastated by a flood of imports encouraged by the overvalued dollar," Federation Research Director Rudy Oswald said.

The Federal Reserve's report on factory output was the second indicator this month to reflect a major setback for the economy, and it was the strongest confirmation yet of a significant slowdown in economic activity.

Earlier, the Labor Dept. report on employment in September showed a loss of 125,000 factory jobs, the biggest decline in nearly two years.

There is no question about the direction in which the economy is headed. Its rate of growth has slowed remarkably this year.

Real, or inflation-adjusted, gross national product fell from a 10.1-percent annual growth in the first quarter of 1984 to 7.1 percent in the second quarter, and to 3.6 percent in the third quarter.

The shrinking GNP is linked to the mounting U.S. foreign trade deficit, which in July ran at an average annual rate of $170 billion. The trade deficit is having devastating impact on American workers. There are 1.3 million fewer manufacturing jobs than in 1979, attributable largely to the surge of imports from low-wage countries and the strong U.S. dollar.

The economic slowdown has been a factor in the decision of major banks to lower their prime lending rate from 12.75 to 12.5 percent. The prime rate is the interest banks charge their most favored corporate customers.

The September drop in factory output followed an almost negligible one-tenth of 1 percent gain in August. The production declines were spread throughout the economy. Manufacturing output fell seven-tenths of 1 percent, with production of durable goods down eight-tenths of 1 percent and nondurable production down four-tenths of 1 percent.

Among the categories of goods, only business equipment and defense and space items rose.

Inventories up

The Commerce Dept. also reported that business inventories expanded eight-tenths of 1 percent in August, partly reflecting a slowdown in sales.

Although housing construction showed an 8.9-percent rise in September the increase did not entirely make up for August's steep 12.3-percent loss. September building starts—the best indication of builders' intentions for the future—continued their downward trend, slipping 5.4 percent after a 3.8-percent decline in August.

The department also reported rising retail sales and falling wholesale prices in September, probably the only bright spots in the economic picture. Sales rose 1.6 percent over the month while wholesale prices fell a seasonally adjusted two-tenths of 1 percent.

Disneyland strike ends as 5 unions ratify pact

Anaheim, Calif.—Members of five unions at Disneyland ratified a new contract with the amusement park, ending a three-week strike.

Employees covered by the master service agreement voted 696 to 292 to accept the settlement and end the walkout that began Sept. 25, the first strike by the unions in 29 years.

Negotiators reached agreement after management dropped demand for benefit concessions and agreed to limit subcontracting to no more than 10 percent of the work performed by Disney workers.

The unions agreed to a two-year wage freeze, turning aside the company's earlier demand for a three-year freeze.

The 1,800 employees covered by the master agreement—janitors, ride operators, ticket sellers, ticket takers, retail clerks and candymakers—are members of the Bakery, Confectionery & Tobacco Workers, Hotel Employees & Restaurant Employees, Service Employees, Food & Commercial Workers and the unaffiliated Teamsters.

Voter shifts reflect gains for Mondale

United States in the Middle East. Bush said his accusation was valid because one of the dictionary definitions of humiliation is shame.

Bush denied in the debate Ferraro's charge that he had said a nuclear war was "winnable" by the United States. But it turned out, the Los Angeles Times had not only a transcript, but an actual tape of the 1980 interview in which Bush said exactly that.

Mondale, meanwhile, picked Stanford University in Reagan's home state of California for a prelude to the foreign policy debate. To a cheering audience, Mondale quoted past Reagan attacks on President Kennedy for not taking "the final step in Cuba," on President Johnson for "not threatening the use of atomic bombs in Vietnam," on President Nixon for signing the SALT I and anti-ballistic missile treaties, and on President Ford for what Reagan termed "bowing and scraping" before the Soviet Union.

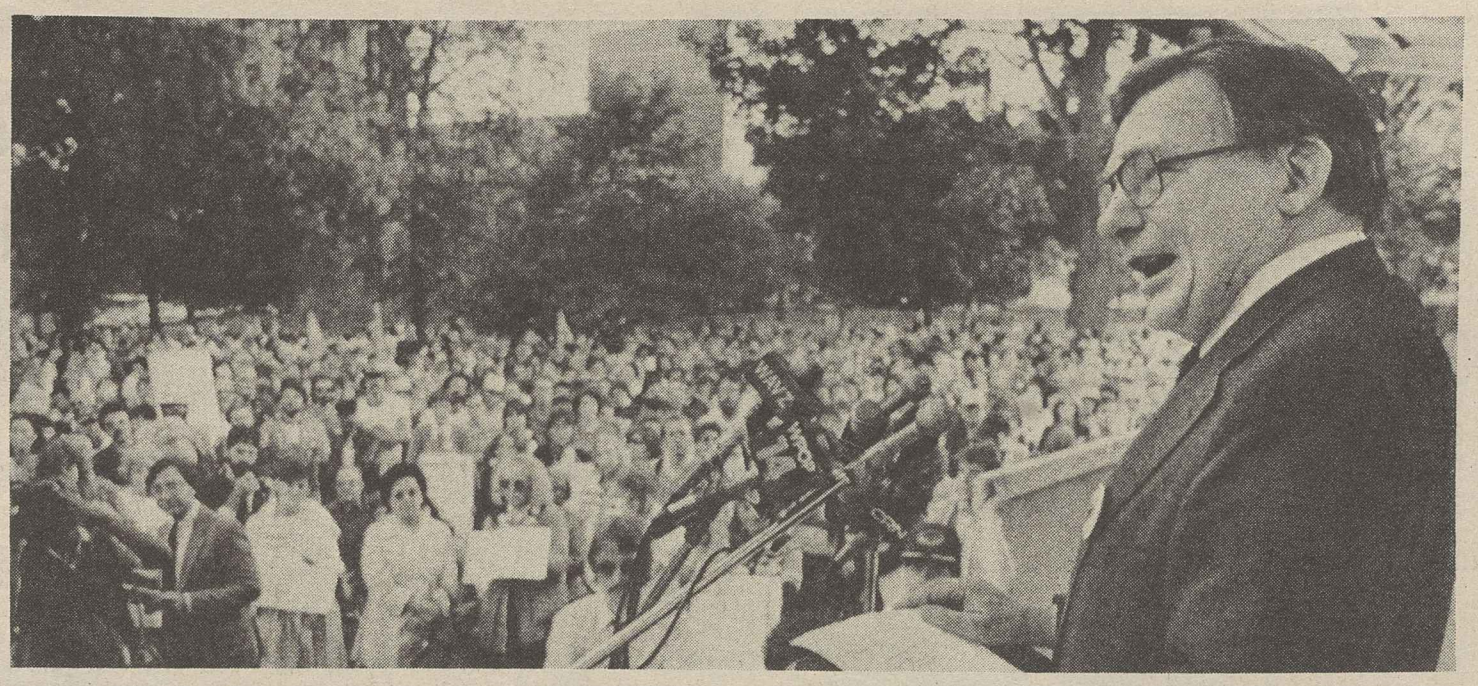
Focus on California

Mondale and Ferraro both have scheduled substantial campaign time in California, the most populous state with 47 electoral votes. The shrinkage of Reagan's lead in his home bas has exceeded the rate in most other states.

Other prominent Democrats were making their voices heard in support of Mondale's candidacy. His chief primary rival, Colorado Sen. Gary Hart introduced Mondale at the Stanford rally. And Massachusetts Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, a crowd-gathering star on the campaign trail, spent three days touring Texas and will visit 20 states by Election Day.

Reagan, who often invokes the memory of John Kennedy and other Democratic presidents, was a leader of a Richard Nixon campaign committee in the 1960 election.

With authority, the Massachusetts senator tells his audiences that Reagan "has no right to quote John Fitzgerald Kennedy." Let him quote Nixon instead, he suggested.



Lane Kirkland addresses massive strike rally for Yale University workers seeking a fair settlement.

Kirkland stresses 'moral urgency' in Yale University fairness battle

New Haven, Conn.—Striking clerical and technical workers at Yale University —members of Hotel Employees & Restaurant Employees Local 34—maintained a united stance in their battle for a first contract, despite a breakdown in negotiations as the walkout enters its fourth week.

The strikers' spirits were bolstered by a massive rally at which AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland called their job action a "moral urgency" in the battle against economic discrimination at the Ivy League school.

Kirkland told the strikers and their supporters, the issue is "fairness," and the effect of the victory here will be felt "in workplaces all across this land."

"Your strike is not just about better wages. It's about a system that has, for too long, denied female and black workers equal pay for equal work," he stressed.

Local 34 represents some 2,600 secretaries, telephone operators, computer programmers and other clerical-technical workers. More than 80 percent are women, and 17 percent are minorities.

Kirkland criticized the university's administrators for assuming that their institution should be treated differently than private corporations. "University presidents typically urge us to take the responsible and long view of things, but they show us that they can be as narrow-minded and obsessed with the bottom line as any president of a corporation," Kirkland pointed out.

The workers are seeking a pay increase of 29 percent over three years, citing the traditional underpayment of wages to female-dominated jobs.

HERE Local 34 chief negotiator John Wilhelm, a Yale graduate, said the school has "taken advantage of a societal tendency to underpay women and minorities, and we are asking them to change that."

Offer rejected

Local 34 members voted down Yale's final offer which the union said offers only 18 percent in increases over three years.

The university's hard-nosed stance has fueled community, faculty and student support for the workers. Professors and students are holding some 600 of the university's 1,000 classes off campus as a protest.

At an Oct. 5 "silent" protest on the street in front of Yale President A. Bartlett Giamatti's home, 191 members of Local 34 were arrested on disorderly conduct charges.

Local 34 negotiator Deborah Chernoff said the union members "felt they had to sacrifice part of their personal liberty in order to make their point."

At the last bargaining session—the local's 75th meeting with the administrators —the university modified its "final offer," but failed to increase the size of the total package.

The local's negotiators equated that to "moving around the furniture. You can put the couch against this wall or that, but it's still a couch. We received the options on how to shift around the same dollar amount."

The average annual pay for the unit is $13,424. The union is seeking a system with 17 steps in each pay grade, based on longevity, coupled to the 29 percent increase over three years and a quarterly cost-of-living adjustment of 50 percent of the rise in the government's consumer price index.

Corporations cash in on tax cut—128 pay none

Corporations are making a mockery of federal income tax laws by capitalizing on the 1981 Reagan tax bill to avoid paying their fair share, a new study charges.

A survey of 250 major U.S. companies conducted by Citizens for Tax Justice reveals that 51 percent—128 of the companies—paid no federal income taxes at all in at least one of the three years since enactment of the Reagan tax measure. Some actually made money off the tax system.

"Back in the 1950s and 1960s, the corporate income tax supplied one-fourth of all federal government revenues," the study observes. "By 1983, that figure had dropped to 6.2 percent."

The study by the Washington-based coalition of citizen and labor groups points out that the decline of the corporate tax began with the adoption of the investment tax credit in the 1960s, and continued into the 1970s as Congress adopted one new loophole after another in response to corporate lobbyists.

But the largest single loophole for corporate taxes came in 1981 with passage of President Reagan's tax "relief" bill.

The Reagan measure created a new system of fast writeoffs for business investments in plant and equipment. The Accelerated Cost Recovery System (ACRS) opened massive new possibilities for legalized corporate tax avoidance, said Robert S. McIntyre, author of the report and the coalition's director of tax policy.

"It's clear, when over half the companies surveyed—all enormously profitable companies—are paying taxes at rates lower than the average American family, that American business is no longer paying its fair share of the tax load," he said.

"As a result, we're witnessing the largest federal budget deficits ever and our nation's families are being asked to pick up the tab."

According to the congressional Joint Tax Committee, the average effective tax rate on individuals this year is 12 percent.

"Americans are wondering why the federal government is incurring the largest deficits in history even while they are paying the highest taxes ever, and this study documents one important answer: the demise of the corporate income tax," McIntyre observes.

Tax bite

Titled "Corporate Income Taxes in the Reagan Years: A Study of Three Years of Legalized Corporate Tax Avoidance," the survey notes that the federal tax code states that corporations must pay 46 percent of their income over $100,000 in income taxes.

However, the growth of corporate tax loopholes such as ACRS allows companies to pay taxes at rates far below the statutory 46 percent rate.

According to McIntyre, the difference between 46 percent of the income companies report to their shareholders and the amount they actually pay in taxes represents the cost of corporate tax loopholes—lost revenue that must be offset by taxes on other taxpayers either now or, in the case of funds borrowed because of the deficits, in the future.

The 250 companies in the study paid $41.1 billion in taxes on profits of $291.4 billion over the three years, 1981-83, for an average rate of 14.1 percent.

If the 250 companies had met the full statutory rate on their income, they would have paid an additional $91.4 billion in federal taxes over the three years, "a not inconsiderable contribution to narrowing the federal deficit," the coalition study observed. Some of the highlights:

- General Electric Co., for whom President Reagan used to deliver commercials and host a television program, was the single largest beneficiary of the 1981 legislation.

The giant electrical equipment and appliance manufacturer earned $6.5 billion in pre-tax domestic profits over the three years but paid no federal income taxes in any of the years. Instead, the company was able to claim refunds of $283 million for taxes paid before Reagan took office.

- Six other companies—Boeing, Dow Chemical, Tenneco, Santa Fe-Southern Pacific, Weyerhaeuser and Du Pont—also received net tax benefits in excess of $100 million over the three years despite profits totaling $9.8 billion.

Zero taxes

- Five of the 18 firms paying zero or less in taxes (that is, they received rebates of taxes paid in earlier years or sold "excess" tax benefits)—GE, Boeing, General Dynamics, Lockheed and Grumman—are major Pentagon contractors.

- Twelve of the 250 companies in the survey averaged tax payments of 40 percent or more over the three-year period. The highest-taxed company was Whirlpool Corp., with a rate of 45.6 percent.

- On an industry basis, the highest average tax rates were paid by companies in the tobacco, leisure and personal care, and textile industries.

Court backs APWU on voter drive

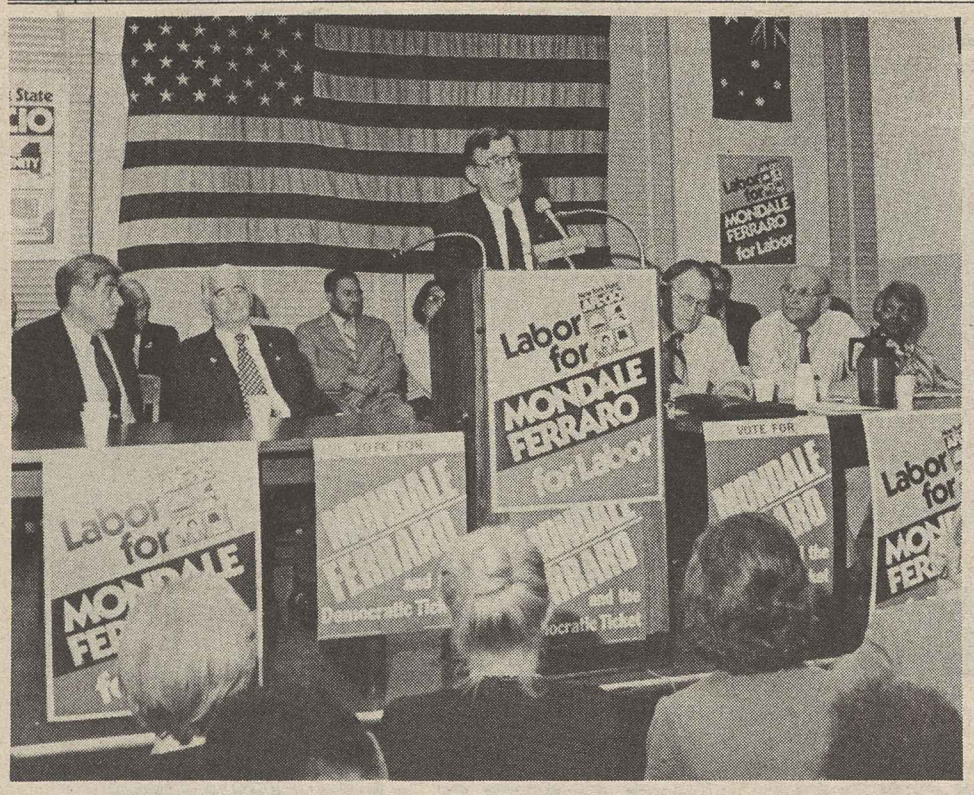
The Postal Workers won a court battle for the right to conduct voter registration campaigns without seeking management's permission, so long as the activity takes place in nonwork areas that are not accessible to the public.

Postmaster Gen. William Bolger had sought to block the union's attempt to get all postal employees registered through a workplace campaign. But the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit backed the union's position and ordered the U.S. Postal Service to rescind its restrictions.

APWU members are now free to register their fellow workers during off-duty hours or on coffee breaks or lunch times in locations such as lounges and employee cafeterias.

With registration deadlines near, APWU President Moe Biller urged locals to undertake an immediate "all-out effort" and to adhere strictly to nonpartisan standards consistent with the Hatch Act.

Locals may also cooperate with voter registration efforts by nonpartisan organizations in public areas and lobbies of post offices where permission for such activities has been given by postal service management.



Federation President Kirkland talks to New York City local union leaders about the election. Sharing the dais are AFSCME Council 37 Director Victor Gotbaum, New York City AFL-CIO President Harry Van Arsdale, AFL-CIO Vice President Frederick O'Neal, State AFL-CIO President Edward J. Cleary, ACTWU Sec.-Treas. Jack Sheinkman and Central Labor Council Treas. Margaret Samuels. The meeting was at ACTWU's local joint board.

Aboard 'Solidarity Van'

Kirkland hits the road to help get out the vote

"We can and we will win in November." That's the message AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland brought to union halls in Connecticut, Massachusetts, New York and New Jersey.

It is the message he is taking into Pennsylvania, Ohio, Michigan, Illinois and Wisconsin on his two-week "Solidarity Van" tour.

The goal is to mobilize support among AFL-CIO members for the Mondale-Ferraro presidential ticket—and for COPE-endorsed candidates for Congress in districts where the votes of union members can make the difference.

They can in the two Connecticut locations where Kirkland spoke on the first day of his tour.

At Hamden, near New Haven, COPE-endorsed Rep. Bruce Morrison joined Kirkland for his meeting with local union leaders. Morrison won his first term in 1982 with 49.9 percent of the vote, defeating a Republican incumbent burdened by the Reagan recession. The rematch this year looms just as close, and the labor turnout can be decisive.

In Waterbury, Republicans have targeted COPE-endorsed incumbent Democrat William Ratchford in a district that Reagan carried by 50,000 votes in 1980. With Ratchford at the Waterbury meeting was the Democratic challenger in the New Britain area congressional district, Arthur House. The Republican incumbent, Nancy Lee Johnson, won narrowly two years ago but is no shoo-in.

One-on-one approach

At these and the other stops, Kirkland spoke to shop stewards, business agents, local union officers—the men and women who symbolize "the union" in the workplaces.

He talked to them of the importance of the election—and the importance of their efforts.

"Make a direct one-on-one approach to as many union members as you can possibly reach," Kirkland urged.

"Your members know you and you know them. . . . They can't talk back to a leaflet. If a member has reservations or questions about our position, the member is entitled to an answer.

"We respect our members. They're not robots. They're thinking men and women who are pulled and hauled by a variety of influences in our society," Kirkland stressed. But "our case is strong" and if it's presented effectively, "we're going to have them with us."

The van, an office-on-wheels, moved on to New York after a stop at the Pioneer Valley Central Labor Council in Springfield, Mass. There was a rally in Albany, a turnoff from the New York State Thruway to meet with union leaders in Kingston, and a meeting with a large turnout of New York City union leaders at the headquarters of the Clothing & Textile Workers local joint board.

At West Caldwell, N.J., Operating Engineers Local 68 was the host; in Neptune, N.J., the town's labor leaders crowded into the union hall of Laborers Local 343. The Electrical Workers Local 269 hall was the site for the Trenton meeting.

Kirkland talked to unionists, listened to them, and over and over stressed the importance of the election to America's workers.

"A vote for Ronald Reagan is a vote for the worst enemies of working men and women," he declared.

Congress links steel support to modernization, retraining

Congress sent a union-supported message to both the Reagan Administration and the nation's steel companies in a trade bill passed shortly before adjournment.

The legislation is designed to give the Administration the authority to enforce any bilateral agreements on export restraints that it might negotiate with countries where a surge of steel shipments to the United States has been based on unfair trade practices.

Reagan position

When President Reagan last month rejected recommendations of the U.S. International Trade Commission for quotas and tariffs to curtail fast-mounting steel imports, he said he will ask countries chiefly responsible for the import surge to agree to voluntary restraints.

The Administration said its goal was to hold imports to about 20 percent but above the 15 percent sought in legislation pushed by the bipartisan Congressional Steel Caucus. It then asked Congress to give it authority to enforce such voluntary agreements as if the limitation were written into law, thus assuring compliance.

In doing so, Congress included a nonbinding statement that the market share of steel imports should be less than the 20 percent Administration target.

And it directed that as a condition of import relief, steel companies use their assets for modernization and worker retraining—goals sought by the Steelworkers.

The little-noted measure was the closest approach Congress has taken in the direction of an industrial policy strategy, which has long been urged by the trade union movement.

As a condition of any import relief, it requires major steel companies that have gone through significant layoffs to put aside not less than 1 percent of their net cash flow for purposes of worker retraining.

Reagan bypasses Senate in filling key NLRB post

ment automatically ended when Congress adjourned, the NLRB found itself temporarily unable to enforce federal labor laws for the second time in six months.

A similar situation arose in April with the expiration of Lubbers's term, and the White House did not immediately come forward with an interim appointment. The four-day interruption, the first in 17 years at the NLRB, limited the authority of NLRB regional offices to respond to improper firings or other unfair labor practices.

Last summer, Reagan sent his nomination of OSHA chairman Robert Rowland to the Senate just one day before it recessed for the Democratic convention. Three days before the Senate was to reconvene, the White House announced that Rowland would receive a recess appointment enabling him to continue in office through the session of Congress.

The NLRB general counsel's post is one of the most important labor jobs in the federal government. Although the board's policy is set by its five members, the power to enforce federal labor laws by issuing complaints or seeking injunctions rests with the general counsel.

Pro-employer tilt

At Senate confirmation hearings last summer, Donahue warned that the Collyer appointment would worsen the NLRB's already heavy pro-employer tilt. Citing her record as chairman of the Federal Mine Safety & Health Review Commission, Donahue said that whenever the agency was divided Collyer voted for the employer position.

"Collyer has been for restricting the coverage of the Mine Safety Act, for reducing penalties against companies found to have violated safety standards, and for narrowly interpreting and applying mandatory safety and health standards designed to protect workers from injury," Donahue pointed out.

She also has been for "restricting the involvement of workers and their authorized representatives in the administration of the Mine Safety Act," he said.

Collyer's appointment as top legal officer of the NLRB, along with Reagan's three member appointees to the board, fits the pattern of the Administration's "single-minded devotion to employer interests," Donahue charged.

Labor bills beat adjournment clock

And the tax-exempt status of group legal services—an increasingly common worker benefit—was due to expire on Dec. 31.

The Senate approved House-passed legislation that restores the tax-exempt status of educational benefits, up to a maximum of $5,000 in one year. It also approved continuation of the group legal services exemptions. Both fringe benefit tax exclusions will run through Dec. 31, 1985.

The steel modernization measure, linked to authority for enforcement of voluntary agreements by other nations to limit steel shipments to the United States, is described in a separate story above.

A carefully crafted tightening of laws to deal with corruption by persons in responsible positions with unions or union-management trust funds was achieved as part of a crime control bill enacted in the final days of Congress.

The AFL-CIO strongly supported the objectives of the measure and Federation President Lane Kirkland, testifying at congressional hearings, repeatedly stressed that "the trade union movement can only be strengthened" by dislodging corruption. Labor's only concern, he said, is that the law be fair and that honest errors in dealing with intricate government regulations are not made subject to penalties aimed at criminals.

As enacted, the legislation makes persons misappropriating more than $1,000 of union or pension funds guilty of a felony punishable by up to five years in prison and a fine of up to $15,000. Offenses involving less than $1,000 continue to be misdemeanors.

Disbarment from office or responsible position is imposed on conviction of "any felony involving abuse or misuse of such person's position or employment in a labor organization or employee benefit plan to seek or obtain an illegal gain at the expense of the members of the labor organization or the beneficiaries of the employee benefit plan."

Advisory role

The bar from office, which will run for 13 years unless reduced to not less than three years by the sentencing court, also prevents the person convicted from serving as a consultant or adviser to a fund.

Present law is more lenient on the disbarment from office and allows a convicted official to continue in office until all appeals are exhausted.

The new law provides that the salary of such a person be put in escrow for the period between conviction and completion of the appeals process. If the conviction is overturned on appeal, the withheld salary will be paid and the bar on employment will be lifted.

A presidential veto threat forced the abandonment of an attempt to fund long-neglected water projects that had strong bipartisan support. Compromises on defense spending resulted in paring President Reagan's proposed increase from an after-inflation 13 percent to an after-inflation 5 percent. And restrictions on funding for the MX missile will require the new Congress to vote on the issue next March before funds can be spent.

Lobbying was intense in the hectic final days of Congress, and the Air Line Pilots blamed "a massive lobbying blitz" by Continental Airlines for scuttling a measure directing the President to establish a review board to recommend a way to resolve the long labor dispute.

Senate Democrats forced the Republicans to take a "fiscally responsible" position on an Administration-sought bill to raise the federal debt ceiling from $1.573 trillion to $1.824 trillion.

A sizable bloc of Senate Republicans followed their usual pattern of voting against a rise in the debt ceiling needed so that Treasury checks won't bounce, counting on Democratic votes to pass the measure. But Democrats, tired of having the votes used against them by Republican election opponents, voted against the higher ceiling. The bill was defeated and an embarrassed GOP leadership had to send Air Force planes across the country to fetch Republican senators who had left for the campaign trail. The debt ceiling bill then passed, 37-30, and the 98th Congress adjourned.

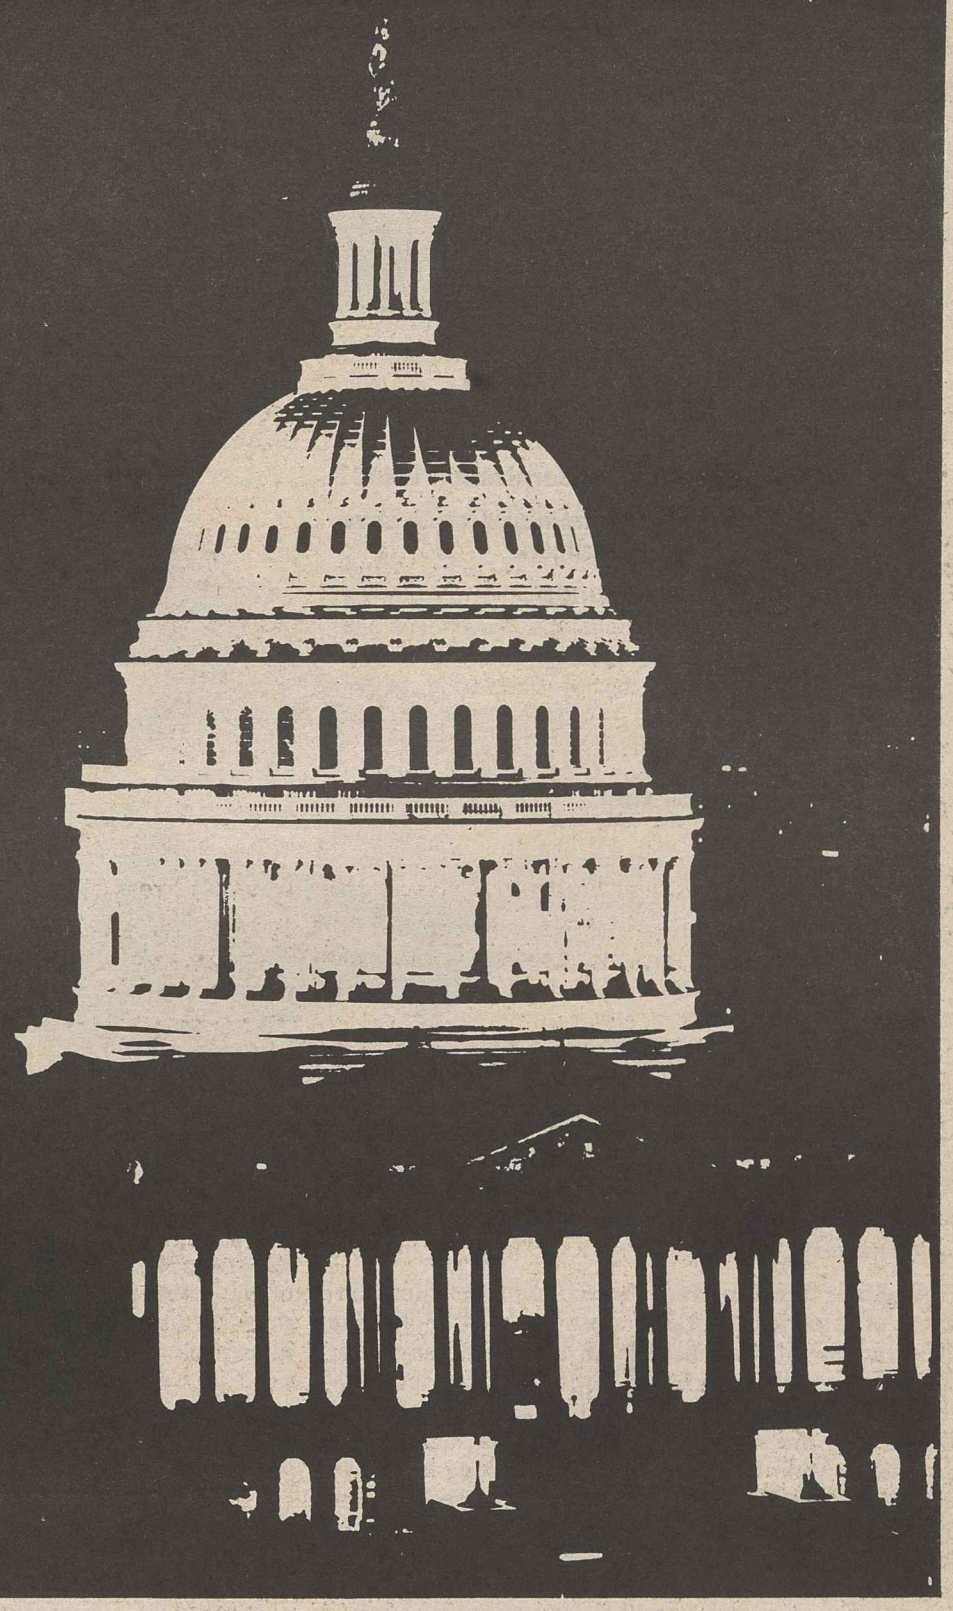
How Congress Voted — A 1984 Scorecard on Workers' Issues



A REPORT ON CONGRESS

IN 1984, legislative inertia replaced legislative achievement in the 98th Congress as the specter of a Ronald Reagan veto hung over Congress, and the Republican-controlled Senate became the burial ground of worker legislation. Despite the best efforts of Democrats and some progressive Republicans in the House of Representatives, Reagan conservatives in the Senate derailed one major legislative initiative after another designed to help American workers. While the Administration's legislative agenda continued to reward the wealthy, the list of Reagan-induced fatalities affecting working Americans continued to grow. These included:

► A bill to provide health care for jobless workers and their families.

► Legislation offering mortgage assistance monies to unemployed Americans facing foreclosure and loss of their homes.

► The domestic auto content bill to help revive the U.S. auto industry and put unemployed workers in scores of other industries back to work.

► A $3.5 billion jobs bill creating 300,000 jobs in the badly needed repair and rehabilitation of local government facilities.

► An increase in training funds for workers made jobless by foreign imports.

► A tax cap to help balance the budget by recovering some of the revenue giveaways in Reagan's 1981 tax ripoff.

In the House, Republican right-wingers blocked action on plant closing protections as well as industrial policy legislation designed to make sense out of U.S. economic policymaking.

As these legislative initiatives bit the dust one after another, Reagan or his GOP congressional allies countered with their own brand of worker "protection" proposals:

► The infamous Hobbs Act amendment to have picket-line incidents made a federal crime.

► A bill to take away the legal right of injured workers to sue when hurt by faulty equipment.

► Balancing the budget on the backs of workers by taxing the value of their fringe benefits, such as health care coverage.

► A plan to strip unions of their First-Amendment right to communicate with their members on political issues.

► A bill to permit legalized wage chiseling through a "pay less" youth subminimum.

► Amendment to weaken "Buy American" requirements in existing federal programs.

► An increase in Medicare costs for retired workers.

► Proposals to repeal the eight-hour work day standard, the ban on industrial homework and the 40-year-old child labor laws.

Senate right-wingers—Hatch, Thurmond, Helms and others—even tried to roadblock a House-passed bankruptcy reform bill which included a provision repealing the Supreme Court's notorious Bildisco decision. That 1984 ruling had given union-busters their biggest break yet by allowing any business the right to misuse the federal bankruptcy law to destroy union contracts. But a full-court press by Washington labor lobbyists coupled with a massive AFL-CIO grass-roots lobbying campaign by union members throughout the country, made the difference. The repeal was pushed through Congress in near-record time and enacted into law.

Thanks to the Democratic majority in the House, only a few of the other conservative attacks on worker rights saw the light of day. But the tug of war between the House and the Republican-controlled Senate widened the gulf between them, and stalemate set in on Capitol Hill.

As a result, only a few key votes emerged from the legislative deliberations in Congress in 1984. Thus, this year's issue of the AFL-CIO voting record is less comprehensive than in years past. The blame for this and the legislative stalemate that plagued the 98th Congress lies squarely with the Reagan Administration and the GOP-controlled Senate whose advocacy of "do-nothing" government helped produce a near-empty legislative record.

For American workers, who stood on the sidelines watching this cruel charade played out, the payback comes on Nov. 6. That's when union members can help set a new tone for America's future by turning thumbs down on the Reagan Administration and those members of the Congress who continue to ignore the needs of America's workers and their families.

That's why this election is the most important faced by organized labor and our membership in decades. No President or conservative bloc of anti-labor Senators has ever so threatened the very existence of our unions and the laws and programs that protect our members. And that's the simple reason why the AFL-CIO has endorsed Walter Mondale and Geraldine Ferraro.

The stakes in the 1984 election are high. Every vote in every union household is crucial to the outcome on Nov. 6.

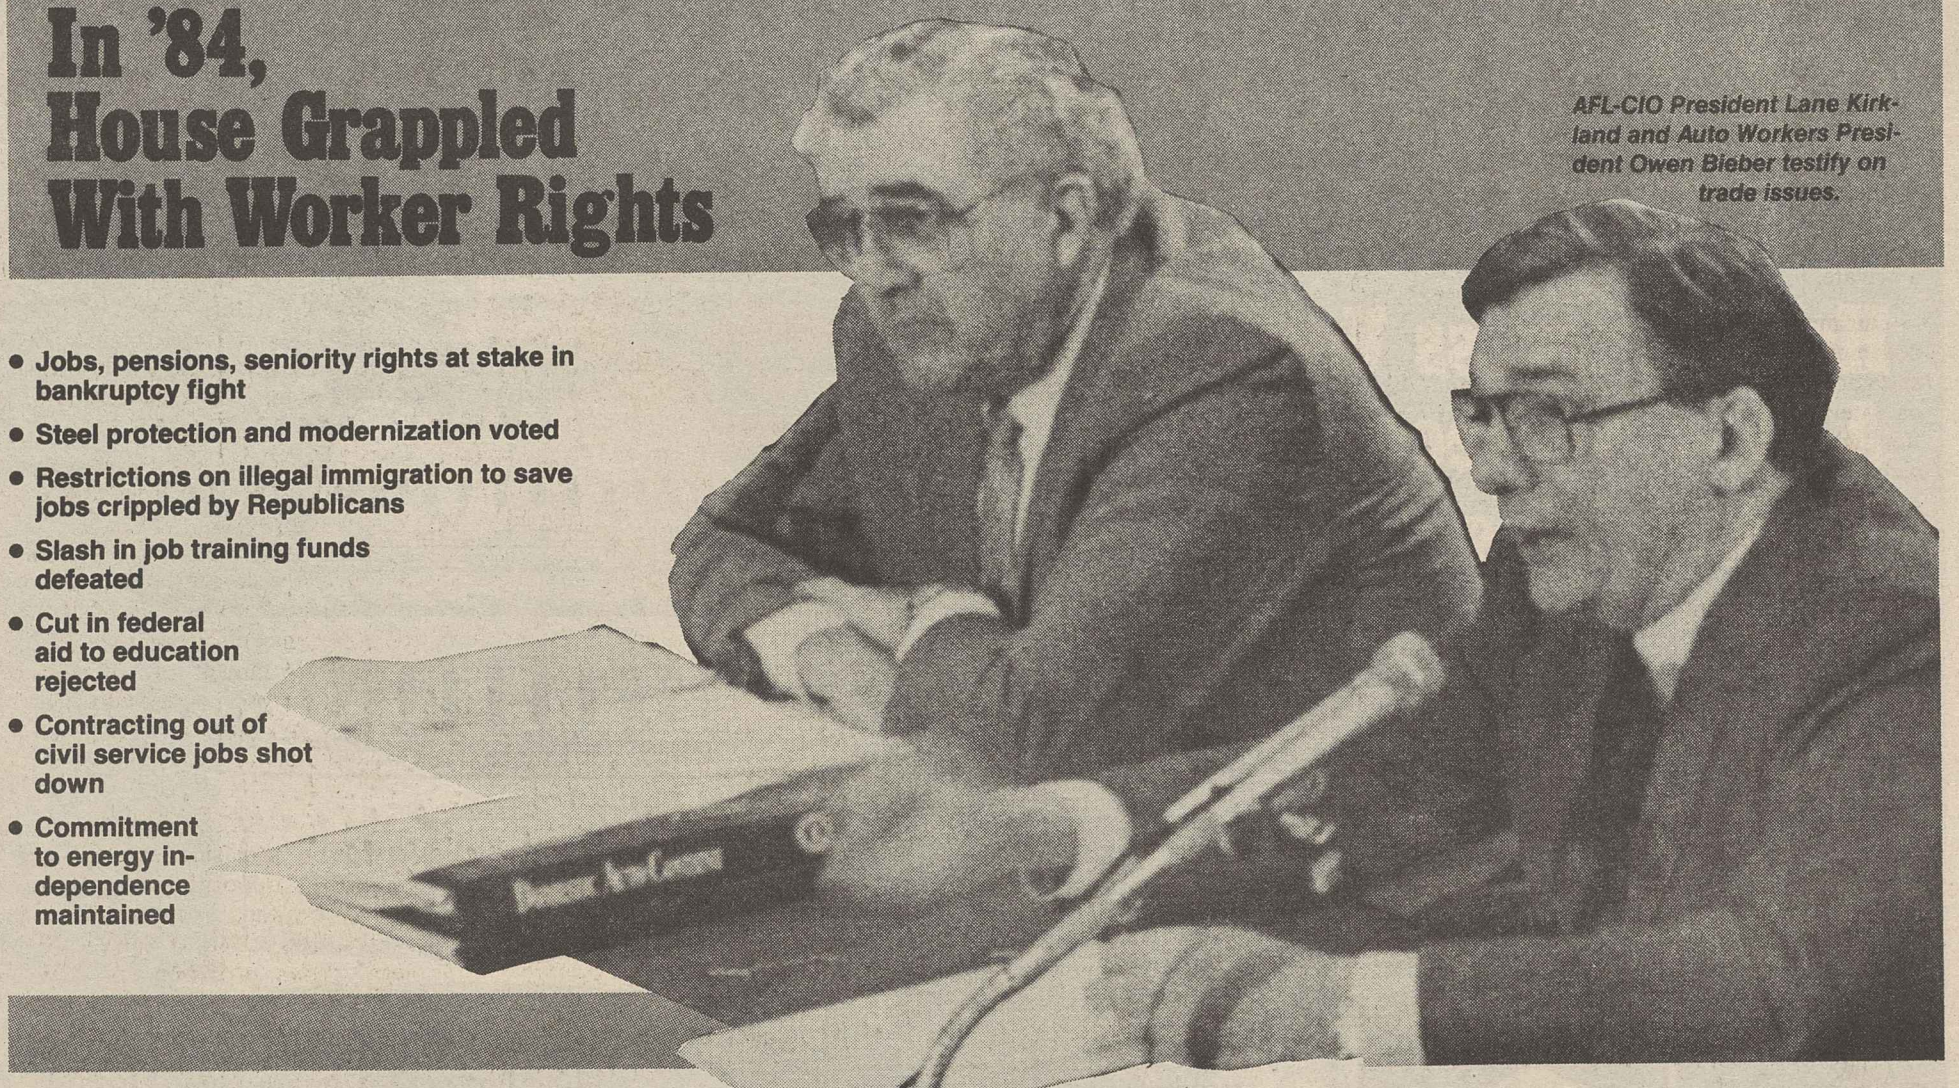
This special section carries labor's 1984 report card on Congress tabulating the votes on major issues of concern to the AFL-CIO in the second session of the 98th Congress.

Congressmen have been judged on 13 key issues—"R-right" or "W-wrong"—on the basis of the position the AFL-CIO took on the legislation. Senators have been rated on 11 key votes.

The tables also include the cumulative voting record and cumulative "right" percentage of each member since election to the House or Senate. With the voting records are brief descriptions of the issues—what the vote was about and its importance to the labor movement and the nation.

Issues of prime importance to labor are the first 6 votes in the House and the first 3 votes in the Senate. In the tabulations they are the votes listed to the left of the rules.

In '84, House Grappled With Worker Rights



AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and Auto Workers President Owen Bieber testify on trade issues.

- Jobs, pensions, seniority rights at stake in bankruptcy fight
- Steel protection and modernization voted
- Restrictions on illegal immigration to save jobs crippled by Republicans
- Slash in job training funds defeated
- Cut in federal aid to education rejected
- Contracting out of civil service jobs shot down
- Commitment to energy independence maintained

1. Corporate Abuse of Bankruptcy Law Threatened to Destroy Worker Benefits

A serious threat to every protection in the union contracts of American workers arose in 1984. Following the example of Continental Airlines, company after company used the bankruptcy law to oust their employees' unions and arbitrarily shred collective bargaining agreements, fire workers, alter work rules, and reduce pay and pension benefits. This union-busting misuse of federal bankruptcy law was sanctioned in February by the U.S. Supreme Court's Bildisco decision. If left intact, this ruling threatened to render worthless the nation's long-standing system of collective bargaining and to undermine union-won benefits like health care, pensions, seniority and work rules.

On the day the court handed down its ruling, the AFL-CIO went to work in Congress to reverse it. The AFL-CIO sought legislation to require a company in financial distress first to obtain the permission of a bankruptcy court before it could modify or reject its collective bargaining agreement. Then, if the company was found to be truly in financial distress, it would have to engage in collective bargaining to reduce pay and benefits only to the extent necessary to save the company. In the process, the company would have to open its books to the workers' representatives, and management would have to assume its share of pay and benefit cuts.

An overwhelming bipartisan majority in both the House and Senate agreed with labor's position. In the House, the collective bargaining protection provision was included as part of a larger omnibus bankruptcy bill. When the bill reached the House floor, the key vote came on the procedural question of the debate rule under which the bill would be considered by the full House. The rule was limited so as to allow only specific amendments. Conservative Republicans, backed by the U.S. Chamber of Commerce and others in the business lobby, attempted to defeat the debate rule in order to get at the collective bargaining safeguard. Their effort was resoundingly defeated by a 242-166 vote on Mar. 21. Later, Congress approved the bankruptcy bill and it was signed into law. The new law not only nullifies the Supreme Court's Bildisco decision and puts a stop to corporate abuse of federal bankruptcy law, but also safeguards the integrity of union contracts by compelling employers to engage in good-faith bargaining over any contract changes necessary to allow the firm to reorganize to stay in business.

2. Trade—Saving U.S. Steel Jobs

Besides record budget deficits, the Reagan Administration's "do-nothing" trade policies bear direct responsibility for a record U.S. trade deficit—projected to be a staggering $125 billion in 1985. This translates into a loss of three million American jobs. Since Reagan took office, the deficit in manufactured goods alone has gone from a $5.3 billion surplus to an $85 billion deficit. While these deficits mounted, the U.S. steel industry continued to be ransacked by foreign imports whose cheaper prices were sustained by a laundry list of unfair trade practices by the exporting countries. Because of this, steel imports captured a record 33 percent of the U.S. market, and steel employment fell to less than 60 percent of 1979 levels.

To stop this economic plunder, the U.S. International Trade Commission—the agency charged with investigating unfair trade practices—recommended quotas and tariffs on imports to help the ailing steel industry. But President Reagan refused to implement these remedies and instead announced he would seek to negotiate "voluntary" import restraints with exporters.

Congress found his response insufficient. On Oct. 3 the House, by an overwhelming 285-134 vote, approved legislation giving the President stronger enforcement powers against unfair steel imports and calling on him to reduce these imports to 17 percent of the U.S. market.

3. Bracero Program—Importing More Foreign Workers

After rejecting amendments to strengthen the immigration bill with respect to limitations on foreign workers, the House turned around and approved an amendment by Rep. Leon Panetta (D-Calif.) to re-establish the discredited "bracero" program. This program, which was killed by Congress in 1964, had permitted the importation of hundreds of thousands of foreign agricultural workers who displaced U.S. farm and migrant workers and undercut American working standards. Bracero workers were subjected to some of the worst cases of exploitation in our nation's history. These abuses were recorded in an award-winning expose by the late Edward R. Murrow in the famous television documentary film, "Harvest of Shame."

Under the Panetta amendment, not only would the bracero program be given new life, but no termination date was set for it. Unlimited numbers of foreign workers would be admitted into the U.S. to do agricultural work. No government determination would be required to certify that there were insufficient domestic workers available to do the work, and few protections would be provided foreign workers coming into the United States. Despite strong opposition by labor, Hispanic, church and public interest groups, the House approved the Panetta amendment by a 228-172 vote on June 14.

4. Protecting U.S. Jobs from Illegal Immigration

The AFL-CIO has long opposed the heavy flow of illegal immigration, which not only undercuts job opportunities for unemployed Americans but undermines U.S. labor standards as well. Illegal aliens, meanwhile, are often the victims of the worst kinds of worker exploitation. To stop the flow of illegal aliens, the primary solution is to remove the lure of employment opportunity, and the only way to accomplish that is to impose tough penalties on employers who hire persons unauthorized to work in the United States.

In 1984, the AFL-CIO pushed for inclusion in the omnibus immigration bill of tough penalties against employers who knowingly hire illegal aliens. While the original legislation contained such penalties, the bill that emerged from the House Judiciary Committee had been substantially weakened. For example, the committee bill failed to require an employer to check the documentation of those hired unless the employer had been notified previously by the Attorney General that it had hired an undocumented alien in its workforce. This would make it nearly impossible to prove that an employer had "knowingly" employed an illegal alien. Further injunctions against employers violating the law were reserved only for special circumstances rather than being a standard remedy for every violation. Finally, the enforcement process itself was so elaborate and time-consuming that a scofflaw employer could stave off any penalty for years.

As a result, when the bill came to the House floor the AFL-CIO backed an amendment by Rep. Gus Hawkins (D-Calif.) to remedy several of the shortcomings. The responsibility for checking a worker's identification was clearly made the duty of the employer. Injunctions were made standard in all cases, and a court procedure was established to expedite the enforcement process. The Hawkins proposal went even further by outlawing discrimination in hiring, recruiting or referring on the basis of a citizen's or legal resident alien's national origin or status as an alien. Despite these improvements, the House, rejected the Hawkins amendment by a 166-253 vote on June 12.

5. Contracting Out of Civil Service Jobs and Public Services

Since 1981 federal government employees have been targeted by the Reagan Administration for massive layoffs, arbitrary cuts in pay, and reduction in job-related benefits. In 1984 conservatives in Congress found still another way to attack federal workers: the contracting out of traditional public services to the private sector. For government, contracting out can often mean higher costs of services, poorer quality of services, decreased accountability by government officials, and increased corruption within government. For government workers, contracting out is a club to be used against them when they seek better pay, benefits or working conditions. Under the Reagan Administration, contracting out has taken many ridiculous forms including the unsuccessful attempt to turn the U.S. Weather Service into a private, for-profit enterprise.

During 1984 the Reagan Administration tried to contract out the administration of 30 Job Corps conservation centers currently managed by the Department of Interior and Agriculture. The Reagan Administration, which views the Job Corps facilities as a commercial activity, tried to turn their operation over to the lowest bidder despite the fact that he program is one of he nation's oldest and most successful federal job training programs.

During debate on a continuing appropriations bill, Rep. Pat Williams (D-Mont.) offered an amendment to prevent contracting out of these services. By a lopsided 242-162 vote, the House overrode conservative Republican opposition and approved the Williams safeguard on Sept. 25. A similar safeguard was also adopted by the Senate.

6. Trade—Restricting Special Import Privileges

The Trade Act of 1974 authorized for a period of ten years the Generalized System of Preferences (GSP), which among other features permits the President to exempt from all tariffs certain items imported from developing countries. GSP imports now constitute about $10.8 billion worth of imports per year, or about 4 percent of total U.S. annual imports. In dollar value, however, the vast majority of GSP duty-free products comes from seven nations. The top three countries—Taiwan, South Korea and Hong Kong—account for 52 percent of total GSP imports in dollar value.

Clearly, these three nations can no longer be characterized as "developing" countries and thus deserving of special access to the U.S. markets at the cost of U.S. workers' jobs. Taiwan, South Korea and Hong Kong now represent the fifth, seventh and ninth largest sources of U.S. imports respectively. As such, they have become major trading countries, exporting more than $26.5 billion worth of goods to the United States alone in 1983. Furthermore, the U.S. trade deficit with these countries alone is expected to reach $19.5 billion by the end of this year. Given their superior trade advantage, the AFL-CIO opposed continuing to give these nations special trade privileges.

During debate on a bill to extend GSP for five more years, Rep. Richard Gephardt (D-Mo.) offered an amendment to strike Hong Kong, South Korea and Taiwan from the list of eligible countries. Despite labor's support for the amendment, the House rejected this important fair trade amendment by a 174-233 vote.

7. Setting Labor Standards for Foreign Workers

Another issue of longstanding concern to the AFL-CIO has been the misuse of the existing "H-2" temporary foreign worker program. This program now allows employers to use temporary foreign workers so long as, in the words of the existing law, "unemployed persons capable of performing such service or labor cannot be found in this country." While complaints about the program abound, since H-2 is administered by the Dept. of Labor, it has remained relatively small in size and protective of the rights of both domestic workers who have priority for the jobs and those foreign workers whose admission has been authorized.

Once again, however, the Judiciary Committee weakened the existing H-2 limitations. The committee bill specifically eliminated the language protecting the preemptive employment right of jobless U.S. workers. It also weakened administrative oversight for H-2 by assigning approval of its regulations to the Attorney General with a significant role to be played by the Secretary of Agriculture.

During debate Rep. George Miller (D-Calif.) offered an amendment that would have: (1) maintained the H-2 program as is; (2) tightened restrictions by insuring that non-agricultural H-2 workers would be admitted only if there were not enough qualified workers available here to perform the work in question and then only if the employment of these workers would not adversely affect American wages and working conditions; and (3) establish a commission to review the H-2 program. Despite strong labor support for the Miller amendment, the House rejected it by a 164-256 vote on June 14.

8. Failure to Reform Immigration Laws

Although the AFL-CIO had maintained a strong commitment to support immigration legislation in 1984, the rejection of both the Hawkins and Miller amendments, followed by the adoption of the Panetta bracero amendment, forced the AFL-CIO to oppose the final House version of the immigration bill. Despite this opposition, the bill was approved by a narrow 216-211 vote on June 20.

9. Saving Job Training/Education Funds from Further Cuts

Another major Reagan budget blitz occurred when the 1985 appropriations bill providing funding for the Departments of Labor and Health & Human Services came to the House floor. Conservatives led by Rep. Bill Frenzel (R-Minn.) offered an amendment to cut funding for both agencies by $1.5 billion despite the fact that the bill was already $421 million less than 1984 funding levels. With nearly nine million Americans still out of work, the amendment would have cut job training funds by $231 million and funds for the summer youth jobs by $55.4 million. Nearly $950 million would have to be cut from federal aid to education programs while another $300 million in medical research would have been erased by the Frenzel amendment. The House rejected this labor-opposed amendment by an overwhelming 276-144 vote on Aug. 1.

10. Preserving America's Goal of Energy Independence

Since the energy crisis of the 1970s, the AFL-CIO has vigorously supported federal policies and legislative remedies aimed at achieving energy independence through prudent energy development, conservation and alternative energy sources. A key element in the development of alternative energy sources includes the enhancement of a viable synthetic fuels program. Synthetic fuels are substitutes for natural gas or petroleum that are made from coal, shale, tar sands and hydrogen from water. The AFL-CIO supported legislation—the Energy Security Act of 1980—that created the Synthetic Fuels Corporation (SFC). The SFC was established by Congress to oversee a multi-billion dollar investment of federal funds in direct loans, loan guarantees, price guarantees and joint venture programs to encourage the commercialization of synfuels technology. This industry has already created badly needed employment opportunities for jobless American workers.

In 1984, during debate on an Interior Dept. appropriations bill, House Republicans led an effort to slash funding for the synfuels program. Rep. Silvio Conte (R-Mass.) proposed an amendment to cut $10 billion from the program. Rep. Bill Ratchford (D-Conn.) countered with a labor-backed compromise to reduce appropriations by only $5 billion. By a 236-177 vote on Aug. 2 the House agreed to the Ratchford amendment and thereby sidetracked the more drastic Conte proposal.

11. Saving Education Funds from Further Cuts

House conservatives, fearing the political consequences of a near $200 billion Reagan budget deficit, again swung their budgetary meat ax in 1984 at domestic social program spending. High on the target list for right-wing conservatives were federal aid-to-education programs. During debate on legislation reauthorizing 11 educational aid programs designed to help disadvantaged students, Rep. William Goodling (R-Pa.) tried to slash these programs by $700 million. However, the Goodling amendment was rejected by a 169-233 vote on July 28.

12. Environmental Protection for Workers and Families

In 1980 Congress recognized that abandoned toxic waste dumps are a major environmental and health hazard. In response, Congress created a "superfund"—a $1.6 billion, five-year, clean-up plan to be administered by the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) in cooperation with affected states and local jurisdictions. Unfortunately, the 1980 legislation failed to include a key provision for victim compensation which had been opposed by Senate Republicans. Now, under the Reagan Administration, the "superfund" clean-up plan has been slowed to a crawl. A major scandal in 1983 over "superfund" mismanagement resulted in massive resignations of the Reagan-appointed EPA hierarchy.

In 1984, Congress considered a five-year reauthorization of the "superfund." The House version again included a key victim-compensation program. A study commissioned by the original 1980 clean-up law found that legal remedies available in state courts to victims of toxic waste were inadequate. The 1984 bill remedied this by permitting citizens to sue in federal court to gain compensation from companies for injuries caused by hazardous wastes, to force actions to clean up a site if the EPA or the states have not taken such action, or to make EPA carry out the provisions of the superfund law.

Once again conservatives led the fight to strike down the victim-compensation provision as they had done in 1980. Despite labor's opposition, the House by a narrow 208-200 vote on Aug. 9 approved an amendment by conservative Rep. Harold Sawyer (R-Mich.) to delete the legal rights provision for toxic waste victims.

13. Promoting Democracy Abroad

Historically, the AFL-CIO has played an important role in the arena of international affairs. The federation not only maintains direct relations with its counterpart labor centers in free countries around the globe, but is directly involved as well in the advancement of trade unions in the developing nations. Since 1962, the AFL-CIO through its regional institutes has contributed enormous resources to unions in developing nations for training in the leadership techniques, basic economics and the practical application of democracy. These institutes have also been directly involved, at the invitation of foreign trade unions and with the cooperation of the national governments, in other activities including vocational training, worker education and construction of cooperatives, medical clinics and housing.

Recognizing the contribution that these activities make to the evolution of democracy abroad, the Congress in 1983 authorized creation of the National Endowment for Democracy. The Endowment is a federally financed, private, non-profit organization whose various activities, such as fostering trade unions in developing countries, are designed to promote democratic institutions. The AFL-CIO, through its Free Trade Union Institute (FTUI), is a participating organization in the Endowment program. In establishing the program, Congress recognized that activities such as advancing trade unions abroad are in the public interest and therefore deserving of public support. In fiscal year 1984, of $18 million appropriated for the Endowment, $11 million went to FTUI for such programs.

In 1984, funding for the Endowment came under attack in both the House and Senate. During debate on the Commerce, Justice, State appropriations bill for FY 1985, the House voted to eliminate the entire $31.3 million appropriation for the Endowment. In the Senate, funding was reduced to $21 million (see Senate Vote No. 4). House-Senate conferees later agreed to a compromise level of $18.5 million. When the conference report came back to the House, Rep. Richard Ottinger (D-N.Y.) announced he would again try to knock out all Endowment funds as he had done before. However, he never got his second chance as the House, by a 237-181 vote on Aug. 8, agreed to a procedural motion offered by Rep. Neal Smith (D-Iowa) to accept the final compromise funding level.

1. Protecting Union Political Rights

Sen. Jesse Helms (R-N.C.), whose 1984 re-election campaign is expected to set a spending record of $20 million, attempted to legislate a sweeping attack on the political spending rights of unions. The Helms amendment would have prohibited unions from using dues money for educational activities, such as voter registration, get-out-the-vote drives and political communications to union members. He would have denied unions the right to finance the cost of political action committees, a right now granted under federal election law to both unions and corporations. The broad reach of the Helms amendment would have applied to both federal and state elections. Further, despite the fact that federal election law treats union and corporate activity equally, the Helms amendment would not have limited in any way the right of corporations to spend their treasury funds for the same activities. The obvious purpose of the Helms amendment was to restrict the right of unions to exercise their First-Amendment right to communicate with their members on political issues, prevent unions from encouraging their members to participate in the democratic election process, interfere in unprecedented fashion with the right of states to enact their own campaign finance rules, and destroy the neutrality of the federal election act with regard to corporate and union treasury spending in federal elections.

Realizing that the Helms amendment was nothing more than an anti-union attack promoted by the National Right to Work Committee, the Senate again rejected the Helms amendment as it had done in 1982. But this time it was rejected by an even larger margin. On May 22, the Senate voted 65-32 for a motion by Sen. Charles Mathias (R-Md.) to table and thus kill the Helms amendment.

2. Restoring Health Insurance for the Unemployed

One of the important recession relief programs pushed by the AFL-CIO was legislation to provide health care benefits for the unemployed. When workers are jobless they usually lose health care insurance. Since most jobless workers are unable to pay the costly premiums for private insurance and are not eligible for Medicaid, they and their families must do without basic medical care.

With more than eight million persons jobless for much of 1984, the AFL-CIO continued to push for a program of health care for the unemployed. During debate on a tax increase bill, Sen. John Heinz (R-Pa.) offered an amendment to make $700 million in federal grants available to the states to provide health care benefits to the long-term unemployed. As it did in 1983, the conservative-controlled Senate rejected this amendment by a 39-57 vote on Apr. 11.

3. Failure to Win Tax Relief for Construction Workers

In 1984 the AFL-CIO backed legislation to permit construction workers to deduct their ordinary and necessary business expenses from their income taxes, just as other taxpayers already do. This tax adjustment was necessary because, under current law, the constraints and limitations on travel and business expenses do not adequately reflect the unique circumstances in the construction trades. As a result, many workers are unfairly treated. Today's construction workers are frequently employed on sites that are far from home. Under current federal income tax law, traveling expenses (including meals and lodging) are deductible if they are incurred while away from home in the pursuit of a trade or business. But such employment must be temporary and expected to last a short period of time. Traveling expenses incurred in connection with employment that is considered to be of indefinite or indeterminate duration generally are not tax deductible. But in the real world of construction, job-related travel expenses do not lend themselves to the distinction between temporary and indefinite employment. Thus, there is uncertainty and inequity in denying these workers an income tax deduction for legitimate costs associated with their jobs.

During Senate debate on a miscellaneous tax bill, Sen. John Melcher (D-Mont.) offered an amendment to incorporate this long overdue tax clarification. Senate Finance Committee Chairman Sen. Robert Dole (R-Kans.) successfully killed the Melcher proposal, tabling it by a 50-31 vote on Apr. 12.

For tabling — Wrong. Against tabling — Right.

4. Fair Corporate Taxes

The corporate share of tax revenues to operate the federal government has fallen from 25 percent in 1960 to 6.6 percent in 1983. Individuals—mostly working families—have had to make up the difference. The largest plunge in big-business tax contributions to the federal government came as a result of the 1981 Reagan tax bill, which cut the effective corporate income tax rate in half at a loss of $170 billion over five years. The corporate tax system is so lopsided now that in 1984, about 90,000 corporations will pay no taxes. Most firms in the chemical industry, for example, not only did not pay taxes in 1983, but received $211 million in refunds or write-offs to reduce future taxes.

To correct this gross inequity, Senators Howard Metzenbaum (D-Ohio) and Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.) during debate on a miscellaneous tax bill offered an amendment to impose a minimal 15 percent tax on corporate profits in excess of $50,000. The amendment was designed to restore a small measure of fairness and raise $19.1 billion over a five-year period. Despite the fact that the nation faced a staggering $200 billion deficit, the amendment was rejected by a 62-30 vote on a tabling motion by Finance Committee Chairman Robert Dole (R-Kans.) on Apr. 12.

5. Balancing the Federal Budget

In 1981 the AFL-CIO and other organizations predicted that the Reagan tax cuts, which included steep reductions in the taxes paid by the wealthy and corporations, would hemorrhage the federal treasury at a cost of hundreds of billions of dollars in lost tax revenues. By 1984 this prediction had come true as the nation staggered toward a $200 billion Reagan budget deficit—more than the total accumulated deficits of every president from George Washington through Jimmy Carter. As deficits mounted, the AFL-CIO proposed a range of tax reforms designed to get the deficit under control. One of them—a $700 cap on the individual tax cuts—would have retained the full tax break for those earning $45,000 or less, but limit the tax windfall for the rich to $700. Unfortunately, in June 1983, the Senate rejected this key tax reform.

During Senate debate this year on a bill designed to reduce the deficit, Sen. John Chaffee (R-R.I.) offered another labor-backed reform amendment—postponing for three years the indexation of the tax rates Congress enacted as part of the Reagan tax cut in 1981. The Chaffee amendment would have raised $51 billion over the three-year period, mostly from the wealthy. Choosing to ignore its revenue impact, the Senate by a 57-38 vote on Apr. 6 agreed to a motion by Sen. Robert Dole (R-Kans.), chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, to table and thus kill the Chaffee amendment.

6. Unfair Higher Telephone Costs

As a result of the Communications Act of 1934 and subsequent regulatory action by the Federal Communications Commission, the government for the last five decades has pursued a policy of promoting reasonably priced, universal telephone service for all citizens. The result of this federal policy is that 92 percent of all Americans now have access to the nation's telephone system. This public policy was, however, jeopardized following the court-ordered breakup of American Telephone & Telegraph, which precipitated an anti-consumer regulatory ruling by the FCC, now under the conservative control of Reagan appointees. The FCC proposed to allow a flat charge on residential and small business phone users for the right of access to long-distance service whether they use such service or not. The fee originally was to go into effect in April of 1984, starting at $2 per month for residential customers and rising yearly until 1990.

The AFL-CIO strongly opposed the access fee. Labor charged that the fee, when combined with increases in local rates, could raise local phone bills by as much as 100 percent, undermining the principle of universal telephone service. The AFL-CIO also pointed out the unfairness of a proposal which would penalize the 17 percent of all telephone customers who make no long-distance calls.

In the Senate the key vote came on a bill sponsored by Sen. Robert Packwood (R-Ore.) that would have temporarily banned FCC imposition of the access fee. The bill also included an important pension rights plan that would allow employees of the new telephone companies created under divestiture to transfer their pension rights to their new employers. However, one day before the vote, the FCC announced that it was postponing implementation until at least June of 1985. The FCC counter-move clearly undercut Packwood's effort as the Senate, by a 44-40 vote on Jan. 26, agreed to a motion by Sen. Barry Goldwater (R-Ariz.) to table consideration of the Packwood bill. (The pension protection provision was later included in an unrelated tax bill which was signed into law.)

7. Restoring a Civil Rights Law

In early 1984 the U.S. Supreme Court handed down a regressive ruling that undermined federal civil rights law, overturning a lower court decision which had found sex discrimination at Grove City College in Pennsylvania. The court's conservative majority narrowly constricted the provisions of Title IX of the Education Amendments of 1972 which barred sex discrimination in any educational "program or activity receiving federal financial assstance." Although Grove City College is a recipient of federal financial assistance. the court majority defined Title IX's "program or activity" language so narrowly as to reach only the school's student financial aid program, rather than the entire school as the lower court had held. The result of the decision was to undermine the federal law's comprehensive prohibition against sex discrimination in education. Not surprisingly, in keeping with the Reagan Administration's abysmal civil rights record, the Assistant Attorney General for Civil Rights stated publicly that he would seek to broaden the reach of the Grove City ruling by applying it to other civil rights laws.

The AFL-CIO and the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights almost immediately countered with legislation to reverse Grove City. It would restore to four key civil rights statutes the broad scope and coverage that was originally intended by Congress and enforced by the federal government for the last 20 years. While the bill easily passed the House with strong by partisan support, Senate Republicans blocked action. The chief opponent was Labor Committee Chairman Orrin Hatch (R-Utah), who bottled up the labor-backed bill in his committee. A last-ditch attempt by Sen. Robert Byrd (D-W.Va.) to add the Grove City repealer bill to an unrelated continuing appropriations bill failed in the waning hours of the 98th Congress. When it was clear that opponents would be successful in killing the civil rights measure, the bill's original cosponsor Sen. Robert Packwood (R-Ore.) moved to table his own amendment as a means to secure a recorded vote on the issue. His amendment was tabled by a 53-45 vote on Oct. 2.

8. Increasing Senior Citizen Health Care Costs—I

No sooner had the Senate rejected the revenue-raising curb on indexing (see Senate vote #4), than it voted for an increase in Medicare costs for the elderly as a way to reduce the federal budget deficit. At present senior citizens and disabled Medicare beneficiaries spend an average of 20 percent of their limited incomes on medical care. The tax bill reported by the Senate Finance Committee would have compounded this financial burden by increasing the Part B Medicare premium and by raising the Medicare deductible. Part B is a medical insurance program that pays up to 80 percent of the reasonable charges for a range of elderly health care services, including doctor and outpatient hospital care, outpatient physical therapy and home health care. The AFL-CIO charged that if medical care costs continued to rise at the present pace, which is greater than the inflation rate in the rest of the economy, monthly medicare premiums would also increase at rates far exceeding the annual cost-of-living adjustments for social security benefits. It was further estimated that if the Finance Committee bill passed, premium increases by 1990 could consume 30 percent of this annual cost-of-living increase.

During debate on the tax increase package, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) offered an amendment to eliminate the increase in the Part B premium. The conservative-controlled Senate, however, rejected the Kennedy amendment and thereby voted for the Medicare increases when it agreed by a 58-36 vote to a tabling motion by Sen. Robert Dole (R-Kans.).

9. Increasing Senior Citizen Health Care Costs—II

After the defeat of the Kennedy Medicare amendment, Sen. Max Baucus (D-Mont.) countered with an amendment designed to restore $588 million of the total $9 billion in Medicare cuts proposed by the Senate Finance Committee. The Baucus amendment would have eliminated the proposed increase in the Medicare

Part B deductible and reduced the Part B premium increases in 1987 so that premium hikes would not exceed the rate of inflation. It would have also provided for closer monitoring of physician behavior under the proposed physician fee freeze so that Medicare beneficiaries could be protected from unfair cost shifting during the two-year freeze. During debate, Sen. Baucus pointed out that of the $9 billion in Medicare costs, senior citizens were required to contribute $3.7 billion in higher medical fees while physicians and hospitals were only required to make up $2.9 billion through reduced fees. Once again the fiscal conservatives turned their backs on senior citizens and voted down the Baucus amendment by a 50-44 vote on May 17.

10. Working Women—Child Day Care Services

With working women and single-parent households comprising an ever-larger proportion of the U.S. labor force, one of their most pressing needs is for affordable and adequate child day care services. In the absence of a comprehensive child day care program, many women have already had to abandon their jobs and turn to welfare. For others, turning their children into "latchkey kids" is the only alternative. The AFL-CIO has long been on record in support of federal assistance to establish programs providing infant care, kindergarten and after-school child day care services at affordable rates.

During Senate debate on legislation designed to upgrade mathematics and science education in the nation's schools, Sen. Don Riegle (D-Mich.) offered an amendment to provide $15 million in seed money over the next three years to establish after-school day care programs using existing school facilities. Although a similar bill had been unanimously passed by the House, Senate conservatives voted 51-42 in support of a motion by Sen. Howard Baker (R-Tenn.) to kill the amendment.

11. Promoting Democracy Abroad

In 1983 Congress authorized the creation of the National Endowment for Democracy, a federally financed, private non-profit organization whose various activities, such as fostering trade unions in developing countries, are designed to promote the evolution of democratic institutions abroad. The AFL-CIO through its Free Trade Union Institute is a participating organization in the Endowment program.

When the 1985 funding authorization for the Endowment reached Congress, it immediately came under attack in the House where the entire $31 million appropriation was deleted. (See House vote #13.) In the Senate several attempts were made to slash the Endowment's funds. While more drastic amendments to eliminate all funding were rejected, Sen. Warren Rudman (R-N.H.) succeeded in reducing the appropriation by $10 million to a level of $21 million. His amendment was adopted by a 62-30 vote on June 28. House-Senate conferees later agreed to a spending level of $18.5 million for the Endowment.

Career workers cut as Reagan pads staff with political friends

The Reagan Administration, while slashing the jobs of career federal workers, is padding the federal payroll with high-paying "political plum" jobs for its friends, according to the AFL-CIO Public Employee Dept.

In releasing a study on federal employment, PED Executive Director John Leyden, charged that "the political 'spoils system' is alive and well in Ronald Reagan's Administraiton."

PED found that the Reagan White House has expanded the number of non-career political appointees drawing federal paychecks by 51 percent since it took office.

The Administration — while attacking the pay and benefits of career federal workers—has also swollen the government's Senior Executive Service payroll with non-career, political job-holders, the PED charged.

Yet in a recent speech in Texas, President Reagan bragged about job cuts, claiming that the government has "75,000 fewer non-defense employees than three years ago."

Although the President "clearly has been no friend" of rank-and-file career federal workers, Leyden observed that Reagan has "a special place in his heart—and on the federal payroll—for political appointees."

PED's analysis of the political job-handouts under the Administration found that there are now 2,712 of the so-called Schedule C employees, compared to 1,793 in 1980.

Schedule C employees may be hired at any federal pay grade, but are commonly slotted in at higher pay scales.

PED also found that the number of non-career, political appointments to the federal Senior Executive Service—the government's top management jobs—grew from 579 to 684 under Reagan.

A separate study released by the Civil Service Subcommittee of the House Post Office & Civil Service Committee showed that the Administration's biggest cuts in rank-and-file jobs came in agencies responsible for key social programs.

Payroll padded

PED found that those same agency payrolls were "ironically" the ones most heavily "padded" with Reagan political appointees.

Leyden called the Administration's record on the job issue "supreme hypocrisy, an approach that attacks the career civil service with a series of pay caps, furloughs, reductions-in-force and benefit cuts while handing out record numbers of plums jobs to those with political connections and right-wing credentials."

The House committee also found that while employment has been deeply slashed in many agencies, much of that has been offset by the increase of nearly 62,000 civilian jobs in the Defense Dept.

The Government Employees, the largest federal workers union, charged that while the Administration has been gutting the jobs of career federal employees, many services they once performed have been contracted out to private sector firms at taxpayers' expense but without any guarantees of cost savings or adequate safeguards against overcharges.

IUD adds 4 firms to 'dishonor roll' for anti-unionism

The Industrial Union Dept. added four companies to its "dishonor roll" for their conspicuously anti-union activities.

They are AP Parts, a manufacturer of mufflers and other auto exhaust parts; Louisiana-Pacific Corp., a giant lumber and wood products firm; Marval Poultry, the world's largest turkey processor, and Phelps Dodge Corp., the nation's second largest copper producer. The companies are also on the AFL-CIO boycott list.

"These four companies, each a leader in its industry, share an attitude which is still too common today—a total lack of respect for the dignity and rights of their workers," IUD President Howard Samuel charged.

In making the IUD's second annual Dishonor Roll, the four companies join five others added last year. Four of the 1983 nominees — Capital Cities Communications, Indiana Desk Co., Procter & Gamble and Fabrege, Inc.—are still on the list.

Samuel noted federal labor law was designed to provide orderly labor-management relations, and the National Labor Relations Board is "supposed to act as the impartial overseer of those relationships. Unfortunately today, workers can no longer count on the government to be fair and just."

Marval—bad news birds

With Thanksgiving just a few weeks off, the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept. is stepping up its boycott campaign against Marval turkeys and turkey parts, urging union consumers to steer clear of birds produced by the unfair employer.

More than 400 members of Food & Commercial Workers Local 400 have been on strike since June 4 against Marval, the world's largest turkey producer, at its Harrisonburg, Va., plant. The company, owned since 1981 by Rocco Enterprises of Virginia, has brought in strikebreakers. Before the firm changed hands, labor and management had enjoyed 30 years of stable relations.

The workers—mostly female and most making less than $6 an hour—struck over what they called the "incredible" deterioration in safety and health conditions and brutal, "intolerable" work rules. Local 400 reported that the accident rate in the plant has tripled since Rocco took over.

According to the Union Label Dept., Marval turkeys can be identified in stores either by brand names, or by the U.S. Dept. of Agriculture inspection stamp that bears the plant number "P-18." The number appears on the wrapper stamp or, especially for whole turkeys, on the metal ring closing the wrapper.

Brand names using Marval products include Armour, Bigger Brothers, Bird in Hand, Boston Beef, C & S Distributors, Dogwood Hill Farms, Esskay, Farmer Gray, Food Club, Frosty Acres, Kingston, Lancaster, Louis Rich, Manor House, Marval, Maryland Chicken, Mazo Lerch, McSweeney's, Montoco, Rockingham, Shop Rite, Stu Leonard, Super True, Sure Fresh, Table Rite, Tender Pride, Top Frost, Weber Gourmet, and Wilson.

Minnesota delegates ready push for big election turnout

Rochester, Minn. — The Minnesota AFL-CIO's 27th constitutional convention adopted legislative goals and rallied delegates to lead a heavy rank-and-file turnout among union voters at the November presidential election.

The 700 delegates called for state legislation to provide for closed primary elections, teaching of labor education in high schools, preservation of the unemployment insurance system in Minnesota, opposition to any form of tuition tax credits or tuition vouchers, and establishment of an Office of Economic Conversion to help distressed industries convert to alternative production.

Other resolutions supported enforcement of both state and federal Davis-Bacon prevailing wage laws along with equal pay for work of comparable worth.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland spoke to the delegates via videotape and warned that the "country can't afford four more years of a government that only serves the rich and divides America." He recalled that Richard Nixon's lead in 1968 was thought to be insurmountable. But had the campaign lasted one more week, Hubert Humphrey would have won, Kirkland reminded the delegates.

The convention endorsed the Democratic presidential ticket of Walter Mondale—a Minnesota native—and Geraldine Ferraro after viewing tapes on a giant television screen showing their acceptance of the nominations in San Francisco and Mondale's appearance at the 1983 AFL-CIO convention.

State AFL-CIO President David Roe set the stage for the delegates, detailing the stakes for workers' in the Nov. 6 election.

"We have a President who has closed his eyes, ears and heart to working people, the elderly, the young, farmers, minorities, the poor," Roe declared. "Our job over the next several weeks is to work hard to elect two people who can see, hear, feel, and will speak from compassionate hearts for all of America . . . Walter Mondale and Geraldine Ferraro."

Ted Mondale, son of the candidate, stressed that "Reagan wants a union-free country, while my father wants a country of free unions." Another speaker was Hubert H. Humphrey III, the state attorney general, who warned delegates that "there isn't much time left to educate people" about the election issues.

National Farmers Union President Cy Carpenter stressed what would happen in Minnesota if Reagan wins, estimating that 13,000 farmers would lose their farms next year.

House finds Women's Bureau inept under Reagan

By Susan Dunlop

Under the Reagan Administration, the Women's Bureau of the Labor Dept. has become ineffective, inefficient and isolated from the working women it was created to serve, according to a report released by the House Government Operations Committee.

The committee found that the bureau, created by Congress in 1920, has failed since 1981 to meet its mandate to promote the welfare and improve the working conditions and opportunities of wage-earning women.

Instead, the committee said, the Women's Bureau has stopped providing the information, technical assistance and leadership on vital issues crucial to women workers that had been available under previous administrations, both Democratic and Republican.

"Rigid organizational patterns" have undermined the bureau's effectiveness and efficiency, and it has virtually severed its "long-term, close ties" with unions, community organizations and local, state and national women's organizations, the committee pointed out in its unanimous report.

The panel also found that the bureau is no longer active—as it used to be—in representing the concerns of women workers in Labor Dept. policymaking or in advocating legislation important to working women.

The report, titled The Women's Bureau: Is It Meeting the Needs of Women Workers?, was prepared by the Manpower & Housing Subcommittee chaired by Rep. Barney Frank (D-Mass.). It is based on hearings held earlier this year during which union women and representatives of women's organizations testified.

In releasing the report, Frank said the bureau's rigidity and inactivity should not be blamed on budget cuts, since Congress has refused every year to adopt cuts in the agency's staff requested by the Reagan Administration.

Services slashed

Among the representatives submitting testimony at the hearings was Coalition of Labor Union Women President Joyce Miller, who pointed out that for years the Women's Bureau had been the leading source of vital statistical, economic and legal information about women workers. But under Reagan, Miller and other witnesses charged, those functions and most of the agency's publications have been sharply cut back.

Miller, an AFL-CIO vice president and a vice president of the Clothing & Textile Workers, testified that the bureau's 10 regional offices had become virtually inactive and that former contacts with union and other organizations have been sharply restricted.

She said the agency shifted the emphasis from programs pegged to the needs of wage-earning women to the interests of women professionals and business-owners.

The committee report concluded that there is an "urgent need" for a strong, active Women's Bureau to deal with the complex problems facing working women, and it recommended that the agency revamp its current policies, methods and priorities.

The committee also recommended that the bureau significantly expand its "critically important function" of publishing statistical and other information and materials, and it stressed that such publications "should include pro/con or descriptive information whether or not the Bureau or the Administration has a position on the issue."

The report also called for more flexibility in the bureau's management, an end to its practice of discouraging regional staff from participating in certain activities, renewed cooperation and contacts with unions and other groups, and more efficient and practical personnel assignments.

It was especially critical of the bureau for ending—on virtually a management whim—a successful job-sharing arrangement between two women directors of the bureau's Region IX in San Francisco. The committee said the bureau should be encouraging rather than stifling such "creative uses of alternative work patterns" both in compliance with federal employment laws that permit them and as a demonstration for the private sector.

Applying resources

The panel also recommended that in planning activities the bureau should weigh the relative needs of various groups. Because the agency's resources are limited, choices must be made in how they are used and the "recent emphasis on mid- and upper-level corporate women," although not bad in itself, "inevitably reduces the resources available to assist needier groups."

The bureau was also pressed to resume its former role of advocating policies and programs that advance the interests of working women.

Democrats look to gain Senate seats

crat Paul E. Tsongas. The Senate's most senior Democrat, Jennings Randolph of West Virginia, is also retiring, but his seat appears safe for the Democrats.

In Tennessee, the clear favorite is now Democrat Albert Gore, Jr., who voted "right" four of every five times in his eight years in the House by COPE's tally. Gore, whose father was a distinguished senator, was endorsed last year by the State AFL-CIO even before he had formally announced his candidacy. His Republican opponent, former State Sen. Victor Ashe, has been trying to ride Reagan's coattails.

Elsewhere, Democratic gains are most likely in the following states:

ILLINOIS—To win a fourth term, Republican Charles H. Percy will have to persuade conservative Reagan supporters that he is one of them without alienating moderates of both parties who have supported him in the past. In rhetoric as well as in voting, Percy has moved to the right and has recruited some of the arch-conservatives in Congress to campaign for him. His Democratic opponent, Paul Simon, has a good government record in Congress and state government that stands him well with much of Percy's former constituency. Six years ago, Percy had substantial labor support in a close election. This time, unions are strongly behind Simon. The Chamber of Commerce has urged "immediate involvement of business around the country" to retain the seat for the Republicans and has worked to prevent a leakage of conservative support to the Libertarian Party candidate. Recent polls have see-sawed.

IOWA — First-term Republican Roger W. Jepsen is clearly vulnerable and Tom Harkin, who at the age of 44 has five times won election to the House from a traditionally Republican district, has a good chance to beat him. Recent polls show he has overcome an early Jepsen lead and moved ahead. Harkin's 73 percent "right" COPE record may be closer to Iowa's sentiments than the 11 percent rating for Jepsen. But Jepsen has unleashed a costly barrage of television and radio advertising aimed at pinning a "too liberal" label on his Democratic opponent.

MINNESOTA—If the election were held this week, the polls indicate, Republican Rudy Boschwitz would win a second term in the Senate and Walter Mondale would fail to carry his home state. But Democrats think that Mondale will indeed carry Minnesota on Nov. 6. And if he does, Joan Growe has a real chance for an upset. She is Minnesota's three-term secretary of state who is trying to get voters to focus on the highly conservative voting record of Boschwitz rather than on his folksy manner. Boschwitz voted only 17 percent "right" on the COPE card, compared with 40 percent for Minnesota's other GOP senator, David Durenberger.

MISSISSIPPI—Republican Thad Cochran, seeking a second term, would be a strong favorite for re-election against almost any candidate the Democrats put up—especially since he has a seemingly bottomless campaign treasury to pay for television commercials. His opponent, former Gov. William Winter, is perhaps the one Democrat with a realistic chance to take the seat. He was a popular governor with a strong record in support of education. But it's an uphill race.

NEW HAMPSHIRE—When Republican Gordon J. Humphrey won his first Senate term in 1978 with 50.7 percent of the vote, he ran as what Congressional Quarterly termed "a militant conservative activist." Now he's seeking re-election as a born-again environmentalist. But the state's conservation groups are solidly backing New Hampshire's Democratic congressman, Norman E. D'Amours. So is the AFL-CIO. His 76 percent "right" COPE record compares with a scant 5 percent grade for Humphrey. The Republican has more money for media advertising; D'Amours may have the better grass-roots organization. Humphrey has led in the polls but not by too much.

NORTH CAROLINA—To a lot of people, the defeat of Republican Jesse Helms would be the most satisfying outcome of any congressional election. Even among southern conservatives, he has been an extremist and his campaign has been closely anchored to the political message of the so-called Moral Majority. This could be the end of the line of Helms. His opponent is North Carolina Gov. James B. Hunt, Jr., popular and able. Neither campaign has been under-financed, but Helms has raised some $4 million more than Hunt and as of last June had already spent $8.7 million on his campaign. Helms has tried to wrap himself in Reagan's popularity in North Carolina, telling voters that "the President and I need your support." He refers to Gov. Hunt, a moderate in the southern political spectrum, as a "Mondale liberal."

Hunt, running neck-and-neck in the polls, retorts that he doesn't want North Carolina to be known as the base "for radical, right-wing politics" or "for narrow, intolerant leaders who claim that God is on their side."

TEXAS—With Sen. Tower's retirement, Republicans nominated Rep. Phil Gramm, who switched to the GOP early last year after having led the band of "boll weevil" conservative Democrats who helped push Reagan's program through the House. By conventional wisdom, he should be a strong favorite over State Sen. Lloyd Doggett, a labor-backed progressive who has fought for consumer issues. Doggett had to win two grueling primaries to gain the nomination. Gramm still leads, but not by as big a margin.

The three states the GOP considers takeable if there is a big Reagan vote are:

ARKANSAS—Democrat David Pryor's popularity should enable him to stave off the challenge of an articulate Republican congressman, Ed Bethune. GOP sources keep listing Arkansas as a possible pickup, but most political readings are that it would take a major upset.

MASSACHUSETTS—The Democratic picture was muddled by the decision of Tsongas not to seek re-election and a hard-fought primary just a month ago that was won by Lt. Gov. John F. Kerry. On the Republican side, the primary victory was a hard-campaigning conservative, Raymond Shamie, who trounced the strongly favored Elliot Richardson. Mid-October indications were that a Kerry victory will keep the seat Democratic. But it was not a sure thing.

MICHIGAN—Democrat Carl Levin is opposed for re-election by Jack Lousma, a former astronaut drafted by conservative Republicans after a 25-year military career. The issues couldn't be more clearcut. Levin, a mainstream Democrat who earned strong labor support by his progressive voting record, has maintained a clear lead in the polls despite his opponent's attempt to pin a tax-increase label to him. Republicans are pouring money into the campaign, convinced that Levin is vulnerable, and Lousma has embraced the Reagan program. But the judgment is that the Republican campaign is still earthbound.

In the other Senate contests, incumbents are clear favorites. Among Republicans, it would take a major upset to dislodge Senators Ted Stevens in Alaska, William L. Armstrong in Colorado, James A. McClure in Idaho, Nancy Landon Kassebaum in Kansas, William S. Cohen in Maine, Pete V. Domenici in New Mexico, Mark O. Hatfield in Oregon, Strom Thurmond in South Carolina, Larry Pressler in South Dakota, John W. Warner in Virginia and Alan K. Simpson in Wyoming.

Upsets do happen, however, and some of the Democratic challengers have proven exceptionally able campaigners who will be heard from again.

On the Democratic side, the Senate seat being given up by Jennings Randolph almost certainly will be won by West Virginia's Gov. John D. Rockefeller IV, less formally known as Jay Rockefeller. Republicans are concentrating their efforts on winning the governorship that Rockefeller is giving up.

Incumbents who appear to have a substantial but not irreversible lead are Senators Joseph R. Biden, Jr., in Delaware, Walter D. Huddleston in Kentucky and Max Baucus in Montana.

The seats that political observers now consider "safe Democratic" are held by Senators Howell Heflin in Alabama, Sam Nunn in Georgia, J. James Exon in Nebraska, Bill Bradley in New Jersey, David L. Boren in Oklahoma, and Claiborne Pell in Rhode Island.

If the Democrats do fall short of taking control of the Senate in this election, a bright opportunity will come in two years when 22 seats now held by Republicans will be at stake to only 12 seats held by Democrats.

Greed is key to Reagan policies

The Economic Illusion

False Choices Between Prosperity and Social Justice. By Robert Kuttner. Houghton Mifflin, Boston. 308 pp. $19.95.

Beyond the Safety Net

Reviving the Promise of Opportunity in America. By Sar Levitan and Clifford M. Johnson, Ballinger, Cambridge, Mass. 189 pp. $16.95.

By Markley Roberts

Greed—plain, old-fashioned greed—is the key to anti-people, anti-worker, anti-union policies of Ronald Reagan.

Greed and giveaways to the rich and the big corporations are camouflaged behind a right-wing theory of "supply-side" economics—a theory of "trickle-down" economics which says the rich must get richer so the rest of us can have jobs and paychecks.

This violation of social justice is the price of progress, according to radical conservative George Gilder and conservative economist Milton Friedman, the intellectual gurus of the Reagan Administration and chief apostles preaching the virtues of greed.

"The economic illusion is the belief that social justice is bad for economic growth," says Bob Kuttner in his new book attacking supply-side, trickle-down economics.

In another new book, Sar Levitan and Clifford Johnson present a reasoned and devastating critique of the right-wing social policies of Ronald Reagan and his "persistent efforts to undermine public confidence in government."

"Due in large part to conservative rhetoric, many Americans associate the welfare system with narrow income transfer programs for the poor rather than with its broader efforts to promote opportunity and equity for all income groups," Levitan and Johnson assert.

The message from these two books is important—and it's a message most union members know already. The last AFL-CIO convention declared, "Fairness and compassion are not in conflict with efficiency and economic progress. In fact, these concerns reinforce one another."

The AFL-CIO pointed out that basic social programs that help people who are unemployed, aged, disabled, or helpless are fundamental to economic progress as well as to social decency and social justice. Union members know that economic progress and social justice must go together.

Full employment is the best way to pull economic growth and social justice together, says Kuttner, and unions have an important role in achieving these goals. A strong, well-organized labor movement is essential to a society which properly links economic progress and social justice.

"Societies with strong unions and highly refined social bargaining machinery do a much better job of maintaining full employment, promoting distributive justice, reconciling technological process with social needs, and moderating inflation," says Kuttner, citing Sweden, Norway, Austria, and West Germany as examples.

The very best economic performers seem to have these characteristics in common: an effective system for converting savings to productive investment; a well-trained and diligent work force; and social institutions that provide personal security and opportunity and minimize class discord."

Unfortunately, the policies of Ronald Reagan widen economic and social gaps between Americans. "The Reagan tax and spending program took from society's poorest and gave to society's richest," says Kuttner.

But it's wrong and unnecessary to load tax giveaways on the rich and the big corporations in hope they will invest their tax savings. In fact, says Kuttner, collective savings of workers in pension funds and life insurance companies are the big sources of investment funds.

Levitan and Johnson attack the Reagan Administration for its radical anti-government ideology and for its abdication from federal responsibilities for promoting economic opportunity and social justice. They also fault liberals and "neoliberals" who accept the right-wing notion that America suffers from too much government and too much regulation.

Jobs and training programs, social security, unemployment compensation, health care, education, housing, public assistance, and other social welfare programs have produced impressive achievements for working people and their families, according to Levitan and Johnson.

But they warn that "when government interventions are successful, their beneficial effects tend to be cumulative and long term," which makes it difficult to maintain political support for these programs in the short run.

America's political agenda must recognize the many successes of the modern welfare system, recapture majority support for the system, and rebuild public confidence in government.

Unfortunately, under President Reagan, programs that help working people, the poor, and the needy are cut while benefits to the rich are raised—and the American people get less fairness, less compassion, and less social justice.

Making Industrial Policy

CONGRESS TOOK a step in the direction of an industrial policy for the United States—a very small step, but nonetheless very welcome.

It did so in legislation to enforce bilateral agreements with countries whose increased exports of subsidized steel have been so damaging to the U.S. steel industry. Having rejected quotas, the Administration is seeking to persuade the offending countries to agree to a ceiling on steel shipments.

Congress insisted on adding to the enforcing legislation a labor-supported provision that is at least the embryo of an industrial policy.

First, by giving support to an effort to limit steel imports, Congress in effect declared that the steel industry is important to the United States and should be helped to survive.

That's an industrial policy decision.

Then, in return for a degree of protection, Congress insisted that the industry act responsibly. Steel companies will be required to use their cash assets—the depreciation savings from tax laws as well as retained earnings—for modernization of facilities for research and development. A small amount is earmarked for retraining of the industry's displaced workers.

ALL THIS is the thrust of industrial policy. It stands in sharp contrast to the meaningless giveaways of the Reagan Administration's tax cuts which encouraged steel companies to use the windfall to buy up oil companies and conglomerates to buy out competitors in stock-buying raids that created no new jobs and no new products.

With all the good intentions, the small step taken in a little-noted bill passed in the final days of Congress isn't going to overcome the festering problems of America's steel industry.

The legislation that was shaped by the House Banking, Finance & Urban Affairs Committee does, however, provide the machinery for truly national industrial planning, with input and commitment of resources from industry, labor and government.

Whatever dictionary the Reagan Administration chooses to use these days, planning is not a dirty word.

It involves deciding where you want to go and figuring out the best way to get there.

The Collyer Appointment

HOW LONG will Rosemary Collyer serve as general counsel of the National Labor Relations Board? That's one of the questions that will be answered on Nov. 6.

President Reagan has already appointed a majority of the NLRB, and the flow of pro-management decisions reflects the changeover. A former attorney for the National Right to Work Committee's legal arm is already in a key NLRB post. The appointment of still another management attorney as general counsel is all that is needed to undercut the last vestiges of impartiality.

As the House Subcommittee on Labor-Management Relations concluded in a report adopted earlier this month, "in the past three years, the perception of a neutral and objective NLRB has been shattered" by the "politicization" of the labor board.

Under the National Labor Relations Act, the general counsel is more than a lawyer. The general counsel is in charge of the NLRB's field staff and is both the grand jury and prosecutor in deciding when to bring unfair labor practice proceedings against either employers or unions. The post is filled by presidential appointment, and its occupant is not subservient to the board.

The Senate did not act on Collyer's nomination, and it died with the adjournment of Congress. But President Reagan bypassed the Senate and gave Collyer a recess appointment, enabling her to take office immediately.

If he is re-elected, the White House affirms, Collyer's nomination will be resubmitted to Congress and she will be able to continue in the post.

That's another good reason to vote for Walter Mondale and for senators who won't rubber-stamp the corruption of the NLRB.

Reagan's mental capacity becomes an election issue

By Press Associates, Inc.

Some years back, Mao Tse-tung swam several miles down the Yangtze River to show the masses he was still fit to govern.

Similar public relations gimmicks have been used for years to boost President Reagan's image. He is filmed swimming, chopping wood and riding horseback on his ranch, far from the nation's problems.

While everyone agrees that the President is in good physical shape for his age, age is not the issue. That energetic hero of the elderly, Rep. Claude Pepper (D-Fla.), notes it is performance that counts. And at a young 84, Pepper retains a keen grasp of the issues and can hold his own in public debate.

To evaluate President Reagan fairly, it is important to try and assess his true understanding of the issues and whether he is capable of leading the nation in these difficult times.

New York Times columnist James Reston keyed on the public's concern over Reagan's real leadership abilities just after the first debate with Walter Mondale in Louisville.

"What Louisville did," wrote Reston, "was not to expose his age, which everybody knew, but to expose his mind, which the voters didn't know. This is what has been covered up in the last four years by his amiable personality, and his superb reading of speeches from invisible mirrors, written and contrived by the best public relations team ever to enter the White House.

Hidden from view

"Nobody knows this better than his most intimate advisers. This is why they keep him out of press conferences as much as possible, didn't want him to debate Mr. Mondale, and fight among themselves about policies, including arms control, that he has not mastered.

"Age may have been a factor in his faltering performance in Louisville. Usually he is at his best onstage, and the bigger the audience the better. But he forgot his lines, even in his memorized closing speech, and that did surprise and trouble his most devoted aides."

Behind the Republican Party's facade of optimism, the Reagan Administration has inflicted much damage on the American society. The economy is no better off than in 1980. Big business and the wealthy reaped $750 billion in tax breaks, a basic cause of Reagan's record deficits. The deepest recession since the 1930s gave millions a taste of hard times. Poverty rose, the middle class shrank, and the arms race continues.

Future plans

And what of the future? Political observers note that Reagan has said nothing of what he wants to do if re-elected. However, the key people behind Reagan know what they want.

Budget chief David Stockman, the President's numbers man, thinks the socially destructive budget cuts of 1981 were a mistake because they were too small. Those were just the "little pebbles. We should have gone after the big boulders —the social insurance programs," Stockman told Fortune magazine.

The biggest cuts in 1985 should be in Medicare and Medicaid, veterans' health care, federal jobs and pensions, student aid and farm price supports, he said.

When Reagan in the first debate with Mondale posed as a defender of social security by declaring he would oppose benefit cuts "to the people now getting them," he gave away the game plan.

That was enough to scare everybody 64 and under, a sizable voting group. So the White House rushed out a mouthpiece who claimed future beneficiaries would be protected as well.

Before Reagan, there was a developing consensus among labor and its allies to work toward a better America. To get the nation moving again toward worthy goals and with a sense of purpose that includes all Americans, labor and other groups endorsed the Mondale-Ferraro ticket. That choice looks better than ever.

House control dependent on key districts

This election will determine whether mainstream Democrats continue to have a working majority in the House of Representatives or whether effective control will slip back to a conservative coalition of Republicans and like-minded Democrats.

It was a conservative coalition that rubber-stamped President Reagan's budget and tax policies in the 1981-82 Congress. It took a 26-seat Democratic gain in the recession-influenced 1982 election to put jobs back on the congressional agenda, fend off new assaults on labor standards and remedy a Supreme Court ruling that had allowed bankruptcy law to be turned into a union-smashing weapon.

Going into this election, Democrats hold a 267-168 majority in the House, crediting two vacancies to the parties last holding the seats.

Election scenario

Only the scariest of political nightmares can conjure up an election scenario giving the Republicans the gain of 50 or more seats what would make the GOP the majority party in the House for the first time in 30 years. But it would require only a strong political current—a Republican pickup of anything over 20 seats—to make damage control critical for labor. Depending on where the shifts take place, almost any double-digit Republican gain combined with the continued GOP control of the Senate would be a serious setback.

The presidential election will influence the congressional results and a close House contest could be decided by the spillover from a one-sided vote for one of the presidential candidates in that particular district. But there are probably no more than 50 congressional districts where the top-of-the-ticket factor could affect the outcome.

If the presidential vote is reasonably close—whether Mondale or Reagan wins—and the marginal House contests divide about equally, a single-digit Republican gain would be likely.

An axiom of congressional elections is that most incumbents seeking re-election will be returned to office. The districts most susceptible to party change are those in which the incumbent is not on the ballot. This year, there are only 27 such "open districts" and 14 are held by Republicans. About half are considered safe for the party in power.

Reapportionment

Two years ago, partly as a result of post-Census reapportionment, there were 58 open districts. And a number of incumbents had the added disadvantage of changed district boundaries that brought in voters unfamiliar with their records.

Further, 65 House members—53 Democrats and 12 Republicans—will not face major party opposition on Nov. 6 and are, in effect, already re-elected. The number includes the six Democrats and two Republicans from Louisiana who won election last month by getting more than half the votes cast in the state's unique open primary.

Others unopposed include both conservatives and liberals from all parts of the country. Republicans may rant about House Speaker Tip O'Neill, but they didn't

One-on-one labor drive sparks campaign effort

Mondale hits issues muffed by President

By David L. Perlman

Walter Mondale and Geraldine Ferraro opened the final lap of their election campaign with an almost dawn-to-midnight schedule aimed at overtaking President Reagan by Election Day.

The Democratic candidates criss-crossed the country, talking issues and leadership to farmers and workers, suburbanites and city voters, students and the elderly.

A trade union movement that is overwhelmingly convinced of the importance of the election meanwhile moved on its own to assure that Mondale's message reaches America's workers. Across the nation, union activists went "one-on-one" with fellow workers to talk about election issues and the real differences between the rival candidates.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, on the final leg of his two-week Solidarity Van tour of union halls, spurred the effort in meetings with shop stewards, local union officers, business agents and COPE volunteers in nine states.

"Millions of voters will be making their decision in the closing days of the campaign," Kirkland stressed. "If a member has reservations or questions about our position, we need to answer them. We need feedback and real discussion."

Proven friend

Kirkland spoke of Mondale as a proven friend "who understands and identifies with the problems of working people."

Since his debates with Reagan, "many more of our people understand why we were for Mondale from the beginning," Kirkland said.

"Now they should know for sure that a vote for Fritz Mondale is a vote to keep their jobs here in America, with opportunities for young people." Just last month, Kirkland noted, another 125,000 manufacturing jobs were lost despite the so-called recovery.

"A vote for Ronald Reagan is a vote for the worst enemies of working men and

Richest corporations escaping federal taxes

Thanks to a tax break bonanza handed to them by the Reagan Administration, many of the nation's richest corporations either paid no income taxes or pocketed fat tax rebates over the last three years, according to a study by Citizens for Tax Justice.

In an analysis of the tax status of 250 profitable major corporations and utilities, the group found that 128, or 51 percent, had paid no income taxes in at least one of the years 1981-83.

Of those that paid some taxes, more than half paid at tax rates substantially below those of the average American family.

The coalition of labor and consumer organizations found that 17 of the firms surveyed had paid no taxes in any of the three years reviewed, and 48 had paid no taxes in at least two of the years. On top of that, the firms were able to take advantage of the Reagan tax law changes to claim billions in cash rebates or sell "excess" tax benefits to other companies, the study found.

Of the 17 companies that haven't paid taxes since at least 1980, five are among the nation's biggest defense contractors. The firms include General Electric Co., Boeing Co., General Dynamics, Lockheed Corp., and Grumman, Inc.

Other widely known names on the no-pay list include Dow Chemical Co., Santa Fe Southern Pacific Railroad, U.S. Home, Tenneco, Weyerhaeuser Corp., Transamerica Corp., Greyhound Corp., Singer Co., and more.

The biggest beneficiary of the tax cuts was GE—coincidentally Ronald Reagan's former employer—which earned $6.5 billion in pre-tax profits over the three years, claimed tax refunds of $283 million and paid "not one cent" of taxes in 1981, 1982 or 1983, the study showed.

The coalition's study, Corporate Income

Labor blasts pay equity put-down

The Reagan Administration insulted working women when its top economic adviser attacked the concept of pay equity, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue charged.

Donahue's remarks came in response to statements by William A. Niskanen who called the comparable worth idea "crazy," and a "medieval concept" whose "time has passed."

During a debate comparing Reagan economic policy with proposals by Democratic Presidential candidate Walter Mondale, Niskanen attributed the wage gap between men and women to the fact that "many, if not most," women interrupt their work life to raise children.

Calling Niskanen's remarks "an insult to American women," Donahue said they revive "the crude belief that women work only for 'pin money' when in fact, most women work for the same reason men do—because they have to."

Convention endorsement

The AFL-CIO has endorsed in convention resolutions the effort to achieve pay equity in the workplace. The concept calls for setting wage scales so that workers will be paid comparable wages for jobs of comparable worth that require similar skills, training and experience.

This runs directly counter to the traditional practice of setting pay scales lower for certain jobs only because they are held mostly by women.

A key pay equity victory was scored by the State, County & Municipal Employees in 1983 when a federal judge found Washington state guilty of pay discrimination against its female employees.

The Reagan Administration has hinted that it will join the state in appealing the decision, but has refused to make public its stance before the Nov. 6 election.

The AFL-CIO has also pointed to Labor Dept. data indicating that the number of working women with school-age children is rapidly increasing, as is the number of female heads of households who are the sole support of their children.

Missouri per capita increase made permanent by delegates

Kansas City—The 500 delegates to the Missouri AFL-CIO convention made permanent an emergency increase in the state federation's monthly per capita tax, boosting it by a dime to 30 cents.

The November elections also played a major role in the convention's agenda as delegates heard from a number of candidates, made endorsements and set their legislative goals.

The per capita increase was first passed last January by the state federation's executive board.

Board Member Donald J. Gralike, president of Electrical Workers Local 1 in St. Louis, told delegates the permanent increase was necessary because membership among state affiliates had been declining as a result of the Reagan Administration's economic policies.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, in an address to the delegates, accused President Reagan of selling out American workers through policies that have made it increasingly more difficult for organized labor to protect not only its own members, but all workers.

Daniel J. "Duke" McVey, president of the state federation, urged the delegates to unite to defeat anti-worker politicians on Nov. 6, and stressed the need for a high turnout of union voters to put Democratic presidential candidates Walter Mondale and Geraldine Ferraro in office.

Joan Mondale, wife of the candidate, scored the Reagan-Bush ticket, as did Rep. Richard Gephardt (D) who warned that four more years of Reagan policies could destroy the economy. Sen. Thomas F. Eagleton said the nation is "headed for an economic catastrophe" if Reagan is re-elected.

Guest speakers

Other speakers included Bricklayers President John Joyce, Ironworkers political director Michael J. Brennan, Rep. Ike Skelton, Rep. Robert Young, and a number of candidates for state offices.

Key among the resolutions adopted by the convention were measures urging legislation on plant closings, supporting the Equal Rights Amendment, backing the Typographical Union members in their struggle against the Kansas City Star, seeking prohibitions on the use of polygraphs in employment, and aiding the Ladies' Garment Workers' campaign to roll back the flood of imported apparel.

In the convention's only election, Donald F. Owens was elected to a two-year term as secretary-treasurer by acclamation of the delegates.

Pilots union votes assessment for Continental strike

The Air Line Pilots voted to sustain the union's lengthy strike action against Continental Airlines through an assessment which will enable it to keep up its court battles and continue strike benefits at a level of $2,400 a month.

"The membership has given us a clear mandate to continue the battle," ALPA President Henry Duffy said. "This means that we will be able to proceed aggressively in the courts, the Congress and elsewhere."

By a 3 to 1 ratio, the membership voted to continue the strike, now in its 13th month. Duffy said this level of support shows the widespread concern of the airline pilots over issues of job security, seniority and grievance procedures—all of which Continental management refuses to negotiate.

Legal efforts

The ALPA's legal efforts against Continental include an appeal of Continental's bankruptcy filing which resulted in massive layoffs and unilateral reduction of wages and benefits, appeal of the bankruptcy court's approval of Continental's abrogation of its labor contract, a $100-million lawsuit against the firm for unfair labor practices, defense against a similar countersuit by Continental and a dispute over pension funds owed to striking pilots.

Duffy noted that ALPA had spent about $8.8 million as of Sept. 1, 1984, in fighting Continental. Previous funding for the legal battles and strike support came from the union's administrative budget. Now, however, these activities will be paid for through the assessment, thus assuring a financial base for long-term efforts against Continental, he said.

At AFL-CIO conference

Health care guidelines drawn to curtail costs

The AFL-CIO is intensifying its search for ways to contain the "incredible increase" in health care costs and counter management demands to cut medical insurance benefits and raise the worker's share of costs.

Representatives of 23 AFL-CIO affiliates met recently at the George Meany Center for Labor Studies to share what they've learned so far. By the end of the three-day session, sponsored by the AFL-CIO Dept. of Occupational Safety, Health & Social Security, the 53 conferees had heard the essentials for a union program to reduce medical and hospital costs:

- Requiring a second physician's opinion before surgery.
- Encouraging outpatient surgery and pre-admission testing before hospitalization.
- Insisting on competitive bids from insurers and forcing insurance carriers to justify rate increases.
- Joining community coalitions with management, providers of medical care and the insurance industry to eliminate unnecessary hospitalization, unnecessary surgery and wasteful medical and hospital practices.
- Supporting state regulation and national legislation, such as the Kennedy-Gephardt bill, to regulate the health care industry.
- Insisting on protection for hospital and other health care workers who haven't shared the industry's profits.

'Corporatization'

Speakers repeatedly emphasized the "corporatization" of the health care industry—a high profit industry. In most communities, the conferees were told, health care is now the largest or second largest industry.

Carl Schramm, director of the Johns Hopkins Center for Hospital Finance Management, told the conference that a lot of expensive, high-technology equipment is "nonsense—toys for doctors."

One speaker cited helicopters as a case in point. When one hospital buys a helicopter, all the hospitals in town feel they have to have one.

Declaring that most communities have too many hospital beds and too many physicians, Schramm pointed out that only six states try to regulate hospital costs.

Dr. Phil Caper of the Dartmouth School of Business and the John F. Kennedy School of Government at Harvard, cited findings that some physicians hospitalize patients 20 times more often than others for the same disease. Usually, he reported, it's a matter of medical styles prevailing in the local community.

One study of 23 Iowa communities found that the cost of hospital care varied from $100 to $320 per capita.

Dr. Caper concluded that "20 percent of medical care is wasteful." He urged unions to identify the areas of waste, especially unnecessary hospital admissions.

Prof. John Dunlop of Harvard, one-time Secretary of Labor, reported on his efforts to encourage the formation of community coalitions to find ways to check rising health care costs. He told of the efforts of a national coalition, the "Dunlop Group of Six," that includes the Business Round Table, American Medical Association, American Hospital Association, Blue Cross & Blue Shield, Health Insurance Association and the AFL-CIO.

Developing expertise

Warning that health care problems can no longer be delegated to outside consultants, Dunlop urged every union to develop its own expertise.

The former Labor Secretary disclosed that the Johnson Foundation has set aside $20 million to help communities develop local health care cost-containment programs. To start, the foundation—in which he "wears a second hat"—has given $100,000 each to coalitions in 16 communities to develop clear, objective programs.

"We are anxious that both labor and management be involved," he stressed, adding that such coalitions are now functioning in 133 metropolitan areas and in one case—Iowa—statewide.

Labor, he reported, is participating in 43 coalitions. Business and insurers in 90, hospitals in 101 and physicians in 107. In 27, all six groups are working together to correct and reshape health delivery systems and thus avoid shifting more of the costs to workers.

Dunlop invited any existing coalition seeking a grant to write him. To obtain a grant, a coalition must develop a specific program with a timetable for cost containment without limiting access to medical care.

Changing times

Karen Ignagni, assistant director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Occupational Safety, Health & Social Security, warned that "the time has gone when we can just talk about how much we can get the employer to put into the health plan."

Ignagni also called on unions to bring labor's opinion into community coalitions and to provide active support for legislation like the Kennedy-Gephardt bill to encourage state regulation of health care costs.

Department Director Bert Seidman sent the conferees home with the admonition: "Get your own members to understand that health care is a new ballgame."

Economic growth rate slackens

More evidence of a sliding economy surfaced in a report from the government that economic growth in the July-September quarter measured only 2.7 percent at an annual rate.

That was below the 3.6 percent forecast by the Commerce Dept. in its "flash" estimate last month and well below the 7.1 percent rate in the second quarter and the 10.1 percent rate in the first quarter.

In conjunction with other economic statistics, the report pointed to an economy barely growing to provide jobs for an expanding workforce and the prospect of even higher unemployment in the months ahead.

The figures on the nation's output of goods and services adjusted for inflation, or what the government calls "real" gross national product, support Democratic presidential candidate Walter Mondale's claim that massive trade deficits are severely hurting the American economy.

Imports surged nearly 11 percent during the third quarter, while exports grew less than 4 percent. As a result, half the economy's expansion went overseas.

The major reason for the flood of imports can be traced to an overvalued U.S. dollar, which has priced American exports out of world markets while giving imports a wide cost advantage in both domestic and other foreign markets.

At a conference of the Business Council earlier this month, Chairperson Paula Stern of the U.S. International Trade Commission warned that the nation's soaring trade deficit resulting from the overvaluation of the dollar has cost the country 2.5 million jobs so far.

Loss of jobs

"The jobs are gone—permanently," she said, blaming the "super dollar" on failure of the Reagan Administration to "think trade when we think overall macroeconomic policy."

There were other signs of a troubled economy:

- Durable factory orders plunged 4.3 percent in September, the largest drop in five months. The decline in durable goods orders partly reflected a slowdown in consumer demand during the summer months.
- In a related report, the Federal Reserve Board said U.S. factories, mining companies, and utility firms operated at 81.9 percent of capacity last month, down seven-tenths of 1 percent from August. The brief auto strike against General Motors had some effect, but the slowdown had been in progress before that.
- Inflation, while still moderate, is trending upward as borne out by a report from the Bureau of Labor Statistics. The government's Consumer Price Index for Urban Wage Earners & Clerical Workers (CPI-W) rose a seasonally adjusted five-tenths of 1 percent in September.

Over the three months ended in September, retail prices as measured by the CPI have risen at an annual rate of 7.5 percent. In the 12 months ended in September, the rise was 3.8 percent.

- New housing starts rose 8.9 percent in September after two straight months of decline, the Commerce Dept. reported. But building permits—an indicator of future activity—were down 5.4 percent and new starts can be expected to continue to decline.

UAW strikes Mack Trucks in three states

Members of the Auto Workers walked off their jobs at four plants of Mack Trucks, Inc., in three states and one in Canada, after talks broke down and their contract with the heavy-duty truck manufacturer expired.

Bill Casstevens, director of the union's Mack Truck Dept., said the two sides "remain far apart on several issues, most notably job security." He charged that management was not serious about the union's concerns over job security.

"The company has displayed an unreasonable and unrealistic attitude on this critical issue," Casstevens said.

The walkout began Oct. 21 following more than two months of negotiations. The parties are seeking to replace a two-year agreement covering some 9,200 workers. The struck plants are in Hagerstown, Md., Allentown, Pa., Bridgewater, N.J., Macungie, Pa., and Oakville, Ont. The UAW's last strike at Mack was in 1964.

Another key issue separating the parties is a company move to take away health care coverage. Casstevens said the company's plan "amounts to nothing more than shifting the burden of the rising cost of health care to the backs of workers rather than seeking acceptable ways of controlling and containing costs."

Canadian GM strike

Meanwhile, talks between the UAW's Canadian unit and General Motors of Canada took a turn for the better and the union indicated there could be a quick settlement in the 10-day strike of some 36,000 Canadian workers.

Canadian UAW Director Robert White said "the impasse has been broken" following his Oct. 24 meeting in Toronto with GM Canada's chief negotiator, Rod Andrew. He said the two sides "have found a key to unlock some fundamental issues."

The walkout at all nine GM Canada plants got under way Oct. 17. GM halted production at some of its facilities in the United States which are dependent on Canadian-made parts, laying off more than 18,000 workers.

The Canadian workers want less emphasis on job security, which was the centerpiece of the U.S. agreement, preferring instead greater economic gains because of the weaker currency in Canada.

Health checks

AFL-CIO headquarters staff members participate in a day-long health and information fair to kick off the annual United Way campaign. Suzanne Hawkins of the federation's Credit Union, center, gives a blood sample for a diabetes test. Hearing and blood pressure tests were also available. Community groups taking part in the event included the Big Brothers, Girl Scouts, Red Cross, Hearing & Speech Society, the Juvenile Diabetes Foundation and the United Labor Agency serving metropolitan Washington.

James C. Petrillo dies at 92, longtime Musicians' leader

Chicago—James C. Petrillo, a hero to professional musicians and one of the most colorful leaders the trade union movement has produced, died Oct. 23 at the age of 92 after a stroke.

He was a legend in his time as he battled with every weapon in the trade union arsenal to preserve live music and jobs for musicians as the nation entered an era of phonograph records and disc jockeys.

Tens of thousands of free performances by bands and orchestras across the country are financed by the phonograph royalties that the American Federation of Musicians won under Petrillo's leadership after a bitter 27-month strike in 1942 against the recording companies. He was reviled as a "labor dictator" in much of the nation's press at the time.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue spoke of his deep commitment to the members of his union in messages to the Petrillo family and to Musicians President Victor W. Fuentealba. Petrillo was an AFL vice president when the labor federations merged in 1955 and served on the AFL-CIO Executive Council until he stepped down as president of the Musicians in 1958. "He was a bulwark of strength" in achieving labor unity, the AFL-CIO officers noted.

Petrillo, who left school to work after the fourth grade, got free trumpet lessons at Hull House in Chicago, the settlement run by Jane Addams. By the age of 14 he had his own four-piece dance band.

He first headed an independent musicians union, then joined AFM Local 10 in Chicago. In those early years, he led a successful strike against Chicago's theaters, helped unionize the city's hotels, negotiated the first contract for musicians with a radio station, and won important pay increases for opera and symphony musicians. He was president of the local from 1922 to 1962.

At the behest of radio stations, Congress passed the Lea Act as an anti-Petrillo law to forbid the union from insisting on the employment of live musicians. A successful AFM campaign brought about repeal of the law in 1980.

Petrillo became president of the AFM in 1940 and served until 1958, when he refused nominaiton for a 19th term. Typically, he refused a pension since he would be getting a paycheck from Local 10. "It wouldn't be honorable," he said, chastising the delegates who insisted on pushing through the resolution. But he was miffed, too, at delegates who opposed the motion. They knew "damn well" that he'd refuse the pension, he chided, "and still some of you vote 'no.' "

That was vintage Petrillo, as was his account of the union convention at which he and then-President Harry Truman played a trumpet and piano duet.

"We played 'The Gang's All Here,' " Petrillo recalled. "Truman played in one key. I played in another, and the delegates were falling on the floor laughing."

Survivors include two sons, James and Lee, and a daughter, Marie De Rose.

Federal tax windfall benefits nation's richest corporations

Taxes in the Reagan Years, was written by its director of federal tax policy, Robert S. McIntyre.

McIntyre cited the corporate tax break windfall that resulted from Reagan's policies as one of the major culprits behind the Administration's record-shattering federal budget deficits.

Corporate tax revenues have been on the slide since the 1950s, dropping from about 25 percent of all federal revenues to 6.2 percent in 1983, but the "largest single blow to the corporate income tax" came in 1981 with passage of the Reagan tax bill, McIntyre said.

That bill created a new system of super-accelerated write-offs for business investments in plant and equipment which "opened up massive new possibilities for legalized corporate tax avoidance" despite some reforms passed by Congress in 1982, McIntyre observed.

The study noted that while federal tax codes call for companies to pay 46 percent of their income over $100,000 in taxes, only a handful of the 250 firms surveyed pay anything near that rate.

In 1983, 129 of the companies paid an effective tax rate of only four-tenths of a percent on total profits of $45 billion.

Yet, in the same period, the study showed, the average American taxpayer paid an effective rate of 12 percent on personal income.

Among the well-known companies that paid rates lower than the average family over the Reagan years were AT&T, Westinghouse, Sears, and Union Pacific Railroad, the survey showed.

McIntyre pointed out that the difference between the 46 percent of income and the amount companies actually pay in taxes represents the cost of corporate tax loopholes—"lost federal revenues which must be offset by taxes on other taxpayers either now, or in the case of the funds borrowed because of the deficit, in the future."

14.1 percent rate

The study found the 250 companies examined paid $41.1 billion in taxes on profits of $291.4 billion over the three years, or an average rate of 14.1 percent. If they had paid the full statutory rate on their income, they would have paid an additional $91.4 billion in federal taxes since 1981. Had it not been for the loopholes, the corporations would have paid an additional $31.8 billion in taxes in 1983 alone, the survey showed.

McIntyre also asserted that the massive corporate tax breaks have not only damaged the economy by contributing to the dangerous budget deficit, they have also failed to deliver the "investment incentives" they were supposed to provide.

Postal Service dispute goes to arbitration

The process of arbitrating a "conclusive and binding" settlement of pay and benefits for some 600,000 unionized employees of the U.S. Postal Service got under way Oct. 19 after a three-month impasse in contract talks.

The first step is the selection of three different panels to hear evidence from the parties in the dispute and draft terms of new contracts. After the arbitrators are chosen by the USPS and the four unions representing the workers, they will have 45 days to draw up the agreements.

The Letter Carriers and the Postal Workers—the two largest unions—bargain jointly and are covered by one contract. Together, they represent about 500,000 workers in city letter carrier, clerk, maintenance and motor vehicle operator positions.

The Mail Handlers' division of the Laborers, representing some 40,000 workers, and the unaffiliated National Association of Rural Letter Carriers, representing 60,000 employees, negotiate separately with the Postal Service.

The arbitration process, which is required under the Postal Reorganization Act of 1970 if the parties fail to reach agreement on a new pact within 90 days of the expiration of the old contract, is new to both the USPS and the unions.

While arbitration has been used in the past to narrow issues and to resolve one of the smaller contracts, this is the first time that outside referees have been called on to settle an entire agreement.

The unions' previous three-year contracts with USPS expired on July 20. Talks, which had been under way for about three months at that point, came to a halt on that date with wide differences remaining.

Key issues

The most divisive issues were demands by the Postal Service for a three-year pay freeze and a lower wage rate for newly hired workers.

Two impartial panels of federal fact-finders, called in to study the dispute between USPS and the two smaller unions, have since issued reports condemning the proposal for lower pay for new workers. In the case of the Mail Handlers, a $2,000 wage boost was also recommended. The panel hearing the Rural Letter Carriers' dispute also called for equalization of pay between rural and urban carriers.

The NALC and APWU waived fact-finding and have met sporadically with the Postal Service to discuss largely non-economic issues.

G.P. Van Arkel dies, retired ITU counsel

Gerhard P. Van Arkel, who protested the Taft-Hartley amendments to the National Labor Relations Act in 1947 by resigning his post as general counsel of the National Labor Relations Board, died Oct. 8 of heart ailments at the Georgetown University Hospital. He was 77.

When President Truman vetoed the Taft-Hartley bill, Van Arkel helped draft the message to Congress explaining the action. When the Republican-controlled Congress overrode the veto, Van Arkel resigned because he felt the effectiveness of the NLRB had been undermined. Truman sent him a message of thanks.

Van Arkel then formed a law partnership with Henry Kaiser, and among his clients was the Typographical Union, which he served as general counsel for 27 years. He also represented a number of other unions.

Van Arkel began his career in a Boston law firm in 1933 and a year later, moved to Washington where he went to work for the Federal Housing Administration. He also worked at the Securities & Exchange Commission before his service with the NLRB. During World War II, he was in the Office of Strategic Services, a predecessor of the Central Intelligence Agency.

Since 1981, he had been of counsel of the firm of Bredhoff & Kaiser.

GOP seeks working control of House bother to put up a candidate to oppose him.

Some of the closest elections, as indicated by various political surveys, are listed below. They involve 22 seats now held by Democrats and 11 held by Republicans. It's likely that most of the House changes will take place in these districts. But there are at least as many more House contests in which a relatively small shift of votes could change the anticipated outcome.

Alabama—In the 1st District, which includes Mobile, Republican Jack Edwards is retiring after 10 terms. The GOP candidate is a former Democrat, Sonny Callahan. It's Reagan country, but Democrat Frank McRight has a good chance to win.

The Republican takeover threat is in the Birmingham area 6th District, where two years ago Democrat Ben Erdreich ended 18 years of GOP representation. He compiled the best COPE record in the Alabama delegation. The Republican candidate is former Democrat J. T. Waggoner, who hopes to ride a Reagan tide.

Arkansas—The 2nd District seat in Little Rock is open because incumbent Ed Bethune is the Republican candidate for Senate this year. Colorful and sometimes controversial Sheriff Tommy Robinson, the Democratic candidate, seems to have an edge over a hard-rock conservative Republican, Judy Petty. He supports the Equal Rights Amendment; she opposes it.

California—The 36th District (San Bernardino) will have the third successive contest between 10-term Democrat George E. Brown, Jr., with a 90 percent "right" COPE record, and John Paul Stark, a right-wing Republican. The seat is a U.S. Chamber of Commerce takeover target.

Republicans and the business political action committees have also targeted the Santa Ana area 38th District that Democrat Jerry Patterson has represented for five terms. GOP candidate Robert Dornan, a New Right leader, had previously represented a nearby congressional district.

Colorado—Retirement of Democrat Ray Kogovesk in the Pueblo area 3rd District gives an opening to Republican Michael Stang, a moderate in the legislature but a conservative on the campaign trail. The Democratic candidate, the strongly environmentalist mayor of a resort community, is W Mitchell (the letter "W" is his full first name). Campaigning effectively from a wheelchair, he was the surprise winner in the primary.

Connecticut — Two Democrats face strong re-election challenges. In the 3rd District, New Haven, Bruce A. Morrison is opposed by the Republican he narrowly ousted two years ago, Lawrence J. DeNardis. And in the 5th District, Waterbury-Danbury, three-term Democrat William R. Ratchford is being hard-pressed by Republican legislator John G. Rowland. The Democrats' best takeover hope is in the 6th District, New Britain, where Arthur H. House is trying to deny a second term to Democrat Nancy L. Johnson. Labor is active in all three contests.

Kansas City rally on the eve of the second Presidential debate draws workers, farmers, senior citizens and women's groups to protest Reagan policies that have brought economic disaster to Midwest farm areas.

Delaware—Incumbent Thomas R. Carper would normally be a solid favorite to retain the state's lone congressional district. But he faces a challenge from Elise du Pont, who is the wife of the state's two-term governor. It's close.

Idaho—Reagan's strength in Idaho's 2nd District is the chief hope for incumbent Republican George Hansen, who has been sentenced to a 5-15-month prison term for falsifying financial disclosure forms and was reprimanded by the House. The Democratic candidate is Richard Stallings, a professor who came close two years ago.

Illinois—The best chance of a Democratic pickup is the Champaign-Urbana 19th District represented by Republican Daniel B. Crane (37 "right," 274 "wrong" votes in three terms). Crane was censured for sexual misconduct with a congressional page last year and may be vulnerable to the Democratic challenge of State Rep. Terry L. Bruce.

Other Illinois contests may be close, but former Democratic Congressman Kenneth J. Gray is given an edge to regain the 22nd District seat he had held for 20 years before retiring in 1974 for health reasons. The incumbent, Paul Simon, is the Democratic candidate for the Senate.

Indiana—Reagan's strength here threatens five-term Democrat Philip Sharpe in the Muncie 2nd District and freshman Frank McCloskey in the Evansville 8th District. The Chamber of Commerce has asked business PACS nationwide to rush funds to help Republican challengers Ken MacKenzie and Richard McIntyre. Another business target is to save conservative Republican John Hiller in the South Bend 3rd District from a strong Democrat, Michael P. Barnes.

Iowa—The 5th District seat Democrat Tom Harkin gave up to run for the Senate is being closely contested by two strong candidates, Democrat Jerome Fitzgerald, former state House majority leader, and Republican Jim Lightfoot, who conducted a popular farm radio program.

Kansas—In the Kansas City 3rd District, veteran Republican Larry Winn is retiring. Democrat John Reardon, the mayor of Kansas City, has a good chance. So does Republican State Sen. Jan Meyers, a relative moderate.

Maryland—This is the third rematch in the suburban Baltimore 2nd District between 11-term Democrat Clarence D. Long and Republican Helen Delich Bentley, a former head of the Federal Maritime Commission. Long, who is 75 and has influential seniority in the House, is the target of a national Republican effort.

Massachusetts—Democrat James Shannon would easily have been re-elected, but gave up his seat to run unsuccessfully for Senate nomination. That makes it closer in the Lowell-Lawrence 5th District between Democrat Chester Atkins and Republican Gregory Hyatt. In the South Shore 10th District, the House censure of six-term Democrat Gerry Studds gives an opening to Republican Lewis Crampton.

Mississippi—Republican Webb Franklin very narrowly won in 1982 in the Delta area 2nd District, defeating the bid of Democratic State Rep. Robert G. Clark to become the state's first black congressman in this century. Franklin has the advantage of incumbency, but Clark is helped by redistricting that added black voters.

New Hampshire — Popular Democrat Norman E. D'Amours gave up the 1st District seat to run for the Senate. Conservative Republican Robert C. Smith is running against Dudley Dudley, a woman with a national reputation as a liberal activist and an elected state official.

New Jersey—In the suburban Newark 11th District, as it used to be, Democrat Joseph G. Minish won an 11th term in 1982 with 64 percent of the vote. But a court-ordered redistricting has made his seat vulnerable this year. The challenger is Dean A. Gallo, the Republican leader of the state Assembly.

New York—Moderate Republican Bill Green represents a Democratic constituency in the 15th District, on Manhattan's east side. This year he faces a very strong challenge from Democrat Andrew J. Stein, the borough president of Manhattan.

Democrat Richard Ottinger is retiring in the Westchester County 20th District and his former aide, Oren J. Teicher is running to succeed him. The Republican candidate, a conservative who praises Reagan's policies, is Joseph DioGuardi.

North Carolina—Republican targets are six-timer Ike Andrews in the Raleigh area 4th District and freshman Robin Britt in the Greensboro 6th District. Andrews, a conservative, is opposed by the more conservative William Cobey, Jr. Britt, who has a better Democratic voting record, faces Howard Coble, who beat a more conservative Republican in the primary.

Democrats hope to pick up the Charlotte 9th Ditsrict seat of Republican gubernatorial candidate James G. Martin. The Democratic candidate, no relation, is political newcomer D. G. Martin. His GOP opponent is J. Alex McMillan.

Pennsylvania — In suburban districts around Philadelphia, five-term Democrat Bob Edgar faces another close 7th District election, this time against Curt Weldon. In the 8th District, Peter H. Kostmayer is challenged by David A. Christian. Both Republican contenders are on the Chamber of Commerce "send money" list.

Texas—Two open seats could switch parties. In the Dallas-Fort Worth 6th District, that had been represented by Democrat-turned-Republican Phil Gramm, Democrat Dan Kubiak seems to have an edge over Republican Joe Barton. The other seat is in the Lubbock area 19th District, which conservative Democrat Kent Hance gave up to run unsuccessfully for the Senate nomination. His former legislative aide, Don Richards, is the Democratic candidate and a former aide to Sen. John Tower, Larry Combest, is the Republican.

Utah—The surprise is that a Republican-held open seat in the Salt Lake City 2nd District may be won by a relatively liberal Democrat, former State Sen. Frances Farley. She's holding her own against the Republican, Lt. Gov. David Monson.

'12,000 American workers will never forget...'

The author of the following article was a member of the Professional Air Traffic Controllers. His name has been withheld at his request.

In 1980 I, a union member, voted for Ronald Reagan.

It was a vote based primarily on selfish motives. He had specifically promised, in writing, to improve my profession—if only my union would endorse his candidacy. So I and my fellow air traffic controllers, figuring that Jimmy Carter wasn't interested in helping us, gave the go-ahead to PATCO officials to endorse Mr. Reagan. The rest is history.

Yes, we broke the law by going on strike. I will not even attempt to defend that. Though most people know we were fired en masse, they assume most of us are back at the scopes. They couldn't be more wrong. I personally decided on day one of the strike that I never wanted to return under the existing working conditions anyway, although I know many of my former colleagues would like to shake the specter of blacklisting.

Union-busting is bad enough, but I will never forget nor forgive the Republican Party and particularly Ronald Reagan for what happened afterward. For while Mr. Reagan was publicly praising Solidarity's courage for defying a military regime (in Poland), he was crushing an American union which dared defy him.

Those who did not comply with his 48-hour ultimatum were not only irrevocably fired, but because of deliberate government action, denied unemployment benefits, food stamps, and in some cases, extensions on FHA and VA mortgages. How? Despite the fact that we were fired publicly, state unemployment offices were advised by federal agencies that we had quit; food stamp offices were advised we were on strike; and finally, a written message went to FHA and VA mortgage lenders that ex-controllers had been fired for cause and should not be granted extensions.

Private sector employers were not the answer either. Most were either caught up in the officially sponsored hatred, or believed the controllers would be rehired after the smoke cleared. Though legal action reversed some of the vindictiveness, the intent was clear—economic capital punishment—total and complete.

The majority of PATCO members had received their training in the military and were Vietnam era veterans. Perhaps that's why the questionnaires which arrived in March 1982 were particularly infuriating.

Those who recall the 1950s should recognize the wording of the first question: "Are you now, or have you ever been, a member of PATCO?" The 34 questions, which government lawyers warned us to answer at the risk of forfeiting our cases, demanded the where, when, why, attendance, and subjects discussed at union meetings. In one of the few court decisions that went our way, 23 of the questions were later ruled unconstitutional.

On Dec. 9, 1981, in response to pressure from some who asked that the fired controllers be re-employed for Christmas, Mr. Reagan stated that fired controllers could apply for any other federal job for which they were qualified. It was a cruel hoax. Those who applied to agencies they had previously worked for were told they'd have to pass a "suitability review" which could take months to complete. In fact, several who had been rehired in the postal system were subsequently dismissed. Suitability, of course, was based on whether or not they'd been active union members.

Because Ronald Reagan comes across as a nice guy, some want to forget PATCO ever happened. Maybe even Reagan's forgotten. Nearly 12,000 American workers will never forget.

Rejected by Congress

Reagan's deficit 'plan' looks for deeper cuts

President Reagan's "plan" to reduce the federal deficit if he wins a second term is no longer secret. In includes deep cuts in social security, reductions in education programs, further slashes in food stamps, housing and other forms of low-income assistance, and an end to operating funds for mass transit systems.

That's the conclusion of congressional Democrats who took Reagan at his word when he responded to a question about his second-term plans for bringing down the deficit.

"Take a look at the budgets I've already submitted and look at the cuts that I've asked for and was not given," the President responded.

The Democratic Study Group, an organization of most House Democrats, did just that.

Congress went along with many of the cutbacks Reagan had sought, especially during the first two years of his term. But even congressional conservatives balked at some of White House requests.

The President's original proposals for social security benefit reductions were among the rejected proposals, the DSG noted. Cutbacks sought in health services, including but not limited to Medicare and Medicaid, were heavier than Congress was willing to approve.

Program cuts

Congress made some cuts in supplementary security income—the program for the elderly needy, blind or disabled—but not by the $1.5 billion sought by the President.

Congress balked also at various Administration proposals that would have eliminated the special milk program and summer food program for school children, ended nutrition assistance for family day care programs, and required parents seeking free or reduced-price school lunches for their children to apply at local welfare offices.

Environmental cuts sought would have reduced funding for water pollution cleanup efforts by 62 percent in constant dollars from 1979 levels, the DSG noted.

Even if all of the rejected budget cuts were made by the new Congress, the DSG report concluded, Reagan's opposition to tax increases and insistence on a big rise in military spending would leave the budget deficit virtually intact. Under those circumstances, it said, "a second Reagan Administration will have to go beyond the draconian cuts proposed over the past four years in order to make a significant dent in the deficit."

Reagan commercial

The Reagan campaign has hammered hard at the assertion by Democratic presidential candidate Walter Mondale that a tax increase will be inevitable to bring the deficit under control, no matter who wins the presidency. One of its often-repeated television commercials claims the Democrats are proposing a tax increase of $157 a month for the average American family.

But the DSG notes that the television spot was first aired six days before Mondale unveiled his deficit-reduction plan, and the $157-a-month figure "bears no resemblance" to anything proposed by Mondale. Households with incomes of $30,000 a year would pay $8-a-month more. Only families with incomes over $100,000 would come near the tax increase cited by the Republicans.

City government bargaining units upheld in Chicago

Chicago—Certification of union representation elections covering 10,000 of the city government's white-collar employees became final as court challenges were exhausted.

The elections were held last June in five units, four of which chose representation by the State, County & Municipal Employees. The fifth unit, including crossing guards and civilian police dispatchers, was won jointly by the Electrical Workers and the Service Employees.

Units that chose AFSCME included some 4,200 administrative and clerical workers, 1,700 human service and inspection workers, 1,500 professionals and 700 library workers.

Chicago locals of the Laborers and the Teamsters had challenged the elections unsuccessfully in the Cook County Circuit Court and the Illinois appellate court. The Laborers had also sought review by the state Supreme Court. They challenged the makeup of the bargaining units and contended that the Illinois Public Labor Relations Act, which went into effect in July, had pre-empted action by the city. Earlier, Mayor Harold Washington had granted recognition to a coalition of 45 unions representing various groups of blue-collar workers.

Democratic Vice Presidential nominee Geraldine Ferraro campaigns in her home district in Queens, N.Y., with Thomas Manton, who is running for the congressional seat she is vacating.

women . . . a vote to ship your plant and your job overseas . . . to cut prevailing wages . . . and to bust unions," Kirkland said in city after city. That's "the message we must get across to our members," he urged.

The common denominator of the AFL-CIO meetings was enthusiasm, a determination to turn the presidential campaign around and to elect a Congress responsive to worker interests.

The acceleration of the campaign was visible almost day-by-day, and the Chicago meeting was a highlight. Plumbers Hall, on Chicago's West Side was jammed to capacity—1,800 local union leaders, by one paper's estimate. They represented the full range of the metropolitan area's trade union membership — blue-collar, white-collar, service trades, teachers and other professionals.

Mondale's stepped-up campaign was an effort to take full advantage of the improved public perception of the Democratic challenger after the two presidential debates.

The first debate had such a powerful impact in showing President Reagan at his worst that a generally acknowledged victory by Mondale in the follow-up foreign policy debate was seen as a comeback by Reagan because he didn't look or sound as bad.

In a post-debate episode, however, a Mondale barb sunk in and Reagan entangled himself still further trying to explain it away.

Letter to Nixon

Reagan has frequently quoted President John F. Kennedy in his campaign speeches, as part of a calculated effort to woo traditional Democratic voters to the Republican fold. He continued to do so even after it was revealed that Reagan headed a campaign committee for Nixon during the 1960 presidential election in which he ran against Kennedy.

Mondale then came up with a copy of a handwritten letter which Reagan wrote to Nixon during that campaign, likening Kennedy's program to the principles of Karl Marx and Adolf Hitler.

Reagan told reporters the next day that he considers what he wrote in 1960 to be "a good letter . . . explaining my philosophy." But Kennedy as President was a source of "some wonderful quotes," Reagan explained.

The AFL-CIO has sent COPE-prepared "one-on-one" guides for local union leadership to affiliated unions, and Kirkland pressed the program at meetings sponsored by central labor councils and area unions along the Solidarity Van's nine-state route.

The second week of the motorized version of a whistle-stop tour took Kirkland to Akron, Cleveland, Sandusky and Toledo in Ohio; to Detroit and its environs, Lansing and Grand Rapids, Mich., into Chicago, Rock Island and Rockford, Ill., with a scheduled final day in Kenosha and Milwaukee, Wis. Kirkland will be making get-out-the-vote forays to other locations in the final days of the campaign.

Key participation

Candidates for the House and Senate took part in many of the AFL-CIO meetings. The Solidarity Van's itinerary was drawn up to touch as many as possible congressional districts where the turnout by AFL-CIO members could be decisive.

The men and women Kirkland spoke to are the cadres of the one-on-one campaign —for the most part, jobsite leaders who have the respect of their fellow workers and are able to translate the election message into the issues of most direct concern to their fellow union members.

I.S. Falk dies at 85, social security pioneer

New Haven, Conn.—Isidore S. Falk, a pioneer in the effort to achieve social security and the continuing campaign for national health insurance, died Oct. 4 following a stroke. He was 85.

Falk served as research director of the Social Security Administration under Presidents Roosevelt and Truman. In addition to his work as a health care consultant, he was a professor at Yale University.

He had also been a health care consultant to the Steelworkers, and chaired the technical subcommittee of the Committee on National Health Insurance.

Reagan vetoes public broadcast funds

President Reagan's second veto of funding legislation for public radio and television is "appalling, but not surprising," the AFL-CIO Dept. for Professional Employees said.

"Public broadcasting has been on this Administration's hit list since it first took office," DPE Director Jack Golodner said. The "real question" now, he suggested, is whether public broadcasting will survive as Congress intended if Reagan is re-elected.

After Reagan vetoed an earlier bill authorizing funds for the Corporation for Public Broadcasting, Sen. Barry Goldwater (R-Ariz.) sought to work with the White House for approval of a lower level of funding. Goldwater has been a strong supporter of the program.

A compromise authorizing $775 million over three years—a cut of $145 million from the vetoed bill—passed the Senate unanimously before adjournment and was approved by the House, 308-86.

After Congress adjourned, when no override effort could be made, Reagan vetoed that bill as well.

Kirkland: 'Reach out to our members'

The following is the basic speech text containing AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland's message to local union leaders in his pre-election tour to help mobilize labor's get-out-the-vote drive among union members.

I want to thank all of you for coming out to meet us. Before our trip is over, we will have been at dozens of meetings like this in nine states.

We are here to urge each and every one of you to make the maximum effort between now and election day to mobilize your members on behalf of Fritz Mondale and Geraldine Ferraro and your COPE-endorsed congressional candidates.

I don't have to tell you what this election means to the trade union movement—and to working people in general. You have to go back a long way—to the days of Hoover, Coolidge and Harding—to find an Administration as hostile to labor as Ronald Reagan's.

Misplaced talents

Reagan is a man whose God-given talents could have been placed—as they were for a little while in his youth (before Death Valley Days)—in the service of the less fortunate in life, on behalf of hard-pressed plain people. But this is a man who sold his talents out, many years ago, to the forces of greed and privilege.

This is a man whose cynical exploitation of the most lofty ideals of the human spirit goes beyond mere hypocrisy.

This is a man who appeals to patriotism for the benefit of those business and banking interests who would sell their own country out for an easy ruble, or a peso, or a yen; who don't care what flag flies over their plants and ships; who are as loyal to the flags of Liberia or Saudi Arabia, or to the Rising Sun, as to the Stars and Stripes. Republican patriotism, Republican jobs, and Republican flags are all made in Taiwan.

This is a man who callously invokes religion in the service of the agents of bigotry and intolerance and in the denial of the hopes and needs of the underprivileged and the poor in spirit, the subjects of the Sermon on the Mount.

But if Fritz Mondale is elected, we shall have in the White House a tried and proven friend of labor, someone who understands and identifies with the problems of working people. We would have someone in the White House we could work with, who would listen to our concerns and judge them fairly in the broad public interest, who believes that working people have a right to a voice in the economic and political life of the nation.

But if Ronald Reagan is re-elected, we will continue to have, behind the rosy image, a White House controlled by cold and faceless manipulators, dedicated to the single proposition that government of the rich, by the rich, and for the rich shall remain firmly planted in the saddle, while the nation fades into the sunset of the closing scene of his last performance.

The message we must get across to our members is a very simple, obvious but powerful one: A vote for Ronald Reagan is a vote for the worst enemies of working men and women.

Ultra-rightists

A vote for Ronald Reagan is a vote for the right-to-workers and the scab-herders of the Associated Building Contractors and the professional union-busters to whom he has turned over control of the Labor Dept. and the NLRB, lock, stock and barrel.

A vote for Ronald Reagan is a vote to ship your plant and your job overseas in search of the weakest, the cheapest, and the most exploited labor in the world.

A vote for Ronald Reagan is a vote to tax all your fringe benefits and to cut your mother's and father's Medicare rights.

A vote for Ronald Reagan is a vote to cut prevailing wages, even the minimum wage, and to bust unions and blacklist workers, as he himself did, to set an example for employers at large.

A vote for Ronald Reagan is a vote for the likes of his best buddy, Joe Coors, a member of his kitchen cabinet, who instructs him in the art of union-busting and who likes to keep his own employees strapped to lie detectors.

Speaking of lie detectors, we have a member of the Cabinet, the Secretary of Labor—at least he was still there when I left Washington—who felt compelled to submit himself to a lie detector test. But I can tell you, from my own personal experience with this man, that he has nothing to fear from a lie detector. He doesn't sweat when he lies.

I don't share the view now being expressed by many journalists that Ronald Reagan's problem is one of age. Reagan's philosophy and policies would be just as bad, just as dangerous to working people, if he were 30 years younger. On the contrary, the trouble with his responses to questions and issues is not that they show age. All of us were taught to respect age and to believe that it brought wisdom. But wisdom passed him by completely.

After all, this is a man who enjoys playing with notions of Armageddon and the imminent destruction of the human species; a man who truly believes that trees are the major cause of pollution; a man who in 1960 claimed that J. F. Kennedy's ideas came from Karl Marx and Adolf Hitler.

In some ways, Reagan is the youngest candidate—because he has some unused vital parts, especially his heart, which has very, very low mileage on it.

Now we can understand why Mr. Reagan's managers keep him in protective custody and are afraid to let him out without keepers to shield him from hard questions. That isn't Teflon after all—but Styrofoam they keep him packed in so he won't break.

Mr. Reagan knows that most Americans do not agree with him on the vital issues, that they do not buy the Republican platform that he and Rev. Jerry Falwell put together. But he believes he can mesmerize the American people with a flood of visual effects—a sea of balloons and waving flags; misty commercials oozing with nostalgia for a mythical past that never was, and promising us a future of cost-free, painless bliss that never will be.

TV impact

The theory of his campaign is that television has turned the American mind into mush, that we are no longer capable of distinguishing between fantasy and reality.

But Fritz Mondale is out there leveling with the American people. He is telling them the sober truth—and exactly what he proposes to do about it. That's the highest tribute a political leader can pay to the intelligence and good judgment of the citizens of a democracy. That's the difference between real leadership and phony showmanship. It's the difference between trusting the people and fearing the people.

We have seen that difference in the debates. Fritz Mondale has shown that he—and not Reagan—has the knowledge, the clear-headedness, and the qualities of leadership required for the presidency of the United States of America.

In the first debate, tens of millions of Americans saw Fritz expose Reagan's hypocrisy on the social security issue, as one example. Four years ago, Reagan said he would not touch social security. Then he tried to cut it by 25 percent. Then he said in the debate that he would not cut benefits for current recipients. Then, as Fritz hammered away, he said he wouldn't cut it for future recipients.

You know, presidents have come a long way since George Washington. As you remember from your school primers, George Washington couldn't tell a lie. Richard Nixon couldn't tell the truth. Now we have Ronald Reagan who can't tell the difference.

In their second debate, we saw Fritz speak seriously to the urgent problems of foreign policy and national defense, while Mr. Reagan disappeared in a time capsule.

Reagan talked about giving the Soviet Union a trillion-dollar Star Wars technology that can't be developed, if ever, until most of us are dead. And in his closing remarks he reminisced about a letter he placed in a time capsule to be opened a hundred years from now.

When Fritz pulled him back to the here and now, Reagan revealed his greatest talent—the art of evasion and ducking responsibility.

At the Philadelphia stop on the Solidarity Van tour, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland talks with local union members and officers.

He didn't make the decision to place the Marines in the deadly, defenseless barracks in Lebanon—that was done by a local commander.

He was not responsible for that CIA manual prescribing assassinations and kidnappings and the recruitment of criminals in Nicaragua—that was done by a CIA subcontractor.

If you thought you felt an earth tremor during the debate, that was Harry Truman spinning in his grave. Harry Truman's motto was "The buck stops here." Mr. Reagan's motto: "The buck went thataway."

Reagan had the colossal gall to use Harry Truman's railcar to whistle-stop Ohio—in what Fritz Mondale aptly called "the Great Train Robbery."

Mr. Reagan may hijack Harry Truman's railcar for his show-biz campaign, but he can never measure up to Harry Truman as Commander-in-Chief.

We've got a great vice presidential candidate in Geraldine Ferraro. She, too, understands the problems of working people. Her mother was a member of the International Ladies' Garment Workers Union, and Gerry herself was a shop steward for the American Federation of Teachers.

It's time we had a shop steward in the office of the vice presidency.

In her debate with George Bush, Geraldine Ferraro more than held her own. In fact, she got George Bush a little hysterical. He almost lost control of himself—gushing about his unlimited loyalty to the President and his boundless awe of Mr. Reagan's intellectual prowess and command of the issues.

'Rumpies'

Mr. Bush represents a rising new political force on the American scene. I call them Republican upwardly mobile professionals—in other words, Rumpies. The distinguishing characteristic of Rumpies is that, with regard to the rump, they kick it when it is down and kiss it when it is up.

Now, since his debates with Reagan, many more of our people understand why we were for Mondale from the beginning—because he's a fighter and he's on our side. Now they should know for sure that a vote for Fritz Mondale is a vote to keep their jobs here in America, with opportunities for young people to do something better with their lives than push hamburgers and Chicken McNuggets.

This year we are running a $130 billion trade deficit—four times what it was when Ronald Reagan took office. That translates into three million lost jobs.

That is a precise measurement of the jobs and hopes and dreams and strength that are being drained from America and disbursed around the world.

We are not talking about part-time jobs, minimum wage jobs, casual jobs, or dead-end jobs. We are talking about the good jobs that form the foundation and avenues of opportunity for the working middle class of this country. Last month alone, during Mr. Reagan's so-called recovery, we lost 125,000 manufacturing jobs.

Make no mistake about it. There is an international trade war being waged against the United States—and we are losing it. We are losing it because this Administration has not only surrendered, it has unilaterally disarmed America. In fact, it is collaborating with the enemy. In that war, Ronald Reagan's financial supporters and cheerleaders constitute a fifth column, undermining American jobs, month after month.

Turn it around

A vote for Fritz Mondale is a vote to turn this around. A vote for Fritz Mondale is a vote for fair play and a fighting chance for women, minorities, and for everyone who depends upon a job for a living, for dignity, and for respect.

The way to win this election is to go one-on-one with those of our members who haven't yet made this connection between the meaning of their vote and their most vital concerns.

I'm sure most of you have heard the line that for a working man or woman to vote for Reagan is like a chicken voting for Colonel Sanders.

To some small extent, it's understandable. Colonel Sanders seems like such a kind and trustworthy old gentleman, who puts out a lot of corn, that there might actually be some foolish chickens who would consider voting for him.

But not if they are well-informed.

And it is our duty to do our best to keep our members out of Reagan's frying pan, by informing them of his record and intentions.

Of course, we need phone banks and letters. We need to hit the issues hard in our union publications. But we need something even more direct—face-to-face discussions with your members.

I want to urge every local union officer, every shop steward, every business agent, every union activist, every COPE committee member to make a direct one-on-one approach to as many union members as you can reach. If a member has reservations or questions about our position, we need to answer them. We need feedback and real discussion.

Building solidarity

The value of this approach goes beyond this election. It will help you to build the solidarity of the labor movement at every level—and that will pay off in many ways far into the future, I guarantee you.

Millions of voters will be making their decision in the closing days of the campaign.

The Mondale campaign is gaining force and spirit and support.

I am convinced that if we reach out to our rank and file, talking the issues and using all of the skills and tools that give our movement its strength—if we give it the very best we have got in us—we can and we will win in November.

We opened this meeting, as we open all union meetings, with the pledge of allegiance to the flag. And, we take that pledge seriously. Think about it when you vote—particularly those key words, "Liberty and justice for all." That is what this election is all about.

The Bosses' Boy

THE CHAIRMAN of the National Labor Relations Board, Donald L. Dotson, has his critics. Quite a few of them, actually, including just about everyone who has ever sat on the union side of a bargaining table. So it is only fair to note that he has some defenders also.

As a management lawyer, before he came to Washington to help out the Reagan Administration, Mr. Dotson had written of collective bargaining in connection with "the destruction of individual freedom and the destruction of the marketplace as the mechanism for determining the value of labor."

Not too surprisingly, the trade union movement wasn't exactly overjoyed when Dotson was put in charge of enforcing the federal law which declares it to be the policy of the United States "to encourage the practice and procedure of collective bargaining" and to protect workers in the exercise of their rights.

These forebodings were reinforced by the stream of anti-labor decisions and policy reversals by Dotson and other Reagan appointees to the NLRB.

But there are those who appreciate Dotson's efforts.

WITH SOME helping funds from an arm of the National Right to Work Committee, Campbell University in North Carolina has created two scholarships in labor relations named after Dotson. That called, of course, for congratulations, and both the Chamber of Commerce and the National Association of Manufacturers were effusive in their praise.

The NAM's senior vice president, Lee Hamilton, said the NLRB under Dotson "has begun the important task of restoring balance to the nation's labor laws."

Chamber of Commerce President Richard Lesher's "Dear Don" letter was even warmer.

"Your efforts and the efforts of the other Board appointees of President Reagan," Lesher wrote, "have created a dramatic shift" from the previous "pro-labor philosophies."

Lesher said he had praised Dotson's performance in a letter to President Reagan. "Once again, the National Labor Relations Act is being administered in a fair and balanced manner," the Chamber of Commerce president applauded.

Indeed, Dotson and the other Reagan appointees deserve all the praise the NAM and the Chamber so generously bestow.

The Gompers Creed

THE ELECTION CREED of Samuel Gompers, that organized labor should reward its friends and punish its enemies, is as valid in 1984 as it was in 1904.

Even in the early days of the trade union movement, Congress and the state legislatures were extensions of the bargaining table in terms of worker concerns. The prototype for today's battle over occupational health and safety standards was yesteryear's campaign for factory safety laws. The historic battle to amend the antitrust law so that a strike or boycott couldn't be ruled an illegal conspiracy in restraint of trade had its parallel this year in the successful effort to stop the federal bankruptcy law from being twisted into a weapon against unions.

Does anyone seriously doubt that unions should be concerned about such issues? Indeed, they would be shortchanging their members if they were not.

Should a union then take the logical next step and let its members know which of their representatives in Congress and the legislatures have acted on their behalf, and which have not? Should it seek to identify and support those candidates for public office most responsive to the legitimate concerns of workers?

Indeed, a union would be derelict if it did not do so.

The congressional voting records distributed with the last issue of the AFL-CIO News represent the documentation for the political endorsements the trade union movement has made.

How else can we reward our friends and punish our enemies?

Future of Medicare tied to Presidential contest

By Press Associates, Inc.

A memorable moment of the Presidential debate on domestic issues occurred when Democratic candidate Walter Mondale charged that President Ronald Reagan would raise taxes in a second term. Reagan retorted with his famous 1980 debate line to Jimmy Carter, "There you go again."

Mondale reminded the President that "the last time you said that" was when Carter charged that Reagan, if elected, would try to cut the Medicare program. "When you say, 'There you go again,' people remember that," Mondale said, recalling that Reagan had "tried to cut $20 billion" from Medicare.

Reagan claimed that he "never proposed any $20 billion should come out of Medicare," but the fact is that in 1983 he did propose roughly this amount of Medicare benefit reductions and out-of-pocket payment increases. This was one of several serious misstatements by Reagan during that debate which contributed to growing doubts about his competence and credibility.

On Medicare, Reagan said that "something is going to have to be done in the next several years to make it fiscally sound." That "something" most likely will be deeper cuts in this vital health program for the elderly if Reagan is re-elected.

Pledge to help

Mondale, on the other hand, pointed out that he had "fought for social security and Medicare and for things to help people who are vulnerable all my life, and I will do it as President of the United States."

While Mondale agrees with Reagan that action is needed to shore up Medicare financially, his solution is very different from the President's. Mondale advocates the medical cost containment approach as the fairest alternative to either Medicare cutbacks or tax increases.

This approach is embodied in the Health Care Cost Control & Medicare Solvency bill introduced in the past session of Congress by Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) and Rep. Richard A. Gephardt (D-Mo.).

Medical costs have risen at two to three times the general inflation rate for more than a decade and are heading the Medicare trust fund for insolvency. The latest government estimates show Medicare payments will begin to exceed revenues by 1991 if nothing is done.

The Kennedy-Gephardt proposal would go to the root of the problem by controlling hospital and physician charges, keeping them near the overall rate of inflation.

Cost control approach

The comprehensive, across-the-board cost control approach contained in Kennedy-Gephardt is needed. Otherwise the alternative could be something like the proposals of Reagan's Social Security Advisory Council. That conservative-dominated panel last March recommended that Medicare be kept solvent by raising the eligibility age from 65 to 67, by taxing employer-paid health insurance benefits, and by increasing beneficiaries' out-of-pocket costs.

On Sept. 13, "Senior Health Action Day," senior citizens in 90 cities marched, rallied and registered voters. They called on both major parties to do the following: Cap doctors' Medicare charges; hold down out-of-pocket costs for Medicare recipients; plan health cost containment across-the-board; use lower costs to save Medicare without cutting benefits; and maintain funding levels for the Medicaid program for low-income people.

In late August, the National Council of Senior Citizens had sent these five key health questions to the Reagan and the Mondale campaign headquarters. Mondale responded affirmatively to all five questions. The Reagan campaign did not respond at all.

The 1984 election stakes are high, not only for Medicare's 28 million beneficiaries, but for all consumers of medical care, for the financial health of Medicare, and for every taxpayer.

Labor lawyer charges

'Pirates' steer NLRB on employers' course

Dallas—A union attorney jolted a legal seminar here with a gloves-off indictment of the Reagan-appointed "pirates" who took over the National Labor Relations Board and are steering it on an anti-worker course.

Laurence J. Cohen, who represents several AFL-CIO affiliates and is general counsel of the Building & Construction Trades Dept., backed up his charge with a case-by-case analysis of major policy reversals.

The NLRB's change of direction is more than a mere "swing of a political pendulum" after an election, Cohen told the Southwestern Legal Foundation's annual Institute on Labor Law. He said the Reagan appointees are "fundamentally at odds" with the intent of the law they are supposed to enforce.

The stated purpose of the National Labor Relations Act, Cohen quoted, is to "encourage" collective bargaining and "protect" the right of workers to organize "for the purpose of negotiating the terms and conditions of their employment."

But since the Reagan "gang of three" became the majority on the NLRB last year, there has been "a wholesale assault on employee protections and union rights," he declared. The new majority has been "methodically scuttling" the law and setting the stage for a return to the "economic warfare" of 50 years ago, Cohen charged.

Policy link

Among the policy reversals cited by Cohen were several which lessened the legal obligation of employers to bargain with their workers.

In one, known as Milwaukee Springs, the three Reagan appointees held that it is no longer an unfair labor practice for an employer to lay off workers in a plant where their union had refused to accept a mid-contract pay cut and then transfer their work to a plant where wage rates were lower because the workers weren't represented by a union.

The lone holdover from the pre-Reagan NLRB, Don A. Zimmerman, dissented. He was the only dissenter, also, in another policy reversal cited by Cohen as an example of reducing protections for employees.

In that case, Myers Industries, the employer was allowed to fire a worker for refusing to drive a truck with malfunctioning brakes and reporting the unsafe equipment to state inspectors.

Even though at least one other worker had protested unsafe equipment, the firing was upheld because the board concluded that the driver hadn't been engaged in "concerted action" with other employees.

That decision reversed a 1975 precedent holding that it is concerted action within the law's protection when action taken by a single employee involves "matters of great and continuing concern for all within the workforce."

Cohen noted that the doctrine overturned by the Reagan board had been established unanimously by an NLRB panel with a Republican majority.

Another case Cohen cited, Rossmore House, also reversed a Republican-appointed board and held that an employer was free to interrogate a known supporter of the union during an organizing drive. Previously, interrogation of any worker was considered an unfair labor practice.

Double standard

Under Reagan, the NLRB has adopted a double standard on "threats" by strikers and employers, Cohen noted. The board said an employer can refuse to hire a striker who voices threats against a non-striker, even if there is no physical violence or even threatening gestures. But an employer's threat to fire workers is excused by the NLRB as merely part of the "banter and bluster of negotiations."

Analysis of the NLRB's recent decisions reveal these trends, Cohen said:

- "If the case presents a conflict between an employer's freedom to manage its business and the union's right to bargain, the employer wins.
- "If the conflict is between the employer's right to control the workplace and the rights of individual employees, the employer wins again.
- "But if the conflict is between the rights of the union and its members to act collectively, and the rights of individual employees to refrain from collective action, individual rights are suddenly paramount."

Policy reversals by the NLRB under its present chairman, Donald Dotson, go much further than reversing the labor board majority of Chairman John Fanning, who held office from 1977 to 1981, Cohen noted. Fanning board decisions represented only eight of the 17 major precedents reversed by the Reagan-appointed majority.

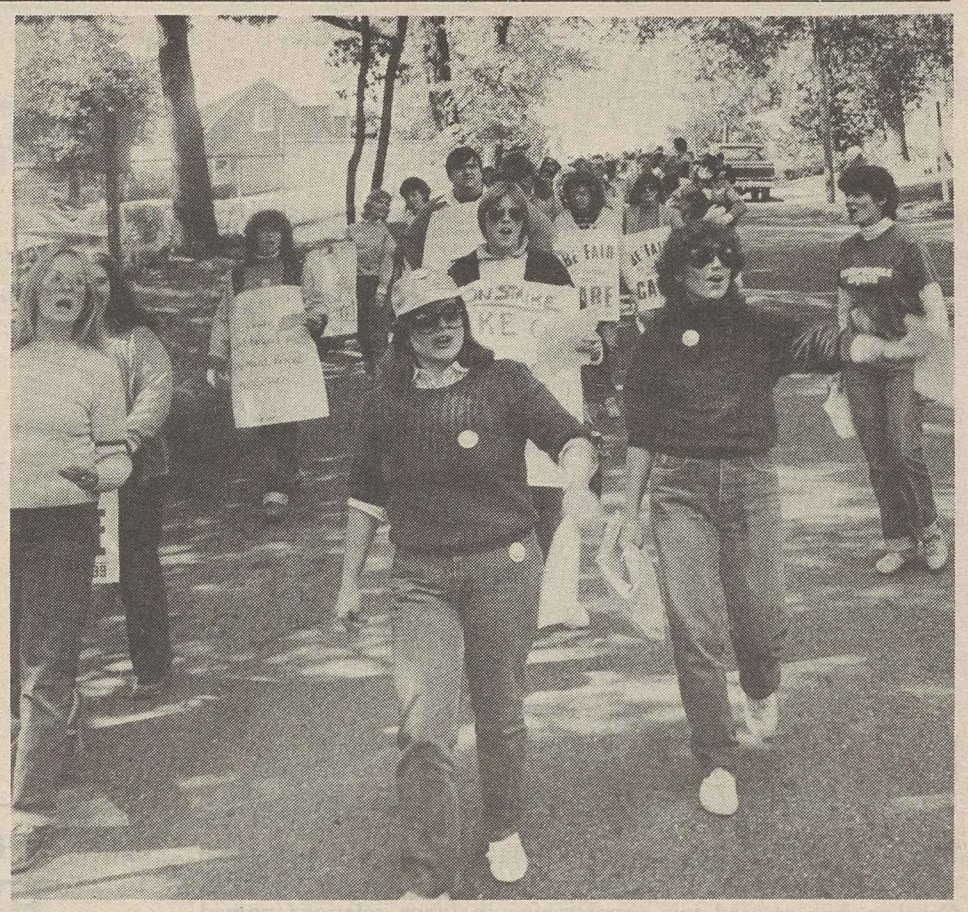
Findings of labor law violations against employers dropped sharply under the Reagan-appointed board compared with both the Democratic and Republican predecessor majorities, Cohen noted. But, at the same time, findings of violation by unions increased.

Employer bias

In representation cases, the NLRB headed by Republican Betty Murphy upheld the employer position in only 36 percent of cases. But the present NLRB has backed the employer on 75 percent of such cases.

"What we are witnessing," Cohen charged, "is not the swing of a political pendulum, but the wielding of a biased bludgeon. The record reveals a one-sided, result-oriented approach to labor-management relations by the Reagan-Dotson board."

The bias is so pronounced, Cohen said, that he and a number of other attorneys representing unions have advised their clients to avoid NLRB procedures whenever possible, "even if statutory rights have been violated."



Nurses who care

To dramatize the link between decent working conditions and quality care, nurses on strike against Norwalk (Conn.) Hospital march through their community urging public support for their walkout. The registered nurses, members of the Hospital & Health Care Employees, struck the 425-bed hospital Oct. 1 after management turned away their proposals for modest wage and benefit improvements. The nurses say better conditions are vital for the hospital to be able to recruit and retain a high quality nursing staff.

Defense contractors found gouging U.S. on labor costs

An Air Force study finding blatant price-gouging by military contractors provides "just another example of where this Administration could make cuts in defense, rather than social programs," Machinists President William W. Winpisinger declared.

The study, presented Oct. 10 to the congressional Joint Economic Committee's finance subcommittee, showed that some contractors were charging the government as much as 20 times their labor costs.

A. Ernest Fitzgerald, the noted Pentagon "whistle-blower" who now serves the Defense Dept. as deputy to the Assistant Air Force Secretary for financial management, told the panel that from $30 billion to $50 billion of the Pentagon's $100 billion annual procurement budget could be saved by tightening up cost procedures.

"We all know that military contractors have had statutory profit limitations removed," Winpisinger noted. "The prices they charge taxpayers for nuts and bolts and spare parts have become a multi-billion dollar scandal—10-cent Allen wrenches for $9,000, penny washers for $100 each. The list is virtually endless."

The IAM, Auto Workers, and the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. have drawn attention to contractor "gouging" recently, putting the spotlight on firms such as General Dynamics Corp., and Litton Industries, Inc.

Fitzgerald's study, requested by Sen. William Proxmire (D-Wis.), chairman of the Senate finance subcommittee, surveyed the pricing practices of six of the top 10 American military contractors. The results showed that on some major weapons projects the final hourly cost to the government ranged from about seven to nearly 20 times the cost of labor to the contractor.

The companies cited in the report are General Dynamics, General Elecric, Rockwell International, Lockheed, Boeing and the Pratt & Whitney division of United Technologies.

Workers' pay

"The Pentagon's response to such ripoffs has been to clamp down on workers' wages or, as they did in our last round of aerospace negotiations, jump over to the employer side of the table and contribute further to the power imbalance that already exists," Winpisinger stressed.

"Our employer contractors literally steal millions, and they call that providing for the national defense. If we get a dime an hour increase they call us greedy and unpatriotic."

Earlier this year, UAW President Owen Bieber charged General Dynamics Corp.'s Electric Boat Division with "massive ripoffs" of taxpayers in its defense contracting practices, billing the government $7,417 for three-inch pieces of wire worth less than 3 cents, for example.

Bieber pointed to statements by a company official indicating that the company was unconcerned about high costs because it can pass on the charges to the federal government as "material" on a cost-plus basis.

The IUD organized a campaign to call public attention to the contracting practices and anti-labor policies of Litton Industries even before that.

In his testimony, Fitzgerald told the Senate subcommittee that Pratt & Whitney's cost of a "standard hour" of labor on its TF-30 aircraft engines was found to be about $10. Standard hour is an industrial engineering measurement of what a trained worker with good tools and proper supervision can accomplish.

But Fitzgerald's study showed that by the time Pratt & Whitney added on costs, such as overhead and administration, as well as 13-percent profit, the hourly price to the government reached about $195.

3.5% COLA set for social security

The nation's 37 million social security beneficiaries will get a cost-of-living raise of 3.5 percent in January based on the government's inflation index, the Social Security Administration announced.

The adjustment is tied to the rise in the Consumer Price Index from September 1983 to September 1984, and the percentage increase is the same as last year.

AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman pointed out that the 3.5 percent COLA is automatically provided for by law and requires no special action by either Congress or the Administration to take effect. Social Security has been indexed in the CPI since 1975.

Most recipients will see the increase in checks delivered Jan. 3, while recipients of supplemental security income will have it in their checks delivered Dec. 31.

Also scheduled to go up automatically on Jan. 1 is the amount of wages subject to social security tax, from the current maximum of $37,800 to $39,600. Less than eight percent of the work force who earn more than the current maximum will be affected.

Typical increase

Social security COLA will put about $15 more in the typical recipient's monthly check in 1985, from $434 a month to $449. A retired couple now getting $750 will get $776 a month.

Increases will be rounded to the nearest whole dollar, the agency said.

While this year employees were taxed at an effective rate of 6.7 percent and employers at 7 percent under changes enacted in 1977, next year both will pay 7.05 percent. For a worker earning $25,000, the increase will be about $88 over the year.

The maximum social security tax taken from checks in the highest bracket will go up $259 to $2,791.80.

Workers paying higher social security taxes because of the increase in the wage base will get higher benefits in the future.

The amount a worker must earn to qualify for coverage in a quarter will go from $390 to $410.

Beneficiaries may also earn more next year without having their checks offset. For recipients under age 65, the maximum will go from $5,160 to $5,400 and for those 65-69, from $6,960 to $7,320. There is no offset against earnings for persons 70 or older.

Voter turnout gets top priority

Labor effort enlists army of volunteers

SATURDAY
NOVEMBER 3, 1984

Organized labor's top priority until the polls close on Election Day is a get-out-the-vote campaign among union members and their families.

It has enlisted an army of concerned and enthusiastic volunteers, more than a quarter-million by COPE estimates.

Their concern is the risk of "four more years" of a Reagan-Bush Administration, the threat of a Congress subservient to right-wing and business pressures, and the hazards posed by state governments dominated by labor's foes.

The enthusiasm grew from a late autumn flowering of the presidential campaign as Walter Mondale and Geraldine Ferraro took their case to the people. In an era when political messages are supposedly delivered through 30-second television commercials, huge crowds have been turning out to see and hear the candidates in person.

Campaign traditions

For the Democratic candidates, the campaign's final week included two great traditions of American politics—an evening torchlight parade in Chicago and a mammoth noon rally in New York's garment district.

The trade union press and direct mailings to the homes of members by their own unions and labor's central bodies have carried and explained the AFL-CIO's endorsements. Typical was the pre-election mailing sent by the California AFL-CIO to nearly a million registered voters who are members of affiliated unions.

All of the mailings carried the Mondale-Ferraro presidential campaign message, and 15 regional editions covered COPE recommendations in 45 congressional districts, 100 state legislative contests and 17 state ballot propositions.

The coverage has been equally thorough in smaller states, and the cadre of volunteers that started working in support of Mondale back in last spring's primaries has been multiplied as the election deadline nears.

Phone banks

In Illinois, union members who sent back forms indicating they were available to help out in the campaign have been keeping 100 phone banks busy across the state. Participation is "more than ever before," State AFL-CIO President Robert G. Gibson reported.

That's the report that AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland brought back also from his Solidarity Van tour of union halls in nine states over a two-week period. The meetings with local union officers, shop stewards and COPE activists emphasized the "one-on-one" approach—worker-to-worker—which the trade union movement has found most effective.

While the national spotlight stayed on the presidential contest, some of the fiercest political battles were being fought in

Reagan vetoes kill youth jobs plan, block funding for health facilities

President Reagan wielded an end-of-the session veto ax to kill a youth jobs program and thwart a bipartisan effort to fund community health centers and train health professionals.

Both measures had passed the House and Senate by one-sided votes after having been trimmed back in a futile hope of avoiding a presidential veto.

Young people without jobs should wait for the economic recovery to reach them, Reagan said in effect. Public sector jobs, he insisted, are "a discredited approach to youth unemployment."

The President's veto gave voters a preview of what a second Reagan Administration would be like.

Conservation Corps

The youth jobs bill he refused to approve would have re-established on a relatively small scale a youth conservation corps that had its genesis in the highly praised Civilian Conservation Corps under President Franklin D. Roosevelt. More recently, such a program was established under the Nixon Administration and continued until Reagan killed it after he became President.

As sent to the President, the labor-backed bill would have authorized $250 million a year to put jobless young people to work in forests, public lands and community projects. A year-round corps would have provided residence-camp opportunities for youths 16 through 25 who were no longer in school. A companion program would have offered summer job opportunities for the 15 through 21 age group.

Reagan said the program would be too costly, and it would be better to reduce federal spending "so that more resources are available to the private sector of our economy to fuel a continuation of the current economic expansion."

Earlier, Reagan had advocated cutting the minimum wage for youth in private employment as a means of encouraging employers to hire them.

The health service legislation the President also vetoed would have provided funds for several federal programs Reagan has sought to eliminate or curtail.

One Administration target is the National Health Service Corps, through which persons who have gotten their professional training with the help of federal grants in effect pay back their debt to the nation by working for a time in communities where health services are inadequate.

That measure, and another vetoed bill broadening the mission of the National Institutes of Health, had bipartisan sponsorship in both the House and Senate. One of the Senate's most conservative Republicans, Orrin G. Hatch of Utah, termed the measures an important part of the nation's "safety net" for the poor.

Reagan waited until Congress had adjourned to pocket veto the measures by refusing to sign them into law. That prevented any attempts to override the vetoes by Congress.

Import tide keeps rising

The nation's merchandise trade deficit with other countries grew by a record $12.6 billion in September, bringing the year's total red ink in trade so far to $96.3 billion.

The monthly deficit was the second largest on record. Americans spent less on imported oil but more on almost everything else. The chief impetus for the continuing flood of foreign imports comes from the overvalued U.S. dollar.

Administration officials have said they expect the total deficit for all of 1984 to reach $130 billion, an all-time high.

In reporting the new trade loss, the Commerce Dept. said Americans spent $30.8 billion on import purchases in September or 10.5 percent more than in August. Export sales were worth only $18.2 billion, just eight-tenths of 1 percent more than in August. All figures are seasonally adjusted.

The worst month for trade was July when the deficit reached $14.06 billion. The August deficit was $9.9 billion.

The trade deficit with Japan alone was $4 billion and with Canada, $2.4 billion. The deficit with Taiwan was $1.05 billion and with West Germany, $1.2 billion.

a handful of extremely close Senate contests and in some two dozen marginal House districts.

Republicans still hope that Democratic incumbents will be vulnerable in congressional districts that Reagan is expected to carry handily. But a week before the election, there were few signs of a large-scale turnover in House seats. Some Democratic-held seats are in the endangered column. But so are some now held by Republicans.

In the Senate, the most likely prospect is a Democratic gain.

In Tennessee, Senate Republican Leader Howard H. Baker, Jr., isn't running for re-election. The strong favorite to win his seat is Democrat Albert Gore, Jr., a four-term House member who has strong labor endorsement.

Helms in trouble

North Carolina is considered a sure state in the Reagan column. But its very right-wing Republican senator, Jesse Helms, is far from a shoo-in for re-election. Democratic Gov. James B. Hunt, Jr., is a formidable challenger. And Helms may have hurt President Reagan nationwide more than he helped himself in North Carolina by rounding up endorsements from Reagan-appointed ambassadors willing to flout a long tradition of non-involvement in politics.

In Iowa, Democratic challenger Tom Harkin may have pulled ahead of incumbent Sen. Roger W. Jepsen. And in Illinois, the once-moderate Republican incumbent, Sen. Charles H. Percy, has become almost a Reagan clone in a tight and bitter battle against labor-supported Paul Simon. Some other contests are almost as close.

In the presidential contest, the enthusiastic response to Mondale and Ferraro defied public opinion polls showing a continued Reagan lead.

In the Pacific Northwest, in Seattle and Portland, Mondale drew record crowds, and the Seattle Times headlined a "Surge for Mondale."

He spoke there, as he had in places like Cleveland and Youngstown, of the need for a caring government. "Let's end this selfishness, this greed, this new championship of caring only for yourslef," he urged to responsive audiences.

President Reagan, delivering a pep talk at the White House to Republican campaign workers, spoke disparagingly of the older, industrial cities where unemployment has been highest.

"It's no mere coincidence," Reagan suggested, that "the most blighted areas of the country" have been Democratic strongholds.

White House press aide Larry Speakes declined to explain the President's words. "I'll leave that at the other end of a 10-foot pole," he told a questioner.

Ferraro fields questions

Ferraro, who has generated enthusiasm throughout the campaign, won over a Chicago studio audience and very likely a large, nationwide television audience in fielding questions on the Phil Donahue show. Meanwhile, Vice President Bush was stumping the South on behalf of some of the most right-wing of the Republican congressional candidates. His special target was the Doonesbury cartoon strip, which has poked fun at Bush. It's "out of deep left field," the Vice President protested.

The Nov. 1 garment district rally for Mondale and Ferraro was co-sponsored by the Ladies' Garment Workers Campaign Committee and the Democratic National Committee. New York's Seventh Ave. was packed six blocks deep for the noon rally. The ILGWU chorus sang campaign songs as the streets filled up—200,000 strong by the start of the rally. Gov. Mario Cuomo, Mayor Edward Koch and ILGWU President Sol C. Chaikin were among the speakers, and union-endorsed congressional candidates from the New York metropolitan area shared the platform.

Vermont Fed sets agenda for broad legislative gains

Burlington, Vt.—Delegates to the 28th annual Vermont AFL-CIO convention adopted a legislative prescription for a better future, calling for the establishment of a state mediation board, reform of the public employee law, and election of candidates opposed to right-to-work laws.

The 66 convention delegates noted in a resolution that a right-to-work measure likely will be introduced in next General Assembly session beginning in January 1985. The resolution urged the state federation to educate its members "to the negative effect passage of such legislation will have on their pay checks and working conditions," and the need to defeat political candidates backing such legislation.

Another resolution described the Vermont Public Employee Law as "inadequate, ineffective, time consuming and expensive." It urged revisions to provide for binding arbitration in all municipalities, penalties for those who commit unfair labor practices, and a simple majority vote for representation and decertification elections.

Mediation board

In calling for establishment of a state mediation board, the convention noted that the cost of hiring a mediator or arbitrator is increasing and many small local unions do not qualify for the services provided by the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue, in an address to the delegates, described what the Reagan Administration has done over the past four years to labor and to the nation and warned of what a second Reagan term could produce.

AFL-CIO COPE Director John Perkins and former COPE Director Al Barkan keyed on the need to elect the Mondale-Ferraro ticket and explained what union members must do to accomplish that.

Other speakers included Gov. Richard Snelling, Sen. Patrick Leahy, Robert Harbrant, president of the AFL-CIO Food & Allied Service Trades Dept., and many of the state's political candidates.

Wyoming unions push repeal of state 'right-to-work' law

Cheyenne, Wyo.—The Wyoming AFL-CIO at its biennial convention here reaffirmed the goal of repealing the state's 20-year-old 'right-to-work' law as its top legislative priority.

The delegates to the two-day convention adopted a program calling for legislation to:

- Extend unemployment insurance coverage to all workers and workers' compensation coverage to employees in the public as well as the private sector, with improved benefit levels under both programs.
- Assure health care services for unemployed workers and their families.
- Provide home mortgage relief and rental assistance for jobless workers in danger of foreclosure or eviction.
- Provide relief to workers and communities adversely affected by plant closures or imports.
- Strengthen all state and federal laws and statutes dealing with occupational safety and health, and urging passage of a strong state standard on hazard identification.

Among other key resolutions, the delegates urged that the legislature "prevent the weakening or repeal of the Wyoming prevailing wage," prohibit the use of polygraph or psychological tests as a condition of employment, and ease the harsh administrative requirements for filing initiative or referendum petitions.

Democratic challenger Hugh McFadden, Jr., was endorsed for the state's at-large congressional seat over Republican incumbent Richard Cheney who has only a 6 percent "right" COPE voting record. A number of other endorsements were made in races for the state legislature.

Utility Workers President James Joy, Jr., played a tape of the 1948 broadcast in which then Democrat Ronald Reagan attacked the anti-worker actions of congressional Republicans.

Joseph Misbrener, president of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers, urged the delegates to elect those candidates who have been supportive of labor's agenda.

Among other speakers Democratic National Chairman Charles Manatt, Chuck Sullivan of the Air Line Pilots, AFL-CIO Assistant Organizing Director Frank Emig, Carpenters Executive Board member H. Paul Johnson and Fire Fighters Vice President Mike McNeil.

Impact of industry changes focus of ILO textile parley

Geneva—The right of workers to be consulted on the impact of rapidly developing structural changes in the textile industry was stressed at an International Labor Organization conference here.

Trade unionists, employers and government delegates of 33 countries agreed that any employer considering a move that could mean job reductions or changes in working conditions should consult with the workers' representatives "as soon as possible."

The consultation should be on ways to avoid a negative impact on workers without "precluding the need for negotiating the terms and conditions" of changes that prove inevitable, the ILO textiles committee said in its final conclusions.

Follow-up action

These findings go to the ILO's Governing Body of 56 worker, employer and government representatives for follow-up action.

The nine-day session concentrated on occupational safety and health in the textiles industry as well as on security of employment and income.

Scott Hoyman, executive vice president of the Clothing & Textile Workers, as spokesman for the workers on safety and health questions, urged the establishment of standards to eliminate on-the-job hazards from dust, noise and toxic substances.

Hoyman stressed the importance of setting international standards to protect workers world-wide. He said, as a conference report noted, that this would stop the practice of some multinational companies of "relocating industries away from countries with strict regulations to countries with less stringent regulations."

Reagan impact

When addressing the conference in plenary session as one of the two U.S. worker delegates, Hoyman deplored the Reagan Administration's budget cuts in occupational safety and health programs, which he said had adversely affected the enforcement of health and safety regulations "because fewer inspectors have greater amounts of work to do."

Eugene Counts, vice president of the United Textile Workers, assessed as "very important" the emphasis placed in the conclusions on the consultation and bargaining rights of workers.

"If these guidelines are followed, the workers will be better informed, will know what to expect, and there will be negotiations prior to any layoffs or changes in the industry," he commented.

Counts also was a worker delegate on the AFL-CIO team at the conference. John Fox, an ACTWU vice president, and Charles Clark, the union's Canadian co-director, served as advisers.

The conference's worker delegates designated Fox as one of their three official representatives on the subcommittee that dealt with security of employment and income.

In a unanimously adopted resolution, the textiles committee called on the Governing Body to exert its influence to have governments "encourage the full application in practice" of the ILO convention guaranteeing women equal pay for work of equal value.

Despite progress in many countries, "women workers are often still subject to discrimination," the committee said.

New booklet available on labor films, TV tapes

An updated edition of Films & Video Tapes for Labor produced by the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education contains information on 128 films and 15 videotapes available from the federation's Film Division.

The new publication lists films and video tapes under 10 separate categories, including labor history, health and safety, organizing, women and unions, civil rights, and political education.

Copies of the booklet, Publication 22, are available from the AFL-CIO Pamphlet Division, 815 16th St., N.W., Washington, D.C. 20006. A single copy is free. For additional copies, the price is 60 cents each or $45 per 100. Posters for promoting film programs also are available for 15 cents each.

Steel plant shutdown leaves wake of hardship

Chicago—Plant closing decisions made in warm, corporate boardrooms with an eye on the profit margin can translate into chilling misery and anguish for the workers whose livelihoods are at stake, according to a new study of the human cost of plant shutdowns.

An intensive, year-long survey of laid-off employees of U.S. Steel Corp.'s once prosperous Chicago South Works paints a stark portrait of continuing massive joblessness among the workers. Many of them have plunged into poverty and many were found to be suffering from intense emotional and physical stress.

The study, one of the largest of its kind, was sponsored by Steelworkers Local 65 and Hull House Association, a major Chicago social work agency. Funding was provided both by private foundations and several city agencies.

900 questioned

More than 900 former employees of the South Works responded to questionnaires. A complete report on the results will be released later in November.

Preliminary findings revealed that more than 46 percent of the workers laid off from South Works since 1979 still have not found new jobs. Among black workers, the rate of continuing joblessness is 61 percent.

Family incomes for the former U.S. Steel workers have been slashed nearly in half from a median $23,000 to $12,000 currently, the survey showed.

Although U.S. Steel once employed as many as 18,000 people at South Works, more than 6,100 have been laid off just since 1979, the union said. Only about 1,000 employees are still in the mill.

Unkept promises

Workers there were particularly angered at the last round of layoffs in late 1983. They charge that the company reneged on promises to plough savings from contract concessions into building a modern rail mill at South Works so they could stay open and compete in the recession and import-battered steel industry.

The USWA has obtained a federal court injunction to block the company from dismantling the last blast furnace at the mill. The union's contention that the facility need not have been shut down has been bolstered by a soon-to-be released study by an independent economic research firm retained by the USWA.

Steelworkers President Lynn Williams, commenting on the survey results, stressed that once-productive workers "who made an enormous contribution to their communities and their country are being destroyed."

The study's authors said in releasing the preliminary results that the "suffering and dislocation we found was far worse than we expected."

Major findings from the South Works study show that while 30 percent of the white former steelworkers are still unemployed, 61 percent of the laid-off black workers and 47 percent of the laid-off Hispanic workers have still not found jobs. Of the workers still on layoff, 63 percent are women.

Eighty percent of those still unemployed blamed the lack of available jobs for their plight, while many also cited insufficient skills or education as major barriers, and 27 percent listed age.

Some 30 percent said low wages offered by other employers were a major barrier to finding new work. One worker, in written comments, explained that "to go from earning $20,000 plus to being at an employer's mercy for $3.35 an hour is devastating."

Retraining center

The Steelworkers and the company have had a retraining and job search aid center in place in South Chicago since September. More than three-fourths of the workers surveyed are interested in retraining.

The study found that 24 percent of the laid-off workers had been forced to move because they couldn't afford current housing, including 11 percent who had been evicted. Another 38 percent reported problems keeping up mortgage or rent payments.

Forty percent of the workers surveyed said they are without health insurance, and 75 percent said they have put off getting medical treatment because they have no insurance.

Food stamps, welfare

Over two-thirds said they have had to apply for food stamps, and 17 percent reported receiving welfare at least part of the time they had been laid-off. About 30 percent said they had to turn to emergency aid such as food banks, to put food on their tables.

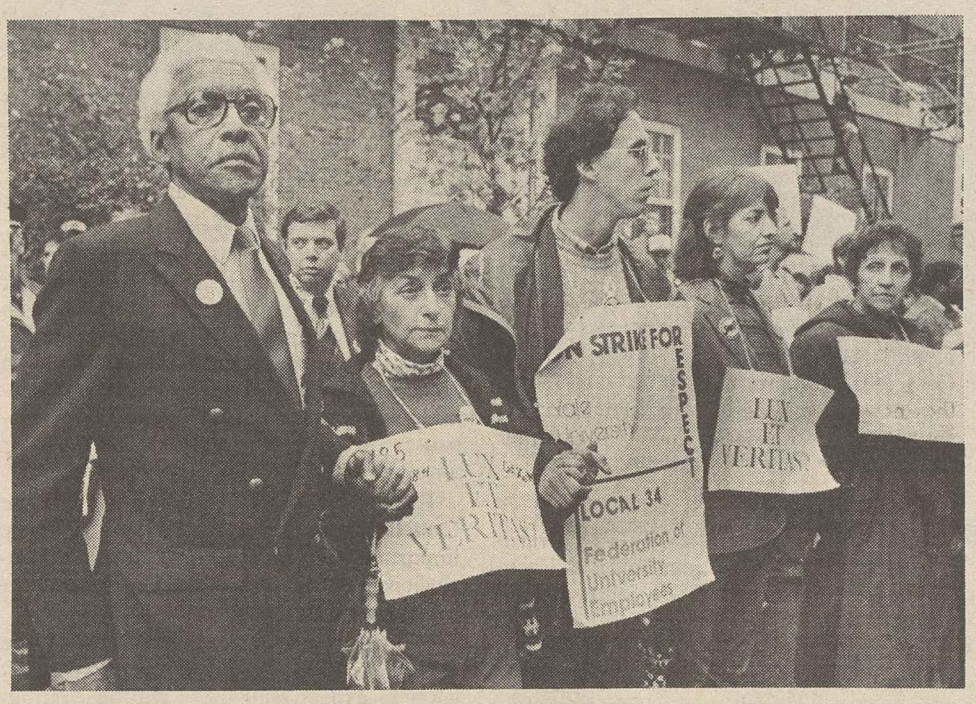
Twenty-six percent of the workers said they have been forced to sell automobiles, and 14 percent have had their cars repossessed.

The report also revealed a pattern of increasing emotional strain and physical illness which the workers themselves link directly to unemployment and their devastated standard of living.

The workers report increased alcoholism, insomnia, family strife and violence and other symptoms of intense stress.

More than three-fourths of the workers surveyed reported feelings of depression.

One worker wrote, "I am just barely holding on to life. I stay sad everyday because I cannot find a job. It is like a curse. Please help me."



APRI Chairman Bayard Rustin joins Yale strikers in a silent protest. He was among 434 persons arrested at the demonstration.

Rustin among 434 arrested at rally backing Yale strikers

New Haven, Conn.—A mass protest against Yale University's stony bargaining stance resulted in the arrest of hundreds of striking members of Hotel Employees & Restaurant Employees Local 34 along with their supporters among the students and faculty.

Bayard Rustin, chairman of the A. Philip Randolph Institute, was among the 434 demonstrators arrested by police. Yale had awarded Rustin an honorary degree this past spring.

The strikers and their supporters rallied at the First and Summerfield United Methodist Church, where civil rights leader Rev. Ralph D. Abernathy charged, "Yale is treating certain segments of its population unjustly and Yale ought to be ashamed."

Rustin led the demonstrators to Woodbridge Hall where he told them, "I'm here because I have a moral obligation to this community. I stand by the workers and against injustices to minorities and women. I believe that whenever people quietly demonstrate—like Martin Luther King, Jr., and Tolstoy and Gandhi—people will listen."

Rustin was the first person arrested as the strikers peacefully went one-by-one to the buses which carried them to police headquarters where they were charged with disorderly conduct.

Witness for equality

The demonstration, called a "nonviolent witness for equality," was the second mass arrest of Local 34 members. The first occurred on Oct. 5 when 191 were arrested in front of the home of Yale President A. Bartlett Giamatti.

The strike by some 1,600 Local 34 members is now in its sixth week. Pay equity is the key bargaining issue for this unit of clerical and technical workers, which is 80 percent women and 17 percent minorities. Their average annual salary is $13,424.

After 75 bargaining sessions, the Yale administrators have forestalled an initial contract with the local. The union is seeking wage increases of 29 percent over three years, while the university has offered 17 percent. The two sides remain far apart on the issues of pensions, job security and health and welfare benefits.

A proposal by the union to have the dispute resolved by a panel of three professors—one chosen by each side with the third member mutually selected—was rejected by the university's negotiators.

Strike support

While Local 34 members remain on strike, their picket lines are being honored by the members of HERE Local 35, the blue-collar service and maintenance unit. And supportive faculty members have moved nearly 600 of the 1,000 classes to sites off-campus.

The effect of the strike on the educational process at Yale prompted 102 students to file a multi-million dollar lawsuit against the university charging that the strike has so curtailed services that the university has "destroyed the atmosphere of collegiality and intellectual inquiry."

The class-action suit, filed in New Haven Superior Court, seeks $2 million for every week of the strike, to be split among the university's 10,000 students.

"No longer will Yale make students pay for its unreasonable bargaining position," Ian Ayres, a second-year law student who helped draft the suit, said. "Yale will have to make a choice, the same choice that strikers make: either negotiate or lose money for every day the strike goes on."

Students have also staged a series of sit-ins to protest the early closing hours of the library due to the strike. Yale, in turn, threatened the students with suspension.

Shipbuilders press support for Mondale-Ferraro ticket

Fort Lauderdale, Fla.—The Democratic ticket of Walter Mondale and Geraldine Ferraro won an enthusiastic endorsement from the delegates to the Marine & Shipbuilding Workers convention here.

President Arthur E. Batson, Jr., said the convention's approval of the Democratic ticket underscored the union's earlier vote for the AFL-CIO's endorsement of Mondale and Ferraro.

In resolutions, the union delegates were critical of the Reagan Administration's policies and of the anti-union twist taken by the National Labor Relations Board under its current Reagan-appointees.

Batson, calling the mood of unity at the convention "the best ever," praised the delegates for a renewed solidarity in efforts to "fight the foes of the labor movement found in the courts, the NLRB and the Reagan Administration."

Through cooperation and determination, he told the delegates, the union can stand firm "against attempts by the companies and by this government to break unions."

The convention also approved constitutional changes including a $1.50 increase in per capita tax aimed at strengthening the union's general fund and strike fund.

Beginning in November, the per capita payment will rise from $4.50 per month to $6. Of that, $1 will go to the strike fund.

The delegates also approved constitutional changes strengthening the link between the national and local unions in reaching contract settlements, amending the union's election procedures in accordance with federal rules, and reducing the size of the executive board from 12 to 10.

Key resolutions urged adoption of a range of policies aimed at undergirding the nation's shipbuilding and maritime industries and preserving and creating jobs.

The delegates called for stepped-up enforcement of occupational safety and health laws for shipbuilding and maritime workers, for improved compensation for victims of occupational hazards and diseases, and expanded information on job-related diseases and hazards for workers.

Among other resolutions, the convention called for ratification of the Equal Rights Amendment, urged comprehensive health care cost containment, and opposed moves to tax workers' benefits such as health insurance.

The delegates urged strong enforcement of federal wage and hour laws to preserve hard-won decency in working conditions and opposed the Reagan Administration's scheme for a youth sub-minimum wage.

Speakers included AFL-CIO Region V Director James Sala, arbitrator Lawrence Seibel, the union's attorney, Michael Brody, and Art Maxwell of the U.S. Savings Bonds Division of the Treasury Dept.

Illinois court bars phony labor paper

Bloomington, Ill.—A phony labor paper—exposed by AFL-CIO affiliates—has been ordered to cease all business in Illinois, and its owner has been fined.

The McClean County Circuit Court, in a case pressed by Illinois Atty. Gen. Neil Hartigan, ordered Richard L. Cammeron, publisher of the Fort Wayne, Ind., based "Labor Tribune," to stop operating or soliciting ads in Illinois.

Cammeron, who has also operated out of Brentwood, Tenn., has been calling Illinois businesses and using pressure tactics to get them to buy ads in an "official labor paper" that in fact had no bona fide labor backing or circulation.

Cammeron was fined $3,500 in civil penalties and prosecution costs.

The state brought charges against Cammeron and the phony paper in 1983 after the editors of AFL-CIO central labor council publications in the Bloomington-Normal, Peoria, and Champaign-Urbana areas reported complaints from local merchants and provided the state with evidence of Cammeron's tactics.

In House report

NLRB backlog tied to Reagan's inaction

The National Labor Relations Board is in a "crisis" as a result of a "staggering and debilitating" case backlog caused largely by the Reagan Administration's failure to fill board vacancies promptly, a House Government Operations subcommittee warned.

"Workers (are) being forced to wait years before cases affecting their livelihood and the economic well-being of their families are decided," the Subcommittee on Manpower & Housing, headed by Rep. Barney Frank (D-Mass.), said in a report.

"We have reached a point where legal rights given to employees under the National Labor Relations Act are in jeopardy because of the board's failure to issue timely decisions."

The report, adopted unanimously, pointed out that the NLRB's backlog of cases has grown from 535 in fiscal 1981 to 1,434 as of Sept. 1, 1984.

The greatest bottleneck in processing unfair labor practice cases is the time it takes for the board to issue a decision, the report said. In fiscal year 1983, the median time between an NLRB administrative law judge's ruling, and issuance of a board decision was 194 days—a substantial increase from 120 days in fiscal 1981 and 170 days in fiscal 1982.

Median delay

The report stressed that the 194-day delay in fiscal 1983 was only the median. One-fourth of the unfair labor practice cases took more than 270 days for the board to decide and 10 percent of the cases required 494 days or more.

The House panel held an oversight hearing on the NLRB case backlog in November 1983 and another hearing six months later to see what progress, if any, the board had made in reducing the load as well as to examine the reasons for the slowness in the agency's decisions.

The "most visible" reason for the backlog and the delays in issuing decisions has been the turnover in the board's membership and the failure of the President to fill board vacancies promptly, the report declared. Since Dec. 11, 1979, 11 persons have served on the five-member board. It has had only four members since August 1983.

"The President's failure to nominate anyone to be the fifth board member is in itself responsible for the board's inability to decide several important cases," the panel said.

NLRB Chairman Donald Dotson told the subcommittee that more than 20 cases were deadlocked at 2-2, and they could not be decided until a fifth member is named.

"There is no indication that the President intends to fill the position soon and to resolve the problem that he has created by allowing 2-2 votes to deadlock the board in many cases," the report observed.

An "equally significant" reason for the delays has been the efforts of the board's Reagan majority to rewrite existing law, the subcommittee said.

System breakdown

"Decisions have been delayed or have not been forthcoming in many routine cases because of the board's priority for the re-examination of prior board case law," the panel observed. "This has led to a breakdown of the regulatory system."

It said the Reagan board has asked appellate courts to return 17 cases to it that had already been decided by previous boards. In one such case, involving an employee of the E. I. du Pont de Nemours & Co., the board went so far as to take the highly unusual step of asking the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 3rd Circuit to return the case to it for reconsideration after the court had already issued a decision in the worker's favor.

Furthermore, the panel said, delays in issuing decisions have not been limited to cases involving novel or complex legal issues. It said the board has taken "an excessive and unreasonable" amount of time to decide even the simplest summary judgment cases. Summary judgment cases are generally straightforward, do not involve difficult issues and result in "boilerplate" decisions.

"While the summary judgment procedure is supposed to move these cases expeditiously, in fact these cases have not traveled on a fast track and have taken between four and 14 months for a decision," the panel said.

Changing the law

Among its recommendations, the panel called for a change in the law so that a board member whose term expires can continue to serve until a successor joins the board. It also said the Reagan board should stop rewriting history.

"The board's highest single priority should be getting decisions out," the panel concluded.

"While we recognize that the board cannot and should not rubber-stamp cases or issues coming before it, the board should set specific, meaningful, and reasonable timetables for deciding cases. If the board fails to set such timetables, then Congress must act."

Printing merger

The leaders in merger talks under way between the Typographical Union and the Graphic Communications Union, ITU President Robert S. McMichen, left, and GCIU President Kenneth J. Brown, right, meet at federation headquarters with AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue. The unions opened merger discussions in October following the lifting of a federal injunction that had blocked ITU merger action until after a rerun election for top offices. McMichen, who won the ITU presidency in both the original election and the rerun conducted in August by the Labor Dept., had campaigned on a pledge to seek merger with the GCIU.

'Populist Party' called cover for right-wing hate groups

In a deliberate attempt to mask its origins and attract unsuspecting voters, a coalition of violent, ultra-right-wing extremists is using the name Populist Party to field a presidential election ticket in at least 16 states.

A report published by the National Anti-Klan Network and the Klanwatch Project of the Southern Poverty Law Center says the Populist name has been usurped by an alliance of hate groups and individuals with direct ties to the Ku Klux Klan, neo-Nazis, the violent Posse Comitatus, the National States Rights Party, the increasingly racist American Independent Party, and an assortment of so-called Christian para-military groups.

It is a separate entity from other, more mainstream organizations—both progressive and conservative—that describe their programs as "populist."

The Populist Party is running former Olympic pole vault champion Bob Richards for president and California radio personality Maureen Salaman for vice president.

The report was written by Leonard Zeskind with research assistance from the anti-Klan groups, the Anti-Repression Resource Team and the Interchange Resource Center.

Zeskind documents the participation of key Populist Party operatives in activities of the hate groups and violence-prone organizations, but his report, titled "It's Not Populism," stresses that the "godfather" behind the party is Willis Carto, leader of the extremist Liberty Lobby and publisher of the fascist weekly tabloid, The Spotlight.

The report traces Carto's continuing close ties to party leaders and his influence in the party's activities, literature and platform adopted at its August convention in Nashville.

Among Carto's operations is the California-based Institute for Historical Review, which pushes the view that the Holocaust is a myth invented by Jews for propaganda purposes.

Zeskind calls the Populist Party "Carto's latest attempt to gain access to the political mainstream for anti-Semitic and racist groups, individuals and ideas." Its first chairman, Robert Weems, was a KKK activist.

Interchange, a labor-supported organization that monitors right-wing groups, warned in its Fall 1984 newsletter that the party's "America First for Americans First" platform is being pitched to disaffected farmers, blue-collar workers, and small business owners who feel they have been passed over by the major parties.

'Platform' planks

The Populist "platform" calls for protection from imports and cheap "immigrant labor," for an isolationist foreign policy and abolition of the income tax—rhetoric that is attracting support from so-called taxpayers' revolt groups.

Zeskind notes that the party's literature —although it has been purged of much of the raw hate language it started out with —contains barely concealed appeals to racism, white workers' fear of job competition, resentment of aid to the needy, and references to "conspiracies of international bankers," code words for Jews.

Richards, twice an Olympic gold medalist, has attempted to publicly dissociate himself from the party's racist, Nazi connections, Zeskind observes, but he has been unable to disprove the documented hate group connections of many of his party associates.

Richards and Salaman, as well as a handful of candidates for other offices, will be on ballots in Alabama, Arkansas, California, Idaho, Iowa, Kansas, Louisiana, Minnesota, Mississippi, North Dakota, Rhode Island, Tennessee, Utah, Washington, West Virginia and Wisconsin. Depending on the outcome of lawsuits, they may also be on several more ballots.

In most of the states, the ticket will be listed under the Populist Party, but in some states the candidates will be on ballots either as independents or under the banners of the Conservative Party, Constitution Party, Taxpayers Party or American Independent Party.

'Do we really have a right?'

After nearly three years of waiting for the National Labor Relations Board to render a decision, Albert Masso and other workers at the West Jersey Health Systems facility in Berlin, N.J., are wondering if they'll ever have the representation election they want.

"We still have no idea when our election will come," Masso, a general maintenance mechanic, told a recent joint congressional hearing looking into the NLRB's operations.

"The question my co-workers are asking is, 'Do we really have a right to organize a union?' The effect that these delays has had is very real."

Masso was involved in a 1981 drive by District 1199C of the National Union of Hospital & Health Care Employees to organize the private, nonprofit hospital's southern division, representing some 160 service, maintenance, and technical workers.

Sixty percent of the employees signed 1199C authorization cards, hoping that they could obtain better benefits, pay, job security, and grievance handling by being organized. The union then filed for an election with the NLRB's Philadelphia regional office.

What followed, Masso told the House Subcommittee on Labor-Management Relations and the Subcommittee on Manpower & Housing, was a nightmare of endless hearings, delays, impenetrable silences, and appeals to the NLRB in Washington as management tried to keep out the union.

Most recently, the full board sent the case back to the regional office in Philadelphia for more hearings and a new decision which, when it comes, could again be appealed by the hospital.

The delays play into management's hands. West Jersey has not been sitting by idly waiting for an election, Masso pointed out.

"It has worked every day to try and weaken our organization," he said. "If we had been able to vote in 1981, the union would have won overwhelmingly. But with each additional month that passes, the task of winning becomes that much more difficult."

Postal unions ask dual voice in arbitration

The Postal Workers and the Letter Carriers have requested that each union be allowed to have a representative on the arbitration panel being set up to decide terms of a new contract or that there be separate proceedings for each union.

In letters to Director Kay McMurray of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service, the unions asked to expand the binding arbitration panel, which is called for under the Postal Reorganization Act of 1970 in situations where no agreement is reached within 90 days after existing contracts expire.

The unions said the law allows them to have a two-person, single-vote, representation on the joint arbitration board. Likewise, the U.S. Postal Service, representing management, could have two representatives, they said.

The unions reported that Postmaster Gen. William Bolger registered technical objections to the procedure after a meeting last week between him and NALC President Vincent R. Sombrotto and APWU President Moe Biller at the mediation director's office.

In the event that McMurray refuses to recognize the unions' right to preserve their autonomy in the arbitration process, the unions "reluctantly" requested separate arbitration proceedings.

Full cooperation

Sombrotto and Biller said the unions would continue to cooperate fully in preparation for the panel's hearings.

The contract dispute between the USPS and the two unions, which together represent more than 500,000 mail workers nationwide, entered the arbitration phase Oct. 19 because negotiations have been deadlocked since the July 20 expiration of the pacts. Wages are the central issue.

Under the law, the chairman of the arbitration panel is chosen by the parties' representatives or, if they fail to reach agreement, by the FMCS.

Worker buying power less since Reagan took office

Workers' purchasing power suffered a decline since President Reagan took office, a Bureau of Labor Statistics report on "real" earnings shows.

Real, or inflation-adjusted, earnings of production or non-supervisory workers in September averaged five-tenths of 1 percent above the August level and were six-tenths of 1 percent higher than a year earlier, BLS said.

But real "spendable" earnings—that is, wages after deduction of income and social security taxes as well as adjustment for inflation-registered gains of only four-tenths of 1 percent and two-tenths of 1 percent, respectively, the AFL-CIO Dept. of Economic Research points out.

Expressed in dollars, workers' takehome pay adjusted for the impact of inflation since 1977 averaged a seasonally adjusted $149.90 a week in September, the federation noted.

That figure represents a 1.2 percent decline from $151.65 a week for all of 1980, the last year of the Carter Administration.

Gross weekly earnings expressed in current dollars, without any adjustments for taxes or inflation, have risen from an average of $235.10 a week in 1980 to $296.52 in September.

Meanwhile, new signs of weakness in the economy appeared in a Commerce Dept. report showing the government's index of leading economic indicators moved up four-tenths of 1 percent in September.

At the same time, the department revised August's indicators downward. The index, which is designed to look ahead to where the economy will be in the coming weeks and months, was first reported as up five-tenths of 1 percent in August. But the revised figure shows it actually fell one-tenth of 1 percent.

The index was down 1.7 percent in July and down nine-tenths of 1 percent in June. It had not gone down three times in a row since late 1981, when the country was in the midst of the Reagan Recession.

In the past four months, the index has dropped 2.3 percent, more than the decline that served as a forewarning of the 1981-82 recession.

Six of the 11 indicators that were available for September contributed to the rise of four-tenths of 1 percent over the month. They were led by the formation of new businesses. Of the five negative indicators, new orders for factory goods was the worst.

In another report, the Commerce Dept. said orders to U.S. factories fell 1.8 percent in September, primarily in the auto, aircraft, shipbuilding, and metals industries. It was the second month of decline.

Factories depend on both new orders and the backlog of unfilled old orders to determine how fast assembly lines will run. Unfilled orders also declined in September, by two-tenths of 1 percent, the first decline since November 1982.

Computer use gains as tool in bargaining

Microcomputers, properly used, can be a source of bargaining power to union negotiating committees.

That is the consensus of 25 union research directors and negotiators who participated in a recent workshop at the George Meany Center for Labor Studies. The workshop was the first of its kind on the subject.

Workshop leaders were Michael Roberts, president of Union International Systems, Inc.; Jeffrey MacDonald, senior staff associate at the studies center, and Lisa Portman, the center's assistant director.

Robert Reed of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Data Processing was a guest lecturer.

The group, which included a number of unionists already experienced in the field, shared information on the use of spread sheets and data bases that can provide negotiators with instant answers to "what if" questions and quick contract analysis.

Participants pointed out that with computers negotiators can obtain a broad view of the impact of their bargaining, cost out union proposals and develop material to present to union committees, as well as management.

At the same time the union specialists agreed that computers aren't going to solve all negotiating problems. They were warned against the danger that negotiations can become "too involved with the numbers instead of arguing for principles."

With this week-long workshop, the subject has become a regular course in the George Meany Center curriculum.

Unions assuming greater role in new job training

The AFL-CIO's Human Resources Development Institute is helping the trade union movement take a leadership role in the nation's reshaped job training programs, HRDI Director Michael Arnold said.

An HRDI "progress report" shows more than 1,000 union representatives serving on the state and local councils established to administer the Job Training Partnership Act (JTPA).

Labor has an important, practical contribution to make to the job-training effort, Arnold stressed, and a special interest in assisting workers left jobless by plant closings or heavy layoffs.

The HRDI report cites the technical assistance provided to the labor representatives on nearly 600 local Private Industry Councils across the country, including HRDI training sessions for labor representatives in most states.

In activities funded by the Labor Dept. under the JTPA program, Arnold noted, "HRDI has consistently exceeded its contractual obligations."

Carpenters' Robert Pleasure named to studies center post

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland has appointed Robert J. Pleasure of the Carpenters as assistant director of the George Meany Center for Labor Studies.

Pleasure, 41, has been associate general counsel of the Carpenters since 1979. He will assume his duties at the Labor Studies Center on Dec. 1.

Kirkland selected Pleasure on the recommendation of a five-member search committee appointed in May 1984 after Fred Hoehler, executive director of the center, announced his desire to retire in 1985.

Hoehler, 66, has served as executive director of the center since it opened in 1969 in temporary quarters in downtown Washington, D.C. Today, the center has a 47-acre campus in the D.C. suburb of Silver Spring, Md., and operates a year-round trade union leadership development program. About 4,000 trade unionists attend classes at the center each year.

A 1964 graduate of the University of Pennsylvania, Pleasure received a master's degree in industrial relations from the London School of Economics and his law degree from the University of Michigan in 1967. Before joining the Carpenters in 1972, he served on the staffs of the New York City Office of Collective Bargaining and the National Labor Relations Board and as assistant general counsel of State, County & Municipal Employees.

Pleasure has taught each year at the studies center and participated in the design of the Carpenters' industrial department, which functions as an education program for the union's 200,000 industrial members.

The search committee chaired by AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue reviewed the applications of more than 40 trade unionists and labor educators.

Pennsylvania enacts toxic chemical law

Harrisburg, Pa.—Pennsylvania has enacted a comprehensive right-to-know law covering all employers in the state, requiring them to make available to employees and the public the identity of chemicals used in the workplace.

Nearly 20 states have enacted right-to-know laws to protect workers from the hazards of toxic chemicals and other substances on the job.

Schedule of institutes at studies center

The George Meany Center for Labor Studies will offer five institutes and workshops during November and December. The schedule:

Computers for Local Unions, Nov. 18-21 — A briefing on the use of computers for union officers who need some knowledge before purchasing equipment.

In-House Opinion Polling, Nov. 18-21— A workshop on preparing mail and telephone questionnaires, training volunteer pollsters and evaluating the results.

Organizing Techniques I, Nov. 25-30— A review of the mechanics of an organizing campaign with videotaping so participants can see themselves in action as organizers.

New Staff, Nov. 25-Dec. 7 — A two-week program to help new union officers and staff members make the transition from on-the-job activists to full-time union representatives.

The Art of Leadership, Dec. 2-7 — A session to help union leaders understand worker motivations, group dynamics, systems analysis, differences in leadership styles and how to deal with stress and anger.

The Service Employees is holding a training session for its own staff on campus, Nov. 2-7.

The American Institute for Free Labor Development on Nov. 6 will graduate 36 Spanish-speaking trade unionists from 15 Latin American countries—17 from affiliates of the Postal, Telephone & Telegraph International trade secretariat—who have been on campus since Oct. 7. They've been studying technology and employment in the telecommunications industry and organized labor and the trade secretariats.

The AIFLD will be host Nov. 2-7 to trade union officers from Venezuela, Brazil and five Central American countries. They're coming to watch the U.S. election process. They'll spend election night in the campus auditorium watching the election returns.

Labor and the Election

FOR THE MAINSTREAM of the trade union movement, the presidential campaign began nearly 13 months ago when the AFL-CIO's 15th convention voted an enthusiastic and near-unanimous endorsement of Walter F. Mondale.

The issue of endorsing a candidate in advance of party primaries, a departure from past practices, had been explored at a series of Executive Council meetings. Gradually, a consensus emerged that the labor movement shouldn't sit on the sidelines and wait until other groups in society had defined the choice of candidates and issues.

During this early deliberative process, AFL-CIO unions voluntarily refrained from making separate endorsements.

The first step was a General Board meeting on the eve of the AFL-CIO convention, at which each union cast the vote of its membership. Many unions sought the views of their members in advance of the meeting, using such techniques as mail-in ballots, straw votes at regional meetings and even hiring professional pollsters.

A two-thirds vote was needed to recommend an endorsement resolution to the AFL-CIO convention. Some unions abstained; some voted against any endorsement; some voted to recommend another candidate, and some split their votes. But more than 90 percent of the total number of votes represented at the meeting were cast for a pre-primary endorsement of Mondale.

The convention endorsement resolution expressed what the leaders of the AFL-CIO's affiliated unions well knew from first-hand experience—that Fritz Mondale was someone very special.

AS SENATOR and as Vice President, "he has been an ally of our people for jobs and decent wages," the endorsement resolution stressed. It cited his battles "for better public education and medical care, for equal rights and civil rights, and for decent housing."

Geraldine Ferraro, as a friend of labor in Congress, was a speaker at that convention—well before she was being talked of as a potential vice presidential candidate. She showed the same wit and drive that has marked her campaign effort, the same commitment to the values of the trade union movement she learned from a mother who was a garment worker for 25 years "so her children could have opportunities she never did."

The AFL-CIO General Board met again in August and pledged the trade union movement to an all-out effort in support of the Mondale-Ferraro ticket.

That pledge has been kept.

"We know the importance of this election," Lane Kirkland said at the time, "and we plan to take our message to every trade unionist and every trade union family between now and Nov. 6."

To the extent that it was humanly possible to do so, that also has been done.

More important, it is still being done and the effort will not cease until the last polling booth closes on Election Day.

The People Factor

COMPUTER PRINTOUTS have replaced 3-by-5 index cards as the building blocks of political campaigns. Candidates hopscotch across the country for the sole purpose of maximizing television news coverage. Opinion polls, which have their legitimate uses, purport to tell us almost from hour to hour how we intend to vote.

Unchanged, happily, is the central role of committed campaign workers—so many of whom come from union ranks.

If elections were decided solely by money, many more of labor's friends would be hard-pressed this year. Labor's resources are people—men and women who after a full day's work volunteer to put in extra hours at a phone bank because they know this election is important.

Their efforts do a lot to equalize the odds.

Bayard Rustin says

Nobel Prize aids struggle for rights in South Africa

By Bayard Rustin

The awarding of the Nobel Peace Prize to Bishop Desmond Tutu, the black South African fighter for racial justice, is a joyous and historically significant event. It confers a great honor upon a deeply religious man and strengthens his struggle for the principles of democracy, majority rule, human dignity and non-violence.

Over the years, the Nobel Committee has made a number of wise and outstanding decisions to honor struggles for peace and democracy the world over. Previous Nobel laureates include Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., Russian human rights advocate Dr. Andrei Sakharov, and Polish trade union leader Lech Walesa.

Bishop Tutu recognizes the common threads in this legacy of support for freedom and implacable opposition to tyranny when he asserts that through this honor "a tremendous political statement . . . has been made. . . . Those who oppose apartheid are seen in the same light as those who oppose communism."

There is a great truth in this assertion, for both communism and apartheid are ideologies of oppression. Under both systems, small privileged minorities (in the communist world the Communist Party bureaucracy, and under South Africa's apartheid system the ruling white minority) deny free expression and democratic rights to the vast majority. And both systems make use of repressive police and security systems. Under both, political opponents are sentenced to harsh terms of imprisonment.

Comparison, contrast

For black Americans, the awarding of the Nobel Peace Prize to Bishop Tutu invites another quite different comparison—the awarding of this honor to another great black proponent of non-violence, Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr.

However, despite the deep religiousness of both men and despite their abiding respect for the principles of non-violence and civil rights, it would be a great oversimplification to assume that the conditions in which they waged their struggle are identical. Dr. King, A. Philip Randolph, Roy Wilkins and other great fighters for civil rights in this country led a struggle for minority rights. Because blacks are a majority in South Africa, the struggle they are waging is in essence a struggle for majority rule.

Immense difficulties

Bishop Tutu well understands this great difference and therefore is aware of the immense difficulties that the anti-apartheid struggle confronts. He recognizes that South African blacks confront a setting of extreme violence and repression. Moreover, they have no ally within the central government as did our own civil rights movement.

Bishop Tutu is a man of peace. Nonetheless, as he indicated to me in our meetings in Johannesburg over the last year, he knows that the violence and repression of the South African authorities breeds a climate of resentment and frustration in which violence is bound to erupt.

The awarding of the Nobel Peace Prize to Bishop Tutu in this violence-prone setting is nonetheless a powerful acknowledgment of the wisdom of his strategy of non-violent struggle to achieve democratic change.

Bishop Tutu strongly advocates peaceful public protest, independent black organization for self-defense, and a strong black-led and multi-racial trade union movement as vehicles for pressuring the racist regime of P. W. Botha into undoing the evils of apartheid.

But Tutu also knows that time is running out for a peaceful solution to the tragic South African impasse. Even as he preaches the ideology of peace, he knows that if change does not come, the only possible outcome will be violence and upheaval in that beautiful, rich, and benighted land.

City problems getting worse under Reagan

Many of America's cities aren't sharing in the nation's economic recovery and face a bleak future if the Reagan Administration's urban policy is continued, a congressionally commissioned study concluded.

The study, by the prestigious National Urban Policy Advisory Committee, said cutbacks in federal assistance to cities and to the poor have fallen hardest on the communities with the most critical problems.

In effect, the study found, "the Administration's urban policy is not to have an urban policy" and to rely on overall economic recovery to give cities the resources to meet their own needs.

The report, prepared for a subcommittee of the congressional Joint Economic Committee, concludes that "further deterioration is likely" under the Administration's deliberate neglect policy.

Problems have become worse, it found, because under President Reagan, "the biggest cuts have been enacted in programs financing state and local government, education, health and social services, and benefit programs tied to low income population."

Subcommittee Chairman Parren Mitchell (D-Md.) told a Capitol Hill news conference that the report pointed up the need for both increases in general revenue sharing and specific new programs including:

- Public jobs for the unemployed on rehabilitation of the central cities' infrastructure and to meet the need for public services, such as health facilities.
- Financing the construction, rehabilitation and purchase of quality housing.
- Inclusion of job-training requirements in any tax incentives granted to job-providing businesses.

The study done for the subcommittee found that President Reagan's policies overall "have helped the affluent but have been damaging to the poor and the near poor."

Deficit's toll

It noted the effect of the federal deficit on the nation's urban areas. The deficit "raises interest rates, limits the amount of money that can be allocated to urban-oriented federal programs, and raises the cost of all public and private-sector borrowing," the report stressed.

Because of tax policies "shifting the burden of federal taxation toward lower income people and from wealthier people, residents of urban centers have less disposable income available to contribute to the revitalization of local economies," the study found.

Victory celebration

Jubilant members of Hospital & Health Care Employees District 1199C in Philadelphia celebrate the end of a successful month-long strike for recognition at Care & Ambulance Service, the first private ambulance service organized in the state. The union credits Mayor Wilson Goode with help in ending the dispute. Elsewhere in the city, District 1199C service and dietary workers at Graduate Hospital ended a one-week walkout with the signing of a new three-year agreement that provides contract gains and rejects management giveback demands.

Canadians ratify GM pact, Mack Trucks strike settled

The Auto Workers ended strikes against General Motors of Canada and Mack Trucks, Inc., in New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and Maryland and signed a new three-year agreement with Ford Motor Co. covering some 135,000 American workers.

But in Toronto, the union's Canadian branch set Nov. 9 as a strike deadline in its contract talks with Ford of Canada. Some 14,200 workers are involved in that.

With new contracts now in place at both GM and Ford in the United States, the union next will seek early negotiations with Chrysler Corp., where the current contract has nearly one year of its term remaining.

The Canadian settlement with GM enabled some 36,000 UAW members to return to work, and cleared the way for nearly 52,000 U.S. workers also to get back to their jobs. The walkout had forced the closure of 30 assembly and parts plants in the United States because of the close integration of GM's North American operations.

Eighty-seven percent of the 22,448 Canadian workers who voted on the GM pact approved its terms, the union said.

The Canadian agreement substitutes additions to the cost-of-living allowance for the bonuses and profit-sharing that are key provisions of the U.S. settlement.

The union's new three-year contract with Ford workers in the United States was ratified by a 64-percent vote. The agreement closely follows the pattern set at GM, but also includes a promise by management not to close plants during the life of the pact.

Historic pact

UAW President Owen Bieber said if all the provisions of the Ford agreement are followed, "It will go down in history as one of our greatest achievements in both collective bargaining and the history of this company."

As in the GM contract, the Ford settlement calls for wage increases ranging between 1 and 3.5 percent, depending on the worker's job classification. It also provides for a job security program in the event of layoffs due to the introduction of new technology, the consolidation of Ford operations, or the company's shipment of work to non-company sources, a practice called "outsourcing."

The UAW's settlement with Mack Trucks ended a nine-day strike by 9,200 production workers which began immediately after their two-year contract expired at midnight Oct. 20. Details of the agreement were withheld, pending ratification votes Nov. 11 in Allentown and Macungie, Pa., Hagerstown, Md., and Bridgewater, N.J.

The main issues in the strike against the nation's second-largest maker of heavy trucks were job security and a company attempt to take away health care coverage.

IUE settles

In other industry bargaining, the Electronics Workers reached a tentative contract with GM covering 24,000 workers at nine plants in four states. Details of the settlement are pending while terms are distributed to members.

Chief IUE negotiator Robert Livingston said the contract is "directly responsive to the priorities of our members," and is "especially strong" in the areas of job security, pensions, and paid holidays. Wage gains parallel the UAW settlement with the company.

AFL-CIO assails attack on blacks in South Africa

The AFL-CIO condemned the South African government's military crackdown against innocent blacks and urged it instead to create a truly democratic system in which all its citizens can live and work in peace.

"The answer to the unrest among the black population does not lie in military actions which will only further violence and civil disruption," the federation said in a statement.

"The South African government should be reminded that the unrest is a direct consequence of the evils of the official policy of apartheid."

A combined force of 7,000 police and Army soldiers mounted the largest crackdown on political dissent ever seen in South Africa when it swept into the black townships of Sebokeng, Boipatong, and Sharpeville on Oct. 22.

The indiscriminate searches, harassment, and arrest of black South Africans in the townships "constitute an unwarranted violation of their fundamental human rights," the AFL-CIO charged.

The government said it launched the operation to "rid the area of criminal and revolutionary elements," but black political movements in the country denounced the crackdown as "an act of aggression equivalent to civil war" and warned that it could lead to increased racial bitterness.

The unrest began when the government inaugurated a new national constitution giving limited political rights to citizens of mixed race and Asian origin, while continuing to exclude the country's 73-percent black majority.

Coalition hits FCC's attempt to change 'fairness doctrine'

The AFL-CIO has joined with other public interest organizations in urging that the Federal Communications Commission not tamper with rules that require broadcasters to cover public issues fairly.

Unions, as well as public interest, religious, minority, business and community organizations have written the agency urging it to drop proposals to change the rules known collectively as the "Fairness Doctrine."

The fairness policy, in place since passage of the Communications Act of 1934, has been under attack by the Reagan Administration at the urging of the networks and many broadcast station owners.

Balance sought

The rules require radio and television broadcasters to provide reasonable opportunities for the presentation of contrasting points of view on controversial issues of public importance. Stations that fail to do so could lose their broadcast licenses under the law.

The FCC has proposed gutting the fairness policy, and the deadline for public comment on the proposal is Nov. 8.

The AFL-CIO, in testimony before a Senate committee, has stressed that the fairness doctrine is currently the only way of assuring that commercial television and radio stations air labor's side of controversial issues, including collective bargaining disputes and other matters concerning workers' rights.

There is no evidence, the federation said, that without the rules, broadcasters would voluntarily air all sides of such issues.

A resolution adopted at the AFL-CIO convention in 1983 also objected to the Reagan Administration's attempts to repeal both the fairness doctrine and the "equal time" provisions of the law which apply to political candidates.

Unions planning to comment can address their statements to the Office of the Secretary, Federal Communications Commission, 1919 M Street, N.W., Washington, D.C. 20554.

Michigan governor hails role of labor's seniors

Lansing, Mich.—In a certificate of special appreciation, Michigan Gov. James J. Blanchard (D) honored Concerned Seniors for Better Government for its "active and conscientious role" in state and national politics.

Blanchard's citation commended the group as a "valuable asset" to assure that citizens are informed about legislation that affects their lives.

Concerned Seniors is an arm of AFL-CIO COPE responsible for registering, educating and getting out the vote of union retirees.

Democratic gains edge Senate toward center

The Republican majority in the Senate shrunk to 53-47 as Democrats captured three GOP seats and gave up only one of their own.

All three new Democrats are more liberal than the Republicans they replaced, suggesting that the new Senate will be more independent of the Reagan White House.

The reduced GOP margin also raises a strong possibility of a Democratic takeover two years from now, when 22 Republican-held seats will be up for election and only 12 held by Democrats.

In this year's Senate election, 19 of the 33 seats at stake were held by Republicans.

Two Republican incumbents were beaten—Charles H. Percy, seeking a third term in Illinois, and Roger W. Jepsen, running for a second term in Iowa, The winners were COPE-endorsed Democrats who gave up House seats to run for the Senate—Paul Simon in Illinois and Tom Harkin in Iowa.

The third Democratic pickup was in Tennessee, where Senate Majority Leader Howard H. Baker, Jr., did not seek re-election. The easy winner was Albert Gore, Jr., a four-term congressman whose father had served three terms in the Senate.

Republicans scored an upset victory in Kentucky, where an aggressive campaign by County Judge Mitch McConnell brought him a narrow win over two-term incumbent Walter D. Huddleston.

Open seats, where incumbents were not seeking re-election, had increased the possibility of party switches in Massachusetts, Texas and West Virginia. But Texas stayed Republican and the two other states again sent Democrats to the Senate.

Elsewhere, incumbents of both parties were re-elected although some had close calls. These are the states where new senators were chosen or where there had been the possibility of a turnover.

Republicans fall short in bid for House gains

The House of Representatives is still the turf of mainstream Democrats.

If recounts divide evenly, the Democratic majority in the new 99th Congress will be 253-182, a modest 14-seat Republican pickup.

The GOP's hope was to at least recoup the 26 seats Republicans lost two years ago, when the nation was mired in double-digit unemployment. They had visions of repeating the 33-seat gain achieved when Ronald Reagan won the presidency four years ago.

Instead, the Democratic House strength is the greatest ever achieved in a presidential election year by the party losing the presidency.

Unless the new Congress reads Reagan's electoral sweep as a policy mandate, the conservative coalition will be only marginally stronger than in the outgoing Congress. Almost certainly the Reagan White House will not be able to steamroller its economic program through Congress as it did during the President's first two years —by putting together a working majority of Republicans and boll weevil conservative Democrats.

All but 14 Democratic incumbents who sought re-election were returned to office. Republicans who sought to wrap themselves in Reagan's coattails were unable to dislodge most of the Democrats who had been targeted as vulnerable because of the expectation of a big Reagan vote.

Democrats ousted three Republican incumbents, and both parties picked up some open seats where incumbents were not seeking re-election.

Split-ticket voting tribute to Reagan, rebuff to program

By David L. Perlman

President Reagan stood 525 electoral votes tall in his impressive re-election victory, but most of the congressional candidates who supported his program went down to defeat.

America's split-ticket election was a personal triumph for the President, a political victory for his critics.

Even as the President was sweeping 49 states, Democrats were ousting incumbent Republican senators and holding on to seats they had won two years ago, in a voter rebellion against the Reagan recession.

With the economy back up from the depths, 59 percent of the electorate voted for "four more years" of a Reagan presidency.

Most union members did not, choosing instead to support the candidacy of Walter Mondale and Geraldine Ferraro, who had the AFL-CIO's endorsement.

The federation remains "proud of its efforts" for the Democratic presidential ticket, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland said.

"Mondale and Ferraro fought for the right issues. They spoke out for justice and jobs for all Americans," he said, and the issues they raised about the nation's direction "remain to be resolved."

As the AFL-CIO sees it, the election brought "no mandate for a right-wing agenda," Kirkland stressed.

House Republican Leader Robert Michel grumbled that Reagan was obsessed with the goal of a 50-state electoral sweep and didn't do enough to help Republican candidates for Congress. But the Republican campaign committee had funded a massive media campaign urging voters to back Reagan by electing "a Republican team." And the President did make repeated appeals for GOP candidates.

It didn't work. Reagan told Iowa voters he "needed" Sen. Roger Jepsen back in Washington. Instead, Iowans sent Democrat Tom Harkin to the Senate. The President went to Little Rock to urge the election of Republican Ed Bethune. But Democrat David Pryor won with 57 percent of the vote.

Moderate coalition

The Democratic gain of two Senate seats opens up the possibility of a moderate coalition achieving a working majority. And it makes increasingly likely a Democratic capture of the Senate two years from now. That's when 22 seats now held by Republicans will be up for election, to only 12 risked by Democrats.

In the House, a likely 14-seat Republican pickup isn't enough to put together a dependable conservative majority — especially since several of the party changes are in districts that have been represented by conservative Democrats.

As for the suggested realignment of American politics, the shift of governorships at stake this year resulted in only a

Kirkland voices pride in labor's effort

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland released the following statement on the 1984 elections:

The AFL-CIO is proud of its effort in behalf of the candidacy of Walter F. Mondale and Geraldine Ferraro. We remain convinced of the soundness of our position in the primaries, the caucuses and the general election.

Mondale and Ferraro fought for the right issues. They spoke out for justice and jobs for all Americans and they squarely and courageously addressed the difficult choices that lie ahead. The issues they raised and the problems they discussed are crucial to the future of our country and they remain to be resolved.

The results of the Senate and House contests clearly indicate that there has been no major party realignment and no mandate for a right-wing agenda. In fact, the President skillfully avoided any commitment to any concrete course of action.

An analysis of exit polls as well as two independent post-election polls commissioned by the AFL-CIO shows that union members and their households voted in sharp contrast with all other households. According to the three network polls, all union households voted for Mondale-Ferraro by 17 or 18 percent more than all other households.

A poll of AFL-CIO union households (not including independent unions and associations) indicates that this margin increased to 20 percent.

Another poll of AFL-CIO union members shows that workers belonging to our affiliated unions supported Mondale-Ferraro by a 60-40 percent margin compared to a 57-41 percent margin of all union members found by one of the networks.

I am proud of the effort and the solidarity demonstrated by our affiliated unions, our state federations, our central labor bodies and our rank-and-file membership. AFL-CIO union leaders and their members recognized the common sense, decency and courage displayed by our endorsed candidates and their support never weakened.

The AFL-CIO remains undaunted. We shall continue to work for "liberty and justice for ALL."

Chemical Workers emphasize organizing as key to growth

Hollywood, Fla. — Chemical Workers President Frank D. Martino told the nearly 500 delegates to the union's convention of the programs and policies the ICWU has in place to help insure its continued growth.

Martino stressed the various organizing programs, the health and safety department and the use of audio-visual presentations as measures that are strengthening the union. The organizing projects focus particularly on signing up nonunion workers in organized plants.

This was the first time the union videotaped its convention. The more than 30 hours of tape will be edited into hour-long segments on organizing, health and safety and other topics.

The six-day convention, which celebrated the ICWU's 40th year, was held just prior to the national elections, and the delegates unanimously supported the Democratic presidential slate of Walter Mondale and Geraldine Ferraro.

Martino told the convention it would be easy, given the present political and economic climate, to deliver a message of gloom and despair, but because of "the type of members" in ICWU, its programs and its dedication to social justice, "we will emerge from these dark shadows brought on by the Reagan Administration bigger and better than ever."

"I firmly believe that our union's, and all of organized labor's, best days are still before us," he said.

Martino was re-elected to a third four-year term. Also re-elected were Sec.-Treas. William J. Sparks and Vice Presidents George McDevitt, Larry Ahern, Arthur Wood, Ralph Brannon, W. A. Joiner and Angelo Russo. International Rep. Michael Hammond of Jeffersonville, Ind., was elected vice president in the only contested race, over James Middleton of Waukegan, Ill. Hammond will fill the seat of Arthur O. Burns, who is retiring.

Adopted resolutions

Among resolutions adopted by the delegates were measures urging a national industrial policy and plant closing legislation, and opposing the Reagan-backed balanced budget amendment, youth subminimum wage, and changes in social security.

Guest speakers included Rubber Workers President Milan Stone; Dr. Eula Bingham, former OSHA administrator; former AFL-CIO COPE Director Al Barkan; Antonio Harrison of the Democratic National Committee; James Kennedy, executive assistant to AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue; Lois Marie Gibbs, heroine of the Love Canal dump site tragedy, and Joseph Lowery, president of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference.

High jobless rate stirs recession fear

Unemployment remained unchanged at 7.4 percent in October, indicating a sluggish economy that could slide into a new recession and a return to double-digit joblessness, the AFL-CIO warned.

"President Reagan shows little or no concern for the millions who can't find jobs, and has no plans or programs to reduce or alleviate unemployment," the federation charged. "Instead, he has just vetoed a much needed youth jobs bill."

Officially, there were 8.4 million workers unemployed in October, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

But the BLS figures ignored many other Americans who suffer some measure of unemployment. They are the 1.2 million who have abandoned their search for jobs because they believe there are none available, and another 5.4 million who are working only part-time because they cannot find full-time work.

The picture is particularly bleak in Michigan, with an official jobless rate of 10.9 percent, as well as Ohio, 9.5 percent, and Pennsylvania, 9 percent.

Blacks, with an unemployment rate of 15.4 percent, and Hispanics, with 10.9 percent, continue to experience the worst of it.

The national rate has remained at 7.4 or 7.5 percent for six months, with the exception of June when it dropped to 7.1 percent, the lowest point since the end of the 1981-82 Reagan Recession.

When Reagan took office, the jobless rate was 7.5 percent and the official number of unemployed was 8.1 million. At the recession's worst point, the rate was 10.7 percent and the number of unemployed workers was 12 million.

"After dropping sharply in the early months of the recovery, unemployment has shown little movement since last May," BLS Commissioner Janet L. Norwood told the Joint Economic Committee of Congress.

Slight jobless change

The major categories of unemployment changed little in October. The jobless rate for adult men fell slightly to 6.3 percent from 6.5 percent in September while the rate for adult women edged up to 6.9 percent from 6.7 percent.

The unemployment rate for teenagers, which has been in the 18-to-20 percent range all year, was 18.8 percent in October.

The number of employed workers grew by 347,000 to 105.6 million over the month, after seasonal adjustment, but that was offset by nearly equal growth in the labor force. Most of the new jobs were in service industries rather than manufacturing.

In testimony to the JEC, Norwood noted that growth in manufacturing jobs "has been quite limited since early in the spring. Indeed, manufacturing has recovered only about 70 percent of the jobs lost during the recession."

The bulk of the new jobs in the service sector occurred in retail trade, probably in anticipation of the Christmas selling season. Over-the-month increases also took place in transportation and public utilities, wholesale trade, and finance, insurance, and real estate, about 25,000 each.

Manufacturing employment rose by 55,000, not enough to recoup the 115,000 decline in September. All of the October increase was in durable goods, with the largest gains in machinery, fabricated metals, and lumber and wood products.

The average workweek of production and nonsupervisory workers fell two-tenths of an hour to 35.1 hours. The manufacturing workweek edged down one-tenth of an hour and factory overtime was unchanged at 3.3 hours, the same level that has prevailed over the past six months.

A separate measure of unemployment that counts the armed forces among the employed showed joblessness at 7.3 percent in October, the same as in September.

Jury slaps LaRouche with $3-million penalty for 'dirty trick' calls

Lyndon H. LaRouche, Jr., a perennial presidential candidate who has circled the outer fringes of American politics, emerged a double loser in a federal district court verdict.

First, LaRouche lost his $150 million libel suit against NBC television and the B'nai B'rith Anti-Defamation League.

The same Alexandria, Va., jury also awarded NBC $3 million in a countersuit stemming from a "dirty tricks" attempt to sabotage a television interview.

NBC programs had portrayed him as a right-wing eccentric whose political cult has been associated with violence, nasty smear campaigns and harassment of opponents. Anti-Defamation League officials had termed him "a small-time Hitler" and pointed to his virulent attacks on Jews over the years.

LaRouche, who lives on a heavily guarded estate in Virginia, said in testimony during the trial that he has no income and pays no income taxes. He described himself as "an economist and philosopher of some significance" and claimed he doesn't know who pays for his food, clothing, travel and lawyer fees.

On the ballot

This year, LaRouche was listed on the presidential ballot of 18 states and the District of Columbia. Four years ago, he contented himself with the Democratic primaries, running in 10 states. But in 1976, as the candidate of something called the U.S. Labor Party, he ran in 26 states and received some 40,000 votes.

A series of articles in the AFL-CIO News two years ago, by Wesley McCune of Group Research, Inc., sought to trace the labyrinth of LaRouche front organizations and his erratic wandering across the political spectrum.

LaRouche began his political career as a self-described Trotskyist communist. In the late 1960s, he turned a wing of the radical Students for a Democratic Society into something called the National Caucus of Labor Committees, which made a specialty of disrupting meetings and making outrageous accusations against LaRouche targets. That became in time the U.S. Labor Party, which, like all of LaRouche's future front groups, carried a misleading name.

His newspaper was called New Solidarity — carrying not the slightest connection with Auto Workers' publication, Solidarity. And the front he has used most recently is the Democratic National Policy Committee.

The LaRouche network includes the Fusion Energy Foundation, which has peddled pro-nuclear publications at airports; the high-priced Executive Intelligence Review, whose correspondents have shown ingenuity in getting access to important foreign dignitaries, and the National Anti-Drug Coalition, whose publications include allegations that wealthy Jews and the British control the world drug trade.

Dubious plots

LaRouche publications have "exposed" plots by the late Nelson Rockefeller and the Central Intelligence Agency to take over the United States and have headlined a "Black International Terrorist Assassination Plot to Kill Lyndon H. LaRouche."

Because of the clear irrationality of his ideological meanderings, LaRouche in recent years has been viewed more as an election-year sideshow than a source of serious concern. An article in the current issue of New Republic magazine may change that perception.

The article, by Dennis King and Ronald Radosh, asserts that LaRouche and people associated with him have had easy access to high officials in the Reagan Administration and were active promoters of the "Star Wars" concept of missile defense during the period when the Reagan Administration's military planners were first exploring the issue. Earlier, he had written of "warfare as the work of God" and said America "must crush forces of evil."

Confirming an assertion in the New Republic article, the CIA acknowledged that LaRouche had met on various occasions with high officials in the CIA.

Over the years, persons associated with LaRouche publications have used the names of prominent newspaper and magazine reporters to reach news sources. Similar tactics are also used to retaliate against perceived "enemies," the libel trial revealed.

Interview sabotage

NBC's successful countersuit against LaRouche was based on the attempted sabotage of a scheduled network interview with Sen. Daniel P. Moynihan (D-N.Y.) to be used in a television news magazine report on LaRouche.

Testimony revealed that a person claiming to be from NBC phoned Moynihan's office to cancel the scheduled interview, while a person claiming to be a Moynihan aide called NBC to say that Moynihan had decided to cancel the interview.

In a pre-trial deposition, LaRouche said he "might" have known about the false calls. At the trial, he claimed that the statement and other portions of the deposition had been "falsified."

SEIU tops union-buster, wins 1,300-member unit

Los Angeles—More than 1,300 employees at Hollywood Presbyterian Medical Center here ignored a heated anti-union campaign run by a hired union-buster and voted by a wide margin to be represented by Service Employees Local 399.

The unit of professional, clerical, technical and service workers voted 632 to 435 for Local 399 in the culmination of a five-month organizing drive begun by the workers in May after the acute care hospital arbitrarily began layoffs and pay and benefit slashes.

Local 399 Sec.-Treas. Gloria Marigny credited the employees' aggressive and dedicated organizing committee for the big National Labor Relations Board election win in the face of a union-busting campaign waged by the hospital and its consultant, Management Science Associates.

Union-busting move defeated at Stanford U.

Stanford, Calif.—By an overwhelming margin, members of Service Employees Local 680 at Stanford University have voted to reaffirm the union as their representative, soundly trouncing a union-busting move by the school's administration.

The unit of technical, maintenance and service workers voted 782 to 424 for continued representation by their local in an Oct. 30 election supervised by the National Labor Relations Board. More than 90 percent of the 1,312 eligible members participated in the vote.

Although the union has represented the employees for well over a decade, the university administration tried to use an amicable internal restructuring of SEIU local jurisdictions as an excuse to pull back its recognition of the unit and to refuse to honor its contract.

Both sides filed unfair practice charges earlier this year, then in September agreed to a new NLRB election to settle the issue.

Local 680 President Linda Crouse praised the local's members for holding steady "against a union-breaking campaign by one of the most powerful institutions in the country."

Crouse said the union had "made history" in a union-busting era "by defeating Stanford's efforts to break us."

The university had agreed before the election to recognize the union if it won and to sign a new contract that will have terms identical to an existing pact which runs through August 1985.

Local 680 was first certified as the Stanford employees bargaining agent in 1973, and in 1980 merged with SEIU Local 715.

Rechartered local

In December 1983, Local 715 concurred with the Stanford unit's request for a return to its former status, and the SEIU international executive board voted to recharter Local 680.

But the university refused to recognize Local 680, filed unfair practices charges and pushed for a disaffiliation vote.

Ignoring a referendum supervised by the American Arbitration Association — in which Local 680 members voted 630 to 125 to reaffirm the union as their representative—Stanford stopped honoring various contract provisions including dues checkoff and grievance procedures.

That move drew unfair practice charges from the local, but in agreeing to an election, both sides withdrew their charges.

ILGWU assails Labor Dept. for lifting ban on homework

A new Labor Dept. attempt to lift a 40-year-old ban on industrial homework in the knitted outerwear industry leaves employees unprotected and flouts the law, the Ladies' Garment Workers charged.

Under a "final rule" issued by the Labor Dept., an employer who registers with the department will be allowed to farm out the manufacture of knitted garments to persons working at home.

According to the Labor Dept., the registration process will make it possible to check conditions of employment for compliance with the wage-hour law.

ILGWU General Counsel Max Zimny disputed the claim and said the new rule is as "fatally defective" as earlier versions. He said inability of the Labor Dept. to effectively enforce wage-hour requirements would allow unscrupulous employers to evade not just the Fair Labor Standards Act "but social security, immigration, workers' compensation and health and safety laws as well."

Soon after the Reagan Administration took office, Labor Sec. Ray Donovan proposed to lift industrial homework restrictions that have been in effect since 1942 for knitted outerwear, women's apparel, jewelry, gloves and mittens, buttons and buckles, handkerchiefs and embroideries—the traditional "kitchen sweatshop" industries.

In the face of public and congressional outcry, the Administration decided to move first to lift restrictions on knitted outerwear, portraying its action as support for a rustic "cottage industry" in Vermont.

Legal challenge

The ILGWU, joined by the Clothing & Textile Workers, fair employer groups, and several states, mounted a legal challenge and won at the appellate court level.

The court decision, nearly a year ago, found that the Labor Dept. hadn't made a case for changing the long-standing regulations and should get back to enforcing the law if it can't persuade Congress to change a law it doesn't like.

In its latest move, the Labor Dept. went to elaborate lengths to propose various alternatives and seek comments from interested parties. In deciding on an employer certification procedure, the department contended the identification of employers using home workers would overcome any problem of enforcement.

That is all that matters, the department said. The appellate court had noted in its decision that the Labor Dept. had argued that an increase in the employment opportunities for homeworkers was a valid cause for rescinding the ban. But the court held the Labor Dept. hadn't adequately considered the argument raised by the unions that any increase in homework employment would be negated by reductions in the employment and earning power of factory workers.

In its new document, the Labor Dept. dropped the argument of expanded employment opportunities and said the only issue was whether a certification process made enforcement feasible.

The new rule is scheduled to take effect in early December.

Gen. Dynamics strikers battle for pay clause

Fort Worth, Tex.—Some 6,400 members of Machinists Local 776 struck the General Dynamics Corp. plant here after approving the walkout by a vote of 4,936 to 108.

The strike, the first at the plant since 1946, centers on the company's demand to replace the annual wage increases with a 3-percent bonus. The company is also pressing for elimination of the cost-of-living adjustment for some workers. The union is seeking a three-year pact containing annual increases of 8 percent, 5 percent and 5 percent, plus improvements in pensions and insurances.

Negotiations resumed Nov. 6, two days after the strike began. General Dynamics is the nation's largest defense contractor and produces about 15 F-16 fighter planes a month at the plant outside Fort Worth.

While negotiations are proceeding slowly, the mood on the picket line is more intense. On the first day of the strike, the IAM members were confronted by local police SWAT teams while picketing the plant entrances. Eight members were arrested as police used tear gas and water cannons against the strikers.

Traffic backups

General Dynamics employs 16,500 persons here, and each morning thousands of non-union workers cross the picket lines. Traffic backups extend several miles from the plant. Several pickets have been grazed by cars crossing the lines.

General Dynamics has been under fire from a number of unions for its anti-labor tactics. It has also been under scrutiny by House subcommittees for its collective bargaining relations and its worsening job safety problems.

The company was cited recently as one of 65 major manufacturers that paid no income taxes between 1981 and 1983. Earlier this year, it was in the headlines when it was accused of taxpayer ripoffs, such as charging the Air Force $9,600 each for Allen wrenches worth about 12 cents and billing $7,417 for three-inch pieces of wire worth less than 3 cents.

Georgia labor gives priority to improving jobless benefits

Savannah, Ga.—The Georgia AFL-CIO's top legislative goal in the 1985 General Assembly will be to gain passage of a law providing for graduated increases in unemployment benefits.

In a report to delegates at the federation's 28th annual convention here, State AFL-CIO President Herbert H. Mabry called on Georgia Labor Commissioner Joseph Tanner to hold a meeting of the Unemployment Security Council to consider raising jobless insurance benefits from the current maximum of $125 a week to two-thirds of the average insured wage in Georgia.

"This would end the constant process of asking for an increase from the General Assembly each year," Mabry noted.

In other business, the three-day convention adopted proposals supporting the right of public employees to bargain collectively, an agency shop law, state income tax reform, and voter registration by political party.

Re-elected to three-year terms without opposition were Mabry, Sec.-Treas. Martha True and Executive Vice President H. F. Ellington.

Delegates also participated in workshops, and heard from a number of speakers who attacked the record of the Reagan Administration.

Rev. Joseph Lowery, president of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, called upon delegates to form a new "coalition of conscience" to move America forward. America has grown "cold and callous," he said.

"Whenever a nation tries to cure inflation by making poor folks sick, it's time for a revival," he warned. "Whenever we try to bring down inflation by running up unemployment, it is time for revival. Whenever we put labor rights, civil rights and women's rights on the back burner and then turn off the doggone fire, it's time for a revival."

Millions jobless

AFL-CIO Region 5 Director James Sala charged that Reaganomics has put 30 million people out of work at one time or another in the past four years. Other Administration policies have cut social security and removed people from disability rolls who were rightfully entitled to receive benefits.

Other speakers included Rep. Tony Coelho (D-Calif.); AFL-CIO Vice President Barbara Hutchinson, director of the Government Employees women's department; AFL-CIO Organizing Director Alan Kistler and Bricklayers Political & Legislative Director Joan Baggett.

Kirkland spurs Negro College Fund

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, with the endorsement of the federation's Executive Council, has accepted the invitation of the United Negro College Fund to be the labor chairman for its Dec. 29 national fund-raising telethon.

Kirkland also will be the host of a reception for trade unionists in support of the UNCF to be held on Nov. 19 from 5 to 7 p.m. at the Washington Hilton Hotel.

In urging union officers and members to back the fund's efforts, Kirkland stressed that many UNCF schools are experiencing extreme financial difficulties. Labor support, he said, can help them continue to provide black youth with "equality of opportunity so vital to their future and to the future of our nation."

Second-term agenda sets renewed attack on workers

By Arlee C. Green

President Ronald Reagan coasted through Election Day, pointing to an unfinished agenda, without ever getting specific as to what that agenda entailed. But the Labor Dept.'s semiannual regulatory agenda, published just prior to the election, is a "laundry list of anti-worker schemes," AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland charged.

"It includes the whole litany of child-labor abuses, workplace health and safety malpractice and the general demolition of all the other worker protections that the Reagan gang has not yet succeeded in gutting in their first 45 months," Kirkland told delegates to the Flight Attendants' executive council meeting in Seattle.

He said the agenda announces Reagan's intentions to:

- Impose a youth subminimum wage on a broader group of full-time students.
- Reduced the limits on working hours for 14- and 15-year-old children.
- Weaken OSHA standards on leading carcinogens.
- Undermine safety and health regulations by reducing employer record-keeping and denying workers access to those records.
- Exempt some coal companies from contributing to black-lung funds.
- Weaken civil rights by exempting federal contractors from affirmative action programs.

Kirkland stressed that Reagan had not mentioned these intentions during the campaign and "if asked, he would almost certainly promise never to carry them out."

The Labor Dept., a few days before the election, did release its final rules removing the protections on industrial homework for the home knitting industry. (Story, Page 3.)

Key among the regulatory items on the Labor Dept.'s agenda are proposed health and safety rules. Margaret Seminario, associate director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Occupational Safety, Health & Social Security, charged that the Labor Dept. is "continuing its deregulatory agenda. There is no public support for weakening the lead standard or the cancer policy or for rolling back the medical records access rule."

Deadlines delayed

The semiannual agenda was published in the Federal Register on Oct. 22, 1984, updating the agenda published on Apr. 23, 1984. In the interim, the estimates on departmental action were revised, pushing the standards back an average of nine months.

Seminario said, "It's only those areas where the Labor Dept. is pushed to issue standards that any are produced. Otherwise, the deadlines keep being pushed back and pushed back, while the Office of Management & Budget works to weaken them."

She said it's ironic that this Administration, which claims to have brought in efficient management from the business community, has been "unable in four years to meet any deadlines, other than court-imposed ones."

Under the Carter Administration, eight new standards were issued, she said, while only two have been produced by the Reagan Administration. The ethylene oxide standard was produced under court order, while the hazards communication standard came at the request of manufacturers.

Seminario also charged that the Labor Dept.'s agenda plans no action for standards on formaldehyde, butadiene, neurotoxins or reproductive hazards.

Kirkland pledges support to striking Masters, Mates

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland pledged that the federation will provide "all possible assistance" to the Masters, Mates & Pilots in the union's struggle for a fair contract with five tanker companies.

The MMP struck the tanker owners Oct. 3, two days after negotiations for a new contract broke off. The union had reached accord for a new three-year contract with dry cargo carriers in July, but the tanker operators refused to renew their agreement.

In a letter to MMP President Robert Lowen, Kirkland said the employers "are engaged in a flagrant attempt to bust your union and destroy the conditions of employment" that licensed deck officers have attained over the past 50 years.

Since the start of the walkout, the tanker owners have attempted to keep their fleets operating with non-union crews.

"By replacing qualified licensed deck officers of the MMP with scabs, they are putting at risk the safety of these ships and crews," Kirkland stressed.

The struck firms are Marine Transport Lines, Maritime Overseas Corp., Trinidad Corp., Moore McCormack Bulk Lines and Keystone Tankship Corp.

Kirkland said federation staff representatives as well as affiliated unions and local central labor councils in port cities will be called on to assist the MMP with picket lines and demonstrations. The MMP is an affiliate of the Longshoremen.

After Democratic gains

Senate changes point to moderate majority

Illinois—The new senator is Paul Simon, 55, a "downstater" who had the support of both factions of Chicago Democrats. He was able to win over many voters who had supported Percy in the past but had been alienated by his increasingly conservative tilt. During three terms in the Senate, Percy's cumulative COPE voting record was 50-percent "right." But he had moved increasingly closer to the Reagan position to court conservative voters. In the last two years, he had cast 20 "wrong" and only six "right" votes on issues important to labor. Simon's COPE record, in his five terms in the House was 80 percent "right."

The campaign became increasingly bitter as polls showed the lead seesawing. A late television commercial by Percy, which may have backfired in terms of support, sought to portray Simon as an admirer of Iran's Ayatollah Khomeini because of an effort he made to gain the freedom of the American hostages.

Iowa—Republican Roger W. Jepsen, seeking a second term, tried to persuade Iowans that Tom Harkin, a five-term congressman with a 73-percent COPE record, was "too liberal" for the state. Iowans were not persuaded. They did not seem dismayed by Jepsen's attack on Harkin for voting against the balanced budget constitutional amendment. Jepsen's personal problems contributed to a decisive victory for his Democratic opponent.

Kentucky—Two-term Democrat Walter D. Huddleston, a moderate who appeared in close tune with his constituents, ran up against an aggressively negative campaign by Republican challenger Mitch McConnell, 32, that turned the polls around. A witty series of television commercials attacking Huddleston was a factor. The margin was close, but Huddleston with a 71-percent COPE record will be replaced by a senator who says he will carry on "the Reagan revolution."

Tennessee—There was no cliffhanger here as Democrat Albert Gore, Jr., who had the State AFL-CIO endorsement even before he formally declared his Senate candidacy, won an expected victory. Victor Ashe, a former state legislator who hoped to keep the seat Republican, told reporters "the only thing that went wrong was that my opponent got more votes than I did." A conservative fundamentalist running as an independent was not a factor.

West Virginia—To succeed the venerable Jennings Randolph, who is retiring, West Virginia is sending Gov. John D. Rockefeller IV, 47, to the Senate. Jay Rockefeller's victory was expected, but his margin over business executive John R. Raese was less than earlier anticipated. Both candidates are wealthy and campaign spending was high. But Reagan coattails weren't long enough for the Republican.

Massachusetts—The retirement of popular Democrat Paul E. Tsongas and a pair of primary upsets led Republicans to hopes of snatching a Senate victory here. Republicans saw Lt. Gov. John F. Kerry, 40, as "too liberal" to win in a year when Ronald Reagan was riding high. But it turned out that Massachusetts voters found Republican businessman Raymond Shamie to be too conservative.

Michigan—Astronaut turned politician Jack Lousma was the Republican "possibility" in Michigan. But incumbent Democrat Carl Levin, with a 95-percent COPE record, held off the challenge.

Nebraska — Incumbent Democrat J. James Exon is about as conservative as northern Democrats come and was supposed to be an easy winner. He did win, but not by much, over a little-known Republican, Nancy Hoch.

North Carolina—The most publicized Senate contest in the nation saw Republican Jesse Helms win a third term, beating off a strong challenge from Gov. James B. Hunt, Jr. Hunt is a moderate conservative, while Helms operates from the outer fringes of the Republican right wing.

Texas—Liberal Democrat Lloyd Doggett won his party's Senate nomination in a divisive and hard-fought primary. He had strong and enthusiastic labor support, but the winner, as expected, was Phil Gramm, the boll weevil Democratic congressman who turned Republican. The state's three-time Republican senator, John Tower, did not seek re-election. Gramm has a 12-percent "right" COPE score.

Minnesota—Incumbent Republican Rudy Boschwitz won a second term as expected. But his Democratic opponent, Minnesota Sec. of State Joan Growe, gave him a strong challenge.

In other Senate contests, Republicans re-elected were Ted Stevens in Alaska; William L. Armstrong, Colorado; James A. McClure, Idaho; Nancy Kassebaum, Kansas; William S. Cohen, Maine; Thad Cochran, Mississippi; Gordon J. Humphrey, New Hampshire; Pete V. Domenici, New Mexico; Larry Pressler, South Dakota; Strom Thurmond, South Carolina; Mark O. Hatfield, Oregon; John W. Warner, Virginia, and Alan K. Simpson, Wyoming.

Democrats re-elected also included Howell Heflin, Alabama; David Pyror, Arkansas; Sam Nunn, Georgia; Joseph R. Biden, Delaware; J. Bennett Johnston, Louisiana; David L. Boren, Oklahoma; Max Baucus, Montana; Bill Bradley, New Jersey, and Claiborne Pell, Rhode Island.

AFSCME gains 6,000 at University of Iowa

Des Moines, Iowa—The State, County & Municipal Employees won bargaining rights for some 6,000 clerical workers employed by the University of Iowa system in Des Moines, Ames and Iowa City. AFSCME was chosen by a vote of 2,377 to 1,610, reversing the result of a year earlier when the union lost by 67 votes.

Equal pay for jobs of comparable worth was a key organizing issue, sparked in part by Iowa Gov. Terry Branstad's veto of portions of a union-backed pay equity bill.

AFSCME President Gerald W. McEntee said the union intends to press hard for pay equity for the clerical workers.

Republican gain of one governorship leaves Democrats with 34-16 majority

By James M. Shevis

Democrats defeated sitting Republican governors in two states and put in the first woman governor in Vermont's history as they resisted GOP gubernatorial attempts to ride Ronald Reagan's coattails to statehouse victories.

When all the votes were counted, eight of the 13 governors' seats that were up this year went to Republicans. But since seven of the contested seats were already held by the GOP, the Republicans were limited to a net gain of just one.

As a result of the virtual standoff, Democrats still control 34 governors' offices to the Republicans' 16. The last time the Republican Party held a majority of statehouses was in 1969, when it had 32.

The two Republican governors swept out of office were in North Dakota and in Washington. North Dakota Gov. Allen I. Olson was upset by Democratic State Rep. George Sinner, who had the endorsement of COPE. Washington Gov. John Spellman lost to another COPE-endorsed candidate, Pierce County Executive Booth Gardner.

The defeats tempered GOP celebration over wins against Democratic gubernatorial candidates in North Carolina, Rhode Island, Utah, West Virginia, New Hampshire, Delaware, Indiana and Missouri.

Democrats scored another satisfying victory in Vermont, where former Lt. Gov. Madeleine M. Kunin squeaked past Atty. Gen. John J. Easton, Jr., to become the state's first female governor and only the third Democrat to hold the office in 130 years.

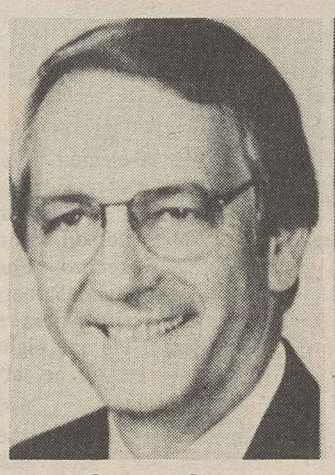
In the tightest governor's race this year, the vote count seesawed throughout Election Day and came up finally in favor of Kunin, 50.06 percent to Easton's 48.48 percent. Three minor candidates accounted for the negligible remaining fraction.

No recount

Easton held back his concession until Wednesday, then said he would not contest the vote or ask for a recount even if the final tally failed to give Kunin the one vote plus 50 percent of the ballots needed to win under the state constitution.

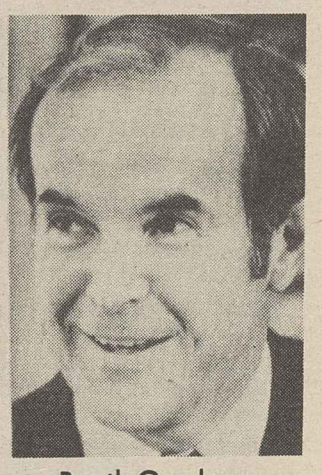
Kunin, 51, succeeds Richard A. Snelling, who retired. She lost to Snelling two years ago, but gained considerable prominence in winning 44 percent of the vote.

Kunin joins Martha Layne Collins of Kentucky as the nation's only female governors. She is only the seventh woman in U.S. history to serve as a state governor.



George Sinner

Madeleine Kunin



Booth Gardner

In a close race in Puerto Rico, two-term incumbent Gov. Carlos Romero Barcelo conceded the contest to former Gov. Rafael Hernandez Colon. Romero Barcelo, who campaigned on a pledge to press for U.S. statehood for the commonwealth, had edged out Hernandez Colon in 1976 and 1980. Hernandez Colon has said he will not push the statehood issue for the island, whose residents are U.S. citizens.

Here are highlights of other contests:

Arkansas—Incumbent Democrat Bill Clinton won by a landslide over Republican contractor Woody Freeman to become the state's first governor since Orval Faubus to serve three terms. Clinton had strong labor backing.

Delaware—Republican Lt. Gov. Michael N. Castle, a protege of outgoing Gov. Pierre S. (Pete) du Pont IV, who was ineligible to seek a third term, beat former State Supreme Court Justice William T. Quillen, a Democrat.

Indiana—Incumbent Republican Robert D. Orr won a second four-year term, defeating Democratic State Sen. W. Wayne Townsend. In this highly conservative state, the GOP now has engineered five straight gubernatorial victories.

Missouri—Atty. Gen. John Ashcroft, a gospel-singing Republican with an old-fashioned conservative appeal, defeated Democratic Lt. Gov. Kenneth J. Rothman. The outgoing Republican governor, Christopher S. (Kit) Bond, was constitutionally barred from seeking a third term.

Montana—Incumbent Democrat Ted Schwinden easily defeated Republican State Sen. Pat Goodover for a second four-year term. A highly popular leader, Schwinden put economic development and careful control of state expenditures at the top of his priority list. He was endorsed by COPE.

New Hampshire—Incumbent Republican John Sununu rolled to easy victory over State House Minority Leader Chris Spirou. No New Hampshire governor in this century who has sought a second term has been denied one.

North Carolina—Rep. James G. Martin became only the second Republican governor in North Carolina this century in defeating Atty. Gen. Rufus Edmisten. Martin succeeds Democratic Gov. James Hunt, who left office to fight a bitter, losing battle to oust conservative Republican Jesse Helms from his Senate seat.

Rhode Island—Cranston Mayor Edward D. DiPrete became the first Republican in 16 years to win the governor's mansion by defeating State Treas. Anthony J. Solomon in a lopsided victory. DiPrete succeeds J. Joseph Garrahy, a Democrat, who did not seek re-election.

Utah—House Speaker Norman H. Bangerter became the state's first Republican governor in 20 years, turning back former Rep. Wayne Owens in a contest to succeed retiring Democratic Gov. Scott Matheson.

West Virginia—Former Republican Gov. Arch A. Moore, Jr., won a tight race against House Speaker Clyde M. See, Jr., for a seat vacated by Democratic Gov. John D. (Jay) Rockefeller IV, who was ineligible to seek a third term and won the Senate seat vacated by retiring Democratic Sen. Jennings Randolph.

Novelty Workers raise per capita, press organizing

New York—A special convention of the Novelty & Production Workers unanimously approved increases in the union's per capita payment and minimum local union dues among a number of other constitutional changes considered. The delegates also realigned the top leadership, including a change in the office of secretary-treasurer.

An urgent appeal by President Julius Isaacson pointed out that the union was being squeezed financially between rising administrative costs and a membership decline caused by a rising flood of imports. The delegates responded by approving an increase, effective next Jan. 1, of 30 cents —from $2 to $2.30—in the monthly per capita payment with the understanding that the situation will be reviewed at the next regular convention in 1986. They also voted for a two-stage increase in local union minimum dues—from $10 to $13 monthly, effective Jan. 1, 1985, with an additional $1 a year later.

After accepting with regret the resignation of Sec.-Treas. John Serpico, who had served in that capacity for the past decade, the delegates unanimously elected Donald Terlap to fill the unexpired term. Elected as international vice presidents were Tom Tscicouris and George Goldman, while Rocco Miranti and Maria Basillio were named to the general executive board.

In other constitutional changes, the delegates voted to reduce the size of the executive board and redefine the functions of the two top officers. The convention voted to launch an intensive organizing drive in the doll and toy industry.

Voters reject right-wing schemes for tax curbs

By Susan Dunlop

With the help of strong campaigns by state labor movements, voters in California, Michigan and Nevada soundly rejected job-destroying tax limitation measures on their ballots and handed right-wing supporters of the revenue-slashing proposals a series of stinging setbacks.

A similar proposal in Oregon appears headed for defeat in a close contest.

Altogether, voters in 43 states and the District of Columbia dealt with some 236 issues on their ballots, including a number of special concern to labor.

In California, a state which commonly has a wide range of questions on its ballots, the State AFL-CIO successfully opposed the tax limitation measure and also beat down a congressional reapportionment scheme that would have favored the state's Republican minority. Voters also agreed with the federation's opposition to a plan to limit campaign contributions to unreasonably low levels, and they turned back an attempt to slash state welfare and medical programs for the needy.

Tax plan

The tax limitation plan would have required a two-thirds majority in the state legislature to raise state taxes and a two-thirds popular vote to raise local taxes and fees.

It also included a tax rebate system that would have given money back to Californians who had bought homes before 1977, while raising taxes for most other homeowners.

Both the labor movement and the business community branded the measure as destructive and unfair. The idea was the latest brainchild of Howard Jarvis, the force behind California's destructive Proposition 13 tax limitation, passed in 1978.

Right-wing setback

A strong labor-business-government coalition in Michigan was the key to that state's 3-to-2 shellacking of a right-wing sponsored tax rollback and limitation initiative.

Had it passed, the measure that the Michigan AFL-CIO called "a gun pointed at the heart of the state" would have eliminated thousands of jobs, jeopardized unemployment compensation, and crippled the state's education system and human services programs.

The initiative would have rolled back a crucial 1983 tax increase to 1981 levels and would have required a voter referendum on future increases while imposing stiff prerequisites for raising various fees and tuition.

The tax initiative on the Nevada ballot, defeated with the State AFL-CIO's assistance, would have applied a stringent requirement of a two-thirds majority in the legislature to approve tax increases. Had it gotten by, as few as eight legislators could have blocked any tax increases.

The race is tight in Oregon where voters by a slim margin are agreeing with the State AFL-CIO's opposition to a property tax limitation that could have cut some local revenues by as much as 40 percent. Final results depend on the tally of absentee ballots.

In a sampling of other ballot isssues decided around the nation:

- New Jersey voters approved two labor-supported bond issues including a measure to cover improvements in the state's mental institutions. The state also was given authority to dedicate 2.5 cents of its 8-cent gasoline tax to guarantee its revenue bonds. Both measures are expected to create several thousand new jobs.

No tax on benefits

New Jersey voters also voted more than 3-to-1 approval of a constitutional amendment prohibiting the state from taxing social security or railroad retirement benefits. The state does not tax the benefits now, but the measure represented a response to changes pressed by the Reagan Administration to permit some federal tax bites in retirees' checks.

- Strong support from the Missouri AFL-CIO helped persuade voters to approve two ballot questions that would permit state and local governments to pay for medical benefits for employees' dependents and provide cost-of-living increases for retirees.

- The West Virginia AFL-CIO convention voted earlier this year to back a proposal for a state lottery expected to help finance the state's school systems, and the voters agreed. But a package of other education-linked measures, including a 1-percent state sales tax hike, was turned down.

A labor-backed plan to provide low-interest home loans to Vietnam War veterans was approved.

Health care rules

- In Arizona, voters agreed with the State AFL-CIO and turned down five complex and confusing health care industry regulation measures. The federation successfully opposed attempts to make strikes by public employees illegal, and voters also turned aside an attempt at a tax limitation scheme. A measure that would weaken the state's prevailing wage law appeared headed for passage, however.

- In Idaho, voters said no to a Republican scheme to change the state's congressional apportionment rules in their favor and nullify a state supreme court decision. On the same ballot, voters decided against a measure to end the sales tax on food.

- The Colorado AFL-CIO successfully supported a "motor voter" registration program that will permit citizens to register to vote when they obtain or renew their licenses.

House results dash Republican hopes

Election pickup falls short of recouping 1982 losses

said the election proved that President Reagan "is a very popular man," but at the same time, "the voters sent Democrats to Congress as a safety net for the American public."

Any tilt to the Republicans, nevertheless, can make a difference on close votes. And the newly elected House will be at least marginally more conservative than the outgoing body. But it will still be the Democratic leadership that controls the agenda and determines in large part what bills will come out of committee.

The ideological shift in the House is less than the party change, since about half the Republican gain came in southern states where many of the changes merely replaced conservative Democrats with more conservative Republicans. North Carolina and Texas accounted for half the Republican gains.

There were only single-seat GOP gains in such big states as California, New York and Michigan—all of which continue to have large Democratic majorities in their congressional delegations. Democratic gains added to the party's congressional majority in Illinois and tilted control of the Ohio House delegation from Republican to Democratic.

These are some of the House races that drew special attention:

Alabama—Republicans held on to the Mobile district, with Sonny Callahan, a former Democrat, succeeding retiring Jack Edwards. And threatened Democrat Ben Erdreich won his Birmingham area district for a second term.

Arizona—In increasingly conservative Arizona, Democrat James F. McNulty, Jr., lost his second-term bid to the Republican Jim Kolbe, who he defeated in 1982.

Arkansas—Republican incumbent Ed Bethune ran for the Senate this year and lost. His Little Rock seat was taken by County Sheriff Tommy Robinson, a somewhat maverick Democrat.

California—Forty-four of California's 45 House members were re-elected. The loser, in the conservative Orange County district he had represented for five terms, was Democrat Jerry M. Patterson, who had an 84 percent COPE record. The winner is conservative Republican Robert K. Dornan, who formerly represented a nearby congressional district. He had eight right and 101 wrong votes before he left Congress in 1982.

Colorado—An open seat left by the retirement of Democrat Ray Kogovsek was taken by Republican Michael L. Strang, a relative moderate.

Connecticut—Two Democrats were in especially tight races this year. Bruce A. Morrison won a second term. But William L. Ratchford lost his bid for a fourth term to Republican John G. Rowland in the Waterbury-Danbury district.

Georgia—Five-term Democrat Elliott H. Levitas, from suburban Atlanta, had only a 47 percent COPE record. But Republican Patrick Swindall, 33, argued that he was too liberal for the district and won an upset victory.

Idaho—Republican incumbent George Hansen sought an eighth term even though he faces prison for filing false financial disclosure statements. The unofficial tally, obviously subject to revision, gives a 67-vote victory to Democrat Richard Stallings in a district that went hugely for Reagan.

Illinois — In the Champaign-Urbana area, Republican Daniel B. Crane's three-term COPE record was a dismal 8 percent. A misconduct censure by the House helped bring about his defeat by Democrat Terry Bruce. His equally conservative brother, Philip, won an eighth term from a suburban Chicago district. An open Illinois district, given up by Democrat Paul Simon for his successful run for the Senate, stayed Democrat. Former Congressman Kenneth Gray was the winner.

Indiana—If the initial tally holds up, Democrat Frank McCloskey has won a second term in the Evansville area. But election is still being listed as undecided.

Illinois Democratic Rep. Paul Simon is congratulated on his election to the Senate by Chicago Mayor Harold Washington at a victory celebration.

Iowa—While Democrat Tom Harkin went to the Senate, his southwest area seat was snared narrowly by Republican Jim Ross Lightfoot.

Kentucky—Carl C. "Chris" Perkins, the new Democrat from the Ashland district, fills the seat of his late father, Carl D. Perkins, who headed the Education & Labor Committee.

Maryland — Democrat Clarence D. Long, 75, tried to beat former Federal Maritime Commission Chairman Helen Delich Bentley, 60, for the third time in a row. Long, an 11-term veteran, fell narrowly short.

Michigan—Republican Bill Shuette, 30, began running against three-term Democrat Donald J. Albosta 18 months ago and finally overtook him in an upset. He was helped by lots of business PAC money.

Mississippi—In a rematch in the black majority Delta district, Republican Webb Franklin won a second term. Democrat Robert Clark narrowly missed becoming the state's first black congressman.

New Hampshire—Democrat Norman E. D'Amours gave up the 1st District seat to run for the Senate. Conservative Republican Robert C. Smith beat liberal Democrat Dudley Dudley to fill it.

New Jersey—A court-ordered redistricting knocked out 11-term Democrat Joseph G. Minish, who had 258 right, 22 wrong COPE votes. The realigned district was won by the Republican leader in the state Assembly, Dean A. Gallo, 48.

New York — The Westchester County district of retiring Democrat Richard L. Ottinger was won by Republican Joseph D. DioGuardi, 44, a Reagan clone. The Queens district represented by Geraldine Ferraro stayed Democratic, with City Councilman Thomas J. Manton.

North Carolina—The Senate contest wasn't the only political upheaval in the Tarheel state. Conservative six-term Democrat Ike Andrews narrowly lost to conservative Republican William Cobey, Jr. Somewhat less conservative Robin Britt of Greensboro lost his second-term bid to Republican Howard Coble. Relatively liberal James Clarke was defeated by the former Republican Congressman Bill Hendon, whom he ousted two years ago. Clarke had a 64 percent COPE record; Hendon had 23 percent. But the seat that nine-term Republican James G. Martin gave up to run for governor was taken by Democrat D. G. Martin, no relation.

Ohio—In the Youngstown area, battered by the steel industry's decline, County Sheriff James A. Traficant, Jr., won an upset victory for the Democrats. He beat three-term Republican incumbent Lyle Williams, a moderate who rated high on constituent services.

Pennsylvania—Five-term Democrat Bob Edgar, in a Republican Delaware County district, figured to have a close election. He did, but he won if a 124,054 to 123,-573 margin holds up.

Texas—A four-seat Republican gain, but a less significant change ideologically. Five-term Democrat Jack Hightower lost to Beau Boulter in the 13th District. Bill Patman, seeking a third term, lost to Republican Mac Sweeney in the 14th District. The 19th District seat given up by conservative Democrat Kent Hance when he sought the Senate nomination was taken by Republican Larry Combest. The only Democrat with more right than wrong COPE votes who lost was Tom Vandergriff of Arlington. He won his first term two years ago with just 50.1 percent of the vote. Vandergriff was edged out in a cliffhanger by Republican Richard Armey, a supply-side economics professor.

Utah—The open seat being given up by Republican Dan Marriott brought a match-up between a relatively liberal Democrat, Frances Farley, and Republican Lt. Gov. David Monson. The Republicans' tiny lead could be reversed on a recount.

Donahue calls Africa unions force for democratic change

Free, democratic trade-union movements act as a "change agent" in society, working to safeguard the dignity of the individual, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue told graduates of the African-American Labor Center's first advanced trade union leadership seminar.

"We seek more and better, and so we threaten those who hold power. That being true, we need strength—the strength of the institution," Donahue told the class of 17 labor leaders from nine African countries.

"We have seen countless examples of the ability of ideas and emotions to change nations. But we've also seen time and time again that unless the change is supported by vibrant, democratic institutions, it will be swept away or corrupted.

"So we seek to build our unions as strong and lasting institutions, able to challenge our opponents and to do battle for our ideas and ideals in whatever way is necessary."

Through their month-long visit to the United States, Donahue noted, the African leaders were able to learn ways of strengthening their unions, linking themselves and their institutions with their American counterparts in the continuing struggle for "bread, peace and freedom."

Earlier, the graduates were greeted by Federation President Lane Kirkland at AFL-CIO headquarters.

As guests of the AALC, the African trade unionists participated in high-level leadership training. In collaboration with the University of the District of Columbia, AALC conducted classes in comparative trade unionism, the historical development of trade unions, structure and functions of trade unions, labor economics, collective bargaining, and worker education.

Guest lecturers addressed the foreign union leaders. Classes were held at the Masters, Mates & Pilots training center in Linthicum Heights, Md.

Countries represented by the graduates were Botswana, Ghana, Kenya, Lesotho, Liberia, Mauritius, Sierra Leone, South Africa and Zimbabwe.

WALTER MONDALE has criss-crossed the country this past year, calling attention to the issues he thought should concern the American people and advocating solutions.

In the end, he lost the election. By a 59 percent to 41 percent margin, voters chose to stick with the incumbent President.

Mondale and Ferraro deserve the gratitude of the American people—including those who voted for their opponents—for having so ably performed an essential role in the democratic process.

It is the duty of a political opposition to propose an alternative program and to present to the electorate candidates who can articulate such a program and who have the ability and desire to carry it out.

This, the Democratic Party did.

It chose its candidates through a selection process that took months to complete and reached to every part of the nation. It sought out the views of a diversity of individuals and organizations to put together a platform adopted in open convention.

Would another candidate have done better against such a personally popular incumbent President?

Possibly yes, but probably no. Certainly not if you believe that a candidate should be judged on issues and ability.

SOME YEARS back, many of us will recall, Richard Nixon lost a campaign for governor of California. The press had never liked him, he complained at a post-election news conference. His political career presumably ended, he told the reporters bitterly that "you won't have Dick Nixon to kick around any more."

An equally weary Mondale met with reporters in the aftermath of his presidential defeat.

He was asked some blunt questions, and answered them gracefully. This is what he said in one response:

"I did my best and I worked my heart out. I was the nominee of the Democratic Party and I made my case with all the strength I could. I believe that I was right. I think I made a strong case.

"I think history will deal kindly with this campaign and with the record it made."

Indeed it should, and we think it will.

Continuing Tasks

THIS EDITORIAL could have been written before the presidential election, because it would have been equally valid if the outcome had been different.

This trade union movement of ours exists to serve the interests of America's workers and to express their aspirations. It will continue to do so.

In the best sense of the phrase, the AFL-CIO has sought to serve as "the people's lobby" in dealing with Congress and the White House. It will continue to do so.

In defense of our nation and of the ideals for which it stands, this union movement has been staunchly patriotic and will ever be so.

Our unions have fought to achieve fairness in the workplace and have advocated programs to achieve fairness throughout our society. These efforts will be undiminished.

Labor is concerned about the permanent loss of industrial jobs, and by the lack of concern of people in a position to do something about it. The search for a solution demands the best efforts of labor and management—and, yes, government. There are no separate Democratic or Republican, liberal or conservative answers to this problem.

The concerns that unite the otherwise diverse body of working men and women who make up the trade union movement are not limited to election years.

Unionism is not a sometime thing.

Patchwork health system denies care to millions

By Press Associates, Inc.

The nation's patchwork health care system is sick. It is plagued by years of price-gouging by doctors and hospitals, by Reagan budget cuts, and by lack of planning at the local, state and national levels.

Unless you're rich, getting sick is likely to cause financial pains. If you're poor, near-poor or unemployed, you probably can't afford to get sick.

If you're a Medicare or Medicaid patient, or even a worker with employer-paid medical insurance, you're almost certain to be paying more out-of-pocket costs, or receiving less coverage, or both. Millions of Americans are not covered by any health plans.

These are among the findings of a blue-ribbon Citizens' Board of Inquiry into Health in America, which this year conducted field hearings in 10 cities across the country. Chaired by Arthur S. Flemming, President Eisenhower's Secretary of Health, Education & Welfare, the panel heard from people who usually get scant attention in health care studies, despite their intimate knowledge of the subject: health care consumers themselves. Here are some of their stories:

Anna Mae Allen, 78, a widowed former homemaker in Harrisburg, Pa., scrapes by on social security benefits of $395 a month. She pays $67 a month for prescription drugs that Medicare doesn't cover.

Limited by funds

Allen said, "I don't see the doctor as much as I ought to because I just don't have the money for the co-payments and the deductibles. I go to the doctor when I have money to go."

Mattie Cole, a 25-year-old mother on public assistance in Vicksburg, Miss., spent 16 days in intensive care due to complications from the birth of her daughter last January. After being readmitted to the hospital for follow-up surgery, she was forced to leave without treatment because of cutbacks in the Medicaid program. With a back infection and catheter tubes still in place, "they told me I had no more Medicaid days and that I either had to pay $300 a day or leave."

Helen Freimund, 60, of Racine, Wis., has been unable to find full-time work since her auto plant shut down 12 years ago. She barely survives on part-time minimum wage work, while her private insurance rates swallow a third of her income.

Double rip-off

Art Frank, 71, a Broward County, Fla. retiree, declared, "The medical profession and the hospitals are ripping people off."

"My wife needed brain surgery," Frank said. "That was bad enough, but then every doctor under the sun came in on this—they just kept shooting the price up. It was unfair."

"The whole case cost over $30,000. I didn't pay all that; that was mostly on Medicare and Blue Cross. But, now, half of our money goes for doctors and hospitals, Frank said.

Frank Lumpkin, 67, of Chicago was thrown out of work when his steel mill shut down four years ago. "We suddenly realized that we had lost all protection for our families. We had no medical insurance."

"Can you imagine telling your kids not to play outside for fear of an accident because you couldn't go to the hospital?" Lumpkin stressed. He said he and his fellow jobless workers were told they weren't poor enough for Medicaid.

"Out of 2,800 hourly workers, over 400 have died in the four years since our plant closed without warning," said Lumpkin. "If we had had medical care, if we didn't have to worry about medical care for our families, some of those 400 would have been alive today."

"We demand a federal health plan to cover everyone—the employed and the unemployed," Lumpkin told the panel.

Voters salute Reagan but reject his program single-seat Republican gain and leaves Democrats with a 34-16 majority.

But Reagan's personal triumph was impressive, especially in his near sweep of electoral votes. Only Minnesota and the District of Columbia were out of his grasp.

The once solidly Democratic South aligned itself with the bloc of southwestern and mountain states in giving Reagan his most one-sided victory margins. The West Coast and a tier of populous eastern and midwestern states were less responsive to the Reagan charisma.

Reagan's electoral vote total was a record high, but his popular vote margin had been exceeded in two of the past five presidential elections—by Democrat Lyndon B. Johnson, who polled 61.1 percent in 1964, and by Republican Richard M. Nixon, who was re-elected in 1972 with 60.7 percent of the vote. In each case, the presidential election that immediately followed was won by the opposite party.

In defeat, Mondale and Ferraro left the political arena with the respect and good will of Democrats and Republicans alike.

Mondale had started the campaign with the handicap of a grueling primary season in which, as the frontrunner, he was the chief target of criticism from other contenders and their supporters. But he left the San Francisco nominating convention with his party united and overwhelmingly enthusiastic about Mondale's choice of Ferraro as vice presidential candidate.

In his acceptance speech at the convention, Mondale took a bold step which brought him high grades from the knowledgeable, but may have cost him votes.

Under Reagan, the deficit had soared through a combination of tax cuts and heavy increases in military spending. The only way to bring it under control without unacceptably deep slashes in defense or social security, Mondale said honestly, is to regain some of the revenue lost by tax cuts that had been tilted heavily to benefit the wealthy. He outlined a plan to do this and challenged Reagan to tell the American people before the election what his plan was.

Instead, Reagan insisted that "economic growth" will take care of the deficit, and the thrust of his counterattack on the Democrats was that these are the people who want to raise your taxes.

Ferraro's campaign became mired for a time in the controversy over disclosure of her husband's tax returns. But she surmounted that issue with a demonstration of competence, wit and grace under fire in a 90-minute news conference. As the campaign went on, she generated enthusiasm in city after city across the country.

Presidential image

It was clear, however, that most people wanted the optimistic reassurance generated by Reagan and that his genial image was blocking out the very right-wing platform on which he ran.

Only once was Reagan truly vulnerable —after the first debate with Mondale in which the President appeared at times befuddled and uncertain. The polls showed a post-debate shift to Mondale.

Reagan was off on his facts in the second debate as well, but the slips weren't evident.

At the end, there were huge crowds and enthusiasm for Mondale and Ferraro — nearly 37 million people did in fact vote for them. As for the more than 53 million who pulled the lever for Reagan and Bush, a substantial portion also voted for candidates for Congress who reflected the views of Mondale, not Reagan.

Flight Attendants address ill effects of deregulation

Seattle—Job security, employer assaults on hard-won wages and benefits, airline safety and the union-busting mentality that has spawned "runaway" air carriers are among the key concerns of their union's members, Flight Attendants President Linda Puchala told members of the AFA's executive board.

Puchala blamed the ill effects of airline deregulation for many of the worst problems facing not only airline employees, but also passengers, and the air carriers themselves.

AFA's board, the union's policy-making forum, held its ninth annual meeting here with the current bargaining environment in the airline industry providing the dominant topic. Some 100 board members representing the union's master executive council and each of its local councils attended the two-day meeting.

A highlight was the formal presentation by AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland of AFA's charter from the federation. The union had been an autonomous division of the Air Line Pilots until the federation's Executive Council voted last February to grant AFA's request for a separate charter, a move that was endorsed by the ALPA.

Puchala, in her remarks to the AFA council, criticized airline management for using deregulation as an excuse not only for union-busting, but also for letting service and safety deteriorate.

The nation's air traffic control system—crippled when President Reagan fired more than 11,000 striking Professional Air Traffic Controllers in 1981—has yet to be rebuilt, and reports of midair "near misses" are up, Puchala pointed out.

Costly delays

On top of that, she said, the airlines are overscheduling flights, and the result has been a record number of costly airline delays. The air carriers, Puchala said, are trying to make up those lost revenues out of the hides of their employees at the bargaining table.

"The management mentality that thinks it's acceptable to over-schedule and incur costly delays—to say nothing of passenger animosity—also thinks it has created the solution to higher airline labor costs," Puchala observed. She cited such tactics as two-tier wage scales that start new hires at lower wages and "runaway" airlines started up by major air carriers to escape union contracts.

The union will continue to fight employer challenges to the "scope and successorship provisions" of contracts, and it will guard its members' work and working conditions, Puchala asserted.

Kirkland told the AFA board that the wholesale layoffs and pay cuts that air carriers are forcing on employees in the wake of deregulation "are ample proof that in your industry, loyalty is too often a one-way street. All the dedication, all the hard work in the world carry no weight in the scales of corporate accounting."

Working people are "under assault" by unfair employers whose tactics are supported and sanctioned by the Reagan Administration, "the most anti-worker, anti-union administration since the days of Calvin Coolidge," Kirkland declared.

Actors union inks 3-year pact with Off-Broadway unit

New York—Actors' Equity reached agreement with the League of Off-Broadway Theaters & Producers on a new three-year contract providing higher minimum salaries and other improvements.

The agreement, which replaces a pact that expired Oct. 7, has been ratified by Equity's council. Approval by League members is considered pro forma.

Equity members will receave increases in minimum salaries ranging up to 11 percent, depending on the seating capacity of the theater. Minimum salaries for actors playing in the smallest, or "A" category, theaters will rise from $202.85 to $225 a week. Those playing the largest, or "E," category, houses will see their pay rise from $421.29 to $435 weekly.

The settlement also provides a sliding scale for salaries based on box office receipts for each category, with the top, or "E," category showing a 20-percent increase over the previous contract.

Cost-of-living adjustments in the minimums are provided in the second and third years of the agreements. All compensation increases are retroactive to Oct. 8.

The new pact, covering Equity members at 36 major New York theaters strengthened the commitment to casting minority actors, including women, blacks, Hispanics, and the disabled, in productions. The agreement also provides a new arbitration procedure.

Philippine trade unions press demands over Aquino killing

Manila—Union leaders demanded the immediate resignation of all military and police officers suspected of involvement in the 1983 assassination of Benigno Aquino, a political opponent of President Ferdinand E. Marcos.

"There is clear evidence of negligence, inefficiency, or incompetence," the Trade Unions Congress of the Philippines (TUCP) and the National Congress of Farmers Organizations charged.

"Worse than that, according to the reports of the chairwoman and members of the Agrava board, there is enough circumstantial evidence to establish a military conspiracy to kill the ex-senator and to cover up responsibility for his death."

The joint union statement said that if the suspects do not resign their military and police posts, they should at least be suspended until all judicial proceedings and other investigations are completed.

Similar demands came from the majority of the five-member fact-finding board headed by Justice Corazon Agrava of the Philippines Supreme Court in a report given to Marcos last month. Agrava herself did not join in the majority's findings.

One member of the panel, which Marcos appointed about a year ago, was TUCP Gen. Sec. Ernesto F. Herrera who is currently visiting the United States. The AFL-CIO, through its Asian-American Free Labor Institute, works closely with the pro-democratic trade unions in the Philippines in a variety of programs.

Since the demands for their resignation were aired, the chief of the nation's armed forces and 25 other people have been charged of double murder in the killings of Aquino and the man the military first named as his killer.

Board's findings

The 26, including Gen. Fabian Ver, the top military official in the Philippines, were named by the Agrava board as "indictable for the premeditated killing" of Aquino and Rolando Galman on Aug. 21 of last year. Initially, the military said Galman was a communist agent and accused him of killing Aquino. Security guards gunned down Galman almost immediately after Aquino was slain.

Aquino was shot as he was escorted from the airliner that brought him to Manila on a flight from the United States, where he had been in exile three years. He planned to participate in legislative elections scheduled this year.

In calling for the resignations of the indicted military and police personnel, the unions pointed out that while Aquino's death drew national and international attention, "there have been, and there may in the future be, other incidents just as savage and just as gruesome . . . where the victims are ordinary citizens like farmers and workers suffering lonely deaths in a far-flung barrio or on the factory floor."

COPE bats .627

COPE-endorsed candidates had a 62.7-percent victory record in 407 elections for Congress and governorships.

That compares with a 59.5 percent record in 1980, when Reagan won his first term, and 59.8 percent when Richard Nixon was re-elected in 1972.

This year, the AFL-CIO endorsed 369 House candidates and 235 were elected, COPE Director John Perkins reported.

Fifteen of 28 COPE-backed candidates won election to the Senate and five of the 10 endorsed gubernatorial candidates were elected.

COPE endorsements, except for the presidential contest, are made at the state and congressional district levels by AFL-CIO state federations. Endorsements are based on the record of incumbents and the positions taken by persons seeking election.

Jubilant workers at Equitable Life in Syracuse, N.Y., celebrate ratification of their first contract with the giant insurance firm.

Equitable Life workers win breakthrough pact

Syracuse, N.Y.—With the ratification of a three-year pact, members of Service Employees District 925 here have won their long, hard fight for a first contract with the giant Equitable Life Assurance Society.

The SEIU, as a result of the signing of the agreement, has called off its boycott of Equitable's insurance policies, pension plans and pension investments. The action had the endorsement of the AFL-CIO Executive Council.

The agreement ratified Nov. 8 caps a three-year fight by 54 female clerical workers in the company's highly automated claims office here to beat off an intensive union-busting effort by the company and to win major gains in pay, working conditions and job security.

The contract with District 925, the SEIU's office workers' affiliate, is the first covering office employees at the nation's third largest insurance company.

Wages and benefits

Key gains in the contract include wage increases and a fair, systematic pay scale, major safety and health improvements on the job for the employees who use video display terminals all day, and a commitment from the company not to close the Syracuse office as it had threatened to do.

SEIU President John J. Sweeney called the contract a "precedent-setting victory not just for the workers in Syracuse—who are certainly to be congratulated today for uncommon strength and persistence—but for all of organized labor, which stood together in a historic contest on behalf of office workers throughout the insurance industry."

Sweeney pointed out that while women make up more than half of all insurance industry employees and 95 percent of all insurance office workers, "their wages and status have been severely depressed."

Karen Nussbaum, national president of District 925, called provisions of the contract governing the use of new technology and automated equipment "a compass" for future negotiations over office automation.

"Automation has revolutionized the work lives of office workers throughout the country, but particularly in the insurance industry, and now—by fighting for trade union representation—we're about the business of revolutionizing the way automation affects us," Nussbaum said.

She pointed out that the workers at Equitable's Syracuse claims office had sought a union because they were concerned over the health effects of working with VDTs, and they believed they were subjected to arbitrary company policies, unfair wages and increasing stress as new technology was brought in by the company without regard to their concerns or safety.

Major provisions of the contract, which runs from June 1, 1984, to June 1, 1987, include wage increases of 4 percent, 5 percent and 5 percent for claims approvers as well as improvements in productivity incentive pay. Other clerical workers will

Bishops' statement stressing job needs hailed by Kirkland

By Susan Dunlop

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland said the American labor movement "welcomes" the direction taken by the nation's Catholic bishops in a major statement on the economy.

Following release of the first draft of the document, Kirkland praised the bishops for their recognition that "the most urgent U.S. priority is the creation of jobs with adequate pay and decent working conditions."

The draft statement in the form of a pastoral letter on "Catholic Social Teaching and the U.S. Economy" was released during the meeting in Washington of the National Conference of Catholic Bishops.

The draft, prepared by a committee of bishops, condemns the nation's unemployment rate as "morally unjustified" and calls the nation's poverty rate a moral scandal.

The bishops call for a major business-labor-government effort to create jobs and aid the poor. The letter also strongly endorses the right of workers to form unions and bargain with employers.

Kirkland pointed out that the document "goes well beyond an expression of concern about poverty and the plight of the unemployed. It sets forth many specific employment programs which the AFL-CIO has long advocated."

The federation president warned that the bishops' letter will be "denounced by those who claim that property rights are paramount and that unemployment and poverty will be cured as benefits someday slowly trickle down to the rest of society."

Positive role

But for workers, farmers, the poor and the elderly, Kirkland said, the bishops' document "is a call for a society that gives them a positive role in economic decision-making and new hope for a 'life with dignity.'"

The five-member committee assigned by the bishops' conference to draft the pastoral letter began work on the document in July 1981. The committee is chaired by Archbishop Rembert G. Weakland of Milwaukee.

The document embraces Pope John Paul II's 1982 encyclical "On Human Work" and a century of Catholic social teaching strongly supportive of free collective bargaining.

Among those presenting points of the view to the drafting committee were AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue and Economic Research Director Rudy Oswald, Farm Workers President Cesar Chavez and Ladies' Garment Workers Vice President Evelyn Dubrow.

The bishops will work on the draft statement over the coming year, and the completed pastoral letter is scheduled for release next November.

They are calling for a new policy commitment to achieve full employment, defined as no more than 3 to 4 percent unemployment, and increased government support for direct job-creation programs targeted to those groups in which unemployment is a persistent problem, such as young people and minorities.

U.S. trade deficit soars to double last year's pace

By James M. Shevis

The nation's merchandise trade deficit soared to a record $96 billion through the first nine months of 1984, reflecting a worsening economic situation that could spell more job losses for American workers.

The red-ink total so far this year is now more than double the deficit incurred in the same period in 1983. By the end of the year, the government estimates the trade deficit will exceed $130 billion—more than three times the deficit in 1980 before the start of the Reagan Administration.

"Of greater concern," AFL-CIO Research Director Rudy Oswald said, "the U.S. position in manufacturing trade has collapsed, reaching a deficit of almost $70 billion in the first nine months of 1984.

"By year's end, the U.S. will show a deficit in manufactured trade of over $90

Democratic strength holds

GOP posts modest gains in states

By David L. Perlman

Republicans made modest gains in elections to state legislatures but Democratic majorities across the country were barely dented. There was no sign of the national political realignment Republican strategists had predicted.

Two years ago, Democratic congressional victories were echoed by state legislature gains. This year, as with Congress, the trickle-down from President Reagan's re-election sent out only a few ripples.

In terms of party control, Connecticut was the only state with a Democratic majority in both houses that moved into the Republican column. In the 1982 elections, Democrats had taken over both houses of the Iowa and Washington state legislatures. This year, they stayed Democratic.

Two years ago, Democrats had taken one house of the legislature away from Republican control in seven states. There was a GOP comeback this year in only four states—Delaware, Minnesota, Nevada and Ohio. In New Mexico's Senate, the GOP moved up to a 21-21 tie.

But Democrats countered with one-house pickups in Alaska and Vermont. In Montana, Democrats won control of the previously GOP Senate while their majority in the House slipped to a 50-50 tie.

Key states unchanged

The shifts were somewhat less than usual for a presidential election year. There were no changes of legislative control in such big state, two-party battlegrounds as California, New York, Pennsylvania and Illinois.

In terms of labor's program in the state legislatures, the mix of party control and governors is slightly less favorable in the aftermath of this election. But it is brighter than after the 1980 election.

In the South, legislatures for the most part remain overwhelmingly Democratic and conservative. But the South in recent decades has been regularly sending Republicans to Congress and electing a few Republican governors.

In some southern states, the GOP is emerging as a significant although still minority force in the legislatures. Thus the Texas House will have 97 Democrats and 53 Republicans instead of 113 Democrats and 37 Republicans. And the North Carolina House will have 83 Democrats and 37 Republicans instead of 102 Democrats and 18 Republicans.

Nationally, however, Democrats hold 4,318 legislative seats to 3,038 for Repub-

Union attorneys in five cities confer via satellite TV linkup

Union attorneys in five cities nationwide participated in a satellite television conference on pension law, marking the second successful use of live videoconference technology by the AFL-CIO Lawyers Coordinating Committee.

The three-hour broadcast originated from a television studio in Washington and was beamed by satellite to some 120 lawyers watching at "downlink" sites in Atlanta, Chicago, New York and San Francisco, as well as Washington. Phone lines connected viewers with panelists in the studio for questions and answers.

The videoconference was also the first time the AFL-CIO headquarters building served as a "downlink" through use of a portable satellite dish that brought the meeting to union lawyers watching the program on a wide-screen television receiver set up in a conference room.

Technical assistance in producing the videoconference was provided by the AFL-CIO Labor Institute of Public Affairs. LIPA, the federation's television production arm, also helped produce the lawyers committee's first videoconference on bankruptcy issues last December.

During the videoconference, a panel of union pension experts in the Washington studio discussed issues of key importance to union attorneys. Each presentation was followed by a round robin of questions from lawyers at each of the receiving sites.

Topics covered included the 1984 pension legislation that provides greater equity for women participants in private pension plans, questions arising from plant closings, corporate reorganizations or other developments that could lead to plan termination, and the evolving interpretations by the courts of federal employee benefit laws.

The discussion was moderated by James Ray of Connerton, Bernstein & Katz, with panelists Joyce Mader of O'Donoghue & O'Donoghue, Steelworkers Attorney Howard Kline and Auto Workers Attorney M. Jay Whitman.

Mader explained key provisions of the new pension equity law which may require modifications in existing plans. The new measure deals with vesting and participation standards, survivor benefits for spouses, and the rights of families and former spouses to benefits following divorce. Both male and female workers are affected.

Whitman outlined danger signals that indicate a company may be planning to terminate or substantially change a pension plan, and Kline reviewed actions unions can take under the law to protect their members' interests in such cases.

Ray pointed out that union attorneys can turn to the federal courts for important interpretations of pension laws beneficial to workers.

Arizona's repeal of wage law tied to business fund

Phoenix—Arizona's ballot box repeal of the state's prevailing wage law was influenced by a massive, expensive effort mounted by anti-labor business groups, construction contractors and the Republican Party, the Arizona AFL-CIO charged.

The repealer was the only one of 15 questions on the state's Nov. 6 ballot to be adopted by the voters.

The State AFL-CIO had opposed all the issues including a right-wing backed proposal to outlaw strikes by public employees that was rejected by the voters.

The initiative also includes a provision that will stop political subdivisions such as towns or counties from adopting their own wage protection laws for public projects.

Contractors' groups indicated that similar campaigns to kill wage laws may be launched in other states.

The Arizona legislature passed a bill to repeal the little Davis-Bacon Act in 1980, but the effort failed when it was vetoed by Democratic Gov. Bruce Babbitt. Before the referendum, the state supreme court had struck down portions of the law.

Chrysler hurdle remains

UAW and IUE ratify auto industry accords

The Auto Workers ratified new contracts with Ford Motor Co., in Canada and with Mack Trucks, Inc., in Pennsylvania, New Jersey and Maryland, all but wrapping up the union's current round of negotiations in the auto industry.

In addition, the Electronics Workers approved a new three-year contract with GM covering 24,000 workers at nine plants in four states. The agreement, negotiated two weeks earlier, was ratified by a vote of about 22,000 to 400 in balloting completed last weekend, the union said. The old IUE contract expired last Sept. 14.

The UAW's last remaining hurdle is the Chrysler Corp., which it hopes will come to the bargaining table before Christmas to discuss renegotiating the current pact to achieve parity with General Motors and Ford. The Chrysler pact has nearly a year remaining on its term.

The IUE settlement basically follows the pattern established by the UAW in September for its 380,000 GM members in the United States. The main difference is that the IUE contract provides more paid time off for workers.

Paid leave

Under the IUE agreement, workers will get four additional days of paid absence allowance for a total of nine in the first year of the contract and three additional days, a total of eight, in the second year. It reverts to five days in the third year, same as in the old pact.

In exchange for the additional time off, the union agreed to defer some other benefits. Among them, increased company contributions to a training fund and establishment of a legal services plan will be delayed until 1987. Also, the initial 2.25-percent wage hike will not be retroactive; 11 cents of cost-of-living adjustments under the old pact will not be rolled into base pay rates, and 14 cents from the next COL adjustment will be deferred for the life of the contract.

In other provisions, GM agreed to contribute up to $61 billion to a new program of job retraining and income maintenance for workers affected by production shifts and new technology.

The IUE represents workers at GM's Delco, Packard Electric, and other parts plants in Ohio, Mississippi, New York, and New Jersey.

The UAW agreement with Ford of Canada covers 14,200 workers, and follows the Canadian pattern established at GM's Canadian plants last month. In voting Nov. 11, the contract was ratified by nearly 83 percent of those voting. The settlement is retroactive to Sept. 14.

Comparable provisions

Wage provisions of the three-year agreement are nearly identical to those in the contract reached with GM of Canada after a 12-day strike. The key difference is two and a half extra days off a year for Ford workers with 10 to 15 years' seniority.

The new three-year agreement between the UAW and Mack Trucks ended a nine-day strike by 9,200 workers. Ratified by a vote of 3,158 to 498, the contract provides for a job bank similar to the ones at GM and Ford and an income security program under which workers with one or two years of seniority cannot be laid off for reasons of technology, plant closings or similar causes.

Mack agreed not to close any of its plants during the life of the agreement, except for the already scheduled closings of a machining plant and a fabricating plant in Allentown, Pa., in mid-1985. The 1,200 workers involved in those closings will be covered by the new income security provisions.

The new pact includes 23 cents an hour in wage increases, an improved profit-sharing plan, and improvements in vacations. The union successfully resisted a company proposal for health insurance copayments and deductibles.

The union has now reached agreement on local contracts at 136 of 174 bargaining units at GM, settling the last two Nov. 14 at assembly plants in Lake Orion and Pontiac, Mich., shortly before workers were to go on strike. Local issues are negotiated separately from the national pact.

Wisconsin convention votes 5-cent hike in per capita tax

Green Bay—Delegates to the Wisconsin AFL-CIO convention approved a 5-cent increase in the per capita tax and adopted a wide range of resolutions on labor, social, economic and political issues.

The monthly per capita paid by affiliates will increase to 30 cents on Jan. 1. Of the new total, 28 cents will be directed to the general fund, and 2 cents earmarked for "purposes consistent with" the federation's objectives, particularly political action.

State AFL-CIO President John W. Schmitt, in his address to the delegates, ticked off the deep economic and social problems suffered throughout Wisconsin and the nation that are being ignored or made worse by the Reagan Administration.

The state's economy, heavily dependent on exports, is being brutally "kicked" by Reagan policies that are allowing the U.S. dollar to become dangerously over-valued —making imports cheaper and the state's crucial exports too expensive overseas, Schmitt said.

"Reagan hasn't done a damn thing" toward a fair trade policy, but has embraced a failing and damaging "free trade" stance, Schmitt asserted.

The delegates also formally endorsed Democratic presidential and vice presidential nominees Walter Mondale and Geraldine Ferraro.

The convention approved a five-cent increase in the per capita tax from the current 25 cents per month to 30 cents beginning Jan. 1. Of the new total, 28 cents will be directed to the general fund and 2 cents earmarked for "purposes consistent with" the federation's objectives, such as political action.

The delegates acted on 106 resolutions covering a range of labor, social, economic, legislative and political issues.

Other speakers at the meeting included Ted Mondale, son of the Democratic presidential nominee, Gov. Anthony S. Earl (D), AFL-CIO Occupational Safety, Health & Social Security Director Bert Seidman, Organizing Director Alan Kistler, and Associate Legislative Director Robert McGlotten.

'84 pay gains average 4.2 percent

Nearly three-fourths of workers covered by major contracts negotiated in the first nine months of 1984 will receive wage increases averaging 4.2 percent in the first year of the agreements and 4 percent annually when measured over the life of the agreements, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

One-fifth of workers covered by major contracts—settlements involving 1,000 or more unionized employees—had no wage change and the rest had decreases, however. The result was that the average first-year increase for all workers covered by contracts reached so far this year was a modest 2.5 percent. The average annual increase over the term of the pacts ratified in the January-to-September period was 2.8 percent. The average increases were virtually the same as during 1983.

This year's average 4.2 percent gain in contracts providing wage increases exceeds the 3.8 percent inflation rate from September 1983 through September 1984 as reflected by the government's Consumer Price Index for Urban Wage Earners & Clerical Workers.

"Construction settlements, covering 420,000 workers, dampened overall wage adjustments in the first nine months of 1984," BLS said. Construction wage increases averaged only nine-tenths of 1 percent in the first year and 1.2 percent annually over the life of the contracts.

Contracts reached during the January-September period covered 1.4 million workers, BLS said.

One-fourth of the workers whose contracts provide for no wage change or decrease in the first year will have wage increases later, BLS reported.

"Thus, by the end of their contracts, nearly four-fifths of the workers will have an increase in wages, averaging 4 percent," the bureau said.

The BLS reported virtually no change in cost-of-living adjustment coverage in settlements reached in the first nine months of this year. Sixteen percent of the workers under those contracts were covered by COL clauses while 57 percent of all workers under major agreements have COL protection.

In key contracts—those covering at least 5,000 workers—combined wage and benefit increases averaged 3.6 percent in the first contract year and annually over the life of the pacts as well.

White House 'discovers' budget deficit growing

President Reagan learned from his budget director that Walter Mondale was right. The deficit is getting bigger, not smaller, and won't be erased by economic growth.

News reports said Reagan was "taken aback" when OMB Director David Stockman broke the news of a soaring deficit to a post-election Cabinet meeting. But the President quickly reiterated that under no conditions would he ask Congress for higher taxes. Instead, he told the Cabinet, more must be done to cut back government.

"We came here to dam the river, let's start throwing in the rocks," Reagan told the department heads.

During the election campaign, Reagan had scoffed at Mondale's warnings of a deficit soaring out of control and insisted that economic growth will deal with the problem.

But Stockman's estimate of the deficit for the fiscal year that began on Oct. 1 has grew from $175 billion last August to $210 billion in the latest calculations.

White House officials almost immediately began putting qualifiers on the President's rejection of higher taxes. The suggestion went out that Reagan's repeated assertions that any "tax simplification" plan will be "revenue neutral" shouldn't be taken too literally.

Explaining it all

White House Press Aide Larry Speakes carefully explained that Reagan had only intended to rule out higher tax rates. As for other forms of tax changes designed to bring in more revenue, Speakes said he didn't know whether Reagan has ever "gotten into that much detail" about the matter.

On Capitol Hill, Republicans were floating suggestions for a bipartisan commission to recommend a solution to the budget deficit, citing the commission on social security as a precedent.

Congressional Democrats, however, were wondering aloud if they were being set up to pull Reagan's political chestnuts out of the fire. Still vivid was the political campaign in which Republicans had painted Democratic candidates as "the people who want to raise your taxes."

House Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill, Jr., said Democrats would insist that Reagan take responsibility for any tax changes.

"If there is going to be a tax bill, it is going to be Ronald Reagan's tax bill," O'Neill said. "He is not going to hide behind the fact that a coalition of Democrats and Republicans put a bill out there 'over my dead body.'"

House Democratic Leader Jim Wright said the extent of the projected deficit came as no surprise. He said congressional Democrats will insist that increases in tax revenue "come from those who are avoiding taxes today, from the great number of extremely wealthy corporations that didn't pay any taxes this year."

A hard core of right-wing Republicans wants Reagan to propose a drastic, revolutionary dismemberment of domestic government as an alternative to increased revenue.

One of their leaders, Rep. Newt Gingrich (R-Ga.) sent an "open letter" to Stockman warning against compromises that slow the "revolutionary" transformation from "the liberal welfare state to an Opportunity Society." It's time to begin "reshaping Medicare, education, military procurement," Gingrich insisted, and shape "a revolutionary budget."

Next budget

The President will submit his budget proposals for the fiscal year starting Oct. 1, 1985, next January, after the newly elected 99th Congress has convened. Before then, the Treasury Dept. is supposed to come up with recommendations for his consideration on "simplification" of the tax system.

During the election campaign, Reagan shunted aside questions about his future tax plans by referring to the Treasury Dept. study that was under way.

Administration hit on move to withhold disability benefits

A Reagan Administration attempt to block a court-ordered reinstatement of social security benefits to mentally disabled persons is both cruel and unjustified, the AFL-CIO charged.

The case in dispute involves some 50,000 mentally impaired New York state residents who had been dropped from the social security disability rolls under the review procedure put into effect at the start of the Reagan Administration. Hundreds of thousands of persons were purged from the benefit lists, arousing public and congressional outrage. Especially criticized was the disqualification of large numbers of mentally disabled persons, frequently because they did not return questionnaires or take timely action to appeal their disqualification.

In the New York class action suit on behalf of the mentally disabled, a federal judge ruled the cutoff of benefits improper and ordered Sec. of Health & Human Services Margaret Heckler to restore them to the rolls with full retroactivity for benefits lost until their eligibility could properly be determined.

A three-judge panel of the 2nd Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals upheld that decision on Aug. 27.

On Sept. 19, Congress cleared legislation intended to protect the rights of the disabled. It included a section requiring the government to establish new standards for evaluating mental disabilities within four months and meanwhile to continue a moratorium on additional disqualifications. It also specified that persons dropped from the benefit rolls could reapply under the new standards for mental disability. If found qualified, they would be given one year's retroactive benefits.

Administration lawyers are now trying to persuade the appellate court to reconsider the New York case. Their contention is that the original court decision should not be applied because it is more generous in terms of reinstatement and retroactivity than the remedy subsequently adopted by Congress.

Bert Seidman, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Occupational Safety, Health & Social Security, said the "clear congressional intent" was not to restrict relief already given to disabled beneficiaries by the courts.

That interpretation of Congressional intent was backed also by Rep. J. J. Pickle (D-Tex.), chairman of the House Subcommittee on Social Security which originated the remedial legislation.

The Administration action would "subvert the intent of the new law," Seidman stressed. He termed it another example of the Administration's "cruelty" in dealing with "the nation's most deprived citizens."

TUCP Gen. Sec. Ernesto F. Herrera, second from right, with AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, AAFLI Executive Director Morris Paladino and Januario V. Seno, Jr., of the Philippines.

Filipino labor leader demands swift justice in Aquino slaying

Swift justice in the prosecution of those responsible for the assassination of Benigno Aquino is essential if faith in democracy is to be restored in the Philippines, that nation's principal trade union leader told AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland.

Ernesto F. Herrera, general secretary of the Trade Union Congress of the Philippines (TUCP) and a member of the board appointed to investigate the Aquino killing, said the population's grievances against the government of President Ferdinand E. Marcos are in danger of being co-opted by the nation's radical elements.

He said the assassination "has not only deprived the Philippines of its honored place in the civilized world but also advanced the communist timetable to take over the government by five years." Herrera said such private institutions as the church and trade unions "have been infiltrated — wittingly or unwittingly — by communists."

In his meeting in Washington with Kirkland and Executive Director Morris Paladino of the federation's Asian-American Free Labor Institute, Herrera warned that the deteriorating economic and political situation in the Philippines threatens the country's democracy.

Call for solidarity

Herrera called on the free trade union movement throughout the world, through the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, to join in solidarity with union members in the Philippines in their struggle for democracy.

Kirkland praised the work of the fact-finding board of which Herrera is a member, and assured him the AFL-CIO will continue to follow the situation closely.

Kirkland also renewed the federation's commitment to work with the TUCP through the Asian-American Free Labor Institute to foster democratic values in the Philippines.

Aquino was gunned down in Manila on Aug. 21, 1983, as he was being led from an airliner that returned him from three years' exile in the United States. Twenty-six persons, including the country's top military official, have been charged with involvement in the killing.

billion. As recently as 1980, the United States enjoyed a surplus of $12 billion for this most important sector of the economy," Oswald pointed out.

Imports in the first three quarters of the year surged to $258 billion from $196 billion in the comparable 1983 period, while U.S. exports edged up a mere $13 billion from $149 billion last year.

Oswald warned that the shift in the balance of trade has cost the United States millions of jobs, and is threatening the foundations of our industrial sector.

"The ill-conceived monetary and fiscal policies of the Reagan Administration, together with the lack of an effective and coherent trade policy, are the principal causes behind this sharp economic decline," he stressed.

The weak trade performance reflects an overvalued American dollar.

The Commerce Dept., which released the trade figures, has calculated that for every $1 billion deficit 25,000 American jobs are lost.

The U.S. trade deficit with Japan, the largest with any country, continued to climb in the third quarter, reaching $10.4 billion from $7.9 billion in the second quarter. There were also sizable jumps in the trade deficit with western Europe, Hong Kong, Singapore, South Korea, and Taiwan.

In other economic developments:

- U.S. industrial production in October was unchanged from the month before as a hoped-for rebound in auto production failed to materialize, the Federal Reserve Board reported. Industrial output has slowed in recent months as part of the general slackening in the economy.
- Retail sales edged down one-tenth of 1 percent in October after rising 1.2 percent in September.
- After-tax corporate profits in the July-September period rose 9 percent from a year earlier, a Wall Street Journal survey of 575 major corporations showed, and the outlook was for continued modest gains through next year as the economy slows.

Meanwhile, the Labor Dept. reported a drop of two-tenths of 1 percent in producer prices at the wholesale level last month. It was the third successive monthly decline.

Maryland mortgage plan aids jobless

Baltimore—Jobless workers in Maryland facing foreclosures on their home mortgages can now get emergency financial help thanks to a new state program fought for by the labor movement.

The state's Homeowners Emergency Mortgage Assistance Program, created by the Maryland legislature at labor's urging, can provide low-interest loans to unemployed workers struggling to meet mortgage payments. The program also includes a counseling program in which non-profit housing agencies will help jobless homeowners meet with their banks to make reasonable payment arrangements.

Henry Koellein, president of the Metropolitan Baltimore AFL-CIO, said the program that took effect Oct. 15 was "desperately needed . . . because so many of our people are not back to work and still have not felt the economic recovery."

The effort for passage of the bill was led by the Baltimore council's Committee on Unemployment and the Maryland & District of Columbia AFL-CIO. The labor councils also cooperated with other community groups and community service agencies in lobbying for passage of the program.

A key factor in their success, the councils said, was a grass-roots program that saw thousands of local union members from across the state telephoning their legislators to urge passage of the bill.

Split-ticket statehouses

In five of the 13 states with gubernatorial elections this year, ticket-splitting voters elected lieutenant governors of different political parties than the successful candidates for governor.

Delaware voters elected Republican Michael N. Castle as governor and chose Democrat S. B. Woo as lieutenant governor.

In Missouri, Democrat Harriett Woods had narrowly lost her try for the U.S. Senate two years ago. This year, she was elected lieutenant governor while Republican John Ashcroft won the gubernatorial election.

And as Republican James G. Martin won election as North Carolina's governor, Democrat Robert Jordan III won the number two spot.

The political mix in Rhode Island makes Republican Edward DiPrete governor and Democrat Richard A. Licht lieutenant governor.

In Vermont, the governorship was won by Democrat Madeleine Kunin, herself a former lieutenant governor. But the incumbent Republican lieutenant governor, Peter Smith, was re-elected.

licans, subject to change in recounts. That includes holdovers in the states that elect legislators in odd-numbered years—Alabama, Louisiana, Maryland, Mississippi, New Jersey and Virginia. There are also other states where some or all state senators are midway in four-year terms and did not stand for election this year.

These are the states where party control shifted or reports from AFL-CIO state bodies indicated significant changes:

Alaska—Democrats ousted Republicans from control of the House, with the margin awaiting a final tally. The Republican majority in the Senate was unchanged.

Colorado — Republicans strengthened majorities to 47-18 in the House, a gain of seven, and 24-11 in the Senate, up by three. With a Democratic governor, the GOP achieved its goal of electing a "veto-proof legislature."

Connecticut—The GOP sweep of both houses leaves a probable Republican majority of 87-64 in the House and 24-12 in the Senate. The Republicans last controlled the legislature in 1974.

Delaware—The House tilted from a 25-16 Democratic majority to 21-20 Republican control. The Senate stays Democratic.

Kansas—Only a marginal change as Republicans added a few seats to build its House majority to 76-49. State AFL-CIO Executive Sec. Ralph McGee noted that vetoes by "our friendly Democratic governor" have blocked "disastrous" legislation and stressed the importance of the 1986 gubernatorial election to the labor movement.

Minnesota — Control of the House switched from a 77-57 Democratic majority to a Republican lead of 70-64. There were no elections for the Senate, where Democrats have control. "The likely effect is to place a roadblock in front of the Minnesota AFL-CIO legislative program, State AFL-CIO President David K. Roe reported.

Montana—Democratic gains switched the Senate from 26-24 Republican control to a 27-23 Democratic majority. In the House, a 55-45 Democratic edge eroded to a 50-50 split but the Democrats are likely to retain control.

Nevada—The House turned from a 23-19 Democratic majority to 25-17 Republican control. Democrats hold the Senate, 13-8.

Ohio—The Senate tilted from 17 Democrats, 16 Republicans to 18 Republicans, 15 Democrats. In the House, the Democratic majority was slightly trimmed from 62-37 to 59-40.

Oklahoma — Party lineup is little changed with continued Democratic control. But state federation anticipates a defensive year battling an anticipated "right-to-work" offensive and continued efforts to repeal the state's little Davis-Bacon Act.

Nebraska—The nation's only single-house legislature is theoretically nonpartisan, and 25 of the 49 seats were at stake this year. On the basis of the party affiliations of the winners, Democrats gained three seats to make the lineup 25 Republicans, 23 Democrats and one independent. Nineteen of 20 COPE-endorsed candidates were elected and State AFL-CIO President Gordon McDonald sees the new legislature as "less conservative" than its predecessor.

South Carolina—State AFL-CIO calls attention to the election of four labor-endorsed black candidates to the Senate, a first since the reconstruction era.

Vermont—Democrats took control of the Senate for the first time in the state's history. The 17-13 Republican majority was turned around. Republicans kept House control, but by a reduced margin. Labor has found bipartisan support for many of its goals.

Reversal of noise rule seen as undermining other safety standards

By Arlee C. Green

An appeals court decision overturning the federal workplace noise standard could have a far-reaching effect on other health and safety standards and for the time-being leaves unprotected workers exposed to high levels of noise, the AFL-CIO said.

The long-awaited decision by the 4th Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals in Richmond, released the day after the national elections by a 2-to-1 vote, struck down the hearing conservation amendment to the Occupational Safety & Health Administration's noise standard.

The court ruling on the case brought by the Cleveland-based Forging Industry Association distinguished between workplace and non-workplace exposures. The majority held that OSHA exceeded its authority by requiring employers to protect workers from hearing loss which could, in part, be caused by sources outside the workplace.

Margaret Seminario, associate director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Occupational Safety, Health & Social Security, warned that if the Labor Dept. allows the ruling to stand without appeal, it could be used as a basis for attacking other federal health and safety standards.

Seminario questioned the logic used by the court in making the differentiation between workplace and non-workplace exposures. "It's often scientifically impossible to prove that health damage was done solely in the workplace," she said. "Does this mean that we should not regulate benzene in the workplace because it also is in gasoline and we might not be able to tell which exposure caused cancer?"

Enforcement urged

She said OSHA has "no choice" now but to enforce the engineering control provisions of the standard, and she urged the agency to direct its field staff to "vigorously enforce" those requirements.

The court's majority opinion, written by Judge Richard F. Chapman, said the hearing conservation amendment "clearly imposes responsibilities on employers based on non-work related hazards. Under the amendment, an employer whose workers are not injured by workplace noise may be subject to numerous requirements simply because its workers choose to hunt, listen to loud music or ride motorcycles during their non-working hours."

The requirements on employers are activated if an employee suffers an average hearing loss of 10 decibels, known as a standard threshold shift. This means that a worker's hearing loss is such that the low-range tones in a hearing test must be 10 times louder than in the worker's initial hearing test to be heard.

Once a worker has experienced this kind of loss, the amendment requires an employer to provide hearing protectors, reduce the worker's exposure to noise, set up a training program and retain records on exposure and hearing tests.

In a dissenting opinion, Judge James M. Sprouse pointed out that hearing loss to some degree occurs as a part of the aging process and can vary according to the non-occupational noises to which employees are exposed. The hearing conservation amendment, however, "is concerned with occupational noises—a hazard of the workplace. The hazard is identified as sustained noise of great intensity — 85 decibels and above. Non-occupational noise of that intensity sustained over a period of eight hours each day is hard to imagine," Judge Sprouse wrote.

Lack of understanding

George Cohen, a labor attorney, said the court's opinion "appears to be one of the more outrageous opinions" in the area of health and safety. "Our assessment is that the majority did not understand what the standard provides."

A former senior scientist who directed development of the hearing conservation amendment, Alice Suter, was quoted in the Daily Labor Report as saying that "it's no coincidence that the decision was released right after the election." Now a private consultant, Suter said, "Everybody was wondering why it took so long, but now we know—it's a post-election gift."

Citing the effect such a ruling could have on other health and safety standards, Suter asked, "How can you tell the difference between chronic lung disease from cotton dust or smoking? Or how can you tell the difference between occupational and non-occupational asbestosis?"

An OSHA spokesman said the agency had not determined whether to appeal the decision for full appellate court review, or to seek a Supreme Court ruling or ask for a rehearing.

Bakery Workers get $1.05 pay hike in Keebler accord

Scottsdale, Ariz.—The Bakery, Confectionery & Tobacco Workers ratified a new two-year contract with Keebler Co., providing a two-step wage increase of $1.05 an hour and benefit improvements for some 3,570 production and maintenance workers.

The agreement, covering workers at the firm's cookie and cracker plants in Philadelphia, Denver, Cincinnati, Grand Rapids, Mich., Van Nuys, Calif., and Atlanta and Macon, Ga., became effective Nov. 1.

Workers received an immediate 55-cent hourly wage boost, and will get another 50-cent increase Nov. 1, 1985. The average straight-time base rate under the previous agreement was $10.71 an hour.

The company also agreed to increase its contribution to the union's health benefit fund by 41 cents an hour per full-time employee, with a 40-hour per week cap, effective Jan. 1. Keebler previously had paid $1.145 per hour per employee into the fund to maintain health benefits.

In addition, as of Nov. 1, 1985, the company will contribute an additional 1.5 cents an hour to cover improvements in sickness and accident coverage as well as laboratory and X-ray coverage.

In retirement benefits, Keebler agreed to make contribution increases totaling 11.5 cents an hour per worker up to a maximum of 40 hours per week in each year of the agreement.

Also, the vacation schedule was improved to allow six weeks of annual paid leave after 25 years of service rather than 30 years.

get raises of 6 percent in each of the three years.

Most of the workers, including many paid primarily for piecework, were making about $5.50 an hour.

The contract also provides for major improvements in working conditions, including modification of the VDTs to reduce stress and physical problems associated with long hours at the machines.

The employees will also have breaks away from the VDTs, and the right to transfer to non-VDT work.

The pact also provides for an improved absentee policy, and will give workers the right to see some of their personnel files and to appeal actions such as work error audits.

Along with the pledge from Equitable not to close the Syracuse office the contract also includes a no-layoff clause for the life of the pact.

Workers at the claims office began organizing in 1981, and despite a union-busting campaign run for Equitable by "consultant" Ray Mickus, the employees voted for representation by the SEIU in February 1982.

The National Labor Relations Board denied Equitable's appeals and certified the union in June 1982, but the company stalled the bargaining process and was found guilty of unfair labor practices by the board and ordered to negotiate.

Equitable's continued refusal to bargain prompted the SEIU to launch its boycott in 1982. The boycott was endorsed by the AFL-CIO Executive Council at its February 1983 meeting.

AFL-CIO Organizing Director Alan Kistler said the workers' success shows that "even a multi-million dollar corporation cannot ignore just demands for better and safer working conditions, fair pay and individual representation and union representation."

1,825 high-jobless areas posted

The Labor Dept. designated 1,825 high-unemployment, or "labor surplus," areas across the country where employers may obtain preference in obtaining federal contracts. The annual listing includes 390 more areas than the previous one. The designations apply for the fiscal year that began Oct. 1.

Employers are eligible for preference in federal contract bids if they agree to perform at least 51 percent of the contract work within such areas. The purpose of identifying the high-jobless areas is to help place a portion of the government's procurement dollars in communities where unemployment is above a specified level.

To be included in the annual listing, an area must have had an unemployment rate averaging at least 10 percent during the previous 24-month period. For the new listing, the two-year period from January 1982 through December 1983 included the Reagan Recession and the start of the economic recovery.

Five-member panel set for postal dispute

The process of arbitrating a new contract covering about a half-million U.S. Postal Service employees moved forward as the Postal Workers and Letter Carriers agreed with USPS on a five-member panel to decide the basic economic issues.

Agreement on the size of the panel was reached Nov. 3 at the offices of Director Kay McMurray of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service.

Theodore Kheel, a prominent arbitrator from New York City, will represent APWU while NALC General Counsel Bruce Simon will represent the Letter Carriers. The two union designees will cast just one vote between them, since APWU and NALC bargain jointly with USPS.

Similarly, USPS's designated representatives will share one vote. They are Joseph Mahon, labor counsel for the Postal Service's eastern region, and Peter Nash, former counsel for the National Labor Relations Board.

Under the 1970 Postal Reorganization Act spelling out procedures for settling a contract dispute where no agreement can be reached within 90 days of the expiration of an existing pact, the chairman of the arbitration panel is chosen by the parties' representatives. If the two sides are unable to reach agreement, the FMCS names the chairman.

45-day deadline

The law also requires the panel to render its binding decision within 45 days after its appointment and, in this case, no later than Dec. 24.

The dispute between the two unions and USPS entered the arbitration phase on Oct. 19 after negotiations reached an impasse following the July 20 expiration of the old agreement.

Two other unions, the Mail Handlers division of the Laborers and the unaffiliated Rural Letter Carriers, also have submitted their differences with the USPS for arbitration, and panels are being drawn up to decide these disputes.

Out of the sweatshop

In the heart of New York's garment district, the struggles of immigrant needle trades workers and their determination to overcome sweatshop working conditions is commemorated in a bronze sculpture by the artist Judith Weller. The statue was erected on its Seventh Ave. site with funds raised by the Ladies' Garment Workers. Officials at the dedication included Mayor Ed Koch, ILGWU President Sol C. Chaikin and Sec.-Treas. Jay Mazur.

Kirkland welcomes appeal of bishops for job programs, workers' full rights

The nation's poverty rate is "morally unacceptable" and dealing with poverty "is an imperative of the highest order, the letter notes, calling for action to remove barriers to "full and equal employment for women and minorities," as well as improved child care services, improved education for poor children, new programs to "foster self-help among the poor," and reform of the tax system "to reduce the burden on the poor."

The letter calls for a major overhaul of the nation's welfare system including funding to provide adequate support for poor families, national eligibility standards and a national minimum benefit, programs designed to strengthen rather than weaken the family and to encourage employment, and the participation of recipients in design of public assistance programs.

The role of the United States and its economy in the international arena is also discussed, including areas such as aid to meet the human needs of developing countries and the need for trade that is both "free and fair."

The letter discusses at length the need for increased participation by workers in economic decision-making, and the bishops firmly underscore the Catholic Church's long-standing support of "the right of workers to form unions."

On union-busters

Union-busting draws a sharp attack in the statement which asserts that "no one may deny the right to organize for purposes of collective bargaining or coercively suppress unions without attacking human dignity itself."

The letter puts the bishops on record as firmly opposed to "organized efforts, such as those regrettably now seen in this country, to break existing unions or to prevent workers from organizing through intimidations and threats."

U.S. labor law needs to be reformed, the letter declares, to help workers in efforts to organize and deal quickly in providing remedies for unfair labor practices.

The letter—with its strong emphasis on economic justice and dignity, and its assertion that "the preservation of privileged concentrations of power, wealth and income" should not be the economy's first priority—has touched off national discussion.

Even before the draft was released, a group of conservative economists and business people issued a statement disputing the draft letter's thrust.

But even the conservatives expressed "our full support for the principle of free and voluntary association in labor unions."

The conservatives also commended labor for its "immense contribution" to the nation's political system, and noted that "probably no institution in American life has been so consistently engaged in promoting democracy in the international arena" as unions.

'No one may deny the right to organize...'

Following are excerpts from the draft of the Catholic bishops' "Pastoral Letter on Catholic Social Teaching and the U.S. Economy," issued in Washington, Nov. 15, 1984.

Workers have a right to a just wage. Labor is not simply a commodity traded on the open market nor is a just wage determined simply by the level the market will sustain. As Pope Leo XIII stated, every working person "has the right of securing things to sustain life."

It is one of the consequences of the way power is distributed in a free-market economy that employers frequently possess greater bargaining power than do employees in the negotiation of wage agreements. Such unequal power may press workers into a choice between an inadequate wage and no wage at all. The provision of a wage sufficient to support a family in dignity is necessary to prevent this exploitation of workers.

The dignity of workers also requires adequate health care, insurance for old age or disability, healthful working conditions, weekly rest and periodic holidays for recreation and leisure. These provision are all essential if workers are to be treated as persons rather than simply as a "factor of production." Justice, not charity, demands such minimum guarantees.

As an institutional means to achieve these guarantees the church fully supports the right of workers to form unions or other associations to secure their rights to fair wages and working conditions. This is a specific application of the more general right to associate. Trade unions express the essentially social nature of human persons and manifest the human need for solidarity.

Unions may also legitimately resort to strikes in situations where they are the only available means for pursuing the justice owed to workers. No one may deny the right to organize for purposes of collective bargaining or coercively suppress unions without attacking human dignity itself. Therefore we firmly oppose organized efforts, such as those regrettably now seen in this country, to break existing unions or to prevent workers from organizing through intimidation and threats.

U.S. labor-law reform is needed to give greater substance to the right to organize, to prevent intimidation of workers and to provide remedies in a more timely manner for unfair labor practices.

We recommend that the nation make a major new policy commitment to achieve full employment. We believe that an unemployment rate in the range of 3 percent or 4 percent is a reasonable definition of full employment in the United States today.

We believe that 6 percent to 7 percent unemployment is unacceptable and is not the best the United States can do.

We recommend increased support by the government for direct job-creation programs targeted on the structurally unemployed.

In an advanced industrial economy like ours, all actors of society, including government, must actively and positively cooperate in forming national economic policies. Taxation, monetary policy, high levels of government spending and a variety of forms of governmental regulation are here to stay.

A modern economy without governmental interventions of the sort we have alluded to is inconceivable. These interventions, however, should help, not replace, the contributions of other economic actors and institutions.

One of the most important means for enhancing this spirit of cooperation is the development of a new partnership between workers and managers.

Important procedures already exist in industrial society to guarantee respect for these joint contributions. Collective bargaining between labor and management and the accountability of management to shareholders give institutional recognition to the contributions of all and provide at least minimal means for the sharing of power within firms.

Support for a less adversarial relationship between labor and management does not mean that workers alone are called upon to make sacrifices.

In the heavy manufacturing sector of the U.S. economy, technological change and international competition are pushing firms and industries toward very painful choices. We acknowledge that choices leading to job losses or wage reductions for workers may sometimes be necessary. But a collaborative and mutually accountable model of industrial organization demands that workers not have to bear all the burdens of a dynamic economy in transition.

Management and investors must also make their share of the sacrifices, especially, for example, when management is contemplating transferring capital to a potentially more productive or competitive location. The capital at the disposal of management represents to a significant degree the investment of the labor of those who have toiled in the company over the years, including currently employed workers.

Without collective negotiation even these minimal rights will be jeopardized, and so industrial cooperation requires a strong role for responsible labor unions in our changing economy. Also, the local communities in which these companies are located have often invested heavily in them through public services, tax benefits, public education and a host of other community resources. They too have a right to expect management to respect their investment.

The extent of poverty in the United States must be a matter of grave concern to all citizens. At the end of 1983 there were about 35 million Americans who, by the government's official definition, were poor. Another 20 million to 30 million had so little that by any reasonable standard they were also needy.

After a decline in the annual rate of poverty from 14.7 percent in 1966 to 11.7 percent in 1979, the figure climbed to 15.2 percent by the end of 1983—the sharpest increase since poverty statistics began to be collected.

In the four years between 1979 and 1983 the number of those living in poverty increased by over 9 million people. During this same period the number of poor children under the age of 6 jumped by 51 percent.

The fact that so many people are poor in a nation as wealthy as ours is a social and moral scandal that must not be ignored.

Members of House of Representatives

If recounts do not change the outcome, the House of Representatives will have 253 Democrats and 182 Republicans in the 99th Congress, which convenes in January.

Numerals show congressional districts; AL—at large. Newly elected House members have an asterisk after their names.*

Bold Statements

THERE WAS a time, not too far in the past, when the principles and programs espoused in the draft statement being considered by the Catholic bishops would have raised no eyebrows. To most Americans, it would have been seen as the shaping of a moral framework for generally accepted and largely self-evident positions.

That was at a time when the national debate was whether the full employment goal would be achieved only when the jobless rate dropped below 3 percent, or whether 4 percent would be a more realistic dividing line.

By any rational standard, the above-7-percent jobless level that has marked the Reagan recovery would have been viewed as a serious recession, requiring government action to help get America back to work.

When the war on poverty was still a national crusade, the intelligent debate was over how most effectively to pursue it. It remained for the present Administration to cut and run. Even now, the remnant programs are again chief targets for more budget cutting.

There have always been attempts, as the bishops phrased it, "to break existing unions or to prevent workers from organizing through intimidations and threats."

But in the past, there was a National Labor Relations Board which sought to enforce the intent of federal labor law and protect the legitimate rights of workers and unions. There were and are weaknesses in the law that allow union-busters to defy or evade it with little fear of the consequences. But in the past, there were those in Congress and the White House who recognized the problem and worked to strengthen the law.

So yes, the viewpoints in the draft of the pastoral letter and similar concerns that have been expressed by the clergy of other faiths are bold statements that need to be expressed.

They call America to its better self, and it will be a better nation if the call is heeded.

Eye-Opener

MOST AMERICANS find even $1 billion too great a figure to comprehend, and eyes glaze over at news stories cluttered with multi-billion dollar figures.

So let's take a figure that's easier to deal with—say 25,000. not $25,000 but 25,000 people.

According to government estimates, the export of $1 billion in U.S. goods to other countries adds about 25,000 jobs to the American economy. That's 25,000 more people who are employed.

The other side of the coin is that $1 billion in imported goods denies employment to some 25,000 American workers.

Just four years ago, the United States enjoyed a trade surplus of $12 billion in manufactured goods. By that formula, which is of course a rough estimate that would vary with the type of goods involved, the United States was 300,000 jobs better off.

Now, the trade deficit has reached nearly $70 billion just for the first nine months of 1984. By year's end, the total is projected at more than $90 billion.

Using the same arithmetic, that represents a shift from plus 300,000 jobs to minus 2,250,000 jobs that the American economy and unemployed American workers sure could use.

Now that's a statistic that ought to make some glazed-over eyes pop open.

Campaign Spending War

MUST A CANDIDATE for public office be enormously wealthy or able to raise large sums from groups with a particular point of view?

In many states and in an increasing number of congressional districts, it would seem so. With costly television commercials the favored way of reaching voters, campaign costs in seriously contested elections are staggering.

In the presidential election, at least, the concept of public financing has forced a truce of sorts in the spending war. Perhaps the survivors of this year's congressional and senatorial elections will be receptive to a fresh look at a persistent and worsening problem.

Low-income households face winter without heat

By Press Associates, Inc.

Since energy prices exploded in the mid-1970s, home heating costs have burnt up consistently larger portions of household budgets. Low-income households, especially those with fixed incomes, were hit hardest by escalating prices for natural gas, home heating oil and electricity.

A new study by the National Consumer Law Center found that the situation is not improving for the nation's poor. In fact, the study, funded by the Field Foundation, found that many Americans will be left out in the cold this winter.

"Homes Without Heat: A Nationwide Study of Disconnected Natural Gas Users" reports on a survey of shutoffs by 67 gas utilities nationwide and the amount of money owed by users at the time of disconnection. Those utilities serve more than 60 percent of the nation's residential gas customers.

In 1983, 4.7 million people in more than 1.6 million households using natural gas had their service disconnected. If current trends continue, more than 1.8 million households will lose their service in 1984—up 9.7 percent over 1983.

During the depths of the recession in 1982, 4 million households using natural gas were behind in payments to gas utilities by 60 days or more. In 1984, 4.8 million households were 60 days or more in arrears—a 21 percent increase.

Deeper in debt

Not only are more people losing service, but they are deeper in debt to utilities. The average amount owed to utilities by households receiving termination notices was $145 in 1981 and $225 in 1984.

Howard Fox, an NCLC policy analyst, noted that the utility shutoff problem has not only defied the economic recovery, but has become "a permanent fixture on the American scene for low-income persons."

Average annual home energy costs for the poor exceed $1,000 in 21 states while over 10.6 million households have incomes under $5,000. Home energy costs absorb four times more of the low-income family budget than that of the average American family.

Although most of those disconnected manage to pay off their debt and regain natural gas service, an alarming number do not. The study forecasts that more than 500,000 households cut off from gas service will not be reconnected this winter.

Programs inadequate

Federal energy assistance programs are inadequate to aid those facing a winter without heat.

The Low-Income Home Energy Assistance Program (LIHEAP), is funded at about $2.1 billion, up 10 percent from 1981 through 1983, while the cost of natural gas rose almost 40 percent over the same period.

The federal Low-Income Weatherization Program—a common sense approach to conserving energy in the face of escalating fuel prices—is funded at only $191 million in fiscal year 1985, compared to $200 million in fiscal 1978.

About 13 million low-income dwellings are eligible for and in need of weatherization services. The program's current funding level can provide weatherization for less than 200,000 units a year. The NCLC estimates it would take 50 years for all of the eligible low-income dwellings to be weatherized at the current rate.

The study suggests that increased funding for these two programs is urgently needed. But the center points out that other steps also are necessary. Policies that affect the price of oil and natural gas and state utility rate-setting policies must recognize the budget limitations of low-income consumers, the NCLC said.

The center also urged expanded efforts by states and utilities in low-income energy assistance and weatherization.

Finally, the center urged the continuation of rules prohibiting heat shut-off during winter months. All but nine states have some type of restrictions on winter disconnections.

Labor assails South Africa for crushing rights of blacks

The AFL-CIO condemned the South African government's attempt to suppress the legitimate struggle of blacks for basic human rights, and urged it to heed their demands for quality education and other social reforms.

"Neither military force nor police brutality will stop the black march to freedom and equality," the federation warned.

In what has been described as the biggest political strike by blacks in the country's history, black political organizations and labor unions called a two-day work stoppage to air their grievances. The government response was brutal, resulting in the death of 17 persons, injuries to hundreds, and about 2,000 arrests.

Union leaders arrested

In the strike's aftermath, Chris Dlamini, president of the 150,000-member Federation of South African Trade Unions, and several other labor activists were arrested under a security law that provides for indefinite detention in solitary confinement without charges.

Piroshaw Camay, general secretary of the Council of Unions of South Africa, was also arrested in the continuing crackdown to bring the number of people detained for the protest strike to 13, most of them trade union leaders.

All had backed the strike that brought much of the country's industrial heartland to a near standstill. The protest capped a wave of unrest that began in the area two and a half months ago in protest against the country's segregationist system called apartheid.

The South African government, in its handling of the two-day strike, has shown "a cynical disregard of the rights of its black citizens," the AFL-CIO charged. "It has also shown contempt for international public opinion, which has repeatedly urged white South Africa to alter its course and engage in a dialogue with all its citizens."

Reliance on massive intimidation, coercive police action, and military force to stem the rising tide of African aspirations only escalates the violence, the federation warned. An equally strong statement of condemnation was issued by the Brussels-based International Confederation of Free Trade Unions.

The worst violence occurred in the segregated black townships of Tembisa and Katlehong on the eastern Witwatersrand in the Transvaal Province.

Observers said the rioting and police brutality has reached a far more serious level than the Soweto disturbances in 1976 which grew out of black student protests against the compulsory use of the Afrikaans language in primary and secondary schools. Then more than 600 people were killed in nearly four months of violence.

In the past two months, 97 persons have died and more than 500 have been injured.

Coalition hits complacency

Official jobless count called 'tip of iceberg'

Official unemployment statistics hide the true extent and impact of joblessness, particularly in the nation's urban areas, and are "morally unacceptable," a coalition of labor, civil rights and religious groups stressed.

"What is lost sight of is that there are people behind those statistics that the recovery is not reaching," the Right Rev. John Burt told a Capitol Hill press conference called by the coalition to focus on the jobs crisis in many American communities.

"What is particularly troubling is that these figures represent only the tip of the iceberg," said Burt, who is chairman of the Ecumenical Great Lakes/Appalachia Project on the Economic Crisis and also head of the Episcopal Church's Urban Bishops Coalition.

When "discouraged" workers — those who have given up the apparently fruitless search for jobs — and others who must settle for part-time work are added to the official unemployment figures, October's real jobless rate was 13.1 percent rather than 7.4 percent as reported by the Bureau of Labor Statistics, the Full Employment Action Council observed.

The report of the council, which is a member of the Washington-based coalition, also profiles real unemployment in the nation's 20 largest cities as well as in cities hardest hit by what Catholic, Protestant and Jewish leaders described as "a profound economic and moral crisis."

Joining Burt in calling for a new approach to the nation's economic problems were Bishop John Ricard of the Catholic Archdiocese of Baltimore and Rabbi David Saperstein, co-director of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations' Religious Action Center.

Among the findings of the Full Employment Action Council report on urban unemployment was that 11 of 14 metropolitan areas hit hardest by joblessness are substantially worse off than they were four years ago. Also, of America's 20 largest cities, nine are better off but nine others are worse off than in 1980.

"The division between extremes is growing wider," Bishop Richard said. "When our cities suffer, our nation suffers. Unless we reach out to them, we cannot stand as a nation."

Lake Charles, La., for example, had an official jobless rate of 5.8 percent four years ago. The comparable figure now is 13.2 percent and the "real" rate, factoring in the discouraged and part-time workers who cannot find full-time work, is 23.8 percent.

Other hard-hit areas, with their current official and "real" rates, profiled in the study are Gary-Hammond-East Chicago, Ind., 12.9 and 23.2 percent; Huntington-Ashland, W.Va., 12.8 and 23 percent; Duluth-Superior, Minn., 12.4 and 22.3 percent; Vineland-Millville-Bridgeton, N.J., 12.3 and 22.1 percent; Youngstown-Warren, Ohio, 12.3 and 22.1 percent; Northeast, Pa., 12.1 and 21.8 percent; Pittsburgh, 12 and 21.6 percent; Kankakee, Ill., 11.8 and 21.2 percent; Modesto, Calif., 11.4 and 20.5 percent, and Altoona, Pa., 10.6 and 19.1 percent.

Called 'a crime'

Rabbi Saperstein called the continuing high unemployment problem in America's cities "a crime" that "afflicts, disproportionately, the blacks and Hispanics, women and teenagers, whose unemployment rates are as much as twice as high as the official statistics indicate."

He said the widespread nature of the problem of unemployment and underemployment reflects "the challenge of moving our nation toward a full and fair employment economy."

"If this nation gives up on those who remain unemployed, whether listed in the figures or hovering outside the official statistics, it is giving up on itself," he said.

NLRB carves up past policy on broadcast bargaining units

The Reagan majority on the National Labor Relations Board reversed a long-standing agency policy in ruling that an Alameda, Calif., radio station's disc jockeys and radio announcers do not constitute an appropriate bargaining unit.

The board majority held that since a "close functional relationship" exists among all workers at the station, the only appropriate unit would be one that included all employees.

The ruling set aside a May 31, 1983, election among "on-air programmers" only, and directed that a new election be held among the all-employees unit.

In their decision, NLRB Chairman Donald L. Dotson and Members Robert P. Hunter and Patricia Diaz Dennis—the three Reagan appointees on the board—reversed the conclusion of an agency regional director who had approved the original election among the disc jockeys and announcers.

In a dissent, Member Don A. Zimmerman asserted that the majority's decision represented a departure from "well-established policy finding appropriate a separate unit of employees who regularly perform before a microphone in the radio and television industries."

"It is neither surprising nor significant," he added, "that a small radio station—such as the employer—would have a partially integrated operation and that on-air performers would spend a substantial amount of their time assisting other employees in off-air duties."

Unsettling decision

Zimmerman said that the ruling unsettled a board policy which for many years had been stable and clear.

The case stems from a petition by the Television & Radio Artists in behalf of 15 on-air program personnel employed by KJAZ Broadcasting Co., who sought to be represented by AFTRA.

The regional director held that AFTRA's attempt to organize the 15 programmers was appropriate because it was "based on the recognized distinction for bargaining purposes in the radio industry between employees who do not appear on the air and those who do."

Sen. Hatch calls for scrapping all curbs on homework

As Sen. Orrin Hatch sees it, the Labor Dept. didn't go far enough in lifting restrictions against industrial homework.

The Utah Republican, who heads the Senate Labor & Human Resources Committee, welcomed as "good news" the Labor Dept.'s latest move to allow the home manufacture of knitted outerwear, such as sweaters.

Hatch expressed disappointment, however, that the Labor Dept. didn't also accord comparable "freedom" in the six other kitchen sweatshops industries where homework has been banned by regulation for more than 40 years. The still-regulated industries are women's apparel, jewelry, gloves and mittens, buttons and buckles, handkerchiefs and embroideries.

Labor Sec. Raymond Donovan had tried to lift all restrictions soon after the Reagan Administration took office, but public outcry and court rebukes in suits brought by unions and fair employers scuttled that effort. The bans were originally imposed because experience had shown that it was impossible to enforce the wage-hour law and child labor restrictions under the kitchen sweatshop conditions that were once common in this country.

"Letting knitters work at home is a good first step," Hatch said. "But we should lift the ban on the other six industries where homework has been outlawed. Let's give even more workers a choice."

Labor assails court decision as 'whitewash'

By James M. Shevis

A Salvadoran Supreme Court decision to dismiss the case against a Salvadoran Army officer accused of plotting the 1981 slayings of two AFL-CIO representatives and the head of El Salvador's land-redistribution program amounts to a "whitewash" by a corrupt judicial system, the federation charged.

"The AFL-CIO is further convinced that the system is totally inadequate to bring charges against a military officer," the federation said in a statement.

The officer, Lt. Rodolfo Lopez Sibrian, had been directly linked to the deaths of the two Americans, Michael P. Hammer and Mark D. Pearlman, and Jose Rodolfo Viera, head of the Salvadoran Land Transformation Institute. Two National Guardsmen have confessed to carrying out the killings in a hotel coffee shop in San Salvador on Jan. 3, 1981.

Hammer and Pearlman, who were with the AFL-CIO's American Institute for Free Labor Development, were advisers to the Salvadoran land reform program. Viera also had been president of the Salvadoran Communal Union, which represents some 150,000 farm workers.

Salvadoran law stipulates that the testimony of confessed murderers cannot be used against another suspect.

Lopez Sibrian had first been acquitted by a court on Apr. 29, 1983, and prosecutors were given a year to produce new evidence for a further appeal. Last May, an appeals court confirmed the acquittal.

Supreme Court review

On Oct. 11, the Supreme Court said it would review the case against the lieutenant "in depth."

"Had they done so rather than consider only procedural aspects of the case," the AFL-CIO said, "the decision of the lower court would have to have been reversed. Under the guise of applying the law, the Supreme Court has abdicated its moral responsibility to see justice done."

Instead, on Nov. 15, the Supreme Court ruled that the appeals court had been correct in dropping the case after prosecutors failed to present evidence other than the confessions before the one-year statute of limitations expired.

"This case and similar cases should not be closed because of legal technicalities," the AFL-CIO declared.

Second-term playbook

Post-election agenda flouts Reagan pledges

By David L. Perlman

The Reagan Administration is planning a post-election end run around the President's campaign promises not to raise anyone's taxes and not to tamper with social security and Medicare.

Its playbook is a second-term agenda drawn up by the right-wing Heritage Foundation and a Treasury Dept. "tax simplification" plan now being pulled into final shape. Informed newspaper stories, stemming mainly from Treasury Dept. sources, point to workers, the elderly and even the unemployed as the likely losers under a Reagan version of tax reform.

Some of the proposals that have surfaced include:

- Taking as big a bite as proves politically feasible out of social security and Medicare.
- Taxing workers on the value of health insurance and other employer-provided fringe benefits.
- Taxing unemployment benefits received by low-income households.

The Heritage Foundation, which got started with funds provided by the Coors brewing company family, wrote the blueprint for Reagan's first term four years ago. "We've been using it to our and the country's advantage ever since," Reagan said.

Galley proofs of its second-term blueprint, Mandate for Leadership II, were passed around to Cabinet members by White House officials. Some portions recommend the outright abandonment of entire government programs so as to shrink drastically the non-military aspects of government.

It proposed to make the social security program voluntary, allowing persons to substitute tax-deferred individual retirement accounts to pay for their future retirement and medical needs. Such a diversion of funds would wreck the existing universal system and leave benefits unfunded.

Election pledge

Reagan had once endorsed "voluntary" social security but the political backlash from the Administration's early attempt to cut back on benefits caused him to pledge unequivocally during the election campaign that there will be no tampering with social security.

A White House press spokesman said in response to questions that the Heritage Foundation recommendations are not official policy and the Administration has "no plans to change social security."

There was no disavowal, however, of a

Big labor rally vows support of copper strikers

Tucson, Ariz.—"You are not alone," AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland pledged to striking copper workers locked in the bitter dispute with Phelps Dodge Co.

Nearly 3,000 union members and supporters joined the strikers and their families for a rally and picnic Nov. 18 organized by the Steelworkers. The USWA has the largest number of members among 13 unions on strike against the copper producer.

USWA President Lynn Williams called the strike "one of the greatest causes the labor movement has faced," and he stressed that the rally was intended "to send a message to Phelps Dodge that union-busting isn't an acceptable way of solving the problems of workers."

"We also want our copper strikers to know," Williams said, "that the labor movement hasn't forgotten their struggle for a union contract."

Williams said the USWA, which has already devoted about $10 million to support for the strikers, will continue to provide food and financial help "for as long as it takes to achieve their goals."

About 30 buses brought strikers and their families from the picket lines at the Phelps Dodge mining properties in Morenci, Ajo, Bisbee and Douglas, Ariz., and two buses of strikers and supporters arrived from the company's struck El Paso,

Pendleton calls pay equity 'looney'

By Susan Dunlop

The chairman of the U.S. Civil Rights Commission is the latest Reagan appointee to ridicule the principle of pay equity.

Commission Chairman Clarence M. Pendleton, Jr., called comparable pay for work of comparable value "looney" during a news conference he held with commission staff director Linda Chavez. Chavez also belittled the idea of pay equity, claiming it would "radically alter our existing marketplace economy."

Later during an appearance on ABC television, Pendleton said it was "ludicrous" to expect that secretaries or others in "traditionally a woman's job . . . should be paid the same as men in other occupations."

William Pollard, AFL-CIO civil rights director, said the commission officials are deliberately engaging in "mischief-making" in areas where they have no authority since pay equity is not under consideration by the panel at this time.

Wrong approach

He charged that they have "misinterpreted their mission" at the commission—which is an independent agency intended to serve as the "conscience" of the United States, not the "mouthpiece of any single political party's views."

Pay equity means that people holding different jobs that require the same amount of education, skill, experience and responsibility should be paid similar wages based on the value of the job to the employer, not on whether the job has been traditionally done mostly by men or women.

The AFL-CIO and its affiliates pressing for pay equity stress that the process requires up-grading of traditionally underpaid jobs while the pay scales of existing jobs will be fully protected.

President Gerald W. McEntee of the State, County & Municipal Employees found it "ironic" that the commission officials spoke out against pay equity on the Tex., facility. Other unionists came by car from communities around Arizona and surrounding states, including members of Arizona's Union Club, a coalition of union retirees.

The rally was also to support 350 USWA members on strike since Aug. 1, 1983, at Anamax Mining Co. near Tucson.

The day after the rally, the Steelworkers distributed 2,000 Thanksgiving turkeys to strikers' families at each of the struck sites.

About 1,700 copper workers are still on strike in the walkout that began July 1, 1983, when Phelps Dodge refused to accept terms of an industry pattern agreement. That pact included concessions by the unions intended to bolster the severely depressed copper industry, but Phelps Dodge demanded even stiffer, unacceptable givebacks, including deep cuts in health benefits.

The company, despite low copper prices, has continued to try to operate with supervisors and strikebreakers, and the unions say its losses are close to $50 million over the year.

Phelps Dodge has a long history of union-busting. The company implemented the infamous Bisbee Deportation of 1917 when vigilantes led by local sheriffs rounded up 1,200 copper strikers, shoved them in cattle cars and dumped them in the New Mexico desert where they were trapped without food, water or shelter until they were rescued days later.

Never easy

The unions have never been able to reach an agreement with Phelps Dodge without a strike.

Kirkland told the rally that the "entire trade union movement of the United States" is "solidly in support" of the copper strikers and their families.

The labor movement has never come by victories easily, "but we do plan to win, so we enter every battle prepared for the long haul, ready to fight it out as long as it takes," he said.

The fight against Phelps Dodge is one against "corporate greed" and against "union-busting, which seems to have earned the government's seal of approval over the past four years," Kirkland charged.

Other speakers at the rally included Operating Engineers President J. C. Turner and Industrial Union Dept. President Howard Samuel, as well as representatives of other striking unions.

The Steelworkers, with the cooperation of the IUD, have launched an education campaign to inform other unions about the financial ties of several major banks that have made substantial loans to Phelps Dodge in spite of the company's questionable financial situation.

In October, the USWA withdrew $11.5 million of its strike fund investments from two major banks that have loaned the company money. The union said it would not be "sound financial practice" to keep its members' money in banks with such "dubious" loan policies.

The campaign includes efforts to keep Phelps Dodge directors and investors informed of the company's activities, and to force the company to comply with environmental laws that it has repeatedly violated.

Unions involved

In addition to the USWA, unions representing Phelps Dodge strikers are the Machinists, Electrical Workers, Boilermakers, Operating Engineers, Chemical Workers, United Transportation Union, Plumbers & Pipefitters, Carpenters, Railway Carmen, Painters, the Morenci-Clifton Metal Trades Council and the unaffiliated Teamsters.

In decertification elections in which no strikers were allowed to vote by the National Labor Relations Board, strikebreakers in El Paso voted against the union, but results of voting in the Arizona facilities have not been released pending the results of USWA challenges.

OSHA plan 'inadequate'

Unions press stricter controls for asbestos

The AFL-CIO and its Building & Construction Trades Dept. want a final federal standard on asbestos that would reduce worker exposure limits 20-fold, primarily through engineering and work practice controls, and a separate standard for the construction industry.

In a post-hearing brief filed with the Occupational Safety & Health Administration, the federation said OSHA's proposed revision of the asbestos standard is "grossly inadequate to protect workers" and warned that it "will do little to stop the mounting toll of asbestos-related cancers."

OSHA's proposal would put all industries under one standard and would lower the permissible exposure limit from 2 million fibers per cubic meter to either 500,000 or 200,000 fibers. It would also, for the first time, give less effective dust masks, equal weight with engineering controls and work practices in reducing worker exposures.

Under the so-called respirator provision, OSHA "would only add requirements for the use of disposable dust masks and worker training," the AFL-CIO said.

The federation brief noted that OSHA, in its adopted cancer policy, determined that one of the few regulatory issues that could be "definitely resolved" was "the requirement that engineering and work practice controls be used as the primary method of complying with PEL's (permissible exposure limits)."

Industry position

Even the Asbestos Information Association, an industry trade group, testified in OSHA hearings that exposure limits "should be reduced to the lowest level feasible through engineering and work practice controls." The AIA had successfully sued to block an emergency standard on asbestos which OSHA issued in November 1983.

Asbestos is a mineral that causes a number of cancers and related diseases. Past exposures will result in the premature deaths of 200,000 workers before the end of this century, according to OSHA figures.

Short-term exposures to asbestos can pose severe risks to workers and given the unreliability of respirators, especially disposable dust masks, the agency's promotion of respirators is "literally a fatal flaw," the AFL-CIO said.

The federation also questioned OSHA's ability to monitor worker exposures if respirators are the primary control method. With engineering controls, it is easy to monitor the air a worker breathes, but with a respirator, such monitoring "would be extraordinarily difficult, if not impossible."

Lowest limits

Federal job safety law mandates that the agency set the exposure limits for harmful substances at the lowest feasible level. The AFL-CIO stressed the need for a limit of 100,000 asbestos fibers, rejecting the view of the AIA that the PEL be 500,000 fibers.

The AFL-CIO pointed out that OSHA's revision of the standard failed to provide improvements in the requirements on ceiling limits, work practices and regulated areas.

The federation stressed that many workers, such as those in repair and maintenance, receive only short-term exposures to asbestos. For these workers, a short-term exposure limit of 500,000 fibers is necessary. The method of averaging out exposures over an eight-hour work day would be ineffective, the AFL-CIO said.

The AFL-CIO said respirators should be allowed only during emergencies — when engineering controls are being installed, or where it isn't feasible to reduce exposures through engineering and work practice controls.

In urging a separate standard for the construction industry, the BCTD called for a long-term exposure limit of 100,000 fibers, with a short-term ceiling limit of 500,000 fibers.

It also wants to require employer reporting, bonding and proficiency; employee training and certification; engineering and work practice controls; regulated areas; emergency and decontamination procedures; monitoring and recordkeeping; medical surveillance; employee notification, and medical removal protection.

UFCW Local 400 President Thomas McNutt presents the union's "Golden Turkey" award to Labor Sec. Raymond Donovan in absentia for encouraging Marval and others to bust unions. Safeway Stores shared the honors for threatening to fire workers wearing Marval boycott buttons.

UFCW expands campaign to boycott Marval turkeys

In time for the biggest turkey season of the year, Food & Commercial Workers Local 400 cooked up a major advertising campaign to urge consumers to boycott birds from Marval Poultry Co. The campaign is continuing undiminished beyond the Thanksgiving season.

Some 400 members of the union struck the company's Dayton, Va. plant June 2, and Local 400 President Thomas R. McNutt said the union hopes to use the consumer boycott to draw public attention to Marval's shabby treatment of its workers and force the company back to the bargaining table.

McNutt said the UFCW "had little choice" but to launch a consumer boycott of Marval turkeys and the new ad campaign because "the Reagan Administration has virtually eliminated the National Labor Relations Board as an effective protector of workers' rights, and it's now up to us to protect our rights as best we can."

The boycott has been endorsed by the AFL-CIO Executive Council.

Local 400's ad blitz won't end with Thanksgiving. It will include radio and print advertising asking consumers to become "Turkeybusters" and stop buying products from Marval's Virginia plant, the largest turkey processing facility in the world. The ads will be concentrated in the company's prime markets in the Northeast including Boston, New York, Philadelphia and Washington. Other cities slated for future campaigns include Baltimore, Cleveland, Pittsburgh and Richmond, Va.

Several of the print ads will feature members of the National Football League Players Association, and the UFCW will hand out boycott leaflets at several professional football games.

Half-mililon letters

Both the Maryland-D.C. and Virginia AFL-CIOs mailed more than half a million letters to union households in the two states explaining the boycott. Many of the letters included a coupon offering a $1 refund on the purchase price of any turkey not from Marval.

The UFCW members struck Marval last summer primarily over what they called "an incredible deterioration in safety and health conditions" and "brutal and inhumane" work rules.

Most of the Marval workers are women with families, and most make about $6 an hour. The company's attempts to destroy the union health and welfare plan is also a key issue.

At the news conference, McNutt said Local 400 had also decided to award its "Golden Turkey Award" jointly to Labor Sec. Raymond Donovan and Safeway Stores, Inc.

Anti-worker climate

In a tongue-in-cheek citation, the union said the secretary "won" the "award" for helping to foster "an anti-union and anti-worker climate" that has "cheered on unscrupulous and predatory employers — like Marval" in attempts to deny workers their rights.

Local 400 said Safeway shared the "honor" for a company directive threatening to fire any employee caught wearing on the job one of the "Boycott Marval" buttons.

Marval turkeys can be identified in grocery stores either by the company name, or by a Dept. of Agriculture inspection stamp with the plant number "P-18" usually found on the metal wrapper closing ring.

Other brand names using some Marval-processed turkeys include Armour, Bigger Brothers, Bird-in-Hand, Boston Beef, C&S Distributors, Dogwood Hill Farms, Esskay, Farmer Gray, Food Club, Frosty Acres, Kingston, Lancaster, Louis Rich, Manor House, Marval, Maryland Chicken, Mazo Lerch, McSweeney's, Montoco, Rockingham, Shop Rite, Stu Leonard, Super True, Sure Fresh, Table Rite, Tender Pride, Top Frost, Weber Gourmet and Wilson.

Second-term agenda flouts pledges companion proposal that is being actively considered in the shaping of the budget recommendations that will be presented to Reagan after Thanksgiving. This would allow persons eligible for Medicare to take instead vouchers that could be used to pay for private health insurance.

The idea isn't new, and critics have warned that the almost certain result would be to allow private insurers to seek out persons with the least risk while leaving unprofitable cases of persons with costly or chronic ailments as a burden on a financially depleted Medicare system.

Less drastic measures reported under consideration include higher premiums offset in part by a new "catastrophic" health insurance protection and continuation of the trend to greater out-of-pocket payment by the elderly and disabled for their health care services.

The Administration already has called for taxation of health insurance benefits beyond a basic minimum, but accounts of Treasury Dept. recommendations indicate a considerably wider taxation of employer-provided benefits.

One of the more startling of the tentative proposals leaked to the press appears to be a revival of an Administration plan that was hastily withdrawn just two years ago after a torrent of protests.

Over the Thanksgiving holiday in 1982, in the midst of the recession's double-digit unemployment, the news broke that the White House was considering taxing unemployment benefits for all recipients, regardless of income.

Under existing law, unemployment benefits are taxed only if an individual's total income for the year—including unemployment compensation—is over $12,000, or $18,000 for a couple's joint return.

It was a sour and unpopular note that Thanksgiving and Reagan hastily renounced the idea.

Now, apparently, it is being revived.

Administration sources confirmed that one of the ingredients of the President's deficit reduction plan will be a major cutback in civil service retirement rights of federal employees and postal workers. In trade union terms, such an action would be comparable to management's unilateral rewriting of a contract.

Martin Marietta contract ratified

The Auto Workers ratified a new three-year agreement covering nearly 5,000 workers at Martin Marietta Corp. plants in three states.

UAW Sec.-Treas. Raymond Majerus noted that the settlement nearly concludes the union's current round of bargaining in the aerospace industry. The major exception, he said, is the Vought Corp. in Grand Prairie, Tex., where 3,500 UAW members have been working without a contract since Mar. 4.

The Martin Marietta contract, which covers workers in Denver, Baltimore, and Orlando, Fla., provides a 4.5-percent, lump sum supplemental wage payment, based on a worker's previous year's earnings and payable on Dec. 14; a 3-percent, lump sum wage payment in the second year of the contract, and a 3-percent general wage increase in the final year.

Democrats lead in undecided races

Results of two congressional elections remain in doubt, but Democrats are leading in both.

The final tally in Idaho's 2nd District showed Democrat Richard Stallings with a 133-vote lead over incumbent Republican George Hansen, but a recount remains a possibility.

The count was even closer in the 8th District of Indiana, where incumbent Democrat Frank McCloskey holds a 72-vote lead over Republican Richard D. McIntyre. The Republican has already requested a recount in two counties.

If the Idaho and Indiana seats stay Democratic and there is no change in several other districts where recounts are still possible, the party lineup in the 99th Congress will be 253 Democrats and 182 Republicans. That would represent a 14-seat GOP gain.

In the state legislatures, a Republican pickup of the North Dakota House was omitted from the roundup in the Nov. 17 issue of the AFL-CIO News. Republicans now control both houses of the legislature, but the governorship switched from Republican to Democratic.

Metal Trades President Paul Burnsky opens shipbuilding conference.

Metal Trades shipyard conference demands end to 'build foreign' policy

Delegates to a multi-union shipbuilding conference called for emergency measures to head off destruction of an industry that is essential to the nation's defense and important to its economy.

The common thread of the three-day meeting was concern over the Reagan Administration's "build foreign" ship construction policies. The biennial conference is sponsored by the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept. and the 200 participants came from both federal and private shipyards. They are members of different unions, but they bargain through local Metal Trades councils.

MTD President Paul Burnsky reported that shipyard employment has dropped from 135,000 to 102,000 in four years, with even more deterioration in sight.

"For all practical purposes, the American ocean-going shipbuilding industry consists today of a handful of yards building vessels for the U.S. Navy," Burnsky noted.

Other maritime nations recognize the need for "a sound and healthy commercial fleet and shipbuilding base," he stressed. But the United States alone "treats its shipbuilding industry as an orphan."

The conference called for the strengthening of laws reserving domestic shipping trade for U.S.-flag vessels and urged the closing of loopholes in existing cargo preference laws.

It pressed also for an increase in federal financial aid for both construction and operation of American-flag vessels.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland told the conference that national interest demands a maximum effort to keep shipbuilding from following the wake of other once flourishing U.S. industries that have been wiped out.

Shipyard shutdowns

In the four years since President Reagan called for a revitalization of maritime resources, Kirkland noted, nine major shipyards have shut down "and nine more are circling the drainpipe."

Kirkland urged the delegates to "expose the hypocrisy of those who speak of a strong America, yet contest every dime spent on our maritime strength, America's first line of defense."

Frank Drozak, president of the Maritime Trades Dept., said assurance of a fair share of cargo is an essential element for building a fleet of U.S.-flag vessels.

Drozak, who is also president of the Seafarers, said the United States must negotiate bilateral shipping agreements with its trading partners and do more to upgrade its inland waterway system.

"Each of these elements would have the effect of approaching our shipbuilding problems from the demand side," he said. "Together they make up the kind of comprehensive maritime policy we need to pull this industry away from the brink of collapse."

Burnsky said lack of work "is rapidly demolishing our industry" and noted that only one shipyard, with an order for two oil tankers, has any seagoing private construction in progress.

The scattering of skilled shipyard workers thrown out of work has already dangerously depleted the nation's ability to respond to an emergency, Burnsky noted.

Rep. Charles E. Bennett (D-Fla.), chairman of a House Armed Services subcommittee on Seapower, said expansion of the merchant fleet is an important aspect of the nation's defense buildup. He urged the metal trades unions to work with a commission established by Congress to shape recommendations for strengthening the merchant fleet.

In action on resolutions, the conference urged a change in government policies that encourage the flight of shipyard jobs overseas. Other resolutions urged strengthened enforcement of occupational safety and health at both private and federal shipyards, and protested unfair contracting-out policies of the federal government.

Pay plunge

Workers' real earnings took a sharp drop last month, declining nine-tenths of 1 percent from the previous month —a sure sign of the economic slowdown.

The drop was the third in the past four months, and left real earnings a full percentage point below the year-earlier level. Real earnings are wages adjusted for the impact of inflation.

The Bureau of Labor Statistics said the October decrease resulted from a six-tenths of 1 percent drop in average weekly hours, a slower pace in inflation, and a slight decline in average hourly earnings.

Cabinet post tied to passing right-wing test

There's only one vacancy in President Reagan's Cabinet so far, and right-wing ideologues want to make certain that it's not filled by a closet liberal.

With the encouragement of the White House, persons being considered for Secretary of Education in Reagan's second term are subjecting themselves to an ideological inquisition from the Committee for the Survival of a Free Congress.

The two most-discussed candidates for the post, National Endowment for the Humanities Chairman William J. Bennett and Boston University President John Silber, already have met with the self-appointed conservative screening group.

Conservatives made no secret of their hostility to Sec. of Education T. H. Bell, who is resigning from the Cabinet. Bell, a moderate in the context of the Reagan Administration, received generally good grades from the Teachers as a person of integrity who "genuinely cares about the quality of the American education system."

AFT President Albert Shanker expressed "dismay" that persons under consideration for a Cabinet post "would parade themselves before these right-wingers."

Candidates listed

The White House furnished the names of persons being considered for the Cabinet vacancy to the right-wing committee.

Bell, who will leave office on Dec. 31, said he was "just amazed" at hearing of the screening process. He expressed the hope that conservatives "won't be the only ones to have an input" in the choice of his successor.

If recommendations made by the conservative Heritage Foundation are adopted as Administration policy in Reagan's second term, the choice of Secretary of Education may not matter a great deal. The foundation's report, which was distributed at a Reagan Cabinet meeting but has not yet been published, suggests that the Dept. of Education be reduced to the equivalent of "a three-room schoolhouse."

Award to Turner stresses social justice commitment

New York—President Reagan's re-election hasn't dampened the trade union movement's commitment to social justice.

That was a central theme of participants in a Workers Defense League program honoring J. C. Turner, president of the Operating Engineers and a leader in job-training programs.

Turner received the WDL's David Clendenin Award, named for one of the organization's founders. It was presented by President Robert A. Georgine of the Building & Construction Trades Dept., and Ladies' Garment Workers President Sol C. Chaikin was the chairman for the program.

The good news from the election, Turner noted, is that the congressional results showed "that we have stopped the political pendulum's wild swing to the right." The task now, he suggested, is to "relight the lamp of compassion, fairness and equality."

The Workers Defense League was founded in 1936 and its efforts on behalf of oppressed groups go back to the era of sharecroppers in the South. It has spoken out against forced labor abroad and a current project involves assistance to jobless persons unjustly denied unemployment compensation. Its current chairman is Harry Fleischman, a longtime civil rights activist and a biographer of Norman Thomas, the Socialist leader who also helped set up the WDL.

Praised for service

Georgine presented the award to Turner, as "one of our movement's great leaders." He cited Turner's work for inner-city youth in the nation's capital, his identification with civil rights causes and civic leadership.

Chaikin said the trade union movement and its allies must continue to fight "for labor rights and against discrimination" during the "four more years" of a Reagan Administration.

In accepting the award, Turner said the combined efforts of groups such as the Workers Defense League, the labor movement, and the Catholic bishops "can reverse the tide of greed that threatens our democracy."

Economy's slowdown brings concern

The slowdown in the U.S. economy appeared even more pronounced in a series of new government reports.

The Commerce Dept. reported that "real," or inflation-adjusted, gross national product during the July-September quarter grew at an annual rate of only 1.9 percent rather than an initial rough estimate of 3.6 percent and a subsequent refinement to 2.7 percent.

The sputtering third-quarter GNP rate compares with a 10.1-percent pace in the first quarter of the year and a 7.1-percent rise in the April-June period.

Analysts said the slowdown stems from the deteriorating U.S. trade position—shrinking exports and surging imports—as the record-high trade deficit mounts.

In another economic report, the department said that new home construction fell 9.8 percent in October. The issuance of new building permits—a key indicator of future activity—also was down by 2.2 percent from the previous month's level.

Meanwhile, the Federal Reserve Board said that the nation's factories, mines and utilities operated at 81.8 percent of capacity in October, down from 82 percent in September. The decline in the operating rate was the third in as many months.

Also, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported a two-tenths of 1 percent rise in its Consumer Price Index for Urban Wage Earners & Clerical Workers (CPI-W) last month.

Over the three months ended in October, retail prices as measured by the CPI have risen at an annual rate of 6.7 percent. In the 12 months ended in October, the rise was 3.6 percent.

Half of the October rise was attributed to increases for gasoline and food. Food prices, which had fallen in September, rose four-tenths of 1 percent. Transportation and medical care costs also rose.

The slowdown in housing starts hit every region of the country last month except the northeast, which posted a small 1.6-percent gain. Construction activity in the south dropped 11.3 percent, followed by an 11.2-percent decline in the midwest, and an 11-percent drop in the West.

Housing starts are now 35 percent below their peak rate of 2.3-million units reached in February. Continued high interest rates are a reason for the slowdown.

The October decline included a 9.3-percent drop in construction of single-family homes. Construction of large apartment units fell an even sharper 14.7-percent.

For union-busting

Polish walkout follows condemnation by ILO

Geneva—Poland's communist government pulled out of the International Labor Organization after the ILO's governing body adopted a report condemning the Jaruzelski regime for banning the Solidarity free trade union organization and persecuting its members.

The move was not unexpected. Poland had already "suspended" its cooperation with the ILO following publication last June of a report by a commission of inquiry critical of the Polish government's labor policies. It had suspended payment of dues and refused to participate in any of the ILO work committees.

The governing body, an executive council of worker and employer delegates as well as government representatives, held fast when other communist members of the ILO threatened to follow suit.

Ukrainian government delegate Gennadi Oudovenko, saying he was speaking on behalf of what he called the "socialist countries," told the governing body, "we wish to express our solidarity and support, and we will consider the necessary measures to be taken as a consequence." He did not specify what measures.

The commission of inquiry's June report called for a resumption of dialogue between the Polish government and the banned free trade union. The panel met in Geneva after the Polish government refused to allow it to visit Warsaw.

Director Irving Brown of the AFL-CIO Dept. of International Affairs, the U.S. worker delegate to the ILO governing body's Nov. 12-16 meeting here, commended the panel for its firm hand against the Soviet bloc's threat to walk out if the report were adopted.

"It is important for the western countries not to yield to the implied threat by making concessions that will vitiate the labor standard-setting function of the ILO," he said after Oudovenko made his remarks.

"If the Soviet Union should leave the ILO, if it ever comes to that decision, it will only be when it believes that it can better further its interests outside the organization."

Poland absent

Poland is not a member of the governing body, and therefore could not speak at the meeting. However, the Soviet Union and its constituent republics of the Ukraine and Byelorussia are entitled to full votes.

ILO Director Gen. Francis Blanchard, in a letter to Poland's ambassador in Geneva, Stanislaw Turbanski, pointed out that the ILO's constitution calls for a two-year notice before withdrawal becomes final. He added:

"It is my sincere hope that the two-year period of notice of withdrawal laid down under the constitution will serve to resolve the issues and permit Poland, which was one of its founding members in 1919, to remain in the ILO."

Poland is the second communist country to pull out of the agency in the past three years. Vietnam left in 1982. The United States withdrew from the body in 1977 over the increased politicization of its debates, but rejoined in 1979.

In announcing the pullout, Poland raised the overworked objections of communist governments against the ILO's supervisory machinery and claimed that the complaint by western trade unions that sparked the ILO inquiry into its treatment of Solidarity was "politically inspired" and "unwarranted interference" in its internal affairs.

In a letter to Blanchard in September, the Polish government threatened to quit the ILO if the governing body took an "anti-Polish" decision on the commission of inquiry's report. The Soviet press took up the threat, implying in several articles that Moscow might follow Poland's example.

U.S. government and employer members of the governing body were, like the AFL-CIO's Brown, solidly behind the majority view that the panel would be shirking its responsibilities if it failed to follow established ILO procedures by formally receiving the report.

The vote to receive, or "take note of," the report was by a vote of 31 in favor, 10 against, and 12 abstentions.

Salvador ruling on death plotter called whitewash

"If the structure of the system must be changed and if that change requires an action on the part of the Legislative Assembly, then it is to that body that we would look for a legal remedy and justice."

The Reagan Administration had focused on the case as a test of the Salvadoran judicial system under the government of President Jose Napoleon Duarte. Death squads linked to El Salvador's military have been blamed for as many as 50,000 deaths in the country's five-year-old civil war.

While recognizing the desire of Duarte and the Administration to see justice done in the case, the AFL-CIO said it could not in good conscience suggest to U.S. citizens that they should continue to support military aid to a country whose judicial system repeatedly fails to punish terrorists.

"We understand the difficulties of those Salvadorans such as President Duarte who would reform their judicial system, but we will not ignore the resolution of the AFL-CIO convention which requires that justice be done in the Hammer-Pearlman-Viera murder case as a condition to our support of military aid," the federation said.

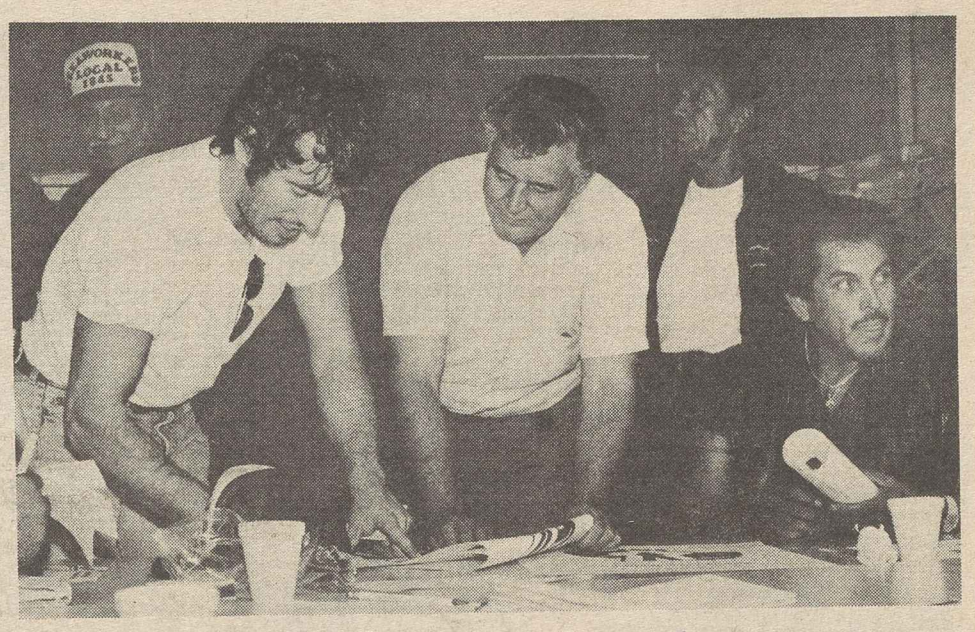
Conditional support

"This conditionality formed, as well, the basis for the support given by the AFL-CIO for the recommendation of the National Bipartisan Commission on Central America."

The State Dept. expressed dismay at the court decision. American investigators said that "substantial evidence exists against Lt. Lopez Sibrian," and that there was "no reasonable basis" for the ruling.

Sibrian is now on active duty in San Vicente province. A second officer linked to the case by the Guardsmen, Capt. Eduardo Alfonso Avila, was freed last March after spending three months in jail. He testified that he had "no knowledge" regarding the case.

Vice President George Bush had appealed for Avila's arrest during a visit to El Salvador last December.



Springsteen's helping hand

Rock star Bruce Springsteen, who donated $10,000 to Steelworkers Local 1845 food bank in Maywood, Calif., signs autographs at the local's hall. Thousands of USWA members have been unemployed since 1982 when Bethlehem Steel Corp. closed its Vernon plant. Springsteen also gave the Steelworkers a block of tickets for his concerts in Los Angeles and urged the audiences to donate to the food bank which helps feed more than 10,000 families.

Kawasaki anti-union deeds hit in world forum by UAW

Kawasaki Motor Corp.'s clear attempts to foil the Auto Workers' organizing drive at its Lincoln, Neb., motorcycle plant violate the Organization for Economic Cooperation & Development's code of conduct for multinational corporations, the UAW charged.

"Kawasaki's record of anti-union conduct in violation of American labor laws is absolutely shocking," UAW President Owen Bieber said. "Kawasaki is a corporation with a double standard: it accepts labor unions in Japan, but not in America."

The UAW complaint against Kawasaki went before the Paris meeting of the OECD's Committee on International Investment & Multinational Enterprises. The OECD is a 24-nation organization to which both the United States and Japan belong.

Thwarted drive

The UAW accused Kawasaki of discriminating against workers at the Lincoln plant prior to an October 1982 union representation election. Strong union supporters were fired, assigned to more difficult jobs, and disciplined more harshly than those who did not support the union, the union said.

The UAW asked the OECD committee to confirm that such actions violate the OECD's "Guidelines for Multinational Enterprises" issued in 1976, which require the multinational companies to "respect the right of their employees to be represented by trade unions" and to "discharge pay, promote, and train without discrimination."

The UAW filed the U.S. government documents with the OECD showing that top Kawasaki officials raised the threat that the company would close the Nebraska plant. In the three days prior to the union election, the company required workers to attend meetings during which they were told that costs were cheaper in Taiwan and Indonesia and that a decision was pending on whether to close the plant at the end of the year.

"Kawasaki's message was very clear," UAW Vice President Steve Yokich said. "They were threatening the workers that the Lincoln plant would close in two months if the workers exercised their legal right to unionize." Yokich directs the UAW's organizing department, which has assisted the Kawasaki workers' efforts to form a union.

The union pointed out that Kawasaki's plant closure threats conflict with the OECD guidelines that companies not "threaten to transfer an operating unit from a country in order to hinder the exercise of a right to organize." Kawasaki's actions also conflict with guidelines that would have multinational firms "provide reasonable notice of the closure involving dismissals," the UAW said.

Union-buster

Kawasaki hired as its labor relations adviser a union-busting firm — Alaniz, Bruckner & Sykes — well-known for counseling employers which seek to frustrate the legitimate organizing and collective bargaining activities of their workers.

The UAW also sought OECD clarification of a guideline that requires multinationals to "provide representatives of employees information which enables them to obtain a true and fair view of the performance of the enterprise as a whole."

Most of Kawasaki's 50,000-plus workers around the world are represented by unions and have an ongoing and apparently satisfactory relationship with the company, UAW Region 4 Director William Stewart said. "We think Kawasaki has an obligation to inform its workers about its positive relationship with unions elsewhere, instead of telling them they couldn't stay open under 'a restrictive UAW contract.' "

The UAW's action against Kawasaki formally requests interpretation of specific provisions on employment and industrial relations in the guidelines for multinational enterprises. It was submitted by the Trade Union Advisory Committee (TUAC) to illustrate the problems arising under the guidelines. TUAC is an advisory body to the OECD representing labor interests.

The UAW's efforts to clarify the guidelines are supported by the AFL-CIO and by the International Metalworkers' Federation, which actively participate in TUAC efforts to represent labor's views to OECD.

Pay equity concept 'looney' to rights panel chairman

same day federal court briefs were to be filed in the historic Washington State comparable worth case.

McEntee challenged the contention that "market forces" will close the "wage gap" for working women in the face of "overwhelming evidence that sex-based wage discrimination exists."

The courts are acting, he said, because employers have not.

Appearing on the ABC television program, McEntee stressed that pay equity studies compare jobs "within the employers' family" and would in no way "upset the market place."

In the landmark Washington case won by AFSCME last year, a federal judge found the state guilty of sex-based wage bias against some 15,000 of its female employees and ordered pay raises. The State appealed the ruling.

The AFL-CIO filed briefs in the U.S. 9th Circuit Court of Appeals in San Francisco supporting AFSCME. Also filing were the NAACP Legal Defense Fund, the National Organization for Women, the National Center for Economic Alternatives, a coalition represented by the National Committee for Pay Equity and the National Education Association.

Service Employees President John J. Sweeney in a statement pointed out that the same kind of predictions about the "cost" and "disruptions" of pay equity are now coming out of the Reagan White House and its appointees as were heard years ago about the eight-hour work day, the minimum wage and "every other worker reform."

The SEIU also announced that its affiliate, the California State Employee Association, filed suit in federal district court Nov. 21 charging the state with sex-based wage discrimination. At least 35,000 women state employees could be affected by the decision.

Senate membership in 99th Congress

These are the senators who will serve in the 99th Congress, which convenes in January. The post-election party breakdown is 53 Republicans and 47 Democrats, a net gain of two Democrats from the outgoing Congress.

The 26 re-elected this year have an asterisk after their name. The seven new senators are indicated by the dagger † symbol.*

College fund

Organized labor's participation in the United Negro College Fund telethon is discussed by AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and UNCF President Christopher F. Edley at a reception for unionists. Kirkland is labor chairman for a Dec. 29 telethon, the Lou Rawls Parade of Stars, to spur fund contributions.

Goals of social security law undercut by compromise

Political compromises in the Social Security Act of 1935 have resulted in "unfilled gaps, fragmentation, inefficiency, inadequate protection, and inequity" in the nation's basic law to protect the needy and the elderly, AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman charged in an appraisal of the legislation.

While enactment of the measure under Franklin Roosevelt was "a milestone in social legislation and a solid foundation for social progress," what passes for pragmatism "has caused us over and over again to miss the mark—to substitute illusions for reality," he told an anniversary conference sponsored by the National Capital Labor History Society and the Washington chapter of the Industrial Relations Research Association.

In the nearly 20 years that he has been a direct participant in the field, "I have seen little progress and much retrogression," Seidman said.

"Our penchant for categorical and means-tested programs have tended to make them tight-fisted, uncoordinated, and complex," he observed. By contrast, the predominant European approach brings the middle-class and the poor together in common social welfare programs with better administration and cost control.

In a look at the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Statistics 100 years since its founding, AFL-CIO Economist Markley Roberts said that the agency deserves credit for its continuing output of reliable, timely, and objective information.

"We get a lot from BLS, but we want more," he said, "especially in the area of wages and industrial relations, the information that is essential to both labor and management for informed and stable labor-management collective bargaining."

Roberts, who has been chairman the past 10 years of the BLS Labor Research Advisory Council, said, "We have seen what we consider a shift from emphasis on statistics relating to workers' welfare to an emphasis on statistics for economic policymaking."

As originally created, BLS was set up "to collect information upon the subject of labor, its relation to capital, the hours of labor and the earnings of laboring men and women and the means of promoting their material, social, intellectual, and moral prosperity."

Air Line Pilots restructure to face deregulated industry

Miami—The Air Line Pilots adopted major constitutional changes designed to strengthen the union's ability to represent its members in the deregulated airline industry.

The amendments voted on by the 300-member board of directors, which is the union's highest governing body, include restructuring of the ALPA policy-making authority, as well as changes in its financial structure and collective bargaining policies.

ALPA President Henry A. Duffy said the restructuring was necessary to deal with the "rapid and sweeping changes in our industry wrought by deregulation."

Duffy told the board that just as deregulation "radically" changed the airline industry, the union realized that "we can't compete in today's deregulated jet environment with an organization designed for regulation and propeller airplanes."

The union's streamlining of its operations and its increased financial strength will help ALPA meet its key contract goals, he said.

Duffy, who is a United Airlines captain, said that among "bottom line essentials" for ALPA contracts will be opposition to two-tiered wage scales and "predatory" agreements that undercut other airline pay scales.

Member protections

The union will also press for strong "scope" clauses that block airlines from setting up double-breasted non-union operations and for successorship rights for members, and protections to keep employers from ducking their responsibilities to pay pension costs.

Job security must be a "primary goal" as important as wages, work rules and pensions, Duffy stressed.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue told the ALPA board that the union gives "great strength and support to the concept of professionals in unions."

ALPA is a "good model" he said, for unions that today need to function both as unions in the area of bargaining, representation and legislative action, and as professional associations that deal with the unique concerns of members, such as air safety.

Donahue pledged that the AFL-CIO and its affiliates will continue their strong support of the union's 14-month-old strike against Continental Airlines.

The constitutional amendments will:

- Give the ALPA president increased role in negotiations of contracts with each carrier, including additional participation in the process of accepting agreements.
- Shift some powers from the board of directors to the ALPA executive council, which consists of representatives of its 47 master executive councils for each air carrier. The council will now have authority to amend the union's constitution and bylaws.

New dues formula

- Change the formula for apportioning dues between the master executive councils and the national office. Now 64 percent of dues collected will go to the national office, up from 62 percent. In addition to the 29 percent to be kept by the councils, 7 percent will continue to be paid into a reserve fund.

The board also endorsed the purchase of a new headquarters building near Washington's Dulles Airport and ALPA will sell limited partnerships in its existing headquarters in Washington to members.

In October, the union's members voted by a substantial margin to continue the strike against Continental and to finance court battles and strike benefits through a special assessment.

The board elected Charles J. Pierce to his second term as secretary, and John J. Magee, to his sixth term as treasurer. Both ran unopposed.

Duffy, who is serving a four-year term, was not up for election this year.

Stanley Ballard dies, past Musicians officer

Pompano Beach, Fla.—Stanley Ballard, secretary-treasurer emeritus of the Musicians, died at his home here on Nov. 11. He was 79.

Ballard held international and local offices for more than 40 years, starting with Local 773 in Mitchell, S.D. He was elected to the AFM executive board in 1950, secretary in 1959, and secretary-treasurer in 1965. He retired in 1975.

He also served as treasurer of the AFL-CIO Dept. for Professional Employees.

Scrooge Revisited

WHERE HAS all the indignation gone? Is it somehow less outrageous that the Administration is considering taxing the unemployment benefits of the poorest segment of the workforce on the eve of Thanksgiving this year than it was two years ago?

Then as now, there were newspaper reports that Administration officials were considering asking Congress to make recipients in all income brackets pay taxes on any unemployment benefits they receive.

The law, then and now, excludes jobless benefits from taxation only for individuals with total annual incomes of less than $12,000 and for couples filing joint returns with incomes under $18,000. And that's counting unemployment benefits received as part of income.

In the 1982 episode, a White House spokesman explained that the intent was to make unemployment "less attractive" and spur more people to "seek jobs." This was in the depths of the Reagan recession, when the unemployment rate was 10.8 percent.

Not surprising, a lot of people and even some editorial writers thought that was about as Scroogelike as you can get—and they said so. The wave of indignation reached all the way to Santa Barbara, Calif., where the President was spending the Thanksgiving holiday.

The word came quickly back. Not to worry. The proposal had been deep-sixed. And besides, it was just something that was being talked about. It hadn't been approved, and now it wouldn't be.

BUT SOME proposals have more lives than a cat. Thus, the Baltimore Sun lists tax change proposals that are "high on the Administration's list." The second item listed reads, "Fully taxing unemployment insurance benefits, which are now taxed for those with adjusted gross income of $12,000 or more."

There's no more talk of prodding the unemployed to get off their duff and look for a job. Now the buzz phrase is "tax simplification."

In 1982, the AFL-CIO denounced the proposal to shortchange low-income persons on their unemployment compensation as "callous and unfair."

It still is.

Test of Purity

NO ONE would ever confuse the Committee for the Survival of a Free Congress with the League of Women Voters or any other non-partisan good government group.

It stands in the far right wing of American politics and does a notable job of raising funds for candidates and causes that meet a rigid test of ideological purity.

That's why it is so dismaying that the White House in effect invited such an organization to screen the persons under consideration for appointment to President Reagan's Cabinet.

The job that is opening up is Secretary of Education. The man who now holds it, T. H. Bell, is resigning at the end of December and true-blue Reaganites are pleased. Mr. Bell, it seems, turned out to be less hostile to the mission of the department he heads than had been anticipated. He sometimes appeared more concerned about excellence in education than opportunities for school prayer.

With no apparent qualms, the White House turned over its "small list" to the right-wing group and the persons being considered dutifully presented themselves for the screening interview.

DURING THE PRESIDENTIAL campaign, Mr. Reagan brushed off as nonsense any suggestion that his Supreme Court appointees might have to gain the approval of the Moral Majority's Rev. Jerry Falwell.

If the screening of a Secretary of Education is any precedent, the notion doesn't appear all that far-feched.

Fortunately there is another screening body whose approval is necessary—the Senate of the United States. The Senate's confirmation power is an essential element of the checks and balances that make up the American political system.

Now more than ever, such a check is essential.

Bishops focus attention on need to aid the poor

By Press Associates, Inc.

"Labor is prior to, and independent of, capital. Capital is the first fruit of labor, and could never have existed if labor had not first existed."—Abraham Lincoln, 1859.

"We must emphasize and give prominence to the primacy of man in the production process, the primacy of man over things. . . ."—Pope John Paul II, 1981.

The philosophy expressed by Lincoln, Pope John Paul II and earlier popes, and by other religious and political leaders has been heard ever since the rise of the industrial age.

The National Conference of Catholic Bishops, in releasing the draft of a 120-page pastoral letter on the U.S. economy, has ignited a debate that may reverberate for years to come.

Every perspective on economic life, the bishops said, must be shaped by the questions, "What does the economy do for people? What does it do to people?" The fundamental test for economic decisions, policies and institutions, the bishops added, is that "they must be at the service of human beings. The economy was made for all people, and not the other way around."

"The poor have a special claim on our concern because they are vulnerable and needy," the bishops' statement said, adding: "We believe that all—Christians, Jews, those of other faiths or no faith at all—must measure their actions and choices by what they do for and to the poor."

Poverty rate

The bishops noted that the poverty rate rose sharply to 15.2 percent of the U.S. population in 1983, leaving 35-million Americans below the government's poverty line. Another 20 to 30 million also were needy by reasonable standards.

"The fact that so many people are poor in a nation as wealthy as ours is a social and moral scandal that must not be ignored," said the statement.

In discussing the rights and responsibilities of various groups, the bishops defended the right of workers to organize and bargain as necessary for human dignity. They expressed support of labor law reform "to give greater substance to the right to organize, to prevent intimidation of workers, and to provide remedies" in unfair labor practices.

On shaping the economy, the bishops proposed "a new American experiment" which would involve cooperative ownership and worker participation in ownership and decision-making. At the local, regional and national levels, they proposed that government, business, labor and other groups cooperate in formulating policies and goals.

Three-year effort

The bishops' pastoral letter, three years in the drafting, is based on consultations with more than 100 experts in business, economics and theology. It is subject to revisions and will be voted on by the nation's 300 bishops at their November 1985 meeting.

The bishops' letter, released a few days after the Nov. 6 presidential election, stands as a searing indictment of the Reagan Administration's record. There is ample documentation by independent analysts of the impact of President Reagan's tax cuts and budget cuts in making the rich richer and the poor poorer. The deep recession, the savaging of the disabled and the attacks on unions were other low points of the Reagan era.

The bishops' letter is especially timely as Reagan embarks on his second term and the 99th Congress prepares to consider tax, budget and foreign policies.

As Rabbi Alexander Schindler, president of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations, said in praising the draft document: "We welcome the bishops' statement because it comes at a time when a broad concern for the poor, the old and the sick has been replaced by the narrow question, 'Are you better off?' The bishops have reminded us that this is the wrong question."

MEMO FROM COPE

Despite Runaway, One Vote Still Counts

When a candidate bags the Big One by 16 million-plus votes, it's a waste of time to tell him one vote counts.

So, President Reagan, if you're reading this, forget it.

But the rest of you, pay heed.

Because a lot of elections really are settled by just a handful of votes, and 1984 had its share of them. In fact, 37 races for the U.S. House and Senate, and for governor, were won by 52 percent or less of the total vote, and 25 of these were taken by 51 percent or less.

In one congressional race, the apparent winner edged in by a 67-vote margin. In another, 73 votes made the difference. And in still another, 286.

Below, the stories of some of the cliff-hangers (some subject to change by pending recounts).

All For 67 Votes

Although the U.S. House has no precise counterpart to Sen. Jesse Helms (R-N.C.)—what legislative body has?—Rep. George Hansen (R-Idaho) comes as close as anyone. He has trouble keeping his nose out of a lot of things. He is both a leader of and a supporter of the ultra-conservative movement and readily lends his name to its fund-raisers.

Problem is, he ran afoul of the law. The seven-term House member campaigned for re-election carrying the burden of a felony conviction for filing false campaign statements.

Final unofficial returns showed enough voters in his district were offended by his law-breaking, or his record, or his attachment to the ultra-right to put the heretofore shoo-in Hansen on the short end of a 101,099 to 101,032 vote count.

Hansen lost to Democrat Richard Stallings by just 67 votes out of 201,131 votes cast.

If enough of the 67-vote edge holds through a recount, right-wingers will lose one of their closest friends in Congress, and the campaign to wipe out federal job safety and health laws will lose its national leader.

Also gone will be Hansen's 93 percent "wrong" AFL-CIO voting record, built on 183 "wrong" and only 13 "right" votes in 14 years in the House.

All that for 67 votes. Not bad.

One vote counts!

In Indiana .016 Is the Difference

Rep. Frank McCloskey (D-Ind.) was targeted by the Republicans and by right-wing political committees. The first-term Representative had the nerve to run up a 90 percent "right" labor voting record.

The GOP figured it could get the 8th District seat back.

But when the dust settled, out of a total of 233,613 votes cast, McCloskey had hung in there by 73. votes.

In percentage terms, he won with 50.016 percent of the vote.

One vote, and .016, count!

To Non-Voters: Next Time, Try It... You'll Like It

The following was written by John Greenleaf Whittier. It is titled "The Poor Voter on Election Day."

The proudest now is but my peer,
The highest not more high;
Today, of all the weary year,
A king of men am I!
While there's a right to need my vote,
A wrong to sweep away,
Up, clouted knee and ragged coat,
A man's a man today!

Kunin Wins by 3,691 ...or Is It by 62?

Is it possible to win the same election by two different totals?

Of course not, you say? Well, you're wrong.

Madeleine Kunin knows you can. She's the newly elected Democratic governor of Vermont.

She won by only 3,691 out of 227,309 votes cast—115,150 to 111,809.

Then again, she won by only 62 votes.

Explain, please.

It's this way: Though she topped her Republican opponent by 3,691, two minor party candidates in the race got enough votes to hold Kunin to only 62 votes above 50 percent of the total cast.

Vermont law says if no candidates gets 50 percent or over, the winner will be decided by the state legislature. And there's no telling what might have happened there.

Governor-elect Kunin knows it: One vote counts!

Where Were Voters?

Final figures are not in, but the anticipated vast increase in voter turn-out failed to materialize on Nov. 6.

Estimates place the total vote between 92 and 92.5 million, or between 52.8 and 53.1 of the voting-age population.

Though this was slightly above the 52.6 percent vote in 1980, it hardly approached the 55-plus percent anticipated early in the campaign.

In fact, there was a sharp fall-off in the percentage of registered citizens who made it to the polls, turned off from voting, perhaps by the surveys that showed lopsided projected margins in the presidential race in the weeks leading up to Nov. 6.

A preliminary study by a group that follows electoral patterns found turnout of registered voters slumped from the 75.2 percent of 1980 to 72.4 percent this year.

61,537 Sounds Big... But 50-49% Doesn't

Despite the fact he represented a fairly conservative district, Democratic Rep. Paul Simon stuck with working people and needy Americans throughout his House career. He scored 83 percent "right" on the AFL-CIO voting record.

GOP Sen. Charles Percy, on the other hand, had shifted drastically from the record of a moderate Republican to one more than 80 percent "wrong" in the past three sessions of Congress.

His problem was that no matter how hard he tried to court the ultra-conservatives, Percy simply couldn't get their support. Indeed, rightist PACs campaigned for a third party candidate, a Libertarian who got 58,120 votes.

Percy lost by just a few thousand more than that. The count for Simon was 2,334,580 to 2,273,043—61,537 votes. It sounds like a big margin, but actually Simon made it in with 50 percent to Percy's 49.

One vote counts!

Sorry, 'Tails' It Is

Sheriff Thomas Lambeth of Topeka, Kan., called it wrong. As a result, he lost his badge.

Lambeth, who thought he won re-election in Nov. 6 balloting by three votes, found after a recount that he was knotted in a 759-759 tie.

Under state law, County Commissioner John Helfich settled matters by flipping a coin. Lambeth got to call it, picked "heads," watched the coin turn up "tails," and take away his job.

Meanwhile, Helfich might wind up with "flipper's thumb," the election tie-breakers equivalent of tennis elbow. It's the second time in just a few months that he had to make the toss to break a tie at the polls.

Okay, So Two Votes Count!

Back in June, Elaine LaCroix, a labor-endorsed candidate for the Maine state legislature, was working the polls primary election day, greeting voters as they approached.

A man and woman came up to her and introduced themselves. They said they were responding to a message from the state AFL-CIO urging them to get out and vote for LaCroix.

As they left the polls, they waved and gave her the "V for Victory" sign.

When the count was completed, LaCroix came out exactly two votes ahead—169 to 167.

On Nov. 6, the same couple repeated the ritual. This time, LaCroix won with a lot more room to spare—50 votes, 1,648 to 1,598. But she remembers: Two Votes Count!

North Carolinians Know One Vote Counts

Certainly citizens of North Carolina got the message that one vote counts. Winners in six of the state's 11 U.S. House contests made it in with no room to spare.

Five House races were settled by margins of 51-49 percent, and one was practically deadlocked at 50-50. That was for the 9th District seat vacated by James Martin (R).

In that one, Democrat D. G. Martin (no relation to James) lost to Alex McMillan, 109,258 to 108,792. That's 286 votes out of 218,230 cast.

Republicans captured three Democratic seats by a thin edge, respectively William Cobey over Ike Andrews by 2,270 out of 221,226 votes cast, Howard Cable over Robin Britt by 3,851 out of 203,973, and William Hendon over James Clarke by 4,178 out of 219,834.

Thus, Democrats lost three incumbents by a total of 10,299 votes out of 645,033 votes cast.

However, they hung on to two seats by narrow margins—Stephen Neal over Stuart Epperson by 3,682 out of 209,922 and Bill Hefner over Harris Blake by 4,003 votes out of 195,629. Combined, the winning Democratic margin was 7,685 out of 405,551.

If you want to go one step further with the numbers, the six seats mentioned were settled by a combined total of 18,270 out of 1,268,814.

Does one vote count? If you're not sure, ask the folks in North Carolina.

Economic dip points toward new job loss

A further decline in the government's index of leading economic indicators threatens a rise in unemployment in the months ahead, the AFL-CIO warned.

"The economy is already very soft and plagued by basic problems," Federation Research Director Rudy Oswald noted.

"Workers' earnings lag, hours of work are declining, high real interest rates continue to squeeze housing and consumer sales, and high imports continue to displace American production," Oswald said.

"These factors foreshadow a bleak 1985 for many workers."

The economic index for October was down a sizable seven-tenths of 1 percent, the third decline in five months. Since May, there has been a cumulative decline of 2.8 percent in the index.

The last three recessions were all preceded by less deterioration in the index.

Negative indicators

Seven of the 10 available indicators were negative, led by an increase in new claims for unemployment compensation. Besides worsening jobless insurance claims, the negative indicators were a slowdown in vendor deliveries, fewer orders for factory equipment, a shorter average work week, a decline in stock prices, lower building permits, and weakened orders for consumer goods.

On the positive side were indicators showing raw materials prices going up, an expansion in the money supply, and a pickup in the formation of new businesses.

The index was up six-tenths of 1 percent in September and up a scant one-tenth of 1 percent in August. But it fell 1.8 percent in July and 1 percent in June.

Another sign of weakness in the economy appeared in a Commerce Dept. report that orders to factories for big-ticket durable goods declined a sharp 4.1 percent in October.

Commerce Sec. Malcolm Baldrige said the decline—the steepest since April—amounted to "paying the piper" for the high-valued dollar.

Because of the dollar's overvaluation, U.S. goods are made costlier for foreigners to buy while foreign goods become cheaper for Americans to buy.

Increasingly, orders are being placed overseas, with the result that leakage from the domestic economy is becoming very large. The October drop was the largest since a 6.5-percent decline in April.

Productivity drop

In another report on the economy, the Labor Dept. said that productivity declined seven-tenths of 1 percent from July through September. It was the first actual decline in productivity since the second quarter of 1982.

Meanwhile, the Federal Reserve Board cut its discount rate to 8.5 percent, from 9 percent. The discount rate is the interest charged by the central bank on loans to financial institutions.

Analysts viewed the reduction as a sign that the Fed planned to loosen up the money supply in an effort to stimulate the sluggish economy.

Several large banks subsequently cut their prime lending rates to 11.5 percent, from 11.75 percent.

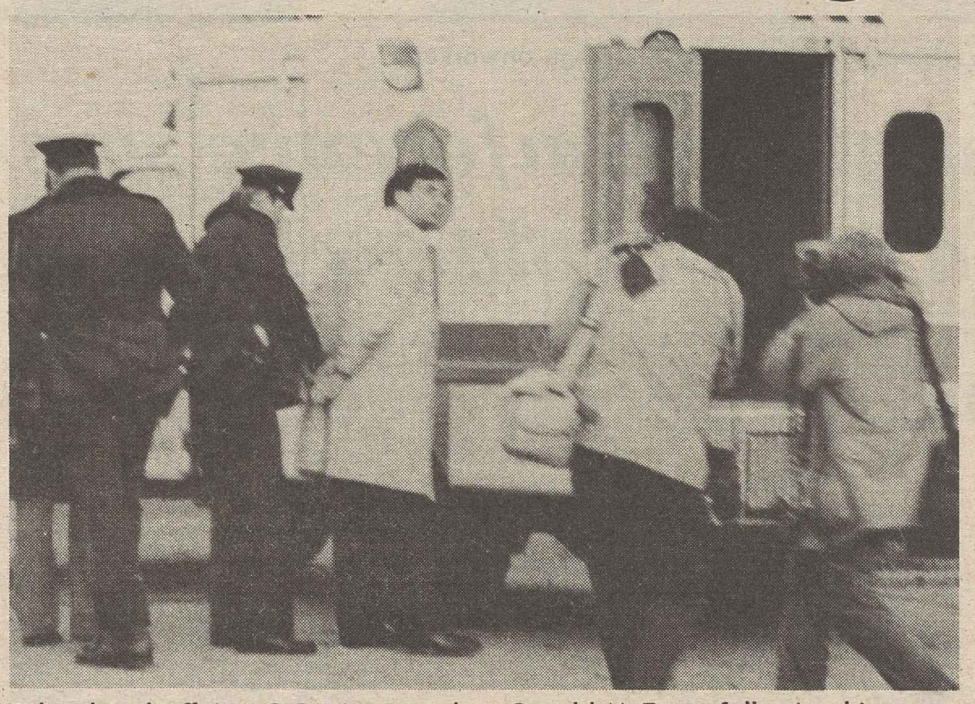
'Simplified tax' proposal threatens fringe benefits



Police handcuff AFL-CIO Vice President Gerald McEntee following his arrest at a South African embassy protest in Washington.

Sanctions sought to fight South Africa oppression

By James M. Shevis

Unless the government of South Africa releases the 13 black unionists and other black leaders arrested while fighting for basic human rights, the United States should invoke stiff economic sanctions and sever all social, cultural, and diplomatic ties with that nation, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland declared.

A letter setting forth the federation's position was personally delivered by Kirkland to Secretary of State George P. Shultz as protest demonstrations continued at the South African embassy in Washington. AFL-CIO union officials joined civil rights leaders and members of Congress led by D.C. Delegate Walter Fauntroy in the demonstrations, and a number were arrested for carrying the protest inside the embassy.

Call for action

Kirkland's letter called on the Administration to press South Africa to enter a serious dialogue with its black citizens. If that doesn't work, he said, the Administration should take action of the sort recommended by the AFL-CIO in its May 1980 congressional testimony.

The federation at that time told the House Foreign Affairs subcommittee on Africa that the United States could help the South African government solve its problems peacefully if it had the desire and the will to do so, "but we should not in any way provide it with political, economic or moral support to sustain its racist policies."

If South Africa should fail to respond to U.S. efforts to help it alleviate the social and economic oppression which is holding back its black population, the AFL-CIO said, "our government should undertake more severe action beginning with a progressively selective ban on the importation of South African products" and, if necessary, even stronger measures.

The embassy protests in Washington began on Nov. 21 as an expression of American outrage over South Africa's brutal crackdown on black political organizations and labor unions.

Among those arrested under a South African security law that provides for indefinite detention in solitary confinement without charges were Chris Dlamini, president of the 150,000-member Federatiin of South African Trade Unions, and Piroshaw Camay, general secretary of the Council of Unions of South Africa.

Also detained were Moses Mayagiso, Transvaal secretary of the Metal & Allied Workers; Jethro Dlalisa, branch chairman of the Transport & General Workers, and Themba Nonlatane of the Municipal & General Workers.

In nonviolent demonstrations reminiscent of the 1960s civil rights tactics in the South, prominent Americans were arrested, handcuffed, and in some instances jailed for refusing to leave the South African embassy until their anti-apartheid protests were heard.

Among those arrested by police in the first week were AFL-CIO Vice President Gerald McEntee, head of the State, County & Municipal Employees; Auto Workers Vice President Marc Stepp;

Kirkland says plan neglects nation's needs

By David L. Perlman

The Treasury Dept.'s "tax simplification" proposal is unfair to workers and shortchanges the nation's needs, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland charged.

It wouldn't do anything to reduce the federal deficit because the proposed tax increases and decreases balance out. But in the reshuffle, many workers would end up paying more in taxes even though tax rates would be reduced and personal exemptions raised.

Kirkland pointed to the proposed taxation of "important fringe benefits" provided by employers.

Besides the taxation of health insurance benefits above minimal levels, which President Reagan proposed last year, the Treasury proposal calls for taxing workers on the value of employer-provided life insurance, education benefits and group legal services.

Low-income persons would be taxed for the first time on their unemployment benefits and injured workers would have to pay taxes on workers' compensation. For those who itemize deductions, state and local taxes would no longer be deductions from taxable income and neither would most charitable contributions and union dues.

Ups and downs

Single-parent households and families where both parents are employed would no longer receive a tax credit for child care expenses. But an affluent couple with one income would be able to put aside $5,000 a year of tax-exempt savings into an IRA (individual retirement account). Under present law, the maximum would be $2,250.

Small contributors to political campaigns or political funds such as COPE would no longer be eligible for a tax credit.

On the business side, the corporate tax rate would be dropped but a variety of tax changes — including some loophole closings urged by the AFL-CIO — would result in higher total tax payments from the corporate sector.

The corporate reforms will be targets

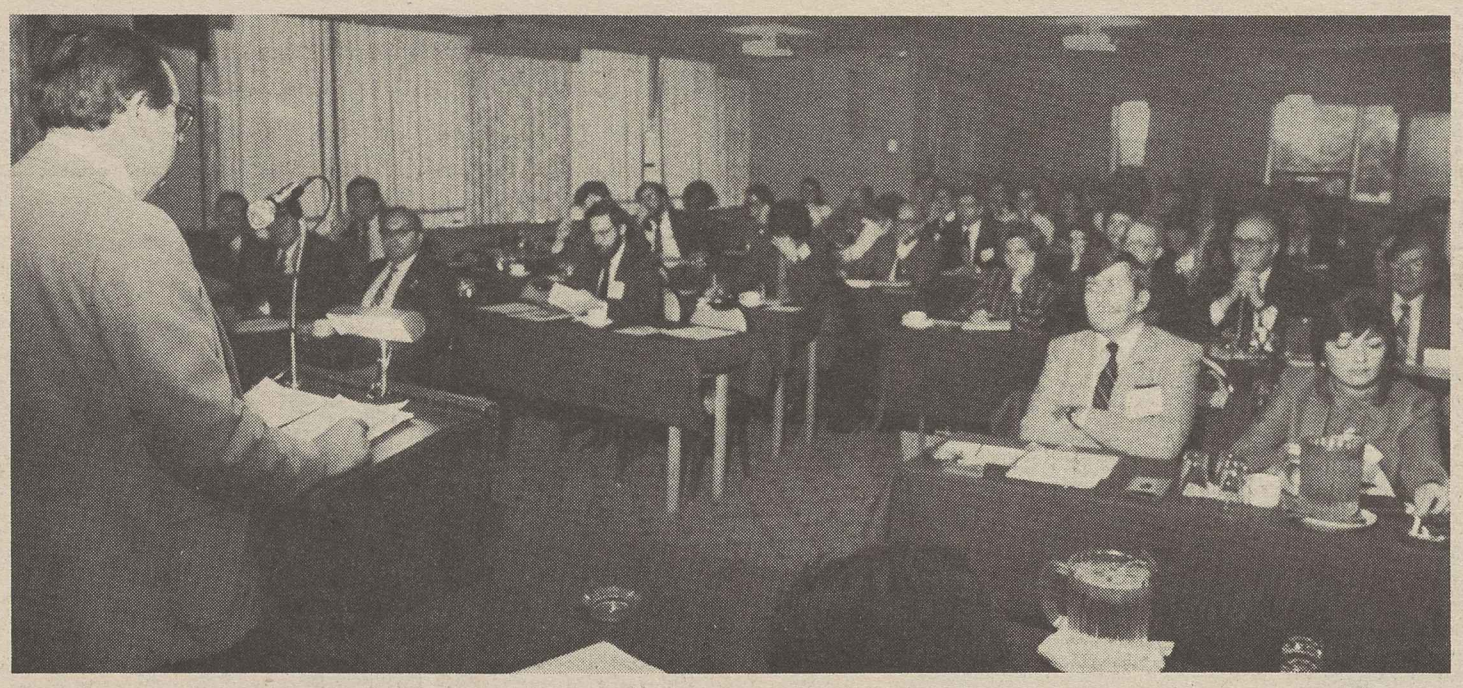
The union vote

Democratic presidential candidate Walter F. Mondale won a landslide 61-39 percent margin of the vote among members of AFL-CIO unions, two post-election polls found.

The polls, based on a scientific 50-state sampling, also found that most union members who voted for President Reagan disagreed with many of the policies associated with his Administration. Like those who voted for Mondale, they strongly opposed job-destroying imports, weakening of job safety and health protections, taxing of fringe benefits and cuts in education and job training programs.

They also agreed overwhelmingly, including big majorities of union members who described themselves as independents and Republicans, that unions "speak up for working people."

A special Federationist center section beginning on Page 5 of this issue of the News contains a detailed analysis of the election-night surveys.



IUD Sec.-Treas. Elmer Chatak discusses impact of technological change on workers.

Office automation conference sees unions tested by workplace changes

New York — The revolution in the workplace brought on by technological change presents new challenges to unions in organizing and representing members.

Those were the findings of a conference on office automation here sponsored by the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. in cooperation with the Public Employee and Professional Employees Departments that drew 100 representatives from 14 unions.

IUD Sec.-Treas. Elmer Chatak told participants that with the changes in the nature of work, there has also been a "total revolution" in the workforce with the number of clerical employees leaping from 9 million to 19 million in the last 25 years. An estimated 23 million jobs—most held by women—will be considered clerical work by 1990, he said.

Government Employees President Kenneth T. Blaylock told the conference that the "redesign of work flow and required skills" will also touch workers. As office work is "deskilled" by automation and computerization, the gulf will widen between top level management and low-wage workers assigned to mostly routine kinds of jobs.

Blaylock said that although the number of office workers is growing, in many areas the introduction of sophisticated computers is leading to layoffs.

As an example, Blaylock pointed to the recent announcement by the Social Security Administration that employment in the government agency will be cut by 20,000 jobs over a period of time.

In bargaining, Blaylock said, unions can anticipate change by improvements in provisions covering retraining, safety and health, work reorganization and job security.

Office & Professional Employees President John Kelly warned that changes in the workplace open up 'the phenomenal potential for exploiting workers" as work at computer terminals becomes decentralized and may even be moved into the home.

National organizing

Kelly stressed the need for nationwide organizing drives directed at target companies to ensure that office workers are protected by patterns of adequate salaries, benefits and safe working conditions.

Karen Nussbaum, president of Service Employees District 925, pointed out that like manufacturing jobs, automated clerical jobs can be exported overseas or into "home sweatshops" where wage, hour, child labor and safety laws won't be enforced.

Professional & Technical Engineers President Rodney A. Bower, in an examination of health and safety hazards linked to video display terminals, called for full research into the potential hazards and the development of safety standards.

Conference participants agreed on the need for advance consultation between unions and management before sophisticated automated equipment is brought into the office.

The participants heard from experts on health and safety issues including physical strains and emotional stress hazards, and the as yet incompletely explored problem of radiation.

Greater research efforts and increased protections are also essential for pregnant clerical workers, the union representatives agreed.

Offices do not have to become "VDT sweatshops" if decent working conditions, proper physical protection, intelligent work design and preventive health care, such as periodic eye testing, are provided, the participants stressed.

Other speakers at the conference included David Eisen of the Newspaper Guild, David LeGrande of the Communications Workers, Louis Slesin, publisher of Microwave News, Barry Johnson of the National Institute for Occupational Safety & Health and Michael Smith of the University of Wisconsin.

IAM strikers win new pact at Dynamics

Fort Worth, Tex.—The Machinists approved a new three-year contract with General Dynamics Corp., ending a 17-day strike at the company's F-16 jet fighter plant here.

The agreement, which provides lump-sum bonuses of 4 percent in the first and second years and a 3-percent general wage increase in the final year, covers 6,400 workers. The third-year pay hike will be rolled into the base wage rate.

In addition, workers will continue to be covered by a cost-of-living adjustment provision. COL increases from the old agreement and any that might fall due under the new pact are folded into wage rates.

The contract also improved pension benefits and a number of other fringes. The vote in favor of accepting the agreement was 3,715 to 464, the union reported.

IAM members struck the company Nov. 5 after management proposed a contract inferior to other recent aerospace settlements, and demanded "givebacks" in some benefit areas.

UAW strike

IAM is the second union to strike General Dynamics in the past year and a half. The Auto Workers struck the corporation's Electric Boat Division in Groton, Conn., for 14 months before settling in August. Before that settlement, the company had been the target of a coordinated union campaign for its stubborn bargaining stance, safety violations and defense contract overcharges.

The firm enjoys huge profits, posting a record $286 million last year. Another record profit is projected for the current year.

The IAM contract increased monthly pension benefits from $14 times years of service to $16 in December and to $18 in August 1986.

Railroad retirement changes affect benefits, payroll tax

Active and retired railroad employees will see changes in the railroad retirement system in 1985, including a small increase in benefits and slight changes in their payroll taxes.

The changes announced by the Railroad Retirement Board will affect both the Tier I program, which is similar to social security, and Tier II, which is similar to an industrial pension plan. About 1 million persons now collect railroad retirement benefits.

Tier I benefits will increase by 3.5 percent and Tier II benefits by 1.1 percent based on the annual rise in the government's consumer price index. But the actual dollar amounts in recipients' checks will be smaller than the formula would normally yield since they are subject to a provision designed to bolster the program's stability.

The 1983 legislation that saved the railroad retirement system from economic disaster requires that a portion of the dollar amount of Tier I COLA be subtracted from Tier II benefits. The final portion of that offset occurs in 1985. The retirement board estimates that the average retiree will see about $11 more in the January check.

Under those 1983 changes, railroad retirement payroll taxes starting Jan. 1 will be calculated on annual rather than monthly income.

The board said the changeover will have "little or no effect" on workers earning $30,000 or less.

The maximum amount of an employees' wages subject to Tier I tax will be the same as the 1985 social security maximum of $39,600 a year. Maximum wages subject to Tier II tax will go to $29,700 a year.

Tax rates on workers and employers will go up in the Tier I program from the current 6.7 percent for workers and 7 percent for employers to 7.05 percent for each, the same as the social security rate.

The Tier II tax rate on workers will go from 2.75 percent to 3.50 percent, while for employers the rate will rise from 12.75 percent to 13.75 percent.

As in the social security system, workers paying higher taxes will be eligible for higher benefits.

Injury rate posts slight dip, but climbs in high-risk jobs

The overall rate of job-related injuries and illnesses declined slightly in 1983. However, in the high-hazard industries targeted by the Occupational Safety & Health Administration, the rate of injuries and illnesses increased last year.

The Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Statistics said 7.6 injuries and illnesses occurred per 100 full-time workers in 1983, compared with 7.7 in 1982. The incidence rate for injuries and illnesses resulting in lost workdays and the number of lost workdays per 100 full-time workers also remained about the same.

OSHA Administrator Robert A. Rowland credited Administration policies for what he called a "gratifying" report.

However, AFL-CIO job safety specialist Margaret Seminario called Rowland's remarks a "whitewash."

Seminario said the BLS report showed significant increases in injury rates in basic industries such as construction and in many of the most hazardous manufacturing industries, where the Administration has made major policy changes.

Contrast

The trends shown in the BLS report are "disturbing," Seminario said, especially compared to significant injury rate declines in all sectors during the final years of the Carter Administration. "It raises serious concerns," she said, because, "with the continuation of non-enforcement, weakened standards, and with OSHA no longer posing any threat to employers, conditions will continue to deteriorate."

The annual report is based on a BLS survey of about 280,000 employers. More than 5 million workplaces come under federal job safety law enforcement.

The highest injury rate was 18.1 per 100 workers in the lumber and wood products industry, up from 16.6 a year earlier. That industry was one of three in the durable goods manufacturing segment to post increases in injury rates. The rate in the furniture and fixtures industry rose from 13.6 in 1982 to 13.8 in 1983, while the stone, clay and glass products industries rate in 1983 was 12.8, up from 12.6 a year earlier.

Higher rates

The overall wholesale and retail trade segments posted an increase in injury rates, rising from 7.1 to 7.2. Agricultural production increased from 12.7 to 13.1.

The construction industry registered a 14.7 rate, up from 14.5 in 1982.

The overall manufacturing rate for illnesses and injuries was 10, down from 10.2 in 1982; transportation and public utilities' rate declined in 1983 to 8.2 from 8.5 in 1982.

Illnesses and injuries in the service industry rose to 5.1 from 4.9, while the rate for the finance, insurance and real estate industries remained at 2 per 100 workers.

In the mining industry, the rate dropped from 10.3 to 8.3 cases per 100 workers. This, however, mirrors the decline in employment from the 1982 to 1983 period when overall employment in mining dropped from 1,143,000 jobs to 957,000.

The BLS recorded 106,000 job-related illnesses in 1983, compared with 105,600 in 1982. Three out of five of the illnesses were skin diseases and disorders associated with repeated trauma, such as noise-induced hearing loss and other conditions due to repeated motion, pressure or vibration. The survey counts only new acute cases of illness, not chronic or long-latent job illnesses, like cancer.

Door company learns union-busting strategy doesn't really pay off

Everett, Wash.—The E. A. Nord Co., once known for its high-quality doors, is finding that you can't really depend on professional union-busters in key management jobs to get rid of a union.

The third-generation owner of a family-held firm replaced Nord's previous management team with alumni of a firm of union-busting consultants, and the next step was predictable.

Management insisted on givebacks in pay and benefits, but adamantly refused to document its need for concessions by letting the union see its books. When workers struck in July 1983, the company scoured the unemployment lines of seven western states to keep operations going behind the picket line.

But after more than 16 months, it hasn't broken the union and only about 30 of more than 600 original strikers have returned to work.

Local 1054, a Carpenters affiliate through the Western Council of the Lumber, Production & Industrial Workers, is still maintaining around-the-clock picket lines.

Union award

In November, the union won an arbitration based on flagrant pre-strike contract violation by management. The award, still being determined, will result in substantial payments to several hundred members who were on layoff when the company secretly funneled bargaining-unit work to a low-wage, non-union operation.

Furthermore, Nord management stumbled badly in its effort to get the union decertified through the votes of strikebreakers. The decertification election, held last July, brought an inconclusive and clearly tainted 433 votes for decertification, 360 votes to retain the union and 403 votes challenged by one or the other side.

The NLRB has issued an unfair labor practice complaint, alleging "coercive" conduct by management—including promises of "no layoffs" if the union was decertified and warnings of job losses if the union was retained. The complaint and the election challenges will be argued before an NLRB administrative law judge in mid-January.

Adding to the case against the company was its abrupt dismissal of a large group of strikebreakers—between 170 and 200 by newspaper estimates — the week after the election.

A news story in the Everett Herald quotes angry, fired workers as charging that the company deliberately concealed its plans for a cutback until after the election, counting on the strikebreakers who were working to vote against the union.

"I think they wanted more people inside than outside—just to pad the election," one strikebreaker told the reporter.

"We were used as pawns," another said. "They told us the day before the vote there would be no layoffs," a strikebreaker was quoted.

Everett Herald reporters described the scene as the fired workers left the plant, "escorted" out by security guards.

They had been regularly taunted by the strikers during the months they crossed the picket line, he noted. But now, he reported, "for the first time many yelled encouragements to the pickets." Some of the quotes:

"You guys were right. . . . Now, we know. . . . You guys know how they are."

Local 1054 Business Agent Frank Dennee said the background to the arbitration case reflects the attitude of the E. A. Nord management before the strike.

In February 1983, six months before the contract expired, the company opened a facility in Kent, Wash., where it performed door patching and related work.

"This facility was kept secret from the union, and management officials actively misled union members about its existence," Dennee said.

In May of that year, he said, three union members followed a truck and discovered the facility in full operation while almost 200 union members in Everett were on layoff. The non-union work crew was being paid at rates between $4.50 and $5 an hour for work that under contract should have been performed by union members. And to top it off, the union label was being put on products coming out of the non-union facility.

Arbitration award

Last month's arbitration award directed the company to pay back wages to all union members who were displaced by the transfer of work to the non-union facility.

The E. A. Nord strike is not directly related to the Louisiana-Pacific Corp. strike, also involving the Western Council as well as units of the Woodworkers.

The preamble to the Nord strike was the hiring of the union-busting management team. The company attorney and chief negotiator, Fred Long, was the founder and head of the West Coast Industrial Relations Association, which has been the subject of congressional hearings on the role of management consultants.

His contract "proposal," Local 1054 reported, included wage reductions of up to 40 percent, elimination of bonus pay, dropping of four holidays, curtailment of pension and health-welfare benefits and a dismantling of the seniority system.

New NBC accord boosts wages 30%

The Broadcast Employees & Technicians ratified a new contract with the National Broadcasting Co., providing pay gains totaling about 30 percent over four years for 3,000 workers in 18 separate units.

NABET members approved the agreement by better than a 2-to-1 ratio, NABET President Edward M. Lynch said. It is retroactive to Apr. 1, 1983, when the old contract expired.

Under the new contract, Lynch said, NBC will raise the pay of the engineers, the largest NABET unit at NBC, by $50 weekly in each year of the agreement. Based on the previous contract rates, the engineers' scale will go up nearly 9 percent the first year, sliding down to just under 7 percent in the fourth year of the pact. Newswriters will receive a comparable percentage increase in pay.

A company-paid dental plan was added to the package for the first time, while the union retained its fully paid medical and life insurance. The agreement also contains some jurisdictional changes, Lynch said.

Workers covered by the contract are located in New York, Los Angeles, Washington, Chicago, San Francisco and Cleveland.

Bankruptcy ploy foiled

Cleveland—A federal bankruptcy court ruled that Wright Air Lines cannot abrogate its union contracts while undergoing reorganization.

In a Nov. 13 decision, the court denied the commuter line's request for immediate, interim relief from its agreement with the Air Line Pilots. ALPA represented about 110 Wright pilots at the time of the bankruptcy filing in September.

In turning down the request for interim relief, the court cited the bankruptcy law revisions enacted by Congress in June. The new provisions make it more difficult for a company to escape its labor agreement obligations while it is in bankruptcy proceedings.

The court held that Wright failed to show that "the relief sought is essential to the continuation of its business or that irreparable damage to the debtor-in-possession will result if the relief is not granted."

The bankruptcy law reforms were passed in the wake of the Supreme Court's Bildisco decision and the ongoing Continental Airlines strike. The Bildisco decision allowed management to unilaterally abrogate a labor contract without a judge's ruling. Continental filed for bankruptcy, then immediately and unilaterally abrogated its labor contracts, firing two-thirds of its workers and resuming operations with drastic cuts in pay scales and working conditions.

Wright, which is based in Cleveland, had just completed negotiations and was about to sign a new two-year agreement when it filed for Chapter 11 reorganization bankruptcy. The carrier is still operating.

'Tax simplification' proposal targets workplace benefits of heavy industry lobbying, and the political consensus was that it would take active presidential support to get them enacted.

But the White House quickly put a long arm's length between President Reagan and Treasury Sec. Donald T. Regan, the principal author of the tax package.

The President had directed the Treasury to come up with a "revenue-neutral" tax package, stressing "simplification" of the tax code.

When the package was formally unveiled, after its principal provisions had already been widely reported, the White House issued a statement from the President saying he realized the proposal would "generate much debate." Reagan promised that he would "personally" review the plan and consider public and congressional reaction before proposing any legislation to Congress.

The reaction from influential members of Congress from both parties was markedly unenthusiastic.

A restructuring of the tax system "will demand enormous political leadership from the White House," House Ways & Means Committee Chairman Dan Rostenkowski said.

"The deficit is probably our most urgent priority," the newly-elected Senate Republican leader, Bob Dole, said.

There was a consensus that the final version of any tax simplification legislation that cleared Congress and became law would differ significantly from the original Treasury proposal. As AFL-CIO Research Director Rudy Oswald saw it, any changes made by the White House as a result of adverse reaction would more likely result in restoring loopholes for business rather than elimination of inequities for workers.

On the plus side, Oswald said, the Treasury report did tilt — although not very strongly — against a value-added tax or some other form of a national sales tax. Such a tax is inherently regressive, the report acknowledged, and its "considerable advantages" would have to be weighed against "serious disadvantages."

The Treasury proposal also takes steps in what the AFL-CIO considers the right direction by amending the depreciation and investment credits for business enacted in 1981—in all, transferring more than $30 billion in tax load from individual to corporate income taxes.

The White House, meanwhile, adopted a comparable trial balloon approach in the shaping of the budget that Reagan will send to Congress in January.

Tied to deficit

Reagan has insisted that spending cuts —exempting the two biggest components of the budget, military spending and social security—are the heart of his plans for deficit reduction.

Along those lines, Budget Director David Stockman has submitted to the President a target list of programs that would have to be drastically cut or entirely eliminated in order to reduce a projected $200 billion dollar deficit in the next fiscal year to $100 billion.

Details were not officially released, but Administration officials have been quoted as terming the cutbacks "draconian." Government retirement programs, student loans, veterans benefits and farm supports are reportedly among the Administration's chief targets.

After Stockman's presentation, according to White House press aide Larry Speakes, Reagan said he would make no immediate decisions and would "think more about it."

Tax plan threatens political credits

The Treasury Dept.'s "tax simplification" proposals would affect both public funding of presidential campaigns and individual contributions to candidates and political committees.

Taxpayers now can claim a tax credit of 50 percent of political contributions, up to a maximum credit of $50 on an individual's tax return or $100 on a joint return. Thus a person who contributes $100 to a candidate for Congress or to a political action committee such as COPE can get what amounts to a $50 rebate on income tax.

That tax credit would be eliminated under the Treasury Dept. recommendations.

The Treasury also is proposing to eliminate the option that taxpayers have of allocating $1 of their tax payments to provide public funding of presidential campaigns.

The money that is built up through this fund is available in presidential election years for federal matching funds in primary campaigns and for full funding of presidential elections for candidates who agree not to use any other funds for their campaigns.

Thus far, the fund built up through the income tax checkoff has been adequate under the funding formula established by Congress. If it fell short, available amounts would be pro-rated among the candidates.

The question immediately arose as to whether the proposal to drop the checkoff represented an Administration attempt to eliminate public funding of presidential campaigns. Encouraging that view is the fact that President Reagan has several times indicated his dislike of public funding and has not checked the campaign funding box on his own tax return. He has, however, accepted public funding for both his 1980 and 1984 election campaigns.

A high Treasury Dept. official told the AFL-CIO News that the proposal was not a move to eliminate public funding of presidential campaigns. He said the Treasury view was that the mechanism for providing funds should not be a part of the tax collection system and that Congress, if it wished to continue public funding, should provide a different means of allocating the money.

To free black unionists

Stiff sanctions urged against South Africa

President William Simons of the Washington Teachers Union, and Rep. Charles Hayes (D-Ill.), a vice president of the Food & Commercial Workers until his election to Congress in 1983. Other members of Congress arrested included Rep. Ronald V. Dellums (D-Calif.), Rep. John Conyers, Jr. (D-Mich.) and Fauntroy.

The policy of apartheid, which compels strict racial segregation in South Africa, has been repeatedly condemned by American labor.

In recent years the AFL-CIO, alone and in concert with the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, has undertaken a major program to help the development of black trade unions in South Africa. At its 1981 convention, the federation established a special fund for that purpose. In addition, individual AFL-CIO affiliates have contributed to African unions.

"This assistance has borne fruit in the rapid growth of a trade union movement which has demonstrated surprising responsibility and maturity, and which has helped point the way for all South Africans towards peaceful social change," Kirkland pointed out in his letter to Shultz.

"In spite of this significant success, the South African government has refused to enter into serious dialogue with its black citizens. Instead, it has continued to revert to repression, state violence, and arrests in dealing with any manifestation of grievances.

"When we and others in the free world protest such unjust actions, we receive no response. Most recently, the non-violent and justifiable expression of protest at the South African embassy by a small number of American citizens was likened by the South African ambassador to the Iranian takeover of the U.S. Embassy."

The federation lodged a sharp protest following the most recent series of police roundups of leading democratic trade unionists and others in the Transvaal region. The detentions came in response to a peaceful, two-day strike by blacks in South Africa's industrial heartland.

The arrests and detentions constituted a repudiation of the Pretoria government's claim that it is committed to black labor reform and to the protection of the rights of black workers, the AFL-CIO said.

"In a year that has seen an accelerated assault on the rights of its black citizens and a systematic suppression of internal dissent, it is clear that South Africa desires to live as an international outlaw, flouting civilized norms and practices," the federation charged.

Labor protest set

The AFL-CIO urged all affiliates, particularly those in the Washington, D.C. area, to join in a labor demonstration on Tuesday, Dec. 4, outside the South African embassy to protest the continued use of repression to frustrate black trade unions.

"I would hope that you and as large a delegation representing your union as possible would participate in this demonstration," Federation President Lane Kirkland said in messages to all affiliates.

Public health council backs strong 'right-to-know' policy

Anaheim, Calif.—The federal hazard communication standard is inadequate in scope and application, the American Public Health Association said.

The APHA policy statement, adopted by its governing council, noted that the standard excludes more than half the nation's workers, many of whom receive significant exposures to toxic chemicals.

The Occupational Safety & Health Administration's rule limits coverage to about 600 substances, leaving to the chemical manufacturers the decision on whether to add other chemicals, the statement stressed. It scored the standard's preemptive impact on state and local "right-to-know" laws, trade secret loopholes, and its exclusion of all nurses, including occupational health nurses from the definition of "health professional."

The APHA outlined what it considered essential to an effective standard on hazard identification, noting that the standard issued in January 1981 under the Carter Administration was preferable to the one the Reagan Administration adopted to replace it.

The APHA stressed that a federal right-to-know rule should:

- Not pre-empt state or local laws, except to the extent that those state or local laws are less stringent than the federal regulation.
- Cover all potentially hazardous chemicals and all workers exposed to such hazards.
- Provide that trade secrets do not supersede human rights to health information about the risks, putting the burden of proof on the manufacturer that irreparable harm would come from disclosure. Full information should be readily available to health professionals without the "chilling effects" of legal sanctions.
- Require that material safety data sheets be available listing common name, chemical name, and chemical registry number, possible hazards and emergency response procedures.
- Cover all compounds regulated by OSHA, all compounds suspected of being carcinogens, mutagens or teratogens, pesticides regulated by EPA, and radioactive materials. Provisions should be made for an advisory council to review and update the law and the list of chemicals covered.

Right-to-know makes good public health sense, Margaret Seminario, associate director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Occupational Safety, Health & Social Security, said. "We're glad to see them joining in labor's effort to get a strong, effective standard that covers all workers exposed to chemicals in the workplace."

Service Employees win long struggle in Seattle

Seattle—Workers at Swedish Hospital voted 409 to 294 for representation by the Service Employees, capping a 26-year drive by the employees to win the right to bargain.

SEIU Local 6 was certified by the National Labor Relations Board as the bargaining agent for 1,000 service and maintenance workers.

Local 6 President Marc Earls said the union victory at the hospital—the largest in the Northwest—is the first major health care victory in Washington State in over a decade, and it shows that "health care workers are striving to take charge of their working lives."

Earls said workers at Swedish Hospital first voted for the SEIU in 1958, before federal or state law guaranteed health care workers bargaining rights. At that time, the employees struck for 86 days in an attempt to win recognition, but the hospital refused.

When the strike ended, the hospital reinstated all strikers except Tee Rogers who is today secretary-treasurer of Local 6. Rogers, who plans to retire in 1985, signed the recent election results on behalf of the union.

Comparable pay suit filed by California SEIU affiliate

San Francisco—The Service Employees have filed a comparable worth suit against the state of California, charging massive sex discrimination in wage rates for employees in jobs held mostly by women.

The California State Employees Association—an SEIU affiliate—accuses California of violating federal civil rights law by the way the state sets pay scales for job classifications occupied mostly by some 37,000 women workers.

The union is asking a federal district court to end "historical and present" sex-based bias in wages and working conditions and for an end to "occupational segregation."

Contending that state jobs requiring similar skills, experience, effort and responsibility should have similar pay, CSEA is asking for upgrades in wages in at least 400 classifications as well as back pay with interest for victims of discrimination.

CSEA cited a 1982 comparable worth study released by the state that found substantial differences in pay between traditionally "women's" and "men's" jobs. Following that study, the state amended its employment code to include a policy calling for pay to be set for female-dominated jobs "on the basis of comparability of the value of work," and the union said it is only asking California to follow through on that policy.

The union is also asking that former state employees be included in a settlement. If they are, as many as 100,000 people, mostly women, could benefit, CSEA estimated.

Legislative effort

Earlier this year, the California legislature approved more than $80 million in the first step in a five-year program to close the wage gap revealed by the pay equity study.

But Gov. George Deukmejian (R) vetoed the appropriation, contending that the issue should be settled by collective bargaining.

CSEA President Leo Mayer said the union filed the lawsuit to force the state to act because without those funds "there's nothing to bargain with."

In a separate comparable worth case, the U.S. Supreme Court declined to review a decision in the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals that dismissed a charge by nursing professors at the University of Washington that they are paid less than male counterparts on other faculties at the school.

Meanwhile, the landmark pay equity case won in federal district court by the State, County & Municipal Employees—in which Washington State was found guilty of sex-based wage discrimination against some 15,000 workers—has been appealed to the Ninth Circuit by the state. The AFL-CIO has filed a brief supporting AFSCME.

Carpenters make union-busting costly

San Francisco—The Carpenters employed a new union concept to sign Ponderosa Homes, a subsidiary of Aetna Life & Casualty Insurance Co., to a three-year contract in northern California after the builder unilaterally shifted its work to non-union subcontractors.

Ponderosa, which builds about 1,000 high-priced homes a year, began to subcontract the work in April 1983, when its contract with the Carpenters' 46 Northern Counties Conference Board expired, and started systematically laying off union workers.

Hiring an anti-union law firm, the developer took the position that since it dealt directly with subcontractors and no longer hired any carpenter employees it did not have to renegotiate an agreement.

The union took a close look at the tie-in between Ponderosa and Aetna, and concluded that since the insurance firm was a major manager of union pension funds across the country it could exert some leverage by boycotting the parent organization.

Funds withdrawn

Working with the Bay Counties District Council of the Carpenters, the Conference Board persuaded other building trades unions to pull out their pension and health and welfare money from Aetna's coffers. Altogether, an estimated $600,000 in union funds deposited with Aetna were moved away from the company.

"The long-term financial problems that that could mean put Aetna in the right frame of mind to negotiate," said Ed Durkin, the union's special program coordinator, and the result was a three-year agreement.

"It is an example of a positive thing that can be done by unions," Durkin said.

Under the new contract, Ponderosa agreed to the terms negotiated between the Carpenters and other California homebuilders governing wages, benefits and working conditions.

More importantly, Ponderosa agreed that all carpenter subcontracting would be done with union workers.

Durkin said that the union's call for help met with overwhelming cooperation within the building trades across the country.

How AFL-CIO Members Voted in the 1984 Election

Election Night Survey Shows Strong Support for Mondale/Ferraro

AFL-CIO members gave Walter Mondale a bigger vote than the general electorate gave Ronald Reagan, according to two nationwide election night surveys completed by Pollsters Peter Hart and Vic Fingerhut.

Sixty-one percent of AFL-CIO members voted for the Mondale-Ferraro ticket, compared to 41 percent of the general electorate, a 20-point difference. Ronald Reagan captured only 39 percent of the union-member vote. This shift toward the Democratic Presidential candidate was all the more remarkable in the face of a sizable move in the opposite direction on the part of other voters.

The results show that Walter Mondale won a considerably larger share of the vote among Democratic AFL-CIO members than he did among all Democrats; similarly, Ronald Reagan's margin with Independents was considerably smaller among union voters than in the national electorate. Pollster Peter Hart notes the significance of these figures:

> "These results are important, because they indicate that the impact of AFL-CIO affiliation transcended party identification in members' voting decisions . . . In an election in which the Democratic nominee was severely weakened by major defections from the ranks of Democratic voters, the AFL-CIO was successful in maintaining a high degree of Democratic solidarity among its membership."

Union members who voted for Reagan do not support many specific programs of his Administration, according to the AFL-CIO polls. By large majorities, union members who voted for Reagan oppose Administration plans to cut back on education and job training programs, deregulate worker safety and health protection, impose a new tax on employer-paid fringe benefits, and reduce the role of labor unions in society.

The Surveys

The surveys were commissioned by the AFL-CIO to gain insight into the voting patterns and attitudes of AFL-CIO members and their households.

The first telephone survey of 1,031 voters in households in which AFL-CIO members reside was completed by Peter D. Hart Research Associates, Inc. A random sample was selected from the AFL-CIO membership list covering all 50 states. Interviews were completed with anyone who indicated he or she had voted in the presidential election. Sixty percent were members; forty percent were non-members living in the household.

A second sample of AFL-CIO members only was interviewed by Fingerhut-Granados Opinion Research. Telephone interviews were completed with 1,011 members using identical survey questions.

The two surveys were later combined to provide larger subgroups for analysis by the Hart polling organization. The data reflects the same proportion of males, females and racial groups as that determined by the Survey of Current Population of the U.S. Bureau of the Census for union members. The margin of error for the combined sample of 1,683 AFL-CIO members is 2.5 percent; that for the 1,031 AFL-CIO households is 3.2 percent.

Comparison With Network Exit Polls

According to the Hart poll, AFL-CIO household voters (non-members as well as members) supported Mondale over Reagan by a 57 percent to 43 percent ratio. Several network exit polls accorded Mondale a slightly lesser proportion—53 to 55 percent of the "union household" vote.

Why this difference? Network exit polls include many households with whom the AFL-CIO has no chance to communicate: Teamsters and other non-affiliated unions and associations. Some of these organizations endorsed President Reagan, others have no political program.

The difference grows even larger when the sample is limited to AFL-CIO members. In both the Hart and Fingerhut surveys, the pro-Mondale percentage among AFL-CIO members was 61 percent. CBS exit poll data also show union members supporting Mondale by a higher proportion (57 percent) than union households (53 percent).

The voting patterns are even more significant when compared with all other voters in the electorate. The ABC network exit poll, for example, shows an 18-point difference in the vote for Walter Mondale when comparing "union households" to "all others." If the AFL-CIO member-support level for Mondale (61 percent) is used for the comparison, the difference increases to 25 percent.

Table 1

Comparison of exit polls with AFL-CIO member poll:

	% Reagan	% Mondale
NBC union households	47	53
NBC other households	64	36
ABC union households	45	54
ABC other households	64	36
CBS union households	45	53
CBS other households	64	35*
CBS union members	41	57
AFL-CIO households	43	57
AFL-CIO union members	39	61

The three networks sampled the following numbers of union households: NBC 3,034, or 26 percent of its national total; ABC 2,709, or 28 percent of its national total; and CBS 2,172, or 25 percent of its national total. CBS polled 1,215 union members and was the only network to differentiate between union households and union members.

*One percent "other" candidates.

Voting Preferences for Congress

AFL-CIO members and household members voted for Democratic candidates for the U.S. Senate and U.S. House of Representatives in greater proportion than they voted for the Democratic Presidential nominee, as shown in the following table.

The vote for congressional Democrats was even higher among the following union-member subgroups: Hispanics, blacks, lower-income members and female members. A majority of Democrats who voted for Reagan switched back to the Democratic Party in their vote for Congress and the U.S. Senate.

Presidential Preference by Demographic Subgroup

(Note: In this and subsequent sections, including the tables; all figures refer to AFL-CIO members only, a combined sample of 1,683 respondents.)

As shown in Table 3, nearly every demographic subgroup of members voted for Mondale-Ferraro by greater or lesser majorities. Exceptions to this rule were found among members who are Republicans, as well as among Independents and higher-level, white-collar workers (professional, technical and sales people).

Support for Mondale was higher among older members. Still, young members (35 years old or under) voted 54 percent for Mondale, 46 percent for Reagan. Mondale's support decreases among higher-income members; however, even those relatively affluent members with family incomes of more than $35,000 voted for Mondale by 54 to 46 percent.

Blacks voted overwhelmingly for Mondale, 94 to 6 percent. Whites also voted for Mondale, by 56 to 44 percent. The Mondale majority among white AFL-CIO members stands in sharp contrast to his showing among whites in the total electorate.

Female members were more likely to vote for Mondale than males, but male members also supported the endorsed candidate. White males under 40 years old voted 52 percent for Reagan, 48 percent for Mondale, while white females under 40 favored Mondale 63 to 37 percent.

Attitude on Reagan Policies

Union members who did support President Reagan in the election do not necessarily support the programs likely to be put forward by his second Administration. By overwhelming margins, AFL-CIO members indicated that they oppose Reagan policies to cut back programs that help working people and give further tax breaks to business. Significantly, opposition to these programs is strong even among members who voted for Reagan, including Republicans.

Union Involvement in Politics

AFL-CIO members want their unions to participate in political and legislative action (Table 5). Strong majorities affirm that unions speak up for all working people and seek legislation that benefits them. Members believe unions are needed to balance big-business influence in government and politics. Significantly, support for union legislation and political action is high among Independents and Democrats for Reagan, two key groups of members with whom unions must communicate effectively in future elections.

Union Members' Political Profile

In Tables 6 and 7, several subgroups are defined to help analyze why certain members who normally vote Democratic or are Independents appear to be leaning away from the Democrats at this time. Republican members appear to be more set in their preferences and more difficult to persuade to vote against their party's candidate in national elections. But Independents and Democrats who voted for Reagan are still open to persuasion. By measuring how far their opinions diverge from the total sample on various issues, it is possible to discover which issues may be persuasive in future elections. Several important subgroups are defined as follows:

- Independents*—persons who say they are independent or are not sure when asked to describe their orientation as, mostly Democratic, leaning Democratic, completely independent, leaning Republican, or mostly Republican."

- Democrats for Reagan*—persons who describe themselves as "Democrats" or "leaning Democratic" and who say they voted for Reagan in 1984.

- Switched to Reagan*—persons who say they voted for Carter in 1980 and voted for Reagan in 1984.

- Critical Democrats*—persons who say they are "Democrats" or "leaning Democratic" and who agree with either of the two following statements: "I used to support the Democratic Party a lot more than I do now," or "the Democratic Party has gotten too far away from the traditions of Roosevelt, Truman and Kennedy."

- Republicans*—persons who say "Republican" or "leaning Republican" when asked to describe their orientation toward political parties.

- Democrats*—persons who say they are "Democrats" or "leaning Democratic" when asked to describe their political party orientation.

Issues for the Future

Members were asked to name one or two issues facing the country which they personally thought were most important when "looking ahead to the future." (Concern about an issue does not necessarily imply a position regarding that issue.) They were also asked which political party would do a better job in the future of handling eight selected issues, regardless of how they voted in this election. Their answers are instructive to those who hope to win union support in future elections.

1. Jobs and Economic Policy

Economic questions top the agenda of future issues for AFL-CIO members with 64 percent mentioning such things as unemployment, jobs, the economy, inflation, prices and interest rates (Table 6). For blacks, Hispanics and "leaning Democrats," jobs are an even stronger priority.

Members believe the Democrats would do the best job of dealing with unemployment and creating new jobs by a 48 percent to 24 percent ratio. This is not as great a margin as one might expect from past surveys. Significantly, several key targeted groups now believe the Republican Party would do a better job on this issue: Independents, Democrats who voted for Reagan, and members who voted for Carter in 1980 but switched to Reagan in 1984.

What kind of economic program will best persuade members to stay with the Democrats? There is considerable discussion among Democrats of re-orienting party policy toward a more free-enterprise, "free-trade" approach that gives greater priority to emerging, high-tech industries. There is little evidence in this survey that such an approach will be effective in attracting union members.

As shown in Table 4, AFL-CIO union members oppose policies that increase the importing of foreign goods in the name of fighting inflation but at the cost of American jobs. Members support government programs to rebuild traditional domestic manufacturing industries.

When asked what the Democratic Party should do in the future (Table 8), the strongest response (58 percent) among all members was to "fight harder to protect American jobs from cheap foreign imports." This response was chosen by an even higher proportion (62 percent) of members who are Democrats critical of their own party's policy direction.

The response to the same question that drew the smallest proportion of all subgroups was "give more support to new high-tech businesses and not worry so much about older industries."

2. Foreign Policy

Foreign policy rated a close second on AFL-CIO members' future agenda (Table 6), with 59 percent mentioning some international issue. Comments about war, peace and nuclear arms not necessarily reflecting a single position on these issues were made by 33 percent. The need for a stronger defense was mentioned by 11 percent, while 10 percent mentioned cutting defense expenditures. Two percent specifically mentioned Central America.

Several subgroups put foreign policy issues ahead of jobs and the economy. These included switchers to Reagan, younger whites, white women, white men under 40, white Independents under 40, upper-income, college-educated, and higher-level white-collar workers.

Past surveys have shown that voters, including union members, prefer the Democrats as the party best able to negotiate a nuclear arms agreement with the Soviets and (by a much smaller margin) to keep world peace. Among those who mentioned war-peace concerns, Mondale won 66 percent to Reagan's 34 percent. There is evidence, however, that Reagan neutralized this issue with some voters. With the exception of female members, most other groups who were more likely to mention war-peace nuclear concerns were also more likely to vote for Reagan. For example, 47 percent of 18-34-year-old whites mentioned this issue and 50 percent of them voted for Reagan.

When it comes to "having sound defense policies" or "dealing with Soviet-Cuban aggression," the Democrats fare worse than on any other issues tested. Members as a whole prefer Republicans to deal with defense by a ratio of 42 percent to 29 percent. One out of four Democrats said the Republicans would do a better job on this issue. Democrats who voted for Reagan and Carter voters who switched to Reagan give their defense preference to the Republican Party by ratios as large as 15 to 1.

The Republicans also fare disproportionately well on the defense issue among white men, younger members, those with upper-middle incomes ($25,000-$35,000), low-income blue-collar workers, Independents, and higher-level white-collar workers. Democrats are preferred to handle the defense issue by blacks, white women under 40, and those who identify themselves as strong Democrats.

3. Budget and Tax Issues

Concerns about the budget deficit, government spending, taxes and tax reform were mentioned by 24 percent of the respondents. Only 3 percent specifically mentioned tax increases as an issue.

The Democrats are clearly preferred as the party that will do the best job in "making the tax system fairer to working people," by a ratio of 55 percent to 23 percent.

On the question of "dealing with the federal budget deficit," members are not so certain—39 percent say the Democrats will do a better job, 27 percent say the Republicans, and 34 percent say both are equal or they are not sure.

Independents prefer the Democrats on the fairness issue and the Republicans on the deficit issue. The Democrats have failed to persuade key target groups on the tax fairness question: Democrats for Reagan and switchers to Reagan.

4. Other Domestic Issues

Issues such as social security, the elderly, health care, education, environment, poverty, race relations and unions were mentioned by 22 percent of respondents. Of these issues, the most frequently mentioned was social security (6 percent). Concerns about social security, health care and elderly-related issues were especially high among women, persons over 50 years old, lower-income respondents, and southern white Democrats. Education was of special concern to women and blacks.

The Democratic Party is the clear favorite for "protecting social security and Medicare" and for "representing the interests of working people," according to the survey. This preference holds for all demographic subgroups and for the target groups, Democrats for Reagan and Carter voters who switched to Reagan. Only Republican members believe otherwise. From previous surveys, we know that voters, as well as union members, believe the Democratic Party to be best at dealing with education, the environment, the elderly and helping minorities and the poor.

Some Democratic candidates have become leery of advocating several of these issues because of the perceived trade-off: they cost money, add to the deficit and lead to a tax increase. While this may be true for some issues, it does not appear to be a problem for AFL-CIO members on the questions of Medicare, social security, unemployment benefits and health care. Three-fourths of the respondents want to continue full funding for these programs, "even if it means an increase in taxes." Even Republican members agree with this proposition, by 55 percent to 35 percent.

5. Social Issues

Only 5 percent of the respondents mentioned as "most important" abortion, crime and drug abuse, corruption, school prayer, welfare abuse, women's rights and other "social issues." Abortion was a slightly more significant issue with Republicans, Democrats for Reagan, switchers to Reagan, 18-34-year-old whites, those with family incomes of $15,000-$25,000, and clerical-sales workers. Of those few who mentioned abortion, three-fourths voted for Reagan.

A relatively higher proportion of Democrats for Reagan and switchers from Carter to Reagan (12 to 14 percent) mentioned social-issue concerns. For this small but significant group, such social questions might be a decisive reason for their defection from traditional Democratic voting patterns.

Thirty-nine percent of respondents did not choose either political party as best "representing your viewpoint on issues like abortion, gay rights, and other social questions." For those who chose, Democrats are preferred by 35 percent, Republicans by 26 percent. The preference is reversed among Independents, white men, whites 65 and older, upper-middle-income whites, less well-educated whites and low-income blue-collar workers.

Among key persuasion groups—Democrats for Reagan and switchers to Reagan—the preference for the Republicans on social questions is much more decisive.

Messages to the Political Parties

Although the Republicans have made some gains among certain subgroups of union members as the party best able to deal with defense issues, social questions, the deficit and, to a lesser degree, the economy, President Reagan faces great resistance from members on most of the domestic initiatives now being considered by his Administration. If there is an economic downturn and no change in Republican policies, the party is likely to lose even this advantage, except perhaps among those few members who place top priority on defense and containing Soviet expansion.

For Democrats, there are both hopeful signs and warning signals in these poll results. A majority of AFL-CIO members still considers themselves Democrats, and these union Democrats remained far more loyal to Mondale than did Democrats sampled in the network exit polls. Nonetheless, a significant proportion of Democratic members (40 percent) agrees with the statement, "I used to support the Democratic Party a lot more than I do now." And 39 percent of Democratic members agree that, "the Democrats have gotten too far away from the traditions of Roosevelt, Truman and Kennedy."

These survey results make it clear that an overwhelming majority of AFL-CIO members opposes the retrogressive direction of Reagan Administration policies. Union men and women want government action to protect American jobs against excessive imports and continued federal support for public education, job training programs, medical care and old-age insurance.

These workers oppose proposals to impose federal taxes on employer-paid health and pension benefits and oppose any further cutting of taxes on corporations.

Clearly, the substantial majority of members surveyed has more confidence in the Democratic Party for dealing with the issues most important to workers. These members show a clear preference for the mainstream Democratic traditions of Roosevelt, Truman and Kennedy to use federal government authority to assure the ultimate fairness of the American economic and political system.

The political agenda preferred by the majority of AFL-CIO members emphasizes policies that create jobs and protect programs for workers' safety, health and old-age security.

One of the many conclusions that can be drawn from these surveys is that union members' political affinities cannot be taken for granted.

AFL-CIO members are affected by the same media, community, social and economic influences that all Americans react to. But union members have the additional resource of their union political education programs to help them make important decisions. These independent polls show that a large majority of rank-and-file members understands which issues are most crucial to working people and which political candidates are most likely to be sympathetic to their concerns.

50 million lack adequate health care coverage

By Susan Dunlop

Some 50 million Americans—or about one out of every four people under 65—have no health insurance or private policies adequate to cover the costs of a major illness, according to a study released by the Dept. of Health & Human Services.

The study, "Who Are the Underinsured?," revealed that even though many workers have group health plans through their jobs, about 60 percent of the underinsured are full-time workers and their dependents. About half of the underinsured are in high- or middle-income families.

Under-insurance is broadly defined in the study as having no coverage for all or part of the year, or having a private policy that will not cover a substantial amount of major expenses.

The problem of inadequate coverage is even worse for the unemployed persons aged 55 to 64 or 19 to 24, low-income families and women who are supporting their families alone, the study found.

The survey was conducted by Pamela J. Farley of the National Center for Health Services Research, an arm of HHS.

Farley's research showed that at least 49.1 million and as many as 76.7 million Americans under 65 are uninsured or under-insured today, depending on several definitions of "adequate" private insurance that take into account the probability of incurring major expenses and the amount of out-of-pocket costs a family might pay.

Out-of-pocket costs

One definition assumed a person was under-insured if he or she suffered a moderate illness with costs of a few thousand dollars—likely to happen to one person in every 20—and the private insurance policy insufficiently covered charges so that the family had to pay 10 percent of their income out-of-pocket for the rest of the bills.

The study found that under this definition, nearly 24 percent of the population under 65 either have no private or public coverage, were uncovered for part of the year, or have inadequate insurance to meet those bills.

A second definition, which the study said is probably the most realistic, assumed that a person has a one in 100 chance of suffering a serious and expensive illness. An adequate private policy would cover expenses so that a family's out-of-pocket costs would not exceed 10 percent of income.

In this scenario. about 26.7 percent of the under-65 population, or nearly 56 million Americans, is either uninsured or under-insured, the study said.

Also, nearly half of those underinsured would be people with policies that provide basic but not major medical benefits.

A third definition tested the adequacy of insurance by whether health plans included coverage for the expenses of a catastrophic illness.

Under that definition, nearly 37 percent of Americans under 65, or nearly 77 million people, could be considered under-insured.

The study also showed that using the second, or intermediate, definition of under-insurance, about 39 percent of female-headed households were inadequately covered compared to about 25 percent of those headed by males.

Age breakdown

About 22 percent of people age 35 to 54 were underinsured as were about 41 percent of those 19 to 24, 27 percent of those 25 to 34 and 31 percent of people 55 to 64.

By ethnic background, some 25 percent of whites, 32 percent of blacks and 31 percent of Hispanics could be considered underinsured using the study's criteria.

Of income groups, nearly 42 percent of low-income families, 22 percent of middle-income, and 14 percent of high-income families qualified as under-insured.

Dole named majority leader at Senate Republican caucus

Senate Republicans, their ranks shrunk by the election, chose a mainstream conservative, Robert Dole of Kansas, as the majority leader for the 99th Congress.

Dole, who had been chairman of the Finance Committee, won a closely contested five-way race to succeed the retiring Howard Baker of Tennessee.

The Republican caucus then followed seniority precedents and designated Sen. Bob Packwood of Oregon to replace Dole as head of the powerful Finance Committee, whose jurisdiction ranges from tax laws to social security. Packwood is a sometimes maverick moderate who has often been critical of the Reagan White House.

To take the Finance Committee post, Packwood gave up the chairmanship of the Commerce, Science & Transportation Committee to Sen. John C. Danforth of Missouri.

The chairmanship of the Foreign Relations Committee, opened up by the election defeat of Sen. Charles H. Percy of Illinois, will be filled by Sen. Richard G. Lugar of Indiana. The senior Republican on the committee was the very right-wing Jesse Helms of North Carolina. But Helms chose to stick to a campaign promise that he would retain the chairmanship of the Agriculture Committee, which is considered important to his state's tobacco industry.

The other committee change put Senate veteran Barry Goldwater as chairman of the Armed Services Committee. The post was opened by the retirement of Texas Sen. John Tower.

All other major committee chairmanships stay unchanged, including Sen. Orrin Hatch of Utah as chairman of the Labor & Human Resources Committee.

For other leadership posts, Senate Republicans chose Alan K. Simpson of Wyoming as assistant leader, William L. Armstrong of Colorado as Policy Committee chairman, and John Chafee of Rhode Island as chairman of the Republican Conference, as the caucus is called. Thad Cochran of Mississippi was named secretary of the conference and Pennsylvania's John Heinz will head the GOP's Senatorial Campaign Committee.

To win the majority leadership contest, Dole defeated Lugar, James A. McClure of Idaho, Pete V. Domenici of New Mexico, and Ted Stevens of Alaska, who had been assistant leader under Baker.

McClure, the most conservative of the group, was the first eliminated and the final runoff gave Dole a 28-25 victory over Stevens.

Democratic caucus

Senate Democrats will caucus Dec. 12, and there has been no announced challenge to the re-election of Minority Leader Robert C. Byrd of West Virginia or Assistant Leader Alan Cranston of California.

In the House, both parties are expected to rename their present leaders. A small conservative caucus may run a candidate against House Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill, Jr., in the Democratic caucus, but it is considered a token move.

The big battles in the House Democratic caucus will be over the choice of a Budget Committee chairman, the filling of a Ways & Means Committee vacancy—and action on a controversial proposal to consolidate the budget, authorization and appropriations process.

Also under consideration will be an attempt to limit and divide equally between the parties the period following the completion of business when one or more members can make speeches to an empty floor but to a live C-span television audience. A group of right-wing Republicans has largely monopolized the free television exposure.

Food Workers approve pact for 14,000 in Ohio

Cleveland—Food & Commercial Workers Local 880 members ratified a new three-year settlement with eight major grocery chains. The contract, covering some 14,000 workers, was reached just minutes before the union's strike deadline.

The agreement, approved by a mail ballot vote of 4,247 to 2,546, covers clerks and meat cutters in Cleveland, Akron and Canton, Ohio. The grocery chains are Pick-N-Pay, Fazio's, Stop & Shop, Buy Rite, Heinen, Acme-Click, Fisher Food of Canton, and the Cleveland Food Dealers.

The union had targeted the largest chain, Pick-N-Pay, for a strike on Nov. 2, while the companies had threatened to shut down all the stores if one chain was struck. The Local 880 members had earlier rejected a management offer.

Cleveland area clerks approved the agreement by a 2,309 to 1,399 vote, and the Akron-Canton clerks voted approval, 900 to 554. The meat cutters, district-wide, ratified the package with a 1,038 to 593 vote.

The agreement provides no wage increase in the first year, a $500 bonus to full-time workers the second year and $300 to part-time workers, and raises wages 27 cents per hour in the third year. There would also be a 10-cent per hour boost in the rates for the progression levels in September 1986, with 5 cents of that made available to health and welfare coverage. Changes were also made in vacations, pensions and holidays.

ILO's strong stand

Director Irving Brown of the AFL-CIO Dept. of International Affairs, right, lauded the International Labor Organization's governing body for its firmness against Soviet bloc countries which had threatened to leave the ILO if a report condemning Poland for its banning of Solidarity was adopted. Other worker delegates are, from left, Alfonso Sanchez Madariaga, Sr., of Mexico, Niamkey Adiko of the Ivory Coast and Alistair Graham of Britain. Poland announced at the Geneva meeting that it is pulling out of the ILO.

Union-company panel cites progress at Litton Industries

A joint labor-management committee formed last year to investigate widespread friction between unions and Litton Industries, Inc. issued its final report with a call for increased union-company cooperation to smooth labor relations and increase productivity.

The committee was proposed in December 1983 by Litton Chairman Fred O'Green largely in response to charges made by a 12-union coalition—led by the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.—that the company's division follows corporate-wide policy of union-busting aggravated by labor law violations.

The five-member committee in its report to O'Green pointed out that it had been successful in mediating two key disputes between workers and Litton-owned companies including clearing up numerous grievances that came out of a strike by the Machinists at a Litton facility in New Britain, Conn.

The committee also helped the unaffiliated United Electrical Workers achieve a first contract at a Litton microwave oven plant in Sioux Falls, S.D., where the UE has been certified as bargaining agent since September 1980. But the committee failed in an effort to resolve a dispute between the union and Litton in Athol, Mass., where a work stoppage began in May 1983.

Members of the committee included IUD Sec.-Treas. Elmer Chatak and Electronics Workers Sec.-Treas. Edward Fire, with Litton Vice President Mathias J. Diedrich and Jerry St. Pe, vice president of the company's Ingalls Shipbuilding Division. Paul W. Kayser, vice president of a management consulting firm, served as neutral chairman.

In its report, the committee noted the unions' position that Litton's labor relations policies amount to a company-wide effort to bust existing unions, aggressively discourage any new organization, and delay and frustrate bargaining.

Litton, the committee said, maintains that its divisions' interest in being non-union are legal, as are their hard bargaining stances.

Panel continued

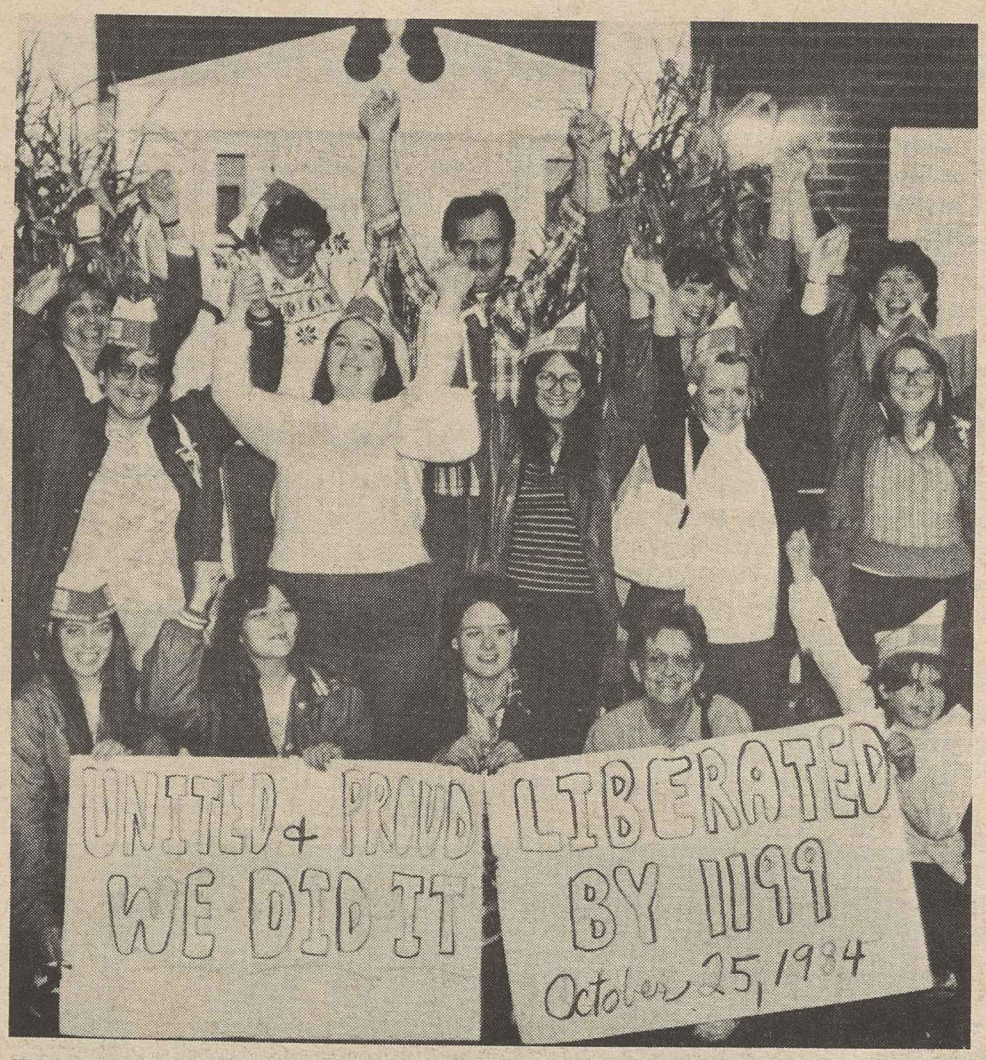
In addition to recommending that it stay in existence for a year to continue its work, the committee suggested that unions and the company increase dialogues to improve understanding of their positions. The panel stressed that legal union organizing efforts should not be grounds for discipline or layoffs, and it suggested that the parties meet to resolve outstanding disputes and grievances.

Litton was also urged to work with the unions to develop programs to cushion the impact of job loss on workers from plant closings or other factors.

The committee—stressing that cooperation is a key to high productivity—pointed to the smooth labor relations between the Ingalls shipyard and the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept. as an example of what could be accomplished throughout the company.

The report suggested creation of a joint IUD-Litton committee on contract proposals to work on "constructive" solutions to productivity issues.

Chatak said that while several major disputes between unions and Litton divisions remain unresolved, the department is satisfied with the progress with the company and is removing it from the IUD "dishonor roll" of anti-union employers.



Nursing home victory

A six-month organizing drive by the Hospital & Health Care Employees resulted in a victory when the 185-member service and maintenance unit at the Whispering Pines Nursing Home in Valparaiso, Ind., voted 81-64 for representation by the hospital union. The 200-bed nursing home is one of the largest in the state.

UAW, Ford ask continuation of Japan's export agreement

Detroit—The Auto Workers and Ford Motor Co. have asked President Reagan to seek a fifth year of voluntary export restraints by Japan to assure that the Japanese autos will not flood the American market after the current agreement ends next year.

UAW President Owen Bieber and Ford Chairman Philip Caldwell stressed in a joint letter that "Japanese increases in sales would have substantial impacts on the U.S. trade deficit, on domestic industry volume, employment and productivity, and the U.S. economy as a whole.

"This would come at a time when many thousands of Auto Workers still remain on indefinite layoff; thousands more have been permanently displaced to lower-wage jobs, at great personal hardship and social cost."

Bieber commented that "the Japanese are looking for a signal from us." He said Reagan should know that passivity or indecision on his part could cost hundreds of thousands of jobs, because the Japanese producers have the available production capacity to seize 40 percent of the U.S. auto market in a very short time if export restraints are lifted.

The key message sent to Reagan was that "we in the domestic industry—management and labor—have demonstrated our good faith and our mutual desire to make the U.S. industry competitive," Bieber said. He stressed that it's up to the government to deal with the competitive factors that are "beyond our control and beyond the scope of collective bargaining."

The UAW leader pointed out that more than half the cost advantage the Japanese have is due to factors beyond the industry's control, specifically a 20 percent advantage based on the yen-dollar imbalance, plus Japan's practice of waiving commodity taxes on export vehicles—taxes ranging between 18.5 to 23 percent.

Despite four years of voluntary restraints, Japan continues to hold a solid 25 percent share of the U.S. market. Japanese firms shipped 1.68 million autos in each of the first three years of restraints, limiting shipments to 1.85 million this year.

Newell J. Carman dies, retired IUOE officer

Roseville, Calif.—Newell J. Carman a retired secretary-treasurer of the Operating Engineers and a former vice president of the California AFL-CIO, died here Nov. 7 following a long illness. He was 71.

Carman joined IUOE Local 39 in San Francisco in 1940, and later was with IUOE Local 3. He was elected an international vice president in 1957 and secretary-treasurer in 1964, serving in that post until his retirement in 1972.

'No quick fix'

Union group explores Central America crisis

After a two-week political study tour of six Central American countries, a group of U.S. trade union officials came away convinced that the nagging crisis engulfing the region did not arise out of a vacuum, but has its origins in longstanding social, economic and political injustices.

"I think it is important that we understand that any commitment by the United States in helping them eradicate the causes of misery in the region cannot seriously be undertaken with a quick fix, but will require a great deal of our patience and determination over a long period of time," said Frank Myers, assistant director of the AFL-CIO's regional office in Boston, which organized the trip.

The Nov. 7-20 visit was arranged by the federation's American Institute for Free Labor Development. It was funded by the newly created National Endowment for Democracy, a federally financed, nonprofit organization established by Congress to promote the evolution of democratic institutions in developing countries.

Six-nation tour

During their visit, the seven trade unionists met with political leaders, heads of private and government organizations, U.S. embassy staff personnel, editors and labor leaders in Panama, Costa Rica, Nicaragua, El Salvador, Honduras and Guatemala.

Their primary purpose was to exchange ideas on the current labor, political and economic situation in each nation with key people in and out of government and particularly with those in democratic union confederations.

The New Englanders—four from Massachusetts and three from Connecticut—included Robert Petronella, a Food & Commercial Workers vice president; Betty Tianti, secretary-treasurer of the Connecticut AFL-CIO; Charles Thompson, a Boilermakers international representative from Springfield, Mass.; James Keyes, business agent of Operating Engineers Local 478 in Hamden, Conn.; Robert Alman, Ladies' Garment Workers vice president for New England, and John Taylor, business manager of Electrical Workers Local 103 in Boston.

They were accompanied by AIFLD Special Projects Director James R. Holway and Gordon Ellison, an AIFLD representative in Central America.

Duarte meeting

A highlight of the visit was a meeting with Salvadoran President Jose Napoleon Duarte, who told them he is determined to stay with his peace initiative in an effort to bring lasting peace to El Salvador and to bring the democratic political process to the people.

Duarte, who has met with leftiist rebels fighting to overthrow the government, stressed that he wants to end the five-year civil war that has torn the nation apart. He pointed out, however, that he would oppose any attempt by guerrilla forces to negotiate themselves into positions of power in the government.

Duarte also assured the group he would do all he could to see that justice finally is meted out in the case of the 1981 killings of two AIFLD staff members and the head of El Salvador's land reform program. The release of a Salvadoran Army officer accused of plotting their murders came shortly after the meeting with Duarte, and was a "great disappointment" to the group, Myers said.

"We were in Honduras when the word got out that the Salvadoran Supreme Court had freed Lopez Sibrian," Myers said. "The problem is that the judiciary system there leaves a helluva lot to be desired.

"The judiciary is not appointed by the executive branch but by the Legislative Assembly. At this moment, Duarte's party is not in control of the assembly."

During his wide-ranging discussion with the group, Duarte stressed that the country's No. 1 problem over the next year remains the troubled Salvadoran economy. Myers said he expressed optimism over the government's land reform program—turning El Salvador's big plantations over to the campesinos, or peasant farmers—and said that while it was not moving as fast as he would like, progress was being made.

The group also met with U.S. Ambassador Thomas R. Pickering and with officials of the Union Popular Democratica, an umbrella labor organization seeking political reform and implementation of the land redistribution program.

Free elections

Another clear impression the trade unionists came away with, Myers said, was that—except for Nicaragua—progress has been made throughout the region in holding free elections.

"Even in Guatemala, where there still exists too many violations of basic human rights, including offenses against trade unions for their activities, arrangements are being worked out to hold democratic elections next year," he said.

In Nicaragua, the group met leaders of the Confederacion de Unificacion Syndical (CUS) a labor confederation affiliated with the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions. Just after taking power, the Sandinista government formed its own labor organization, the Confederacion Sandinista de Trabajadores, and insisted that all unions belong to it.

When the CUS and the Confederacion Nicaraguense de Trabajadores resisted, the Sandinistas embarked on a campaign that violated every concept of trade union rights, the group was told.

"CUS leaders told us of arrests without charges, physical violence, and other forms of harassment to them and their families," Myers said.

"The CUS leaders told us that they too fought in the revolution to overthrow the vicious Somoza dictatorship but that it is the Sandinistas who have betrayed the revolution. They promised democracy and a pluralistic society, and have produced neither—only a totalitarian regime."

Back panel

Myers said he and his colleagues were convinced of the soundness of the recommendations of the National Bipartisan Commission on Central America, which last January offered a practical, comprehensive program to bring security and economic progress to that important region.

"One of the best ideas to come out of the commission was the call for the creation of a Central American Development Organization (CADO), which would provide assistance to the development of the area in every dimension," he said.

The commission, on which AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland served, envisioned CADO as an organization committed to political pluralism, free elections, mutual security, human resource development, preservation of peace, and establishment and maintenance of sound economic growth policies throughout the region.

"They learned a lot, and their visit boosted the morale of the union guys in Central America, especially in Nicaragua, El Salvador, and Guatemala," Holway said.

"This is the kind of contact they really want in Central America."

Schedule of labor studies center courses

The George Meany Center for Labor Studies will offer four institutes during December and January. The schedule:

The Art of Leadership, Dec. 2-7—A session to help union leaders understand worker motivations, group dynamics, systems analysis, how to deal with stress and to recognize differences in leadership styles.

Teaching Techniques in Labor Education, Jan. 13-18—A class to demonstrate techniques commonly used by those who teach in union conferences, summer schools or night classes.

Contract Administration: Life without Arbitration, Jan. 20-24—A program to explore alternatives to arbitration, to reintroduce promptness, clarity and low cost into the process. Grievance mediation will be discussed for use when grievances have piled up.

Negotiating Techniques: State & Local Agencies, Jan. 20-25—An exercise in bargaining an agreement in a typical public sector situation experienced factfinder-mediators.

The Bakery, Confectionery & Tobacco Workers staff will be at the center for special training Dec. 9-14.

Nearly 60 candidates for bachelor of arts degrees in labor studies enrolled in the George Meany Center/Antioch University college degree program will be on campus Jan. 27-Feb. 1 for their semi-annual week-in-residence.

The American Institute for Free Labor Development country directors will be on campus Dec. 7-14. The Asian American Free Labor Institute's annual conference for country directors is Jan. 7-14.

Information about these or other labor studies is available from Fred K. Hoehler, Jr., executive director, George Meany Center, 10000 New Hampshire Ave., Silver Spring, Md. 20903; telephone 301/431-6400.

The Tax Dodge

PRESIDENT REAGAN didn't invent political gamesmanship, but he has certainly raised it to an art form.

Take his proposal—oops, the Treasury Dept.'s proposal—for a major revamping of the nation's tax laws. It contains some good ideas as well as some that are very bad, and anything in it may or may not be supported by the President.

The recommendations are based on the Treasury Dept. study that the President kept referring to during the election campaign, whenever he was questioned about his tax plans.

The Secretary of the Treasury assured a televised news conference that the new system would be "simple and fair" and reflects an "enormous public input."

President Reagan, the White House tells us, isn't so sure. But he will consider the report, see how the political winds are blowing, and decide what to do about it. Anyway, the President is reported happy that the proposal doesn't contemplate using revenue gained by closing some of the most notorious corporate tax loopholes to reduce the budget deficit.

FAR BETTER, as this Administration sees it, to give another tax break to families affluent enough to tuck away $5,000 a year of tax-exempt funds into IRAs. But be sure that persons with incomes under $12,000 pay taxes on any unemployment benefits they receive.

Meanwhile, let the Treasury draw the political heat away from the Teflon-coated White House.

Having ruled out additional revenue, President Reagan asked his budget people to come up with a deficit-reduction plan based on spending cuts. And indeed they did.

The cuts proposed were described by Administration officials as "draconian."

The definition, in Webster's New International Dictionary, Second Edition, is "barbarously severe . . . harsh . . . cruel."

That's a fair description if the published reports of some of the provisions prove accurate.

But it seems that the President just wants to look at them. They're not his proposals, yet.

The buck, these days, never stops anywhere.

Making an Impact

THE ELECTION-NIGHT surveys analyzed in this issue confirm that members of AFL-CIO unions voted for the Mondale-Ferraro presidential ticket by substantially greater margin than other workers.

Clearly, the effort the AFL-CIO and its affiliates put into informing union members of the positions and records of the rival candidates had an impact.

Political education does make a difference.

The polls refute, convincingly, the assertion by labor's foes that the trade union leadership is out of step with the rank-and-file and cannot speak for its members.

At least as impressive as the indicated 61 percent support for Mondale was the affinity of views of the overwhelming majority of union members on the issues the AFL-CIO considers most important. These views were shared by union members who voted for Reagan as well as by those who voted for Mondale.

There is also a warning light in the poll results that would be foolish and perilous to ignore.

Younger white workers, with fewer years of union membership and a shorter memory of how things were, are most likely to differ with the positions of their unions—and of their union brothers and sisters.

That's an education problem that has to be addressed.

Reagan tax hike likely, but who will pay more?

By Press Associates, Inc.

Controlling the mammoth federal deficit will be the first order of business for the new 99th Congress. President Reagan's red ink is now flowing at an annual rate of $210 billion, according to the White House's upwardly revised post-election estimate.

The deficit can be reduced in two ways—budget cuts and tax increases. No one, with the exception of fanatical "supply-siders," believes Reagan's campaign assertion that economic growth will close the huge gap between revenues and spending.

Reagan's Treasury Dept. has been hard at work for months devising tax schemes to be presented to Congress and the public under such euphemistic labels as "tax reform," "tax simplification," and "revenue enhancement."

In the 98th Congress, among the various "flat tax" bills introduced was one proposed by conservative "supply-side" Congressman Jack Kemp (R-N.Y.) to dismantle the progressive income tax system that is based on ability to pay.

A "modified flat tax" proposal by Rep. Richard Gephardt (D-Mo.) and Sen. Bill Bradley (D-N.J.) would preserve the basic structure of the progressive tax while lowering tax rates for most taxpayers.

Lower rates

Flat tax proposals would lower tax rates for individuals and businesses by ending many tax deductions, exclusions, credits, preferential rates, and deferrals of tax liability. Many wealthy individuals and corporations that now pay little or no taxes through skillful use of tax loopholes would be paying more.

Since the 1950s, a proliferation of tax breaks has caused the corporate share of federal revenues to plunge from about 25 percent to 8.5 percent. Over this period, the average company's effective tax rate—the percentage of its domestic income actually paid to the Treasury—has dropped from 45 percent to 27 percent.

Corporations got their biggest tax break in 1981, when Congress enacted the Administration's supply-side Accelerated Cost Recovery System (ACRS). Companies were allowed rapid tax write-offs for their capital investments instead of depreciating them according to the traditional "useful life" concept. Among the Treasury Dept.'s tax proposals is a modification of the ACRS boondoggle for big business.

Congressional study

The Congressional Joint Committee on Taxation recently released a study showing that tax breaks allowed corporations and individuals to escape $322 billion in taxes in fiscal 1984.

The study provides Congress with information it can use to select among various options to raise revenue. The list of tax expenditures in Fiscal 1984 included:

- The deductibility of mortgage interest on owner-occupied homes, $23.5 billion. Deferral of capital gains on home sales, $4.9 billion.
- Accelerated depreciation for corporations under the 1981 tax changes for plant and equipment, $10.2 billion.
- Business investment credit other than stock ownership, structure rehabilitation, reforestation, leasing, and energy property, $24 billion.
- Net exclusion of pension contributions and earnings in employer plans, $47.2 billion.
- Exclusion of employer contributions for medical premiums and medical care for employees, $17.6 billion.
- The oil and gas depletion allowance for energy companies, $330 million.
- Exclusion of interest on general purpose state and local government debt, $7.7 billion.
- Deductibility for charitable contributions, other than education and health, $425 million.

Working people will be watching closely as the Administration and Congress move closer to action on the deficit problem. The question is—who will pay?

Labor journalism award winners announced

Judges in the International Labor Communications Association's 1984 journalism contest presented 111 awards to outstanding labor publications for materials published during 1983.

A total of 1,002 entries were examined by two panels of judges, including 60 entries in the contest's special category of labor history journalism.

The 135 labor publications that entered this year's contest were judged on general excellence as well as in eight special performance categories.

Publications could also enter five contest categories for materials published that dealt with aspects of labor history.

Daphne Siev White of the Teachers' publications staff was named as the winner of the ILCA's prestigious Max Steinbock Award. The prize, named for the late president of the association, is awarded in recognition of "the best journalistic effort which exemplifies a humanistic spirit."

Top winners in the overall general excellence categories were:

International and national union publications—newspapers of 100,000 or more circulation, CWA News, Communications Workers; magazine of 100,000 or more circulation, UAW Solidarity, Auto Workers; newspapers under 100,000 circulation, Seafarers Log; magazines under 100,000 circulation, Air Line Pilot; newsletters, SEIU Leadership News Update, Service Employees.

State and local central body publications—publishing at least 12 issues a year, Michigan AFL-CIO News; publishing more than 12 issues a year, Kenosha (Wisc.) Labor.

Local unions—15,000 or more circulation, Union Leader, Food & Commercial Workers Local 400, Landover, Md.; 7,500 to 15,000 circulation, Local 342 Forefront, UFCW Local 342, Jamaica, N.Y.; 2,500 to 7,500 circulation, Los Angeles Fire Fighter, IAFF Local 112; less than 2,500 circulation, College Union Voice, Cook County (Ill.) Teachers Union.

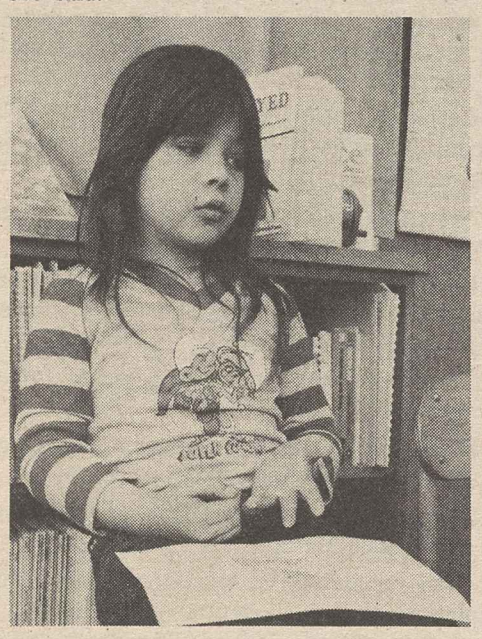
Unemployment's children
They're growing up old

The following is Daphne Siev White's article which won for her the ILCA's Max Steinbock Award. The story appeared in the April 1983 issue of the AFT's On Campus publication.

"My mother is unemployed, my father is unemployed; I was going to shovel snow and no snow fell, so now I'm unemployed."

Dawn is nine years old, and she is frightened. Her family is facing eviction; her out-of-work parents yell at her and each other more than they used to, and they spend little time with her. She is afraid one day her angry parents will leave her.

"One day I cried so hard I couldn't stop," she said. Jennifer is 11, and until recently she didn't know what the word unemployment meant. The way some adults discussed it, she thought it meant "somebody going to jail." Jennifer's father had been laid off, but just as he was recalled, her mother lost her job. "Next thing I know my dog will be unemployed," she said.



Dawn—a victim of unemployment.

Jennifer recently had a dream about unemployment. "I fell asleep and I had a dream that we were going to go poor and have to get rid of my dog. I started crying in my dream. Then my parents got in a car accident but they had no car insurance. The car was ruined and we couldn't afford another one."

Dawn and Jennifer, who both attend the Carver Elementary School in Detroit, are two of the estimated 13 million children who will be living in households affected by unemployment this year. Research shows that such children are more likely to suffer from malnutrition, more likely to be abused, less likely to receive medical care and more likely to display behavior problems than children of working parents.

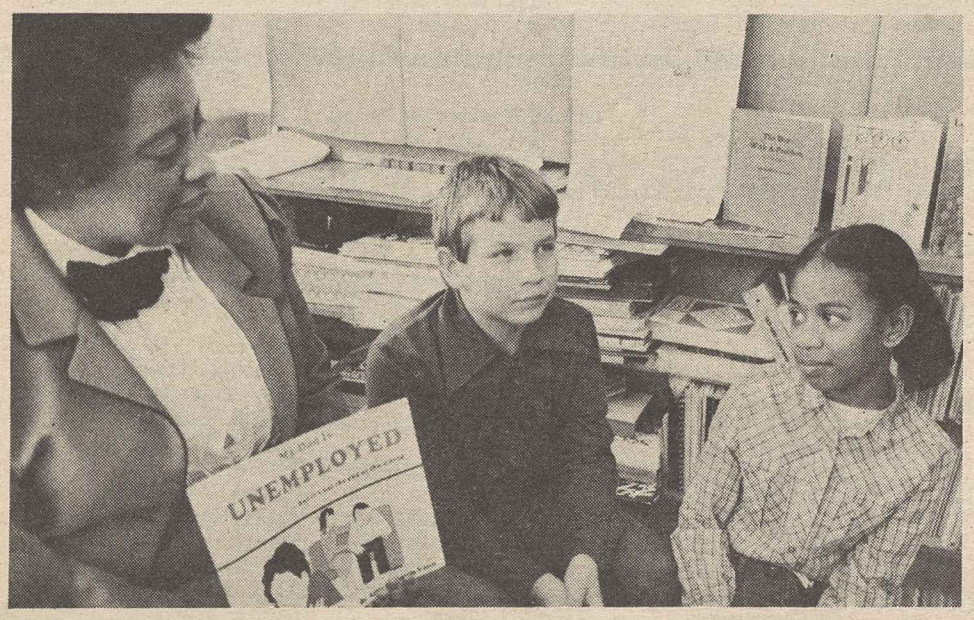
Stress factor

"If I were to select one stress [factor] as the most damaging and disruptive to children, it would be the loss of work by their parents," pediatrician Lewis H. Margolis told a congressional subcommittee earlier this year. Yet, "children are more likely to experience parental unemployment than the death of a parent, divorce or even major illness. Indeed, exposure to unemployment is so widespread that if it were an infectious disease like polio or measles, our nation would vigorously pursue policies against it," said Margolis, a researcher at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill.

Despite the magnitude of the problem, very little has been done to address the needs of children in this situation. This is partly because unemployment is often masked by alcoholism, divorce, mental illness and other family troubles.

Recently, guidance counselors and teachers in areas with high jobless rates have begun to realize that many children whose grades and demeanor suddenly change for the worse may have a common problem: out-of-work parents.

"About two and a half years ago I started getting an increased number of referrals, children who were acting out, daydreaming, coming in looking disheveled and getting into fights," said Artie Morris-Vann, a Detroit guidance counselor who works at both Carver and Mann elementary schools. "As I worked with these children, I stumbled across the fact that most of them came from families in which one, but usually both, parents was unemployed."



Artie Morris-Vann counsels students.

Vann, a member of the Detroit Federation of Teachers and one of the pioneers in helping the children of the unemployed, looked in vain for guidance materials in the field. Vann believes in the technique of bibliotherapy—using the situations and feelings in a book as jumping-off points for discussion of readers' feelings—and so she wrote a book, with the help of some of her students, about a child whose father is unemployed.

The book, My Dad Is Unemployed . . . But It's Not the End of the World, is now used in school districts across the country. Vann herself published the book and an accompanying activities guide, and about 5,000 copies have already been sold to districts in Texas, Florida, North Carolina, Maryland, California and other states. The book is aimed at elementary school students, but the activities guide can be used with all grade levels.

The book begins, "Dad used to go to work every day. One day dad came home from work and didn't smile or hug mom and me like he always did. He looked real sad. He looked as if he might cry. . . . I had never seen him cry before. I was confused. Finally, I decided to ask mom and dad what the word 'unemployed' means."

'Things got awful'

At first the child is pleased at the prospect of spending more time with his dad. But soon the reality of unemployment begins to intrude. "Things really got awful at my house with dad unemployed," the book continues. "Everything and everyone seemed to change. My favorite red fruit punch drink started tasting yukky. I told mom it needed more sugar. All of a sudden she started yelling and screaming at me about the cost of sugar and something about a budget. She even slapped me. She never did that before. Then mom started crying. I cried, too."

By reading this book with small groups, Vann and other counselors are able to explore children's feelings about what is occurring in their homes. Often, a child's first reaction is relief that he is not the only one in the world with unemployed parents. Children also share their feelings of guilt and embarrassment about loss of family income and pride.

Students often discuss their fears: fears of selling the car, the dog, the house, fears of being evicted like some of their neighbors, fears of being deserted by jobless parents.

Such fears are not unfounded. While being interviewed for this report in Detroit, Drew Middle School counselor Brendolyn Black was called away to help find a temporary shelter for two of her students who had been abandoned by their mother.

In order to cope with the reality of unemployment, children in these groups discuss ways to have fun without spending money, by jogging, going to the library, playing checkers or engaging in low-cost hobbies. Some of the older students try to find jobs of their own, and many actually give some of this money to their parents.

At Drew Middle School, Carl gives half the money he earns on his paper route to his mother, who is studying to be a nurse. One of his classmates, Tanisha, is pursuing an opportunity advertised on the back of a matchbook: "It says there is no age or sex discrimination, no experience is needed, and you can earn $100 a week by getting information for their directory," Tanisha said. "I want to give $50 to my mother and save the other half so I can buy a typewriter."

Value of education

While the children are becoming aware of the harshness of economic realities at a young age, they are also learning about the value of education for the jobs of the future. "All the jobs in the future will be to fix robots and do computer programming," said Peter, a Detroit fifth grader.

Teachers and guidance counselors in areas with high unemployment rates are making special efforts to hold job fairs and career-related activities for their students.

For some students, however, this career awareness comes too late. A juvenile court judge from Wisconsin, Charles B. Schudson, recently told Congress that many of the offenders he sees have stopped caring about their future: "I often say to a child in court, 'You have 60 more years to live. What you do with the next year [on probation or in reform school] will make those years good or bad.' Often, the responding glare is, 'Hey Judge, terrific—60 years of unemployment!' "

While Schudson is pessimistic about the youth that come before him (saying, "In anger and frustration, they will rape, rob and murder others and destroy themselves"), not all children of unemployed parents go that route.

At Carver Elementary School, for example, many of the children of unemployed parents felt their homes were more loving than those of rich children. "Rich people don't have the love because they can buy things, but poor people have to stick with each other. All they can give is love," said 12-year-old Marvin.

"Sometimes parents don't see their kids as much, but when they are unemployed they can see their kids a lot," echoed Lowanda.

Unemployment can wreak havoc with children's lives. But with help from school counselors others, the burden they carry can be made a little lighter.

South Africa protests widening

Police arrest AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Donahue and Newspaper Guild President Charles A. Perlik, Jr., during labor protest at South African embassy.

Solidarity marchers press release of jailed unionists

By James M. Shevis

American workers demonstrated against South Africa's apartheid policy of racial segregation and demanded the release of 21 black trade unionists jailed without charges in that country. Protests spread from Washington to South African consulates in five other cities.

"This is a workers' protest, a people's protest," AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue declared just before he and two other union leaders were arrested in Washington near the South African embassy.

"We need to press for peaceful change in South Africa," Donahue stressed, and he predicted that change will come to that racist country one way or another.

Donahue, Newspaper Guild President Charles A. Perlik, Jr., and Steelworkers Vice President Leon Lynch were arrested after they crossed a police barricade Dec. 4, and they spent the night in a District of Columbia jail. This brought to 22 the number of prominent persons arrested in Washington since demonstrations at the South African embassy began on Nov. 21. They offered themselves for arrest by deliberate, peaceful violation of restrictions on demonstrations near embassies in order to focus public attention on South Africa's repression.

More than 500 marchers, carrying signs protesting South Africa's racist and anti-labor oppression, paraded peacefully at a prescribed distance from the embassy. They were there in response to AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland's call for a turnout to send the South African government a message that they stood side by side with that nation's embattled blacks.

Condemning repression

"On behalf of millions of American trade unionists, we assemble here today to condemn that repressive government," Donahue declared at a sidewalk news conference during the demonstration.

"In the AFL-CIO, we are black and white, male and female, and old and young —together. We are the broadest cross-section of society that exists in America," Donahue said.

"Together, we speak not alone of black issues or white issues but of human issues, of labor issues, of issues which unite all workers. If our sisters and brothers are enslaved anywhere, if trade union rights are denied anywhere, freedom is threatened everywhere."

Meanwhile, as the protests escalated in this country, Kirkland was en route to Brussels for an executive board meeting of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, which has been instrumental in the development of the black trade union movement in South Africa.

Donahue noted that Kirkland and other ICFTU board members would have been joined there by Gen. Sec. Piroshaw Camay of the Council of Unions of South Africa were he not confined to a South African jail.

Shared view

While the immediate focus of the labor demonstration was on the plight of the imprisoned South African blacks, the rally was as much a protest of the Reagan Administration's "constructive engagement" policy toward South Africa as it was a condemnation of that nation's brutal treatment of black workers.

Donahue charged that the Administration's diplomatic and economic approach to South Africa, which winks at its racist practices, amounts to tacit approval of that country's social policies.

Support for this view came the same day

Right-wing agenda seeks tighter squeeze on labor

By David L. Perlman

A right-wing group that was influential in shaping the Reagan Administration's first-term agenda has drawn up a second-term blueprint that proposes to drop the other shoe on the trade union movement.

That's the thrust of the labor chapter of the Heritage Foundation's recommendations for "continuing the conservation revolution." Its second-term proposals include:

- Repeal of all prevailing wage laws.
- Amending the Hobbs Act so as to subject union members accused of misconduct on the picket line to federal criminal charges.
- Weakening wage-hour law protections.
- Making it illegal to consider "socially desirable factors" in making pension fund investments.
- Bringing the National Labor Relations Board career staff under closer political control.

Labor Sec. Raymond J. Donovan and NLRB Chairman Donald L. Dotson both come in for high praise. But the report complains that Republicans in Congress didn't fight hard enough for legislation opposed by unions. It also urges President Reagan to "rid his staff of their inordinate fear of union leadership."

The chapter on the Labor Dept. and the NLRB was written by Steven M. Antosh, executive director of the virulently anti-union Center on National Labor Policy. Its fund-raising appeals have asked contributions to combat "ruthless union bosses."

With its prestige enhanced by demonstrated influence in the Reagan Administration, the Heritage Foundation has been less shrill in its recent fund-raising. But when it was just another right-wing group, it asked for contributions for a special "Fund to Stop Big Labor" and said money was desperately needed to prevent Congress from imposing "compulsory unionism on our armed forces."

That fund appeal warned of soldiers "going on strike before a combat alert" and "shutting down a strategic airbase during contract negotiations."

The foundation's second-term blueprint, which White House officials passed out at

U.S. trade deficit tops $100 billion, new policy urged

The AFL-CIO called for urgent action to reverse the nation's soaring trade deficit, which grew by $9.2 billion in October and passed the $100-billion mark for the first time ever.

"It is safe to say that no other country in the world would stand idly by in the face of such a disastrous economic situation," Federation Research Director Rudy Oswald declared as the Commerce Dept. announced the new figures.

"Both the economic and trade policies of the Reagan Administration must be changed to defend U.S. domestic industries and to prevent the wholesale destruction of America's industrial base," Oswald said.

"The issue is not free trade or protectionism, but the future health of the United States."

Corporate taxes still shrinking

The corporate share of the tax burden is continuing to drop, a congressional study confirmed. Last year, taxes on corporate earnings accounted for only 6 percent of federal revenues, down from 8 percent in fiscal 1982, 10.2 percent in 1981 and 12.5 percent in 1980.

The study, by the staff of the Joint Committee on Taxation, was requested by Representatives Don J. Pease (D-Ohio) and Byron L. Dorgan (D-N.D.). It showed that individual income tax brought in 48.1 percent of tax revenue, close to the pattern of recent years. The next largest source of federal revenue was from the social security payroll tax, which accounted for 34.8 percent of federal tax revenues.

Thirty years ago, the corporate share of taxes was 30.3 percent, and 20 years ago it came to 20.9 percent.

Pease termed the survey "powerful evidence" of the need for tax reforms.

Taxes avoided

Dorgan noted that while working families with moderate incomes pay a significant amount of income taxes, the study shows "corporations making hundreds of millions of dollars in profits and paying little or no income taxes."

A recent survey by Citizens for Tax Justice found that 128 of 250 major U.S. companies paid no federal income tax at all in at least one of the past three years.

The congressional study showed wide differences in the effective corporate tax for different industries, depending on the availability of the various forms of tax credits and deductions that Congress has added over the years.

It noted also that in almost all industries the effective corporate tax rate in the United States is lower than in other countries. In 1983, corporations paid an average 16 percent of U.S. income in taxes but paid to other countries taxes equivalent to 54.3 percent of their foreign income.

'85 bargaining puts focus on public sector

The year 1985 will be a relatively light bargaining year in private industry, but a busy one for state and local governments, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

In the private sector, 537 contracts covering 2.4-million workers under major agreements — those involving 1,000 or more workers — come up for renewal. That is fewer than one-third of the 7.4-million workers under major contracts scheduled either to expire or be reopened next year.

On the other hand, 288 state and local government agreements covering 1.1-million workers are slated for negotiation in 1985. That represents more than half — 55 percent — of the 2-million state and local government employees under major agreements.

About 596,000 of the government workers are state employees covered by 96 expiring contracts. Some 544,000 are local government workers under 196 expiring pacts. This is the first year that BLS has published data on upcoming state and local government contract expirations.

Workers involved in next year's private sector bargaining are in trucking, men's and women's apparel, construction, rubber, electrical products, and auto.

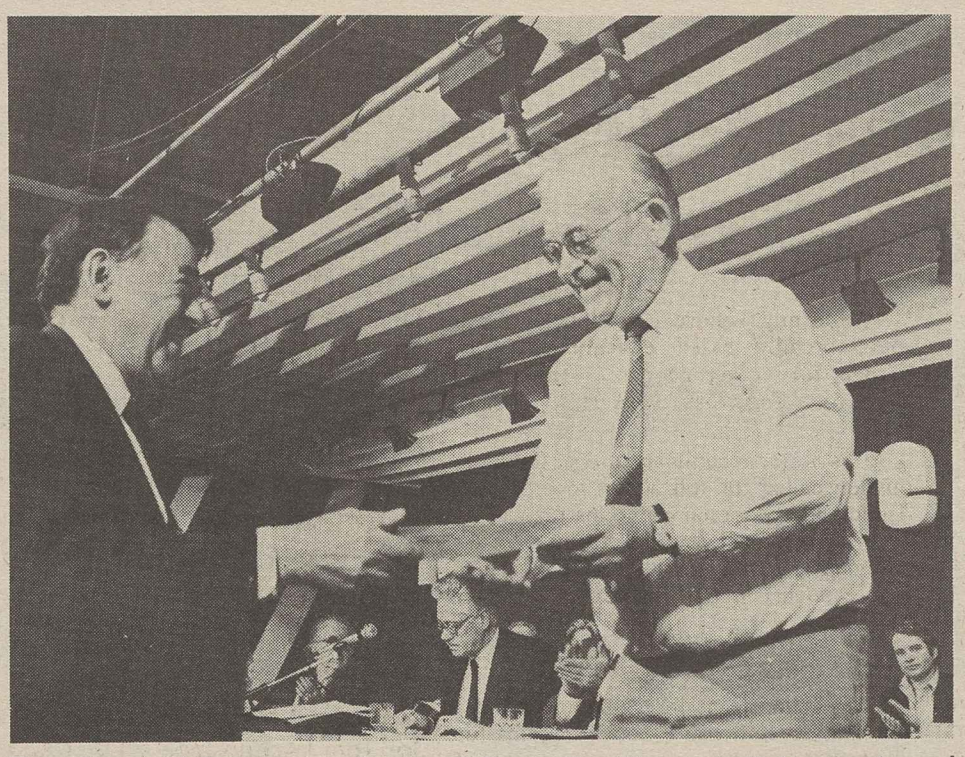
Busiest period

The heaviest bargaining period will climax in June, when 261 agreements covering 1.1-million workers in state and local government, electrical products, and construction trade are scheduled for expiration or reopening.

Deferred wage increases resulting from contracts negotiated earlier are slated next year for 3.8 million of the 9.4-million workers under major collective bargaining agreements. The average increase will be 4 percent with workers in private industry averaging 3.7 percent and those in the public sector averaging 5.5 percent.

The BLS said deferred increases in private industry next year will be the lowest since the agency began compiling such information in 1970.

Fifty-eight percent or 2.4 million of the workers covered by cost-of-living adjustment clauses will receive wage changes in 1985 because of those provisions.



Gen.-Sec. André Bergeron of France's Force Ouvriére accepts Meany Award from AFL-CIO International Affairs Director Irving Brown.

Meany human rights award goes to French labor body

Paris—France's free trade union confederation, Force Ouvriére, and its general secretary, André Bergeron, were honored with the 1984 George Meany International Human Rights Award for their efforts in support of independent trade unionism.

The presentation was made on behalf of the AFL-CIO Executive Council by Irving Brown, director of the federation's Dept. of International Affairs, at FO's 15th Congress here.

The Meany award, established in memory of the late AFL-CIO leader and his commitment to the cause of human rights and dignity throughout the world, consists of a plaque and a check for $5,000. Previous winners included Neil Aggett and Mangosuthu Gatsha Buthelezi, champions of black rights in South Africa; Lech Walesa, chairman of Poland's Solidarity free trade union, and the International Rescue Committee for its work in behalf of refugees.

In his remarks, Brown noted that both Bergeron and FO have been fighting for more than 40 years to develop a free trade union movement in France that would be independent of any political party or foreign power. FO stoutly resisted communist attempts to take over the nation's trade unions after World War II.

"These is no question they are on the road to becoming the leading trade union movement in France," Brown said. "FO now has the strength and the possibility to move into a new stage of becoming a stronger organization than it has ever been since the split from the communists in 1947."

The award also recognized FO's key role in support of Poland's Solidarity both before and after the military takeover by Gen. Wojciech Jarulzelski. It was an FO delegate to the International Labor Organization who took the initiative to file a complaint against the Polish communist government last spring for its suppression of trade union rights, Brown observed.

That complaint resulted in a report by an ILO Commission of Inquiry condemning the Polish government for its violations of international labor conventions on freedom of association and the right to organize and bargain collectively. The report was upheld at last month's meeting of the ILO Governing Body in Geneva.

Survey finds layoff victims still suffering

The recession still isn't over for most workers who lost their jobs because of plant closings or heavy layoffs, a Bureau of Labor Statistics study found.

Only 60 percent of a group chosen for its attachment to the work force had found new jobs by last January. And of those who did, nearly half had to take pay cuts.

These are some of the findings of a BLS study that focused on 5.1 million workers whose jobs have been permanently eliminated since 1979. About half the job losses were in the manufacturing sector—the nation's eroding industrial base. Most took place during the 1981-83 period, which included the Reagan recession.

The study, based on a census survey requested by the Employment & Training Administration, covered persons who had worked at their place of employment for at least three years before their jobs were eliminated. More than 30 percent had 10 or more years of seniority.

As of the January 1984 survey, only 60 percent of the displaced workers were employed. More than 25 percent were classified as unemployed and actively seeking jobs. The remainder had dropped out of the workforce—because of age, lack of job opportunities in their communities, ill health or some combination of reasons.

Of those re-employed, 367,000 who had lost full-time jobs were in part-time work, and several hundred thousand were self-employed.

The BLS survey found some 2 million re-employed persons whose full-time earnings in old and new jobs could be compared.

Reduced pay

Of these, nearly half took a pay cut and slightly more than half were at the same or higher pay levels. But the pay differentials were greatest for those who took a cut. There were 621,000 persons whose pay at their new jobs was at least 20 percent below their previous level and 533,000 at least 20 percent higher.

These were some of the other findings of the BLS study:

- Re-employment was highest—about 75 percent—among those who had lost managerial and professional jobs. It was lowest among the least skilled.
- Workers displaced from jobs in durable goods manufacturing were more likely to be taking a pay cut in a new job.
- About half the workers surveyed had lost their jobs because their company or plant had closed down or moved. The heaviest concentration of the displaced workers was in the East North Central bloc of states and in the Middle Atlantic region. Only about half the job-losers in these two areas found other jobs.
- Re-employment prospects decreased with age, with the sharpest drop in the 55 and older groups.
- The re-employment average was 62.6 percent for whites, 41.8 percent for blacks and 52.2 percent for workers of Hispanic origin. Within each category, the male re-employment rate was higher than that for women.

Right-wing blueprint targets labor

a Cabinet meeting, urges the Labor Dept. to put even more of its resources into investigating unions and protecting individual members from their unions. The Landrum-Griffin Act should be amended to strengthen the government's authority, the report recommends.

It praises Donovan for cutting the Labor Dept. budget more than any other Cabinet department and changing the direction of the Occupational Safety & Health Administration so that only 3 percent of its citations are contested by employers—down from 22 percent in 1980.

Donovan also gets high marks for his attempt to lower the minimum wage for youth and his efforts to legalize industrial homework. But more effort should have been made to change policy through legislation, the Heritage Foundation chides.

Even though unions "vociferously" opposed the Reagan Administration, there was little attempt to mobilize congressional Republicans, the report complains. It urges that Senators "more supportive" of Reagan policies be put on the Senate Labor & Human Resources Committee. And it singles out for special disapproval the moderate views of Sen. Lowell P. Weicker, Jr. (R-Conn.).

Sen. Jesse Helms (R-N.C.), who stands to the far right of Senate Republicans, has perennially sought to push through an amendment to the Federal Election Campaign Act that would bar unions from funding non-partisan voter registration and get-out-the-vote drives. "The Administration should support this strongly," the report urges.

Amendment of the Hobbs Act to make the federal anti-extortion law applicable to picket line "violence" in labor disputes is needed to protect the right of employees to work during a strike, the report insists.

Regulatory changes

Both the Davis-Bacon Act, applying to federally-funded construction projects, and the Service Contract Act have been gravely weakened by regulatory changes made in Reagan's first Administration.

Further regulatory changes should be made, the Heritage Foundation contends. But its solution of choice is "outright repeal," which it complains "the Reagan Administration has been reluctant to request."

The recommendation that "the concept of a socially desirable investment should be made "illegal" under the law regulating pension funds would bar any attempt to give preference to investments that would create jobs for union members. It also would prevent a policy of not investing in firms cooperating in South African race discrimination or in companies notorious for union-busting.

Reversals welcomed

In its section on the National Labor Relations Board, the Heritage report welcomes reversals of previous policy adopted by the board's Reagan-appointed majority.

The report is critical of the White House's "neglect" of the agency and Reagan's failure to move promptly to fill vacancies with his own appointees. It suggests that the President appoint a White House staff member to "coordinate labor policy and agency appointments."

It recommends legislation that would substantially reduce the number of establishments and workers covered by federal labor law, both by raising the volume-of-business test for coverage and excluding firms with fewer than 15 employees.

Other recommendations would weaken the independent powers of the NLRB general counsel, bring more people with private sector labor relations experience into the agency, and put the 33 regional directors under political control. They would be either direct political appointees or senior executives subject to replacement at will.

Labor Dept. announces appointments to bureau

Ronald J. St. Cyr has been appointed deputy under secretary of labor to head the Labor Dept.'s newly created Bureau of Labor-Management Relations & Cooperative Programs. St. Cyr had been acting head of the Labor-Management Services Administration since March 1983 when Donald T. Dotson left to accept appointment as chairman of the NLRB.

John R. Stepp, director of the Office of Labor-Management Relations Services since 1980, was named associate deputy under secretary.

Milton Plumb, 69, dies, former AFL-CIO staffer

Milton Plumb, a well-known labor journalist and publicist and a former AFL-CIO News staff member, died Nov. 27 of a heart attack at the age of 69.

A charter member of the Newspaper Guild, Plumb worked for Detroit newspapers in the 1930s and was an information official at the Library of Congress for 12 years. In 1951, he was named assistant publicity director of the CIO and after the merger became an assistant editor of the AFL-CIO News. Subsequently, he served as public relations director of the Railway Labor Executives' Association and later established his own public relations firm in Washington. He retired in 1980.

Survivors include his wife, Libby, a son and two daughters.

Shortchanging students

Panel scores neglect of vocational studies

By Susan Dunlop

A healthy balance of both academic and vocational courses is the best educational "diet" for all high school students, college-bound or not, the National Commission on Secondary Vocational Education concluded in its report.

Vocational education should not be considered a "dumping ground" for any student, but as a full and equal part of the educational process that helps prepare all students for the working world, the report stressed.

Titled "The Unfinished Agenda," the report was released by the commissioners Nov. 29 at a news conference in Washington, D.C. and is the result of seven months of study by a 14-member commission drawn from education, business and labor.

The commission was chaired by Prof. Harry F. Silberman of the University of California at Los Angeles and its members included Jim Auerbach, staff representative with the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education.

Similar problems

Among its findings, the report pointed out that secondary vocational education teachers suffer from the same problems outlined in numerous other reports on American education—"they tend to be underpaid, underprepared and asked to work miracles."

Recruitment of all teachers is hampered by low salaries, but "additional incentives" such as scholarships, extended pay for more time at work and opportunities to upgrade skills could help, the report observed.

Teachers' President Albert Shanker called the study "welcome and necessary," particularly in the light of other recent reports on education that have ignored or downplayed the importance of vocational teaching.

"Vocational education can provide a rigorous basic education and more advanced preparation for the world of work," Shanker said. "We need not sacrifice all of our vocational programs for increased academic requirements in schools. We can find ways to integrate literature, science, mathematics across disciplines to insure that all students leave our schools prepared for whatever life offers."

In its research, the commission found that in 1982, 27 percent of all high school seniors were enrolled in vocational programs, and 95 percent of all public high school graduates that year had earned some credit in vocational courses.

Vocational courses are usually grouped into nine areas: agriculture, business, marketing, technical, health, trades and industry, vocational home economics, industrial arts and consumer home economics.

Of the nation's more than 350,000 vocational education teachers, about half teach at the high school level, and about one-fourth teach part-time while holding other jobs in private industry.

Devalued programs

The panel found that a common perception about vocational education is that it prepares students for "low-status" jobs. Because many parents and some educators "devalue" school programs that aren't a prerequisite for college, vocational and occupational schooling is also unfairly devalued.

The commission stressed that a "more balanced approach" to excellence in secondary schools would provide all students with "a mix of both academic and vocational courses and enough elective options to match their interests and learning styles." Vocational education "must be a significant part of a quality high school education," the panel said.

AFL-CIO Education Director Dorothy Shields pointed out that many of the report's recommendations parallel organized labor's long-standing positions on education.

"We firmly believe in the need for a solid, broadly based educational background for young people as the strong foundation for work or college," Shields said.

In its major recommendations, the commission called for full access to both academic and vocational programs for all students and stressed the importance of counseling, interest and aptitude assessment to help students make choices and career plans.

Equal access

The commission called for guarantees of equal access to all school programs for all students regardless of sex. The needs of handicapped students for full access were also underscored.

The recommendations urged schools not to provide "separate tracks" that lead to different diplomas and suggested that states not create curriculum requirements that restrict students' opportunities to take vocational courses.

For teachers, the commission urged action by university teacher educators and local school officials to upgrade the quality and performance of vocational educators, including improvements in certification requirements and competitive salaries and incentives.

The commission also stressed the importance of a continued and expanded federal government role in vocational education, not only for funding—about $900 million in federal money is spent on vocational programs each year—but also to assure equal access to programs for all students. The report pointed out, however, that federal standards or funds should "supplement, not supplant" active state and local roles in vocational schooling.

Cooperation urged

The commission strongly recommended a continued and improved cooperation between the schools and business, labor and the community in the development and design of vocational and career education.

Collaboration between business, labor and the schools sometimes breaks down "partly because school personnel do not initiate the request or do not give a complete and equal role to those who accept the invitation," the report noted.

"Field-based learning" or the chance for students to learn while working should also play a greater role in vocational programs, the report suggested.

Buffalo area training center to aid laid-off GM workers

Buffalo, N.Y. — Some 3,500 laid-off General Motors employees represented by the Auto Workers will receive training for new jobs under a $1.6-million program to assist dislocated workers in the western New York area.

In addition, an undetermined number of active GM workers who face possible layoff due to changing situations in the auto industry will be retrained for jobs either within or outside the company.

The training and retraining will take place at the renovated headquarters of a trucking firm in Cheektowaga, across from Buffalo International Airport. Funding is provided by a special GM-UAW national training fund, first negotiated in 1982 and expanded in the parties' recently negotiated contract.

Announcement of the training program —the sixth to be undertaken jointly by the union and the company in the last two years—was made at the training site by UAW President Owen Bieber; UAW Vice Pres. Donald F. Ephlin, who directs the union's GM department, and Alfred S. Warren, Jr., vice president in charge of GM's industrial relations staff.

"This center and others like it around the country reflect a high level of joint commitment by the UAW and GM to the principle that workers are not mere pieces of machinery to be discarded along the way as this industry transforms itself," Bieber said.

"We are determined to minimize job losses in the first instance, and to pay proper attention to the needs of those who must be laid off."

Ephlin and Warren said the programs will be linked to community educational institutions, private industry councils, social service agencies and employment service and economic development agencies in western New York.

Provided by contract

The UAW-GM contract provides for a Joint Skill Development & Training Committee to promote training, retraining, and related activities to upgrade the skills of GM workers nationwide, and to help them maintain their employment or find new employment.

Similar projects have been set up in California and at four locations in Michigan—Flint, Pontiac, Saginaw-Bay City and Detroit.

Under the union contract, the company provides funding at the rate of five cents an hour worked by each UAW-represented employee for certain projects and an additional 10 cents an hour worked for other training-related programs.

Firm ordered to clean up mercury

Poultney, Vt.—The State of Vermont has ordered the Staco, Inc./Chase Instruments Corp. to hire a professional to purge the harmful element mercury from the homes of its workers who are represented by the Furniture Workers.

The UFWA is pressing Staco for a severance pay settlement for the 45 workers the firm laid off when it chose to shut down its thermometer plant rather than comply with state regulations on worker safety and health.

Last spring, the state health department ordered the plant closed after urine tests revealed elevated levels of mercury in the workers and in their children. Exposure to mercury for extended periods can cause damage to the liver, kidneys, and central nervous system, as well as brain damage, nausea and dizziness.

The Chase division produces glass products, including thermometer tubes, while the Staco plant fills the thermometers with mercury.

The Vermont Occupational Safety & Health Administration had inspected the plant in 1983 and found mercury above permissible levels throughout the plant. Mercury was found in the lunch room, on the snack, soft drink and change machines and on the refrigerator and napkin holder.

Tests run on 23 of the workers' children showed 18 with elevated levels of mercury in their urine. The state health department pressed the company to provide clean-up for the workers' homes. Yet two separate clean-up efforts by the company failed to reduce the mercury contamination to safe levels, and two families were evacuated from their homes.

Lack of trust

A survey by the UFWA in mid-November showed many Staco workers had refused to allow the company to monitor and clean up their homes because they didn't trust the firm to do it properly, UFWA safety coordinator Jamie Cohen said.

The UFWA pressed the health department for an order that Staco hire professional cleaners with experience in removing mercury and stressed the need for emergency aid to workers forced to vacate their homes. The union pointed out that some workers might refuse the clean-up effort because they can't afford temporary housing, having been out of work since last June. The health department issued such an order Nov. 16.

UFWA President Carl Scarbrough charged "these workers have been victimized by a company that feels no responsibility to its employees. When the health department got after them to correct the situation and they were fined $170,000 to clean up the Poultney sewage system, after letting mercury drain into the sewers, they took the easy way out. They closed down the plant and threw 50 or our members out of work."

UFWA District Rep. Keith Sweeney, who has been negotiating with the company to gain severance pay and benefits for the laid-off workers, said Staco rejected all the union proposals and said it considers negotiations closed.

Postal Workers' officers win rerun

Top officers of the Postal Workers, headed by President Moe Biller and Sec.-Treas. Douglas C. Holbrook, were re-elected in a nationwide mail ballot.

The election was a rerun of last year's vote, which was set aside by the Labor Dept. after protests by unsuccessful candidates were upheld. The only change from the 1983 outcome came in a three-way contest for the post of education and research director. Michael G. Zullo, the previous incumbent who had trailed in the 1983 vote, won the rerun.

The results, certified by both Labor Dept. representatives and the APWU Election Committee, gave Biller 53,046 votes to 42,971 for David E. Daniel of the Huntington, W.Va., local.

Marchers file outside the South African embassy to protest that country's jailing of black unionists. More than 500 took part in the labor demonstration.

in an appearance by Bishop Desmond M. Tutu, the black Anglican who won the Nobel Peace Prize this year, before members of the House Foreign Affairs subcommittee on Africa.

Tutu termed the Administration's policy toward South Africa "immoral, evil and totally un-Christian," and offered to meet with the President.

Donahue called on the Administration to bring greater pressure on South Africa to grant voting privileges and other fundamental human rights to blacks, who make up three-fourths of the population.

"For 30 years, we in the AFL-CIO have decried the South African system of apartheid which breeds these violations of human rights," he told newsmen.

"We have said repeatedly that if South Africa persists in the denial of trade union rights, persists in its efforts to strip away the citizenship of its 73-percent black population, and persists in the forced relocation of that population, then our government must act forthrightly to assist South African workers by a selective ban on the import of South African products.

"We have said U.S. actions must continue, if necessary, to such measures as a full boycott, barring of new investment, complete disinvestment, and the severing of all social, cultural, and diplomatic ties with South Africa.

"Today, after 30 years of protesting, it is time to get on with this program."

Biggest yet

The Washington demonstration was by far the largest yet held at the embassy, drawing hundreds of pickets from dozens of AFL-CIO unions.

At least two dozen international and national union presidents were on hand as were the heads of a dozen state AFL-CIO federations. Fifty trainees and upgraders from the Seafarers' Harry Lundeberg School of Seamanship in Piney Point, Md., were there and a delegation of 100 from the State, County & Municipal Employees, including the union's 25-member executive board, also were on hand.

The spreading protest against South Africa's apartheid policy brought out union members in New York, Chicago, Houston, Los Angeles, and Seattle, and organizers pledged the demonstrations would keep up until the imprisoned blacks were released.

In New York, six black leaders were arrested after they blocked the entrance to the South African consulate. Among those arrested was former New York Deputy Mayor Basil A. Paterson, two state legislators, and several civil rights leaders.

About 200 people representing labor and civil rights groups marched outside the South African consulate in Beverly Hills, Calif., demanding the immediate release of the black unionists, who were jailed for their role in a two-day strike last month in which hundreds of thousands of South African black workers stayed away from their jobs.

Global impact

Joining the protesters in Washington, the District of Columbia's delegate to Congress, the Rev. Walter Fauntroy, thanked the AFL-CIO for mounting the nationwide labor demonstrations, saying that now "the American people will know that this is a cause that affects not only blacks but working people all over the globe."

The Steelworkers' Lynch, who is the union's vice president for human affairs, called for changes in policies in both Pretoria and Washington.

"There is an attitude of complicity in this Administration which finds acceptable not only racism as a national policy but the repression which characterizes regimes of fascist or military control," he charged.

"We are outraged at what is happening in South Africa. Our actions are directed toward that government. . . . and our own makers of foreign policy who are willing to accommodate to those actions."

TNG's Perlik said the Guild has long agonized over its black brothers and sisters in the South African newspaper industry who have been banned, driven from their jobs, and imprisoned for seeking to give a voice to their fellow citizens.

'Time for action'

"We have sent telegrams, letters, and resolutions of protests to the racist government of South Africa, asking that it desist," Perlik said. "They have gone unanswered and unheeded. . . . It is time for an end to words and the beginning of action.

"It is time to end American industries' complicity in this unspeakable system of apartheid."

The three union leaders jailed overnight in Washington were charged with crossing police lines as they sought to take their demands to the South African ambassador. Police told them the embassy was closed for business, and arrested them as they proceeded toward the embassy. The charge, a misdemeanor, is punishable by a $300 fine and/or 10 days in jail.

As he headed toward the embassy, Donahue led the demonstrators in a chorus of "Solidarity Forever," a tune sung over and over during the afternoon protest. Also heard during the cold vigil were "We Shall Overcome," the civil rights song that punctuated the freedom fighters' rallies of the Sixties in the United States, and chants of "Free the Union 21! Free the Union 21!"

State AFL-CIO presidents from 11 states—Pennsylvania, West Virginia, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Maryland, Mississippi, Tennessee, Alabama and Kentucky—also joined the protesters.

Embassy protesters carry signs bearing names of South African black trade unionists jailed without charges.

The 21 jailed unionists

The names and affiliations of the 21 jailed South African black unionists:

Piroshaw Camay, general secretary of the Council of Unions of South Africa; Chris Dlamini, president of the Federation of South African Trade Unions; Moses Mayekiso, Metal & Allied Workers; Jethro Dlalisa, Transport & General Workers; Bangi Solo, National Union of Textile Workers; Xolami Ndona, Chemical Workers Industrial Union; Zanemvula Matela, Paper, Wood & Allied Workers; Amos Nkosi, Commercial, Catering & Allied Workers; Ntsikeldo Qaku, African Food & Canning Workers; Boy Nkese, South African Woodworkers.

Also, Andisi Xintolo, South African Woodworkers; Jerry Kau, National Automobile & Allied Workers; Themba Nontlatane, Municipal & General Workers; Thema Mbandluna, Municipal & General Workers; Zola Sekele, United Mining, Metal & Allied Workers; Gilbert Binda, United Mining, Metal & Allied Workers; Isaac Lehoko, United Mining, Metal & Allied Workers; Glenn Malela, United Mining, Metal & Allied Workers; Rita Mzanda, General & Allied Workers, and Amos Masondo, General & Allied Workers.

Other union leaders arrested at recent embassy protests have included AFSCME President Gerald McEntee, Auto Workers Vice President Marc Stepp, President William Simons of the Washington Teachers Union, District of Columbia AFL-CIO President Joslyn N. Williams, and Rep. Charles Hayes (D-Ill.), a former vice president of the Food & Commercial Workers.

On the day after the labor solidarity demonstration, AFSCME Sec.-Treas. William Lucy also was arrested, along with two congressmen, and charged with congregating within 500 feet of an embassy with intent to demonstrate.

Also detained have been several congressmen and civil rights leaders, including the daughter of slain black leader Martin Luther King, Jr.

The AFL-CIO has expanded its material support of South African black unions in recent years, establishing a special fund for that purpose at its 1981 convention. It has repeatedly registered shock and concern over the tragic consequences of apartheid, and has testified before Congress in support of measures that would bring pressure to bear on the South African government.

Among bills it has supported are those which would regulate the conduct of U.S. companies operating in South Africa, and require businesses to develop programs of equal opportunity and pay for black workers.

Productivity— Policies and Problems

By Bill Cunningham

American workers produced in 1983 goods and services worth on the average $19.50 an hour in all private industry and $22.50 per hour in manufacturing alone. That's more than twice as much as each worker produced 35 years ago, measured in dollars corrected for inflation. And the United States still maintains its lead as the most productive nation in the world, although some nations are catching up because their productivity is growing faster.

In 1983, American workers were 7 percent more productive than workers in Germany, 39 percent higher than Japanese workers, and 45 percent higher than those in the United Kingdom according to Labor Dept. figures on Gross Domestic Product per person employed.

Productivity gains are an engine of progress and contribute to a higher standard of living for all Americans when the gains lead to higher wages and benefits rather than only to higher profits. And higher wages increase consumer purchasing power, which is essential to keep the economy growing and healthy. Of course, higher wages and benefits are necessary to raise living standards, and workers' gains are best achieved when employees have a union to represent them. Unions have also been shown to contribute substantially to higher productivity.

Why Productivity Grows

An understanding of what causes productivity to grow is important to the development of improved economic policies. A key ingredient is a healthy economy with rapid business expansion. The strongest productivity growth is achieved when unemployment is falling and consumer demand is strong, because that climate stimulates the factors that lead to higher productivity.

The use of high interest rates and tight credit by the government to fight inflation tends to slow the growth of production and investment in the kinds of activities that raise productivity.

The factors contributing to higher productivity include investment for expansion and modernization of plant and equipment, on-the-job training programs, and school and university programs to train workers in the newest skills for growing job opportunities. Also, research and development spending leads to new products and production processes. Public infrastructure development, consisting of transportation systems, sewer and water systems, schools, and other public investment, provides support facilities essential for production of goods and services.

In a recent study of the relationship between productivity growth and output growth, Keith McKee and Carol Sessions of the Illinois Institute of Technology concluded that "most productivity improvement occurs because of an increase of output by the nation or by individual industries." Looking at U.S. industries they concluded, "Some industries did well and some poorly, but the first order trend was that productivity increased at the same rate as the rate of increase in output. Such a strong correlation was not anticipated and appears to indicate that the trend found for U.S. industries seems to follow that for the industrial nations."

Invest and Modernize

Investment for expansion and modernization of plant and equipment has more than kept up with the growth in the labor force, meaning that each worker works with far better equipment than in the past. According to the Bureau of Labor Statistics measure of potential capital services, the potential service available from plant and equipment has gone up 165 percent per hour worked since 1949. Although it declined in 1976-78, this measure began rising again in 1979 before dropping again in 1983.

The share of the nation's income devoted to investment in plant and equipment has been gradually rising since World War II as shown by the Commerce Dept.'s survey of Plant & Equipment Expenditures. Investment as a share of GNP rose from about 9.5 percent in the 1950s, hitting 11.2 percent in 1979 and 1980. The investment share fell during the recession to 9.2 percent in 1983.

Recent data, however, show contradictory investment figures, both weak and strong. The Commerce Dept.'s Plant & Equipment Survey shows investment at 9.2 percent of GNP in the first six months of 1984, reflecting no improvement over 1983. Another series from the Commerce Dept., on Fixed Nonresidential Investment, shows strong growth in investment registering a 11.5 percent share compared to 10.5 percent in 1983. Why the discrepancy exists and which series is more accurate remains to be determined.

A study by Edward Denison, a leading productivity expert, found that increases in the amount of plant and equipment account for about 15 percent of productivity growth in recent decades.

Investment for modernization of plant and equipment has gradually improved the quality and productive potential of the nation's workplaces, although some companies and industries have fallen behind. Plant and equipment have become increasingly more modern since World War II. The average age of plant and equipment in U.S. manufacturing fell from 13.9 years in 1945 to 9.0 years in 1981 before rising to 9.2 years in 1983 as a result of the recession, according to Commerce Dept. figures.

Education, a Vital Factor

The nation's commitment to education has improved the quality of the workforce, making a vital contribution to productivity. Better education through schools and training programs accounts for 20 percent of U.S. productivity growth in recent decades, according to Edward Denison's study. Advances in knowledge from all other sources contribute an additional 54 percent. Education provides the basis for inventions, new materials, and the improved flow of work from one operation to another. And education supplies the workforce with the basic skills for applying such advances in technology and know-how.

The 1.7 million patents issued in the United States since World War II testify to the scientific progress of the American people and to their ability to consistently develop new ways for producing more and better goods and services.

America's R&D Leadership

The United States is the world's leader in the development of new technology, and it spends more on research and development than Japan, France, and Germany combined. The National Science Foundation reports that in 1982, the United States spent $80 billion on R&D compared to $26 billion for Japan, $18 billion for Germany, and $11 billion for France. West Germany devotes a slightly larger share of its income to R&D — 2.81 percent of its gross national product compared to 2.63 percent for the United States. R&D accounts for about 2.4 percent of GNP in Japan and 2.1 percent in France. Scientists and engineers make up a larger share of the labor force in the United States than in any major competing country.

Spending on R&D has gradually expanded over the years. Overall spending for research and development rose to record levels each year after 1976 following a slump during the recession of 1974 and 1975. About $88 billion dollars, more than ever before, was spent in 1983 by private industry, universities, and government, with the federal government contributing 46 percent of that amount.

Scientific research and development helps raise productivity, through the development of new machines, new production methods, and new products. As with other factors contributing to productivity, research and development spending is much stronger when the economy is healthy.

Investment by federal, state and local governments makes a large contribution to improved productivity. Schools, colleges and universities increase the skill and knowledge of the workforce. Investment in transportation systems, public power projects, sewer and water systems, and police and fire stations provides the basic facilities necessary for the production of goods and services. Government antitrust enforcement of competition strengthens private institutions, also making possible higher productivity.

Elimination of discrimination on the basis of race, age, and sex also helps to raise productivity. Discrimination prevents people from using their talents to their utmost potential and results in lower overall productivity.

Education, training, investment, and research and development are the basic, long-run causes of the rise in productivity. At any given time, output per work-hour depends on how efficiently the economy is using its plant, equipment, and labor. A recession with layoffs and unused equipment results in a drop in productivity. Putting workers as well as idle machinery and equipment back to work will result in a rise in productivity.

A New Economic Climate

Economic circumstances that affect productivity growth have changed dramatically in recent decades. Increased foreign competition, high interest rates, more rapid fluctuations in business conditions, and the export of U.S. technology are major problems with which America must cope if the economy is to realize its productive potential.

Foreign competition increasingly comes from countries that give subsidies and assistance to their industries to help them win the competitive battle in world markets. Leading industrial countries have adopted coordinated industrial policies that increase the viability and competitiveness of their industries.

High Interest Rates

Interest rates have been at historically high levels during the past five years. Government policy of encouraging high interest rates to fight inflation, increasing demands for credit and the huge federal budget deficit have pushed up interest rates and thus made it more costly to finance new plant and equipment. The prime interest rate charged to large corporate borrowers rose from 6.8 percent in 1977 to a high of 18.9 percent in 1981 and was still over 11 percent in November 1984.

The real rate of interest, which is the actual rate less the rate of inflation, is thought by many experts to be a better indicator of the burden of interest rates on borrowers. The real rate of interest to large corporate borrowers averaged 8 percent over the past four years compared to 1.1 percent in the 1970s. The high cost of capital has put American producers at a great disadvantage in competing with foreign producers.

A study by George Hatsopoulous, a Director of the Federal Reserve Bank of Boston, argues that the high cost of capital is America's biggest handicap in competing with other nations. That study shows the real cost of capital in the United States at three times the level faced by Japanese business. According to the Hatsopoulous study, in 1981 Japan had a cost advantage of about $2,300 on a product costing $10,000 due to the lower cost of capital in Japan, in addition to the advantage due to lower labor costs.

The high interest rates have also raised the value of the dollar relative to the currencies of other nations, making it more difficult to export and to compete with imports. The higher U.S. interest rates are a major factor in the deterioration of U.S. competitiveness.

High interest rates and other nonlabor costs including profits and depreciation have been rising much faster than labor costs in the 1980s. From the first quarter 1980 to the third quarter 1984, unit nonlabor costs in private business rose 37 percent compared to a 24 percent rise in unit labor costs.

The ups and downs of the business cycle have become more frequent in recent years producing increasingly serious recessions and disappointing recoveries. The recessions have reduced consumer demand and created greater uncertainty for new investment.

nities. An example of this transfer of technology is the robotics industry. The United States is at the fore of the development of robots, but several U.S. companies producing robotics have licensed foreign manufacturers to produce robots invented in this country. Many robots introduced into Japanese industry are made in Japan with the permission of the U.S. companies that invented them, and Japan may become a major source of robots for the United States.

Industrial Policy

These changes in economic circumstances have prompted the AFL-CIO to give support to the proposals for an industrial policy to deal with the factors adverse to growth in production and productivity. Adoption of an industrial policy could signal a national commitment to the rebuilding of the industrial base as the foundation for long-term balanced growth and the fulfillment of the nation's commitment to a policy of full employment.

To that end, the AFL-CIO supports the proposal for a National Industrial Policy Board — including representatives of labor, business, academia, the public, and government — which would identify industries that are vital to national economic growth and employment and the industrial development priorities that should be assisted through targeted policies. The Board would oversee a National Industrial Development Bank, patterned after the Reconstruction Finance Corp. which operated from the late 1930s to about the mid-1950s. The bank would be authorized to make and guarantee loans to finance approved reindustrialization ventures.

Who Gets the Gains?

The success of the American economy is due in large part to a strong base of consumer purchasing power. Higher U.S. wages enabled America to lead the world in the adoption of mass production. Mass production is both a cause and result of high wages.

If wages and benefits fail to rise enough to share in productivity gains, then profits, dividends, executive sal-

The Effect of Unions on

Several recent studies show that unions make a substantial contribution to productivity in carrying out their role of improving workers' living standards, job security and working conditions.

The most comprehensive comparison of union vs. nonunion productivity in the United States was done a few years ago by the economists James Medoff of Harvard and Charles Brown of the University of Maryland. That study compared union and nonunion plants in 20 manufacturing industries and found union workplaces 22 percent more productive than nonunion plants.

In another study, Kim Clark, an economist at the National Bureau of Economic Research, looked at union and nonunion plants in the cement industry. Clark found unionized plants 6 to 8 percent more productive than nonunion plants. In plants that had changed from nonunion to union, unionization led to a gain in productivity in the same 6 to 8 percent range.

Steven Allen, an economist at the University of North Carolina, compared the productivity of union and nonunion construction workers using nationwide census data and found union workers at least 29 percent more productive than nonunion construction workers. In a follow-up study of construction projects, Allen found that union workers constructed 38 percent more square footage per hour in office building construction and 20 percent more in school construction.

Researchers point out a number of reasons why union workers are more productive. The better pay and benefits provided under union contracts, greater job security, and the grievance procedure give workers more satisfaction with their jobs, making them less likely to quit. The lower turnover means that unionized workplaces have more experienced, better-trained workers who work more efficiently with less supervision. The seniority system helps raise productivity by increasing aries, and the like rise disproportionately. Wealth becomes more concentrated in the hands of a relatively small elite, causing buying power to lag and creating an imbalance that leads to a drop in sales, a piling-up of merchandise, production cutbacks, layoffs — and ultimately another recession or depression.

There is nothing automatic to assure that the benefits of productivity are broadly and equitably distributed. Therefore, rising productivity presents the potential for trouble as well as the potential for progress.

In the 1920s, rising productivity was translated into booming business profits, but wages and buying power and living standards of the great mass of American people lagged far behind. Sales of goods and services did not increase as fast as they could be produced. Profits also spilled over into speculation in commodities, real estate, and corporate stocks. This led to a seriously lopsided, unbalanced economy which was a major cause of the 1929 crash and the Great Depression of the 1930s.

Labor Costs and Productivity

For the majority of consumers, wages are the source of the buying power necessary to sustain a healthy economy. But raising wages does not necessarily mean raising labor costs, because they are not the same thing. For example, a 5 percent pay raise for workers in a "widget" factory might be expected to raise the labor cost for widgets by 5 percent. But if widget output per worker-hour also goes up 5 percent, there is no change in labor cost per widget.

When more is produced for each hour of work, there is an increase in the total amount of goods and services in the economy. Who gets those additional goods and services depends on how the gains of productivity are divided. For example, if productivity increases by 5 percent, workers must get a 5 percent wage increase just to maintain their share of the income. Rental income, interest income, executive salaries, dividends and profits could all increase by 5 percent since the total output has gone up by 5 percent.

So it is a mistake to identify labor costs too closely with wage rates. Labor costs may go down even when wages rise because of productivity gains.

Increases in the cost of living that reduce worker buying power also erode the potential for producers to sell their goods, so wages have to increase as much as the increase in prices and productivity just to maintain workers' share of national buying power.

Productivity gains are a source of higher wages, shorter hours, more holidays and longer vacations, earlier retirement, and general improvement in living standards. But because higher productivity means producing more goods and services over the same number of hours worked, productivity increases can also have destructive effects on workers and their jobs. Thus, workers have a vital interest in how productivity is shared.

Key Role of Unions

Collective bargaining plays a crucial role in dealing with both the dangers and opportunities of increased productivity. The flexibility of collective bargaining helps workers and their unions settle with employers on reasonable and humane protections against the adverse effects of new production methods and to share in the gains of productivity.

But the union role of protecting workers from the adverse impact of productivity is only one dimension of the collective bargaining agreement, which also does much to stimulate productivity. The needed protections, for job security and in such areas as job safety, can themselves contribute substantially to productivity gains by reducing lost work time. And the stability brought to the workforce through acceptance of seniority, the grievance procedure or other standard features of a collective bargaining contract can contribute to worker morale and consequently to productivity.

The effect of unions is vividly shown in studies done over the last few years. Harvard economists Richard Freeman and James Medoff examine the evidence in a recent article, "Trade Unions and Productivity: Some New Evidence on ar Old Issue," published in the Annals of the American Acaaemy, May 1984. They conclude that "Econometric investigations have yielded new evidence concerning collective bargaining's impact on productivity. These findings indicate that in many sectors, in particular manufacturing and construction, unionized work places are on average more productive than nonunion ones."

The relationship between labor and management is clearly an important factor in productivity. In general, the labor management climate where unions are firmly established has gradually improved since World War II and is reflected in the reduction in days lost due to strikes and the increase in the use of arbitrators and mediators to solve disputes.

Management and labor in some cases have adopted programs for labor-management cooperation in order to secure a better working relationship and enhance the opportunity to improve efficiency.

America's Ability to Compete

The competitiveness of American industry is aided by the higher productivity of American workers and attempts to bring about a better working relationship between workers and their employers. Despite these factors, the nation faces a major crisis in international competitiveness.

America's crisis in international trade has intensified over the last three years. Trade in manufactured goods was in surplus as recently as 1981. In 1983, exports fell more than $11 billion and imports rose $15 billion. For manufactured goods, the deficit of $38 billion in 1983 was more than two and one-half times the deficit of 1982. Projections based on the first ten months of 1984 are for a staggering trade deficit of over $90 billion in manufactured goods for the full year.

A sharp rise in the dollar after July 1980 caused severe damage to the nation's competitive ability. From July 1980 to September 1984, the value of the dollar rose 72 percent against the currencies of major trading partners. This means higher costs, including higher unit labor costs. The rise in the value of the dollar made U.S. exports more expensive in foreign countries and made imports cheaper. The rise in the value of the dollar means that a U.S. manufacturer roughly competitive in 1980 might be at a 72 percent cost disadvantage today.

The primary cause of the rise in value of the dollar is the high level of U.S. interest rates. Foreign investors, wanting to take advantage of higher U.S. interest rates, are trading their currencies for dollars and thereby bidding up the price of the dollar.

The sharp rise in the value of the dollar followed a decade in which unit labor costs in the United States rose at a much slower pace than those abroad. Even though productivity was rising more rapidly abroad, unit labor costs — that element that affects prices — were rising more slowly in this country because of slower increases in wages and the impact of exchange rates. Unit labor costs in the 1970s rose 171 percent in Japan and 241 percent in Germany compared to a much smaller rise of 80 percent in the United States. Despite this dramatic improvement in competitiveness of U.S. products, the trade deficit grew worse during that period because foreign governments were so successful in subsidizing their own exports.

It would be unreasonable to expect productivity increases to cope with unfair trade practices or to grow enough to make up for the sudden and tremendous rise in value of the dollar. It would also be unreasonable to expect workers to make wage concessions to make up the difference. It would take wage cuts of 15 percent per year each year for the last four years to make up the difference. A reduction in interest rates would bring about considerable relief for American manufacturing industries.

Productivity Measurement

The measurement of productivity for the U.S. economy is done by the Bureau of Labor Statistics (BLS) of the Dept. of Labor. BLS publishes productivity measures quarterly and yearly for the total economy, except government and non-profit enterprises. The most comprehensive measure is called Output per Hour in the Private Business Economy. BLS publishes separate productivity data for manufacturing, farms and non-financial corporations. Measures are published yearly for 122 selected industries, but no productivity data are published for individual corporations. Also available are BLS data showing the growth in manufacturing productivity in other industrialized countries.

The total measure of productivity does not include government because government workers primarily provide services, and the output of services is difficult to measure. The rapidly growing health care industry is an example of the problem of measuring the output of services. Doctors and health care employees have been aided by new medicines, equipment, and knowledge which help prevent illness and make treatments of patients more effective. The number of cured patients and the improvement in the health of the community rather than the number of patients treated would be a better measure of productivity of health care.

Productivity Since 1950

Productivity growth in the 1970s was slower overall than in the previous two decades although manufacturing productivity growth did hold up. The slower growth rate led to a good deal of discussion as to its causes.

The Largest Contributions to Productivity Growth are Advances in Knowledge and Education

Manufacturing productivity has showed surprising strength in the 1970s despite the unfavorable economic conditions. For all the 1970s, manufacturing productivity rose an average of 2.5 percent per year, compared to 2.0 percent in the 1950s and 2.8 percent in the 1960s.

For the early 1980s, productivity continued to grow very slowly because of the recession, but picked up substantially in 1983 as output increased. Productivity for the nonfarm business sector grew an average of only 1 percent from 1980-82, but registered 3.5 percent growth in 1983 accompanying a 5.0 percent rise in output. Nonfarm productivity showed no increase in the third quarter of 1984 as the growth in output fell sharply.

Nonmanufacturing productivity has continued to show weakness in the 1980s. While manufacturing productivity grew 4.3 percent in 1983, nonmanufacturing posted only a 1.6 percent gain. The diversity of productivity growth rates by economic sector and by industry suggests that researchers should look further than the overall numbers to see why productivity is growing at a healthy pace in some industries but is weak in others. Productivity growth from 1962 to 1982 ranged from an average of 4.7 percent a year in communications to 2.6 percent in manufacturing and finance and 1.1 percent in the services.

There is also diversity within manufacturing. In manufacturing for the same 20-year period, productivity growth registered a 6.2 percent average yearly increase in hosiery, 5.2 percent in synthetic fibers, 4.6 percent in milk, and 4.5 percent for radio and TV sets. Lower figures are found in primary aluminum at 1.1 percent, machine tools with no increase, and footwear, which registered an average decline of 0.2 percent per year.

Some experts have cited special factors in utilities, mining, transportation and retail trade that have reduced the contribution of these sectors to productivity growth. The unique problems of these sectors indicate that analysts should take a closer look at productivity on a sector-by-sector basis.

Productivity growth in utilities was substantial until the energy problems and recession set in during the early 1970s, reducing the growth of energy production. As energy prices rose and demand for energy slowed, many new plants were canceled and unused capacity increased.

Transportation productivity in the 1950s and 1960s was aided by such factors as the construction of the interstate highway system. As the highway system neared completion in the 1970s, its contribution to productivity gains in transportation was reduced.

According to a study by Lester Thurow, 80 percent of the slower productivity growth in mining is due to reduced productivity in oil exploration as the resource base has declined. The extended hours in retail trade are a factor in the slow growth of productivity in this sector. Longer business hours mean more labor time and added convenience to customers, but may have little or no effect on the amount of goods purchased, meaning lower productivity.

Shift to Services

The rapid growth of jobs in services and the decline in manufacturing's share of jobs is often cited by analysts as contributing to slower productivity growth in the private business economy. This negative effect results from the slower productivity growth and lower level of productivity in services. For example, in 1983 the value of production by manufacturing workers averaged $22.50 an hour compared to $13.50 an hour for workers in the service sector. New job holders and workers losing their jobs in manufacturing are taking lower-paying, lower-productivity jobs. The growth in these sectors and the decline in manufacturing mean that overall productivity growth has been slower than if manufacturing had maintained its share of employment. The lower level of productivity in services is in part due to undervaluation of service output rather than an actual measure of the contribution of this sector to total output. The measure of productivity levels in service industries depends in large part on wages, which generally are lower in the services.

Problems Measuring Productivity

Problems in measuring productivity also cause the figures to show slower growth. Measurement is much more difficult during inflationary periods when adjustments must be made for price increases.

Construction productivity measurement is based on very poor price devices called "input" price indexes which are supposed to correct for inflation but which substantially understate the total value of construction and therefore do not give an appropriate output series for productivity measurement. Productivity data for services including finance, insurance and real estate, and retail trade are based on gross dollar receipts which do not fully count physical output increases when output goes up faster than prices.

In analyzing productivity, most studies have looked at the effect of such factors as regulation, capital investment, the increased number of women and teenagers in the workforce, and the work ethic.

Productivity Growth in Private Business Has Slowed While Manufacturing Productivity Has Held Up

Coping with Regulations

Regulations in the 1970s required business to provide safer workplaces, to be more responsive to customer complaints, to reduce pollution of the air and water, and dispose of wastes in a safe manner. These regulations have been credited with major improvements in air and water quality, public safety, and addressing consumer demands for good quality products.

Fortunately, much evidence indicates that these improvements came with a minimal reduction in business efficiency and productivity, and expenditures to comply with pollution control regulations were basically made in addition to other investments. BLS estimated that investment spending on pollution control equipment reduced productivity growth by only one-tenth of 1 percent per year.

When environmental legislation was first passed in the early 1970s, the law required business to bring existing plants up to standards as well as to equip new plants with pollution control equipment. By the late 1970s, as existing plants caught up to standards, the burden of spending on pollution control was substantially less and continue to be substantially lower in the 1980s.

The makeup of the American workforce has changed since World War II to the point that women now hold about 44 percent of all U.S. jobs, compared with only 29 percent in 1950. Women most commonly hold clerical jobs, and 88 percent hold white-collar or service jobs. Twelve percent hold blue-collar jobs in various crafts and as machine operators, drivers and laborers. There is no evidence that women are less productive in the jobs they hold than men. Studies asserting that women are less productive are based on the assumption that their lower pay indicates lower productivity. The lower pay, rather, is a reflection of the generally lower pay levels of service jobs and of the widespread discrimination against women, not an indication of lower productivity.

Young Workers

Productivity of teenagers and young adults can be raised by training programs to give them better skills and employment opportunities, and this is particularly important when the number of teenage and young adult jobseekers is growing rapidly. Although the number of American teenagers and young adults grew sharply in the 1970s, the growth in the proportion of teenagers in the labor force in the 1970s was a little less than in the 1960s.

The number of teenagers in the labor force began to decline in 1979. In 1983 there were 8.1 million teenagers in the labor force compared to 9.7 million in 1978. The number of young adults aged 20-24 began to drop in 1982 and 1983. The impact of teenagers on the labor force will be substantially less in the 1980s.

American workers have a strong "work ethic." They want to be productive and to produce good quality products. Much of their identity and self-respect comes from the jobs they do. The data on industry productivity do not indicate any lessening of the work ethic. In some industries productivity rose more than 4 percent per year in the 1970s. These include air transportation, major household appliances, soft drinks, milk, corn milling, hosiery, and synthetic fibers. For manufacturing as a whole, the average yearly increase was 2.5 percent. The workers in high-productivity industries are no different than those in low-productivity industries.

The Role of Savings

Savings and capital availability have been ample to provide investment funds, although the opportunities for investment along with growing consumer borrowing, speculative lending, and foreign lending put heavy demands on credit markets. The fierce competition for credit between those who would use the credit for job-creating investment and those borrowing for other purposes has led the AFL-CIO to recommend credit policies that favor job-creating investment.

Many experts have expressed the concern that savings rates in the United States are not high enough, pointing to higher saving rates in competing countries. The justification for the Reagan Administration's 1981 tax cut that gave much more to the wealthy than to low- and moderate-income taxpayers rested largely on the argument that tax cuts to the wealthy would increase saving and increase the pool of funds available for investment.

More than half of the 1981 tax cut went to business and the wealthiest 10 percent of the population. For example, a family earning $200,000 per year received a tax cut of $9,658, while a family earning $20,000 received a tax cut of only $544.

The tax cuts failed to increase saving. The personal savings rate in the first nine months of 1984 averaged 6 percent of personal income compared to 6.1 percent in the same period of 1980, the year before the tax cut took place. Gross saving, including business and government saving, declined to 14.9 percent of GNP in the first nine months of 1984 compared to 15.5 percent in the same period of 1980. The decline in the gross savings rate was due to the large increase in the federal government budget deficit.

Whatever the cause of lower U.S. savings rates, tax cuts to the wealthy are not a solution, and a reversal of those tax cuts would be in the interest of equity and provide more consumer purchasing power to low- and moderate-income families.

A better understanding of productivity growth can help in the formulation of policies to improve the nation's productivity. A major step forward in adapting to the new economic circumstances would be the adoption of a coordinated industrial policy. Consideration must be given to the dependence of productivity growth on a growing, healthy economy which has full employment and full utilization of capacity. Balanced economic growth, with expanding sales and full employment, must accompany rising productivity. Economic policy must also recognize the importance of a broader distribution of the potential benefits from rising productivity.

Short-term limits urged on toxic gas

The State, County & Municipal Employees, which represents some 200,000 hospital and health care workers, has urged the Occupational Safety & Health Administration to establish a short-term exposure limit (STEL) for the cancer-causing gas, ethylene oxide, which is used to sterilize equipment in hospitals.

OSHA is under court order to determine by Dec. 17 whether it will set a STEL for ethylene oxide. Various labor and public health groups have been trying for more than three years to get the federal safety and health agency to issue a strong, comprehensive regulation.

In June, OSHA limited the permissible exposures to one part EtO per million parts of air, averaged over an eight-hour day, but delayed setting a STEL.

A short-term limit of 10 ppm was withdrawn at the last minute, however, reportedly due to pressure from the White House's Office of Management & Budget. OSHA cited OMB's arguments that a STEL would not be "cost-effective."

AFSCME President Gerald W. McEntee, in a letter to OSHA Administrator Robert W. Rowland, said, "We feel strongly that a short-term exposure limit for EtO is needed in order to provide health care workers with a safe working environment." AFSCME urged a STEL of 3 ppm.

Clear mandate

McEntee stressed that OSHA "has a clear legislative mandate" to issue standards based on the latest scientific data that "ensure that no employee will suffer impairment of health. We feel that it is unacceptable for OSHA to allow a chemical to be considered innocent until proven guilty by the illness and death of workers at some later date."

The union stressed that the setting of a permissible limit of 1 ppm, a 50-fold reduction from the previous limit, is not enough to protect workers. Hospital and health care workers generally receive short-term exposures.

An AFSCME survey of 19 health care facilities showed that in 10 of them workers detected the odor of EtO at least occasionally, meaning they were being exposed to extremely high doses of the toxic gas.

UAW welcomes Mazda plan for plant in Michigan

Detroit—Auto Workers President Owen Bieber welcomed the Mazda Motor Corp. announcement of plans to build an assembly plant near Flat Rock, Mich., which would employ some 3,500 workers and produce about 240,000 cars per year.

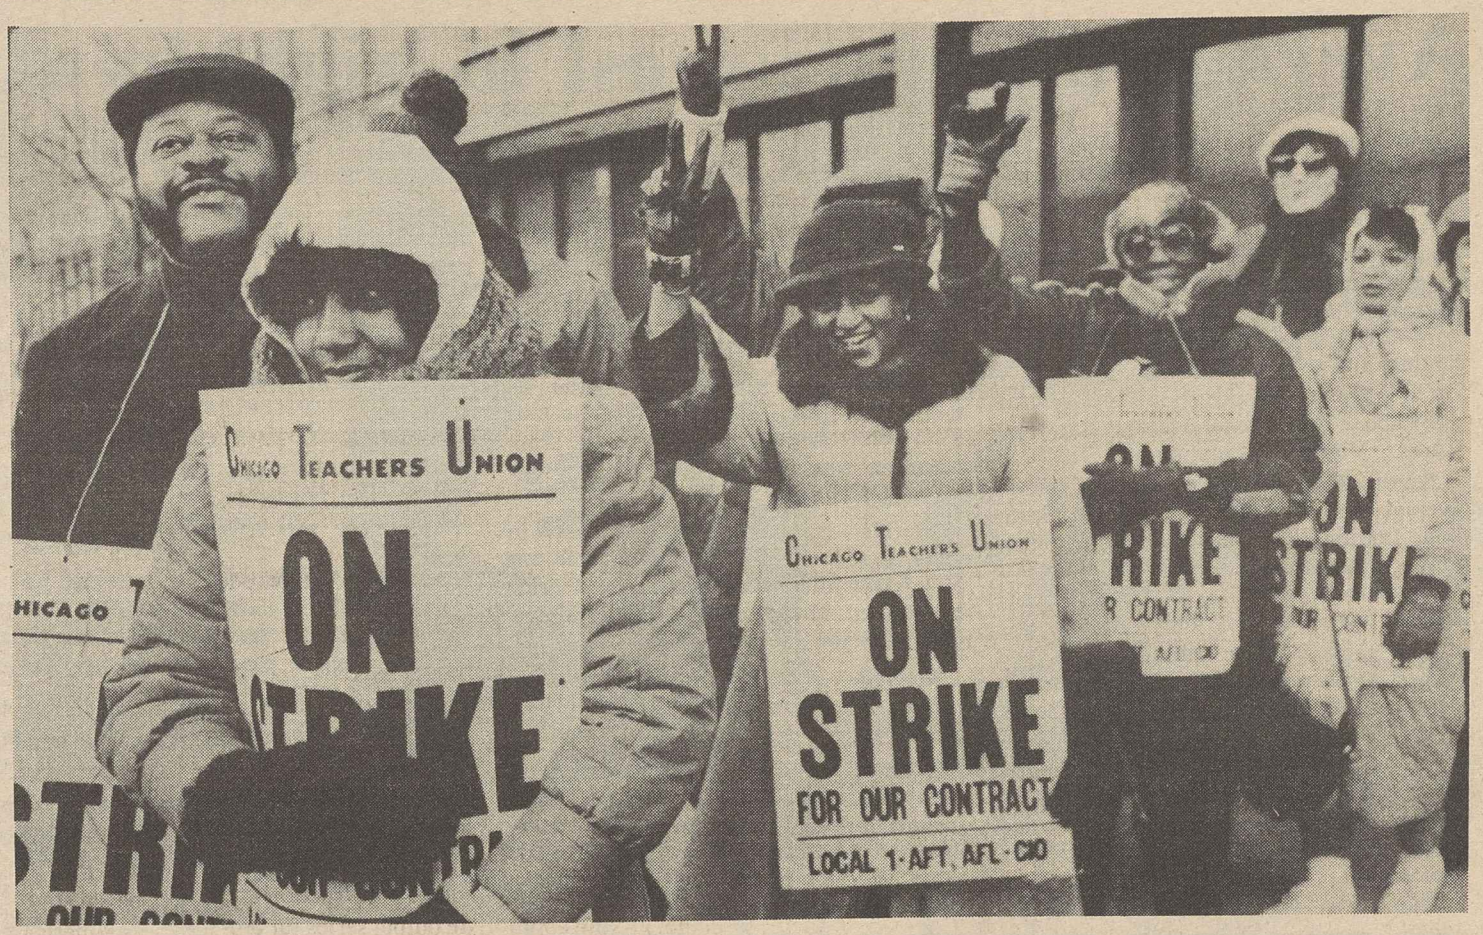
Bieber said the union has "a basic understanding with Mazda about the UAW's participation in the Flat Rock project. We congratulate them on their decision to work cooperatively with the UAW on the human resource issue."

Construction of the plant will begin next spring with the production of vehicles scheduled for the fall of 1987. The plant site is adjacent to a Ford Motor Co. casting facility which has been closed since December 1981.

At a news conference, Bieber stressed that "Mazda's philosophy of putting employees at the center in terms of their importance to the enterprise is very much on the same plane as the UAW philosophy."

Bieber added that Mazda's willingness to acknowledge that it should participate actively in the economic growth of its U.S. market by producing cars locally is the essence of what the UAW has been saying to all of the Japan-based auto companies.

"We have an opportunity to create and maintain a new relationship between labor and management that stresses cooperation and recognition of human rights and values," he said.



Chicago teachers picket

Chicago Teachers Union President Jacqueline Vaughn offers encouragement to teachers on strike against the nation's third-largest school system. About 20,000 CTU members struck Dec. 3, rejecting school board proposals for pay cuts and health benefit takeaways. More than 12,000 members of other school unions are backing the teachers, and the walkouts sent home some 430,000 students. CTU members had voted in August to extend their contract to December in hopes of reaching a settlement. Current negotiations have produced some progress, including restoration of health care payments slashed by the school board.

20-nation union conference sets job-health guidelines on VDT use

Geneva, Switzerland — The multinational scope of concern for the health and safety of the hundreds of millions of workers now using video display terminals was vividly evident when representatives of unions from 20 nations met here to draw guidelines for protection from the machines' hazards.

The scope of the guidelines adopted is also broad, ranging from design of the machines and of the work stations in which they are used to radiation emissions and their possible effects on workers' reproductive systems and offspring.

The conference on visual display units, which drew 200 participants, was sponsored by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions and 14 international secretariats of unions that represent VDT operators.

The machines — typewriter-like keyboards linked to television-like screens — have come to be used for a multitude of word- and data-processing tasks over the last dozen years. They are often called video display terminals (VDTs), cathode ray tubes (CRTs) and, principally in Europe, visual display units (VDUs).

Representatives of three international unions headquartered in Washington played significant roles in the conference as part of their secretariats' delegations: David J. Eisen of The Newspaper Guild (International Federation of Journalists), David E. LeGrande of the Communications Workers (Postal, Telegraph & Telephone International), and Diana Roos of the Service Employees (Public Services International).

Assurances sought

The conference called for measures to assure that the machines emit only low levels of very low frequency (VLF) radiation, which has come under suspicion of being a reproductive hazard.

Until results of current studies are known, the conference said VDT operators must be given an opportunity to transfer to other work upon becoming pregnant or planning to be.

In what some participants termed its most striking recommendation, the conference voted without dissent to recommend a limit of 5 volts per meter as a terminal-surface emission limit in the VLF electric field.

While the limit represents the world's lowest current standard—now in use for the general public in Czechoslovakia—it is one that "a large proportion of VDTs can already meet," according to Robert De Matteo of the Ontario Public Service Employees, who proposed it.

Machines that do not meet it can easily be modified with installation of an inexpensive shield, he pointed out.

The conference did not recommend a limit for VLF emissions in the magnetic field, but did refer to the secretariats a recommendation to press for research and development of shielding.

Pregnancy provisions

A pregnancy-protection package advanced by Roos stressed that pregnant VDT operators should be able to request transfer to other work without loss of pay, seniority or other benefits.

It emphasized the importance of shielding against VLF radiation until the question is resolved and also warned against employers using the possibility of reproductive hazards to exclude women from VDT work.

It also pointed out that if research confirms that reproductive problems are attributable to VDT emissions, all operators, not only women, could be at risk.

The conference also adopted several proposals made jointly by LeGrande and Eisen covering rest breaks, work station lighting, eye examinations, facial rashes, air containments and development of other kinds of display tubes that do not pose the possibility of emissions hazards.

VDT operators' rest breaks, the conference said, should be on a scheduled basis—15 minutes every hour for intensive work, every two hours for less intensive work on the machines—rather than at each operator's discretion.

The guidelines adopted by the conference also include:

- Eye examinations every year.
- Work station light levels of 300 to 500 lux (32 to 53 foot-candles), which is adequate for hard-copy purposes and makes it unnecessary to use supplemental lighting with its often attendant problems of glare and visual contrast.
- A warning against painful ultrasound emissions from the machines, which can be remedied by properly placed padding.
- A warning that the buildup of static electric charges on VDT screens when combined with air contaminants may be the cause of face and hand rashes reported by some operators.
- Still another warning, that other air contaminants — such as asbestos, carbon monoxide, poly-chlorinated biphenyls and photocopier solvents—should not be overlooked in analying VDT operators' complaints.

The guidelines also strongly oppose all automatic performance and behavior monitoring of VDT operators.

"No VDU-based system should be used to collect or store individually identifiable data on arrival and departure times, work breaks, keyboard speeds, corrections made or other performance or behavior-related data," the participants stressed.

Citing the importance of combatting stress, the conference pointed out that VDT work "which is not designed according to ergonomic principles or which involves excessive workload . . . can give rise to high levels of stress and fatigue."

The guidelines also scored "electronic homework" as a dangerous practice that can result in "total disregard of health and safety regulations."

Operator injuries

The guidelines' restbreak and ergonomic provisions are important in meeting the increasingly common problem of repetitive-strain injuries to wrists, hands and arms of high-speed VDT operators, the conference said.

Well-designed VDT stations should have desks with separately adjustable screen and keyboard surfaces, adjustable chairs and, where needed, footrests, the conference said.

In an opening address, David Cockroft of the Commercial, Clerical, Professional and Technical Employees Federation — called the conference an effort to "set down in one place the collective wisdom of the international trade union movement" on VDT health and safety.

He urged that its guidelines become "a standard reference guide for trade union negotiators throughout the world."

Average income lowest in 'right-to-work' states

Workers earn less in states where the union shop is prohibited under so-called "right-to-work" laws.

A new Commerce Dept. report shows that per capita income in the 20 R-T-W states averaged only $10,708 in 1983. This compares to an average of $12,186 in the 30 other states and the District of Columbia, and to a U.S. average of $11,685.

Only five of the open shop states ranked at or above the national average—Nevada, Kansas, Virginia, Wyoming and Texas.

Seven of the 10 states with the lowest averages are R-T-W states—North Carolina, Tennessee, Alabama, South Carolina, Utah, Arkansas and Mississippi. The last three states were below $9,000, with Mississippi averaging only $8,098.

The same pattern appears in average wages of manufacturing workers and in expenditures per pupil in public schools.

While weekly wages in the 20 open shop states averaged $322.99 and hourly earnings averaged $8.10, the figures in union rights states averaged $367.44 and $9.24. The national average was $354.48 and $8.84.

Here is a state-by-state analysis of per capita income in compulsory, open-shop states for selected years:

Alabama—When its "right-to-work" law was enacted in 1953, it was $658 below the national average in per capita. Last year, it was $2,443 below—a drop of $1,785.

Arizona—A R-T-W state since 1947. Figures for that year are not available, but in 1948 it was $109 below the national average. By 1983, it was $1,029 below—a loss of $920.

Arkansas—In 1948, a year after its R-T-W law was adopted, the state was $541 below the national average. By 1983, Arkansas was $2,718 below the national average, a loss of $2,177.

Florida—Enacted a R-T-W law in 1944. Last year, its per capita income was $92 below the national average. Florida has gained $140 from its 1948 standing of $232 below the national average.

Georgia—In 1948, the state was $442 behind the national average and in 1983, $1,306 below—a loss of $864.

Iowa—In 1948, the state was $213 above the national average. Its per capita income then fell below the national average and has been below in most years since. In 1983, it was $980 below—a loss of $1,193.

Kansas—Passed its open-shop law in 1958. At that time, it was $6 below the national average, and remained below until 1972. By last year, Kansas increased its per capita to $12,247, which is $562 above the national average.

Louisiana—The state was $1,012 below the national average in 1976 when it passed its R-T-W law. In 1983, it was $1,415 below, for a loss of $403.

Mississippi—Passed its law in 1954 and was $866 below the national average at that time. In 1983, it was $3,358 below—a loss of $2,721.

Nebraska—In 1948, the state was $128 above the national average. Its per capita income then fell below the national average and in 1983 it was $473 below—a loss of $601.

Nevada—The only R-T-W state that has consistently been above the national average, Nevada's average was $531 above the national when it passed its law in 1951. In 1983, it was $766 above—a gain of $235. The state's strongly organized entertainment industry helps boost the state average.

North Carolina—Passed a R-T-W law in 1947, and was $427 below the national average in 1948. In 1983, it was $1,898 below—a loss of $1,471.

North Dakota—In 1948, it was $61 above the national average. Last year, per capita income rose to $11,666, but was $19 below the national average—a loss of $80.

South Carolina—In 1954, when it passed a R-T-W law, per capita income was $637 below the national average. In 1983, it was $2,498 below, a loss of $1,861 in relation to the national average.

South Dakota—Was $100 above the national average in 1948 and in 1983 was $1,838 below—a loss of $1,938.

Tennessee—In 1948, its average was $465 below the national average and last year it was $2,136 below—a loss of $1,671.

Texas—It was $224 below the national average in 1948, the year after it passed its law, and was the same as the national average last year. This represented a gain of $224.

Utah—Passed a R-T-W law in 1955, and at that time was $245 below the national average per capita income. Last year, it was $2,692 below—a loss of $2,447.

Virginia—In 1948, it was $293 below the national average. Last year, it was $431 above, a gain of $724.

Wyoming—Passed a R-T-W law in 1963, when its per capita income average was $9 above the national. The next year, it went below the national average and stayed below until 1973, when Wyoming again went above the national rate. It was $226 above last year.

Coors goes flat

Golden, Colo.—Coors beer is not even a best-seller in its own backyard any more.

Colorado sales figures released by the brewing industry show Adolph Coors Co., based here, ranked third in its own state behind Anheuser-Busch, Inc. and Miller Brewing Co.

In 1977, the year the AFL-CIO boycott of Coors began, the company had a full 47 percent of the beer market in the state. Figures for the first six months of 1984 show Coors with only a 21.7 percent share of that market.

Coors sales have slipped badly despite a massive advertising and promotional campaign last year in which the company spent nearly $119 million, or more than 10 percent of its gross revenues, on promotion. In the years before the boycott, the company rarely advertised and refused to even market its products anywhere but in a select few Rocky Mountain and western states. After the boycott began, Coors started pushing its brew nearly nationwide.

The AFL-CIO tapped its boycott after Coors busted a directly-affiliated local union in the plant whose members had struck over human dignity issues.

Yale strikers return to work after rejecting contract offer

New Haven, Conn.—Some 1,600 strikers at Yale University—members of Hotel Employees & Restaurant Employees Local 34—returned to work Dec. 4 on a temporary basis, after soundly rejecting the university's latest contract proposal.

At a Nov. 29 meeting, the Local 34 unit of clerical and technical workers voted 959 to 79 to reject the administration offer, which union spokesman William Meyerson said would add only about $30 per person annually to the previous proposal.

The strikers then voted 800 to 250 to return to work at least through the holidays to thwart any economic pressure from the university for a settlement during that period. They held open the possibility of renewing the strike in January.

Key issue

The key issue for the unit, which is more than 80 percent female, is pay equity —equal pay for jobs of comparable worth. The bargainers still remain far apart on economics as the union is seeking to close the wage gap over the period of the contract. Local 34 went on strike on Sept. 26 after bargaining for 11 months to settle the economic portions of an initial contract. The unit of secretaries, research assistants, telephone operators and computer programmers has an average wage of $13,424 annually.

The strikers have received widespread support for their efforts. Students and faculty at Yale have joined in rallies, honored picket lines by holding classes off campus and pressured the university for a settlement. One group of students filed a multi-million dollar lawsuit seeking to impose a $2 million weekly fine on the university for each week it delays in reaching a settlement. That money would be returned to the university's 10,000 students.

Fraternal support for the strikers has come from HERE Local 35, the university's 900-member service and maintenance unit, which has honored the picket lines. The university has challenged Local 35's right to honor the picket lines, and the matter is now being arbitrated.

Key to the strikers' decision to return to work temporarily is the chance to urge their supervisors and those workers who didn't strike to press the university for an adequate contract settlement.

As a part of that pressure, Local 34 is holding a rally in front of the university administration building on Dec. 8 and supporters will be coming from as far away as Philadelphia, Myerson said.

No additional bargaining sessions have been set. The negotiators last met on Nov. 28 and the administration increased its offer by a total of $250,000, roughly $30 annually for each member of the unit.

An ad hoc faculty group of 10 Yale professors studied the bargaining proposals of each side and reported the two packages remain some $6-$7 million apart, Myerson said. He noted, however, that Yale has saved more than $3 million during the strike by not paying wages and benefits to the 1,600 strikers.

'84 election effort reviewed by Southern Labor School

Nashville, Tenn. — Labor's role in the campaign process was the focus of the 1984 AFL-CIO Southern Labor School held here.

The 65 participants in the week-long school, organized by a conference of state federation officers with the cooperation of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education, reviewed organized labor's election efforts, assessing what worked, what didn't and why, with an eye toward the 1986 elections.

Arkansas AFL-CIO President Bill Becker serves as president of the school and James Neeley, president of the Tennessee AFL-CIO, is the secretary-treasurer.

A panel discussion focused on the election efforts in Mississippi, Tennessee, Texas and North Carolina. While Democratic Presidential candidate Walter Mondale centered his campaign on the economy and deficits, the labor school participants reported that it was the issues of race, women and the right-wing on which voters in the South based their decisions. There was unanimous agreement that southern black voters came through for Mondale.

Barbara Van Blake, director of Human Rights & Community Relations for the Teachers, told the audience of staff representatives and officers of state and local central bodies that the Reagan "gender gap" proved to be less of a factor in the elections than anticipated.

AFL-CIO Civil Rights Director William E. Pollard outlined the future choices of both blacks and Democrats, discussing whether or not the various coalitions making up the Democratic Party are sufficiently broad-based.

One on one

AFL-CIO Region V COPE Director Clem Dowler said the AFL-CIO "one-on-one" program was very successful in South Carolina and moderately successful in other states where there were problems in getting voter and membership lists.

AFL-CIO COPE Director John Perkins lauded labor's effort in getting out the vote and noted that unemployment, jobs and social security issues were most important to union members who voted for Mondale.

Among other speakers, labor attorney James Youngdahl of Little Rock, Ark., discussed recent National Labor Relations Board decisions overturning previous NLRB policies, gave a synopsis of bankruptcy legislation and spoke on civil rights enforcement under the Reagan Administration.

Mike Arnold, director of the AFL-CIO Human Resources Development Institute, explained the services available from the institute and described HRDI projects currently under way in the South.

Frank Emig, assistant director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization & Field Services, gave a progress report on efforts being made to obtain full affiliation of all local unions with the state and local central bodies.

Looking ahead

Sen. James Sasser (D-Tenn.) told the participants that despite the election results, "the labor movement must look ahead to ways in which it can advance the goals and ideals of working men and women." He suggested that labor strive for more cooperation with management while seeking to gain a greater voice in the corporate decision-making process.

U.S. trade deficit tops $100 billion, new policy urged the first 10 months of 1985 stands at $105.5 billion. The deficit for all of 1983 was $69.4 billion, then a record.

Commerce Sec. Malcolm Baldrige, blaming the spreading red ink on the over valuation of the dollar with respect to other currencies, said the deficit for all of 1984 appears headed for a $130-billion total. Higher figures are forecast for 1985.

October imports totaled $27.6 billion, down by $3.3 billion or 10.6 percent from September. Exports totaled $18.4 billion, up by $200 million or 1.2 percent.

Oswald pointed out that the continuing deficit has caused the loss of millions of U.S. jobs, particularly in the manufacturing sector. Only four years ago, he noted, the United States enjoyed a surplus in manufacturing trade.

Non-petroleum imports dropped to $22.2 billion in October, 13 percent below their $25.5-billion monthly pace in the third quarter. The value of petroleum imports rose moderately on higher volume and a slight increase in price to $28.84 a barrel from $28.70 in September.

A strong dollar discourages U.S. exports and encourages imports. Most economists attribute the problem in large part to the huge federal budget deficit, which keeps interest rates high attracting an inflow of capital from abroad which drives up the dollar.

The South African Struggle

TWO YEARS AGO, the AFL-CIO honored posthumously Dr. Neil Aggett, who died under suspicious circumstances in the South African jail where he had been held without charge for 70 days.

Aggett, who was white, was a regional officer of a union of black cannery workers—and that was his crime. He was a co-recipient, with a black South African leader, of the 1982 George Meany Human Rights Award.

Now being held in South African jails are 21 black trade union leaders who also are considered by their government a danger to a society built on the evil system of segregation and perpetual discrimination known as apartheid.

These 21 union leaders must be freed. Their release must be the start of a genuine reshaping of South Africa's institutions to reflect that nation's multi-racial population.

One crucial test is freedom for trade unions representing black workers, white workers, and wherever possible and everywhere as soon as possible, black and white workers alike.

The South African government is quite right in one respect. Free trade unions are a threat to societies that are based on injustice.

THESE PAST weeks, members and leaders of AFL-CIO unions have joined with other groups concerned with human rights in picketing the South African embassy in Washington. Union members in other cities have organized parallel demonstrations at South African consulates.

Labor's concern is not new found. The protests we register echo the outrage the AFL-CIO Executive Council expressed in 1958 at the arrest and indictment of union leaders and other foes of apartheid. The federation contributed to their defense fund then, and set up its own fund to support the cause of South African trade unionism at the 1981 convention.

Before AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue joined the other prominent Americans who for a night shared the indignity of arrests with their South African brothers, he spoke of the further measures that must be taken—including effective economic pressure from the United States government.

As for labor's special concern, "if our sisters and brothers are enslaved anywhere, if trade union rights are denied anywhere, freedom is threatened everywhere," Donahue said.

Speaker O'Neill

WHEN THE 99th Congress convenes in January, Thomas P. O'Neill, Jr., of Massachusetts will again be elected Speaker of the House of Representatives. And that's good news for Congress and the country, despite a few grumbles from some "new look" Democrats.

Tip O'Neill is the consensus choice of a Democratic caucus whose members cover a broad political spectrum and represent sometimes conflicting regional interests.

Someone has to pull this paper majority of Democrats into an effective voting majority on issue after issue, and you'd have to look awfully hard to find anyone who could do it better. This is an era, remember, when party leaders have little power to reward supporters or punish those who stray from the fold. It calls for the skills of a politician, not a ringmaster.

O'Neill came to Congress more than 30 years ago, filling the House seat that John F. Kennedy held briefly before moving on to the Senate. The most valid complaint that any House Democrat has made against O'Neill is that, in an age of television, he just doesn't look like a youthful Kennedy. No way.

On matters of principle, O'Neill has been a rock who has stood up to Democratic and Republican presidents alike. But on strategy, he is a pragmatic politician who can count votes.

He looks like a savvy "pol" and that's what he is. Thanks be for that.

Jobs data hide full scope of unemployment crisis

By Press Associates, Inc.

On the first Friday of each month, at 8:30 a.m. the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Statistics releases the national employment and unemployment data for the previous month.

The one figure that is headlined by the nation's newspapers and highlighted on the evening television news is the jobless rate. It's the magic number, so to speak, that buries the rest of the department's unemployment statistics in news reports and the popular mind.

But how much does the magic number reveal about the extent of unemployment in the nation and its communities? That question was raised at a recent Capitol Hill press conference by a coalition of religious, labor and civil rights leaders that released its own "First Friday" report.

Actual unemployment and underemployment, said the report, stands at over 13 percent of the labor force, far above the Labor Dept.'s 7.4 percent rate for October. The higher figure, which represents more than 15 million men and women, takes into account not only the "officially" unployed, but also the 5.5 million people working part-time because they couldn't find full-time jobs and the 1.2 million "discouraged" workers who have despaired of finding any job.

Not fully recovered

Despite the past two years of "recovery," the report noted, there are almost a half-million more officially jobless now than in 1980; 1.2 million more discouraged workers and another 1.2 million involuntary part-time workers.

Moreover, many communities have higher jobless rates than four years ago, said the report, titled "Communities in Crisis: Real Unemployment in America" and prepared by the Full Employment Action Council. The report revealed that 17 of the 20 metropolitan areas hit hardest by unemployment are substantially worse off today. These include cities in Texas, Ohio, Pennsylvania, West Virginia, Illinois, New Jersey, California, Alabama, Florida and Louisiana.

Also, the average period of unemployment grew from 13.2 weeks in October 1980 to 16.5 weeks in October 1984. Yet, only 30 percent of the jobless are drawing unemployment compensation benefits, less than half the percentage in the 1974-1975 recession.

Tops all but one

Even the official 7.4 percent jobless rate is higher than in every year between 1947 and 1981 except for the recession year of 1976, the report noted in questioning how this came to be called "recovery."

The real unemployment situation in the United States was described as "a profound economic and moral crisis" by the Catholic, Jewish and Protestant leaders at the news conference.

"The division between extremes is growing wider. This is morally unacceptable," said Bishop John A. Ricard of the Catholic Archdiocese of Baltimore.

Rabbi David Saperstein of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations' Religious Action Center called the unemployment rate "a crime, an assault and battery on the bodies, the dignity and lives of all those who continue to be deprived of the opportunity to provide for themselves and their families."

Bishop John A. Burt, chairman of the Urban Bishops of the Episcopal Church, said even the official jobless rate, although an improvement over the double-digit recession level, is "a scandal" compared to what "we believed to be tolerable levels of unemployment just a few years back."

The coalition urged the new 99th Congress to enact emergency jobs legislation, including the Community Renewal Employment Act, the Youth Incentive Employment Act, the American Conservation Corps, plant-closing legislation, and the Industrial Competitiveness Act.

Republicans on the Attack... Against One Another

To the Victor Belongs the Spoiling

With far more ferocity than Democrats, who are merely squabbling over the slim pickings left by presidential defeat, Republicans are at war with one another over the banquet table of triumph.

To the victor, it seems, belongs not so much the spoils as the spoiling.

Since the re-election of President Reagan, insults have flown like missiles around Washington. Most of them are all in the family, the GOP family, as party factions jockey for position with differing perspectives and ambitions on how and for what to milk their landslide presidential win.

Most vociferous and aggressive, of course, is the chorus of right wingers who've brought so much noise but so little dignity to the scene.

Prime example: Rep. Newt Gingrich (Ga.). He, along with members of the House coven he calls the Conservative Opportunity Society, spent recent years sticking pins in effigies of Tip O'Neill and other Democrats, alleging they want to give the hemisphere away to the Reds. Now he lays about at his GOP colleagues with equal malice.

When Sen. Bob Dole (since elected Senate Majority Leader) said he thought it might be necessary to boost some taxes to cut Reagan's record-high federal deficit, Gingrich accused him of acting as "the tax collector for the welfare state."

He reportedly called Dole "the Mondale of the Republican Party" who's part of a GOP group "that sees itself as running essentially a cheaper and narrower version of the Democratic welfare state."

Not alone Dole, but Budget Director David Stockman, has been assailed by Gingrich. When Stockman gave Reagan the bad news that the President's campaign assurances to voters that the deficit would wither away with economic growth simply wouldn't pan out, and something more than wishing would have to make it so, Gingrich went after him for engaging in "terrorization of the President."

He charged Stockman "convinces everyone we're faced with the sinking of the Titanic and then (tries) to sell a lifeboat called 'modest post-Mondale tax increases.' "

"It's a little like someone who shoots you in the arm," says Gingrich, "and then says you need a doctor and offers his help."

Banishing Stockman from grace, Gingrich winds up, "You don't need friends like that."

Not surprisingly, Gingrich attracts as much flak in retaliation as he fires off in spite, in this context all from Republicans. Though Dole and Stockman have turned the other cheek, others have taken up the cudgels. Said one unidentified Republican: "Newt's a talker. He couldn't legislate his way out of a paper bag."

Another called Gingrich down for "ego-gratification and personal ambition," while yet another accused him of "self-aggrandizement."

Less personal, but no less pointed, House Minority Leader Bob Michel (Ill.) said: "We have a responsibility to govern. . . . It's great to be out there talking, but we have to deliver."

Even among some ultra-conservatives, Gingrich rankles. Mickey Edwards (Okla.) deplored his "confrontation" tactics and "rah-rah mentality." He said Republicans must use their presidential victory to produce "results and not rhetoric," and he assailed the "bombast and glitter" and intra-party "guerrilla activities" of the Gingrich wing of his rightist colleagues.

Meanwhile, a lot of Republicans, Michel among them, have criticized Reagan for failing to do much to help GOP House candidates get elected. They claim had Reagan really pitched in, the GOP could have ballooned what turned out to be a modest gain of 14 seats.

Right-wing leader Richard Viguerie goes so far as to say Reagan's campaign managers "double-crossed" lower-level GOP candidates, and by failing to help them with presidential appearances and support, cost many of them the election. This failure, Viguerie charges, puts at risk Reagan's legislative package.

All the hassling by Gingrich, Viguerie and some of their buddies has larger objectives than headline-grabbing. They want the control they grabbed over drafting of the GOP platform last summer to be extended to the legislative process, the agencies of government, and throughout their own party.

Gingrich describes their agenda as changing "from a welfare state to an opportunity society." How much opportunity and for whom is still being worked out.

The problem is others in the GOP have a different view of what the government should do and be and claim as much legitimacy as Republicans as the Gingrich-Viguerie-etc. group.

This makes it likely that the GOP fight over the spoils of victory will rage on throughout the next couple of years at least, and into the party's presidential nominating contest of 1988. It could well become boisterous enough to equal professional football as a spectator sport.

Anything Else?

If the business community was celebrating Ronald Reagan's re-election victory, Kevin Phillips threw cold water all over it in a hurry.

Phillips, a conservative whose track record as a commentator is pretty strong, wrote the following in his newsletter, Business and Public Affairs, dated November 15, the first issue to come out after the election. If it were a TV show, it could be called, "The Day After."

"The central predicament facing business strategists is the considerable likelihood that 1985-86 will see internecine warfare among business lobbies, delay in coping with the deficit problem, onset of a recession, major Republican congressional losses in 1986, a return to a somewhat more negative public perception of business and a worsened national political climate for business in 1987-88."

One-Vote Follow-up

In Idaho, the 67-vote victory of Democrat Richard Stallings over Rep. George Hansen not only held up through a recount, but almost doubled. Final tally: Stallings by 133 out of more than 201,000 votes cast. Hansen has gone to court to challenge the decision.

In Indiana, Rep. Frank McCloskey's 73-vote margin out of more than 233,600 votes cast was clipped to 72 after a county-by-county certification. However, the Republican secretary of state refused to certify the results on grounds that McCloskey's opponent filed a lawsuit in one county. This one could drag on and ultimately be determined by the U.S. House itself.

Odds 'n Ends

AH, THAT BRIGHT HIGH TECH future everyone's talking about. Here's one about heart in the high-tech executive suite. Atari recently fired a bunch of middle-to-high level management people, told them to clear out in a couple of days. One discharged vice president asked a little more time "to wrap up business and clean out my office." He was told to get out sooner. Explained Atari Vice President James Copland (who still has his job): "Frankly, I can't see anything out of the ordinary about asking a person to leave in two days in the world of big business. Most people can pack up an office in five minutes. I don't have much sympathy for anyone complaining about the time to get out."

MILK-OF-HUMAN-KINDNESS attitude at Atari recalls the recent closure of three high-tech firms in California, all of which were profitable here but which smelled larger profits in Hong Kong. In throwing a couple thousand American workers out of their jobs, the head of one of the three firms explained the company would do better overseas where "for a bowl of soup and $3.50 a day" workers would "work their butts off."

MOVIE STARS SEEKING OFFICE? What'll they think of next? In India, at least seven popular film stars have entered as candidates for parliament on the slate of Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi's Congress Party. This could be catching.

RIGHTWARD TREND among Americans turns up in recent Gallup Poll. Survey finds 36 percent of respondents consider themselves "right of center," up from 31 percent in 1976. Self-termed "left of center" shrinks to 18 percent from 24, and "middle-road" changes just one percent from 45 to 46. Trend parallels growth among those calling themselves Republican, now 35 percent to 39 percent Democratic and 25 percent independent. Democratic allegiance at lowest point since end of World War II.

GOOD NEWS FOR DEMOCRATS, however, who've been concerned about failure of party's presidential candidates to carry western states. Geologists discover huge rift splitting the continent, predict western third of nation will drift away from eastern two-thirds and be separated by a new ocean. Of course, that's millions of years off, but Democrats are patient people.

CORPORATION COP-OUT ON TAXES becomes ever more evident. Congressional Joint Committee on Taxation releases study showing corporate share of federal tax last year was down to mere 6.2 percent. It was 12.5 percent as recently as 1980 (pre-Reagan). Rep. Don Pease (D-Ohio), who released the study, said, "continued shrinkage in corporate America's relative tax burden thrusts the vast majority of responsibility for operation of the federal government on the individual taxpayer. . . . It aggravates federal budget deficits." Said committee member Rep. Byron Dorgan (D-N.D.), "While many American working families who struggle with moderate incomes pay a significant amount of income taxes, in this study we discover that there are some industries and many individual corporations making hundreds of millions of dollars in profits and paying little or no income taxes."

LOWEST TAX RATES on income among industries, committee report showed, were paid by railroads, 2.4 percent; chemicals, 3.6; financial institutions, 3.8; construction 0.7; motor vehicles, 3.5; telecommunications, 4.8.

DEEP IN DEBT, about $90,000 of it, is Rev. Jerry Falwell's "I Love America" political action committee. Only six percent of its receipts went to candidates, most of the rest expended in fund-raising.

TAX SIMPLIFICATION as seen by Johnny Carson: You send your money directly to the Pentagon.

7 South Africans freed as demonstrations grow

By James M. Shevis

The AFL-CIO "is gratified" that the South African government has freed seven black trade union leaders imprisoned following a massive strike by black industrial workers last month, but said it will continue its protest against South Africa's apartheid policy of racial segregation.

The seven, including the heads of two labor federations, were released just three days after the AFL-CIO and its affiliated unions joined in a series of protests in Washington and other cities to express the outrage of America's workers over the arrests of black trade unionists—21 in all.

Among those freed were Piroshaw Camay, general secretary of the Council of Unions of South Africa, and Chris Dlamini, president of the Federation of South African Trade Unions. Two of the seven were charged on their release with additional violations of the country's Internal Security Code, and let go on bail.

All of those released must report their movements to local police stations. No information on the status or whereabouts of the 14 other prisoners was available.

Camay was expected to join AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and other members of the executive board of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions at a meeting this week in Brussels, where the South African situation was due for discussion.

Also released were Jethro Dlalisa of the Transport & Allied Workers; Bangi Solo, National Union of Textile Workers; Amos Nkosi, Commercial, Catering & Allied Workers; Moses Mayekiso, Metal & Allied Workers, and Themba Nontlatane, Municipal & General Workers.

In a telephone conversation with American union friends, Camay said, "We are in good health."

ICFTU Gen. Sec. John Vanderveken telegraphed AFL-CIO headquarters: "We would like to thank you for all your support in the campaign for their release."

Unions ask court order to set benzene standard

By Arlee C. Green

Six AFL-CIO unions have filed suit against the Occupational Safety & Health Administration and the Labor Dept., seeking a court order requiring the agency to issue its long-delayed standard on worker exposure to benzene.

Despite repeated assurances from OSHA officials that rulemaking on the cancer-causing chemical would be expedited, OSHA has continually moved back its date for beginning the standard-making process.

The suit, filed in the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia, seeks to compel OSHA to issue a notice of proposed rulemaking within 30 days of the court decision, to proceed with rulemaking on a priority basis, to issue a permanent benzene standard within eight months of the court order, and to require the agency to file progress reports with the court every 60 days.

The unions involved in the suit are the Steelworkers, Rubber Workers, Allied Industrial Workers, Painters, Chemical Workers, and Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers. They were joined in the suit by the Public Citizen Health Research Group.

Lives in jeopardy

"We simply had no choice," USWA President Lynn R. Williams said. "OSHA broke every promise it made on benzene. Their delay jeopardized the lives of thousands of workers."

Painters President William Duval added, "The technology exists to protect workers from benzene. All that's lacking is OSHA's commitment."

More than 350,000 American workers are exposed to benzene on the job. Shortly after OSHA was created in 1970, it adopted a consensus standard limiting worker exposure to 10 parts benzene per million parts of air over an eight-hour workday. This, however, was before studies found strong evidence linking benzene exposure to leukemia and other blood disorders. It can also cause chromosome damage, respiratory irritations and dermatitis.

OSHA issued an emergency standard in 1977, lowering the exposure limit to 1 ppm, and set a permanent standard at that level in 1978. The standard was struck

Reagan swings ax at vital programs in budget preview

By David L. Perlman

President Reagan is seeking congressional support for budget cuts that would heap new burdens on America's cities, close down broadly supported federal programs, and further reduce assistance to the poor, sick and elderly.

Reagan gave House and Senate Republican leaders a preview of the retrenchment budget he will send to Congress in late January and promised to "lead the charge" for its enactment. But it is an open question whether many in Congress will follow.

The kill list includes politically popular programs that have had strong bipartisan support from Congress.

It includes mass transit assistance that makes public transportation affordable, low-income home weatherization, urban development grants that cities have used to generate job opportunities, community services funds, and sewer construction grants.

Federal revenue-sharing would be ended, thus depriving cities of an important revenue source at the same time they are expected to pick up the cost of the discontinued federal services and grants.

For individuals, the Reagan budget plan calls for pay cuts for federal employees and curtailment of retirement benefits. Suspension of cost-of-living adjustments would penalize black-lung victims, retired railroad workers and low-income households dependent on food stamps.

The nation's elderly would have to pay significantly more for Medicare services. And the states would either have to pay a bigger share of Medicaid health care for the poor or reduce the number of households helped.

The Job Corps and national employment and training programs would be eliminated. So would library grants, legal services for the poor, passenger train subsidies for AMTRAK and postal subsidies that allow lower rates for publications of non-profit organizations.

Farm assistance would be reduced, the Small Business Administration largely abolished, and regional assistance programs, including Appalachian aid, would be phased out.

The federal share of the education budget, which is already below the pre-Reagan level, would continue to drop.

Mandate claimed

At a news conference, Reagan claimed a re-election mandate for his program. The people "voted against wasteful government spending," he asserted, "and they were right."

As for his proposal to cut the pay of government employees by 5 percent, the President noted that many private-sector workers took pay cuts to help their employers stay in business. In response to press queries, the AFL-CIO retorted that there is a big difference between pay concessions negotiated through a union and

Study on pay equity finds progress in public sector

By Susan Dunlop

A new study by a coalition of pay equity groups finds that there is a deep interest in the concept of comparable worth in every part of the country, especially in the public sector. Workers, mostly through their unions, are asking state and city governments to close unfair pay gaps between so-called women's and men's jobs.

The survey, "Who's Working for Working Women?," found that more than 100 state and local governments and agencies in at least 30 states have made significant moves to identify and correct sex-based wage discrimination.

The study was done jointly by the National Committee on Pay Equity, the National Women's Political Caucus and California's Comparable Worth Project.

In releasing the results, NCPE Executive Director Claudia E. Wayne said the committee has found "an ever-increasing awareness that pervasive patterns of sex-based wage discrimination have consigned generations of working women to positions of economic inferiority within the nation's workplaces" and in society as a whole.

Similar skills

The idea of comparable worth, or pay equity, calls for paying workers comparable wages for work requiring similar skills, responsibility, experience and education—regardless of whether the job is traditionally held mostly by women or mostly by men.

In practice, that has meant upgrading pay scales assigned to many so-called wom-

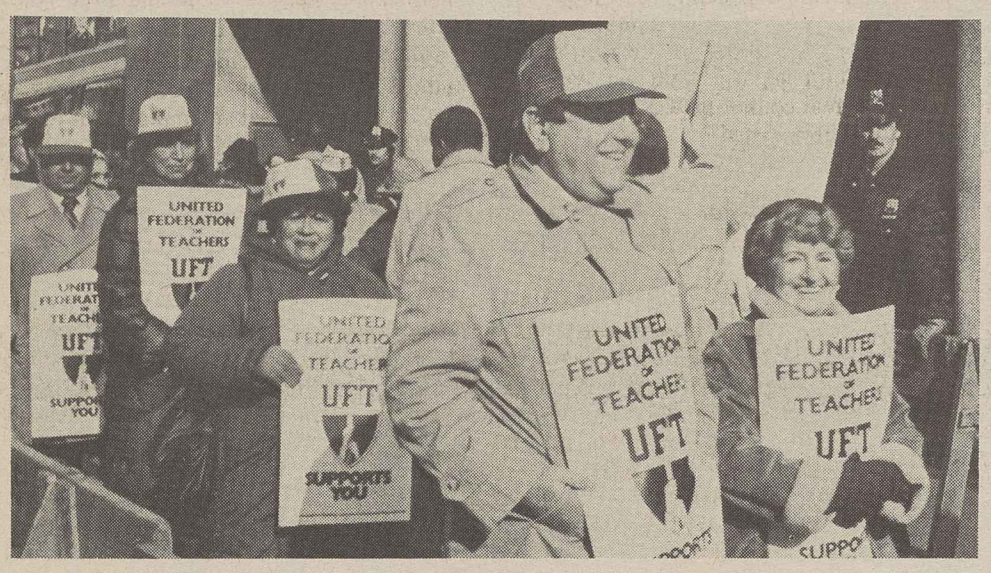
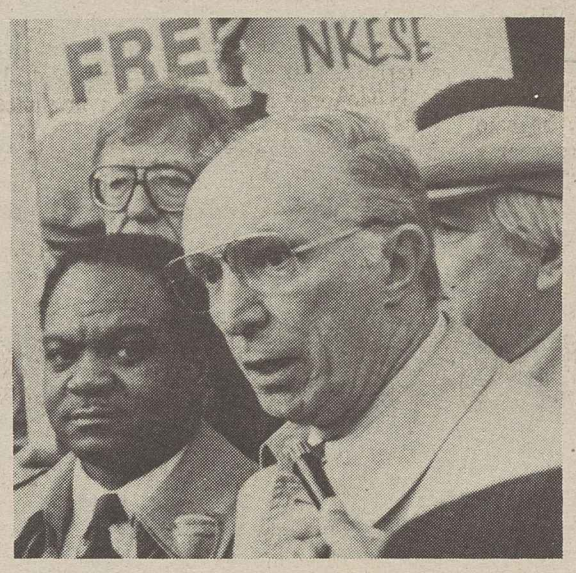
Labor protests hit South Africa

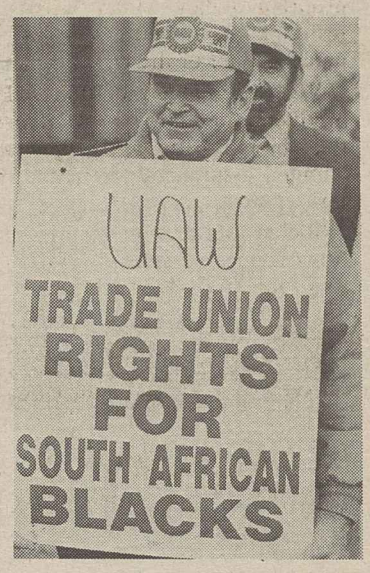
American labor expressed its outrage over the jailing of 21 South African black trade unionists in demonstrations at South African offices across the country.

The AFL-CIO and its affiliates turned out in Washington, New York, Chicago, Houston, Los Angeles, and Seattle to protest both the Pretoria government's apartheid system of racial segregation and the Reagan Administration's policy toward South Africa which winks at that country's treatment of disenfranchised poor blacks.

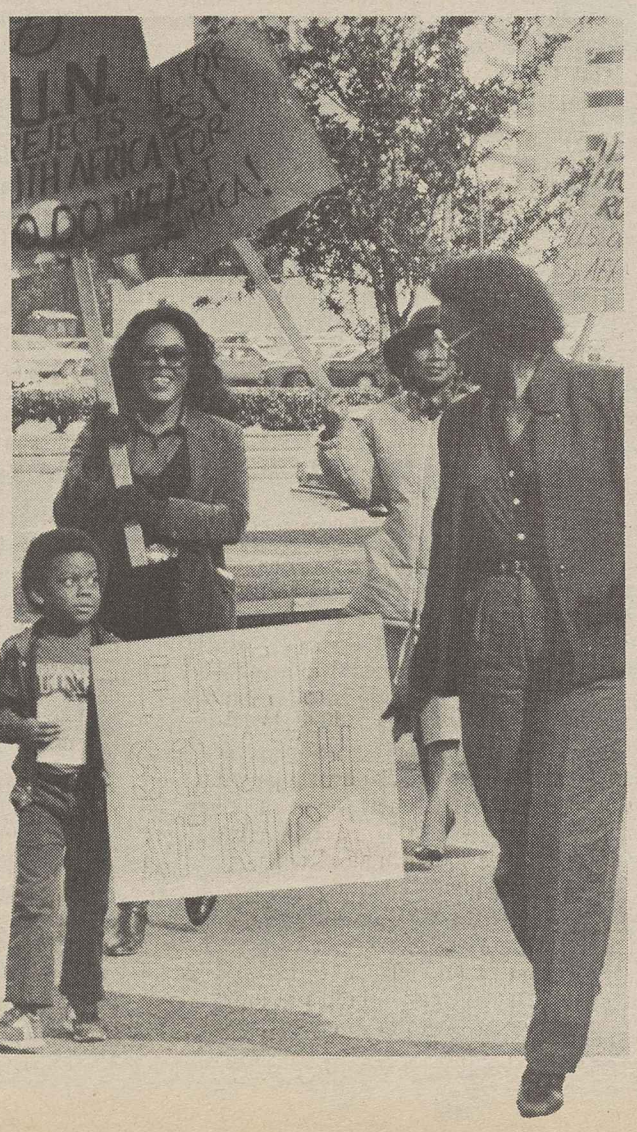
At the biggest rally, near the South African embassy in the nation's capital, Federation Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue, Steelworkers Vice President Leon Lynch and Newspaper Guild President Charles A. Perlik, Jr., were arrested and spent a night in jail for crossing police lines.

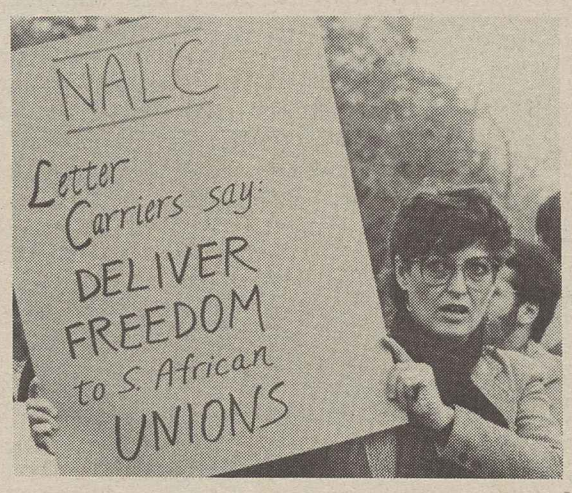






Members of the Teachers and Communications Workers and representatives of the A. Philip Randolph Institute picketed the South African consulates in New York, above, and Beverly Hills, Calif., right.





Sec.-Treas. Donahue at a sidewalk press conference demands release of the 21 jailed trade unionists as pickets from the Auto Workers and Letter Carriers march near the South African embassy in Washington. Seattle area union members, bottom left, issue a similar message as they demonstrate at the consulate in that city.

Federal policy sought

Healthy auto industry pressed as trade goal

Detroit — The Reagan Administration should press for enactment of domestic auto content legislation and seek a multi-year extension of the Voluntary Restraint Agreement with Japan as part of an overall federal auto industry policy, the Auto Workers urged.

At an International Trade Commission hearing here, UAW President Owen Bieber said those measures could create and preserve well over a million jobs by 1990. Failure to take action to ensure a healthy domestic auto industry will result in economic decline for the country and ballooning trade deficits, he warned.

Bieber stressed that if current trends continue, the domestic auto makers may only have the capacity to build 900,000 subcompacts annually by 1990—while subcompact sales that year would be 4.2 million.

"Clearly, the resulting heavy reliance on imports—whether marketed by domestic or foreign-based companies—could become a severe economic burden and represent a major policy failure that can and should be avoided," he said.

Progress at risk

"Our progress at the bargaining table can very easily be undone and overwhelmed in the absence of a clear commitment by our government to a viable domestic auto industry," he emphasized, reminding the commission that the UAW bargained responsibly this past fall to maintain and create jobs for American workers.

To protect those jobs in the auto and auto-related industries, Bieber said an appropriate policy would be the continued restraint of Japanese imports to a 17-percent share of the U.S. market.

Warning about the future of small car production in the United States, he said the union has been able to bargain only "limited assurances" from the industry on this segment.

Bieber said that while the domestic auto firms "concern themselves only with profits," the federal government "certainly ought to be concerned with the consequences of expanded imports on an already frightening trade deficit situation."

Pointing to this year's $19-billion auto trade deficit with Japan, Bieber said "there is absolutely no reason" for it to continue. Discussions of future small car production often overlook the fact that the domestic car firms are making healthy profits while producing most of their subcompacts here, he noted.

"The U.S. government should not permit them to abandon small car production now just because the companies expect to make even higher profits through a so-called captive import strategy," the UAW leader said.

Not so healthy

Addressing the effect of back-to-back recessions, Bieber told the commission that while the auto industry appears to have joined in the recovery, "an industry that will have discarded 170,000 hourly workers over five years is not 'healthy' in the most important sense."

He stressed that the UAW doesn't expect auto industry employment to increase, but "the question is whether the rate of employment decline will be kept within manageable bounds."

The internationalization of the auto industry is not the result of market forces, Bieber said, but rather the outcome of "aggressive mercantilism" by other nations that seek to restrain their automotive imports while promoting exports.

Bieber pointed out that the U.S. trade deficit has swelled as the country has tried to soak up the flood of exports that are "pushed out by the policies of all other auto-producing countries." For the United States to practice free trade alone and allow restrictions on Japanese imports to end would result in "a rapid collapse of a major portion of our auto industry here at a terrible cost to auto suppliers and the U.S. economy as a whole," he predicted.

Works in Canada

The same U.S. auto companies that have fought a domestic content approach here "have functioned quite well under a similar approach that was adopted in Canada some 20 years ago," Bieber pointed out. He said the "Canadian value-added" feature of the U.S.-Canadian auto pact "has not reduced trade there but has permitted a rapid expansion of trade in both directions."

The voluntary restraint pact with Japan, coupled with passage of domestic content legislation in the House, has boosted Japanese investment in U.S. plants, but the announced plans of the major Japanese auto firms remain "very inadequate," Bieber said.

Investment has keyed on assembly plants, with a heavy reliance on imported components. The result is that when the U.S. plants become fully operational the domestic content of all vehicles sold here by Japanese companies would still average only 15 percent. The domestic content legislation, however, would raise that level to roughly 50 percent.

CLUW official chosen for D.C. commission

Carol A. Anderson, president of the District of Columbia chapter of the Coalition of Labor Union Women, has been named to the D.C. Commission for Women by Mayor Marion Barry.

Anderson, who is an equal employment assistant on the staff of the Government Employees, is a shop steward for Office & Professional Employees Local 2, a vice president of the D.C. Coalition of Black Trade Unionists, and she chairs CLUW's national affirmative action committee.

CWA Executive Vice President James B. Booe, center, with fellow ILO worker delegates Huang Zongxi of China and Emile Jans of Belgium at postal and telecommunications conference.

ILO conference advances communications union role

Geneva—The right of postal and telecommunications workers to form free trade unions and bargain collectively was strongly affirmed at a conference held here by the International Labor Organization.

The 18 governments represented at the nine-day session proved "very willing" to accept collective bargaining in wage determination, James B. Booe, executive vice president of the Communications Workers, said. Booe, who was vice chairman of the 20 worker delegates and representative of U.S. workers, termed the government side's attitude a step in the right direction.

Reviewing the results of the first conference held by the ILO's joint committee for postal and telecommunications services, Booe said he was doubtful at the outset that it would be possible to produce a meaningful report, "but the desire to achieve a real consensus was much greater than I had anticipated."

Stress was also placed on the essential role of unions and collective bargaining in occupational health and safety, one of the two major items on the committee's agenda.

Measures to improve health and safety must be taken "at all levels" and in consultation with trade unions, "particularly in the framework of collective agreements," the committee said.

The detailed recommendations adopted by the committee called for creation of a professionally independent occupational health service that would "cooperate closely" with trade unions.

Such a service "should not confine itself to aspects of work alone," but should consider "all factors liable to affect workers' health and well-being," the group specified.

Booe, who was on the worker team that negotiated with the governments on safety and health, said the conclusions reached can be very helpful to unions around the world.

In a second series of conclusions the committee said all postal and telecommunications workers should "through their trade unions have the right to collective bargaining with regard to the determination of wages."

It called on governments to "encourage and promote the full development of machinery for collective bargaining" so that the terms and conditions of employment can be set "by means of collective agreements."

Jobs for women

In a separate resolution, also adopted unanimously, the committee said women should enjoy the "same opportunity as men to hold all jobs in postal and communications services" and should be guaranteed "equal pay for equal work."

Parental leave to meet family responsibilities should likewise be assured along with a "guarantee of re-employment at the end of such leave," the resolution added.

Pilots blast FAA safety cover-up at Continental

The Air Line Pilots accused the Federal Aviation Administration of an "inexcusable" cover-up of safety laxity by Continental Airlines.

ALPA President Henry Duffy cited documents obtained by the Washington Post under the federal Freedom of Information Act as bearing out the union's contention that safety regulations were violated after Continental forced its flight crews out on strike in October 1983.

The airline had seized on a since-closed loophole in federal bankruptcy law to tear up its union contract and unilaterally cut the pay of its pilots in half.

FAA inspectors found 52 possible safety violations while investigating ALPA complaints in February and March of this year, the agency's documents revealed. While most of the alleged violations were resolved without formal action, the agency said it is seeking civil penalties for violations involving failure to train flight crews in the handling of hazardous material and for flying and permitting a pilot to fly without a current proficiency test.

Duffy noted that a House subcommittee had held hearings on Continental's safety management in mid-June. It is "astounding," he said, that the FAA didn't make the results of its investigations available to the panel.

The ALPA also has protested Continental's current attempt to spin off its profitable southern Pacific routes to a new subsidiary airline.

The union welcomed a decision by the Civil Aeronautics Board denying the route application. In denying the application, the CAB noted that Continental's assets are still subject to the bankruptcy court's jurisdiction.

Pressure on South Africa builds

The 21 black trade unionists were picked up by police and held without charge following last month's peaceful, two-day "stay-away" that brought South Africa's industrial heartland to a near-standstill.

The AFL-CIO immediately protested the Pretoria government's use of police arrests and military force to attack the democratic rights of black trade unionists. It joined the ICFTU in strongly protesting the arrests of Camay and Dlamini.

On Nov. 29, Kirkland delivered a letter of protest to Sec. of State George Shultz denouncing South Africa's attack on free unions and their leaders. Kirkland's letter called on the U.S. government to impose stiff sanctions on the South African government and to sever diplomatic, cultural and social ties with that nation if the trade unionists were not released.

Several American labor officials, including AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue, were arrested in the Dec. 4 demonstration of trade unionists at the South African embassy and during the continuing daily demonstrations at the embassy that began Nov. 21.

Protest marches at South African consulates in several major cities Dec. 4 reflected the solidarity of American trade unionists in their abhorrence of apartheid.

Seeking support

Three South African union leaders, who visited Washington last week to enlist American support against their government's apartheid policies, said the jailings of their fellow union members were part of an effort by South Africa to suppress the nation's fledgling black labor movement.

"The state is sending cops into the factories to have workers give evidence in court (against union leaders); the state is clamping down on the union leadership," said Calvin Makgeleng, chairman of the Chemical Workers Industrial Union in the Transvaal province where last month's strikes were centered.

Black South Africans, banned from unions until 1980, are "fighting for living wages," said Pat Horn, an organizer for the Paper, Wood & Allied Workers Union.

In the rural black townships, which are plagued by high unemployment, "there are starvation wages . . . and misery and poverty are much higher" than in the rest of the country, she said.

The AFL-CIO has strongly supported the South African black unions, both morally and materially, and has repeatedly urged the Reagan Administration to apply pressure on Pretoria to end apartheid.

Pay equity study cites progress in public sector

en's jobs to levels paid for equally valuable—but not necessarily identical—jobs held mostly by men.

The coalition's study found that leaders in state and local governments are coming up with policy changes or new laws mandating pay equity.

"Together with unions, which are aggressively bargaining for non-discriminatory pay, state and local governments are leading the national movement for pay equity," the report said.

The state and local initiatives include new laws or amendments, enforcement of wage discrimination rules, and executive policy decisions.

Action being taken by state legislatures, cities, counties, school districts and local agencies include information and data collection, job evaluation studies, establishment of pay equity policies, and enforcement of existing civil service laws, the survey noted. Many of the actions were originated by unions.

Where states and localities have failed to carry out pay equity promises unions have moved quickly to file lawsuits and discrimination complaints.

Among the best known cases, the State, County & Municipal Employees won a key decision in federal district court when the state of Washington was found guilty of wage bias and ordered to upgrade the pay of nearly 15,000 female employees. That chase has been appealed, and the AFL-CIO and other organizations have filed briefs supporting AFSCME's position.

California suit

In California, the Service Employees went to federal court to file the largest sex-based wage discrimination suit to date. That suit covers some 39,000 people who work for the state in jobs held predominantly by women.

In both cases, the states had done pay equity studies and agreed to act on them, but failed to follow through.

NCPE pointed out that in sharp contrast, voluntary action by the state of Minnesota—where AFSCME represents state workers—has resulted in a plan that will upgrade many state workers' jobs over a four-year period with "absolutely no disruption to the state's economy."

The survey points out that while the wage gap in public employment is wide—in state and local governments women earn 71 cents for every dollar earned by men, in the federal government the ratio is 63 cents on the dollar—in the private sector it is still wider. Employed women in private industry earn only 56 cents for each dollar men earn, and the wage gap in employment anywhere has varied little over the last 30 years, the groups stressed.

The federal Equal Pay Act that mandates equal pay for equal work has helped thousands of women achieve fair wages when they do the same jobs as men for the same employer. But it has made only a small dent in the wage gap because relatively few women hold the identical jobs as men.

The survey sharply rebutted the suggestion by opponents of pay equity that women who want higher pay should leave their jobs and seek those held by men.

This is "an extremely limited remedy," the study charged, because it ignores the clear evidence that wage discrimination exists. It calls for workers to give up jobs for which they have trained and unrealistically assumes that in times of high unemployment any job is available to anyone. Many traditionally "women's jobs," particularly in white collar occupations, are among the fastest growing in our economy, and skilled workers are needed to fill them.

Attitude criticized

Both Wayne and NCPE Chair Nancy Reder were critical of disparaging remarks made by Reagan Administration officials and officials of the U.S. Civil Rights Commission about the idea of pay equity.

Earlier, AFL-CIO Vice President Joyce Miller criticized the remarks by the commission's officials as "incendiary" and a clear and improper attempt "to issue Civil Rights Commission policy even though the commission has not yet discussed or voted on the issue." Miller, who is a vice president of the Clothing & Textile Workers, heads the Coalition of Labor Union Women which is a member of NCPE.

Jewish labor group honors Cleary's human rights role

New York — New York State AFL-CIO President Edward J. Cleary has been given the Labor Human Rights Award of the Jewish Labor Committee.

The award, given annually by the National Trade Union Council of the JLC, was given to Cleary for his "service to the cause of advancing the struggle for social justice and equal opportunity.

At the awards dinner here, Cleary praised the JLC's "commitment to the dignity of mankind."

That commitment "was expressed with action," Cleary said, as soon as the JLC was founded 50 years ago "when you were raising money and helping extricate labor leaders of all nationalities from the onslaught of the Nazi repression in Europe."

The history of the JLC, he said, "is a mosaic of actions on behalf of human rights and the people of the world."

Cleary criticized the Reagan Administration for its insensitivity to the needs of the poor and the disadvantaged. He noted parallels between many of the goals of the labor movement and concerns expressed in the draft pastoral letter on poverty being considered by the nation's Catholic bishops.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue, who presented the award, said the Jewish Labor Committee has played a central role "in the labor movement's long battle to overcome hate and repression and to build a decent society for all citizens."

Donahue warned that "those who oppose us or the values we espouse haven't changed or gone away" and that they are "working today as hard as they ever have to eliminate jobs, cut pay checks and bust unions."

"They are as determined as ever," he said, "to roll back the progress we have made toward full civil rights, toward insuring decent medical care, an adequate education, decent housing and a reasonable measure of social justice."

The Reagan Administration, he asserted, "encourages our opponents at home and abroad."

Labor's mission

Donahue stressed that the labor movement "at home . . . will continue as the instrument through which working people gain a voice in their own destinies."

At the same time, he said, "the labor movement will honor its mandate to support our brothers and sisters in the Middle East, in South Africa, in Poland, in El Salvador, in Chile and wherever else workers are threatened."

JLC President Herbert Magidson, who is a Teachers vice president, warned that there is "a sense of selfishness developing in our country. It is being fed by the growing strength of those who have been able to pin the label of 'special interest' on the labor movement while they very cleverly cloak themselves in the cloth of self-righteousness."

Eloise Giles dies at 98, retired staff librarian

Eloise Giles, former AFL-CIO librarian, died Nov. 27 at Providence Hospital in Washington. She was 98.

Mrs. Giles, who began working for the AFL in 1927, retired from her post with the merged federation in 1960 after 33 years of service.

Reagan claims a mandate to slash programs, cut pay the management-imposed pay cut that Reagan is demanding.

Reagan said he will set an example by taking a 10 percent pay cut himself.

Above all, Reagan insisted, the spending cuts are needed to hold down the budget deficit without raising new tax revenues, imparing defense growth or touching social security cost-of-living adjustments.

During the election campaign, the President insisted that economic growth and greater government efficiencies would overcome a budget deficit that had soared as a result of his tax policies and high unemployment levels.

Only after the election did the White House change its optimistic assumptions of economic growth and concede that the deficit is headed up, not down.

The one big aspect of the budget plan still unresolved as the AFL-CIO News went to press was the level of defense spending. Even the President's strongest supporters in Congress are saying openly that the huge defense budget must bear a reasonable share of spending restraints.

One prevailing view on Capitol Hill was that the White House was counting on Congress to initiate a suspension of the cost-of-living adjustment in social security benefits as well as in other benefit and retirement programs. That would get the President off the hook on his promise—made in an election campaign debate with Walter Mondale—not to tamper with the program. But congressional Democrats have made clear that they are not about to pull the President's political chestnuts out of the fire.

At his news conference Dec. 7, Reagan repeated an erroneous statement about social security that he had made in a presidential campaign debate.

He was asked how he justified exempting social security beneficiaries from "sharing in the burden" of spending cuts.

Wrong again

Reagan responded with some irritation: "Well, because again I have to point out, and none of you seem to pick it up, social security does not contribute to the deficit. . . . If there was a reduction in social security outgo, only two things could be done. Either you would reduce the social security payroll tax or that money would revert to the Social Security Trust Fund. It would not in any way reduce the deficit."

In fact, as was widely noted when Reagan first made that mistake, social security taxes are counted as income and social security payments are counted as outlays in the federal budget and in the determination of the deficit.

The White House budget drafters apparently did not view Reagan's pledge to leave social security benefits intact as applying to the poorest of the elderly—those receiving supplemental security income SSI). The Administration plan would deny them a cost-of-living adjustment.

Food Workers win award of $4.1 million in back pay

A union-won arbitration award will bring more than $4.1 million in back pay to 800 workers at two Armour-Dial plants —a soap factory in Aurora, Ill., and a meat processing plant in Ft. Madison, Ia.

Armour-Dial is a subsidiary of the Greyhound Corp., and employees of both plants are represented by the Food & Commercial Workers.

The parent Greyhound Corp. last February imposed massive wage and benefit reductions for both groups of workers. The wage cut alone dropped base pay from $10.69 to $8.25 an hour. The company claimed as authority for its action a 1981 agreement by the union allowing modifications of portions of the contract when necessary for the employer to maintain its competitive position in the industry.

The arbitration award, which UFCW President William H. Wynn termed "an important victory for workers," held that Greyhound had overreached and made changes not allowed by the letter the union had sent in 1981. The arbitrator said allowable adjustments were limited to pension benefit increases scheduled for 1985 and starting wages for newly hired employees.

The arbitration decision directed back pay for wages illegally reduced and raised the base rate at the soap plant to $11.04 an hour, in line with the soap industry pattern. The packing plant base wage was set at $8.75 an hour, in line with a recent Swift Packing Co. settlement, and fringe benefits will be improved in line with the Swift contract.

UFCW Vice President Lewie G. Anderson, the union's packinghouse division director, said the union has sought "to act in a responsible manner" during a difficult time for the industry.

"But there is a clear difference between being responsible and permitting any employer to unilaterally gut our contract," he stressed. "That difference is greed, and Greyhound's greed was recognized by the arbitrator."

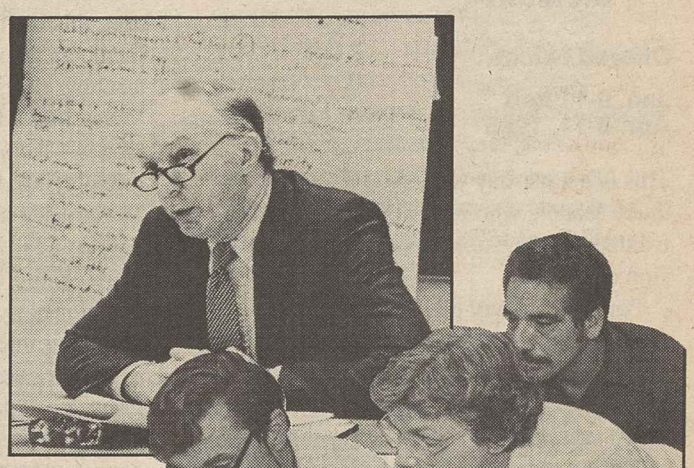
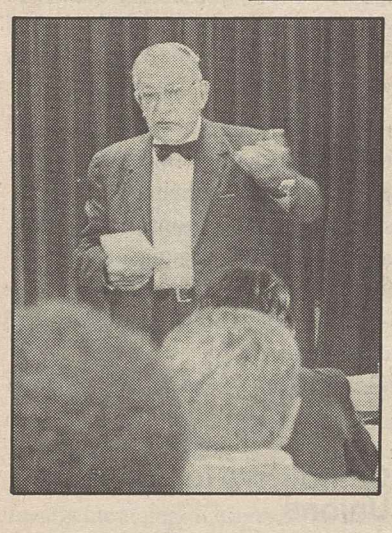
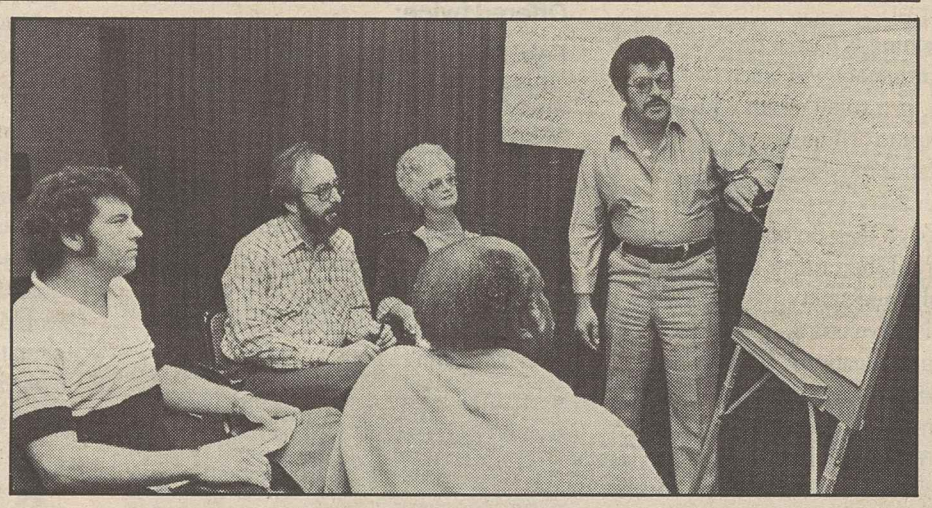
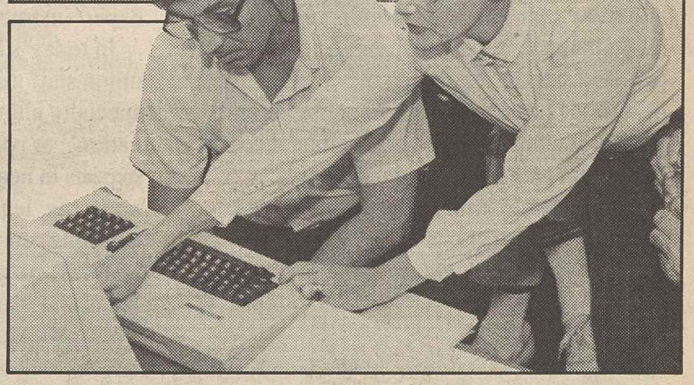
GEORGE MEANY CENTER FOR LABOR STUDIES

casionally for the alumni and friends of the George Meany Center for Labor Studies, Inc.









27 Programs for leadership studies

In the first half of 1985, the George Meany Center will offer 27 institutes and workshops. Most are tool courses to help union leaders to sharpen their skills. A few are backgrounders to broaden understanding.

All fulltime union officers, representatives and staff employees of AFL-CIO affiliates are eligible to attend any of these programs. Most run for one week, from Sunday evening to Friday noon.

All but two of the classes will be held on the George Meany Center campus at Silver Spring, Md. The University of Oregon at Eugene and the University of California at Berkeley will host the two off-campus programs.

The Center's core curriculum focuses on the techniques of organizing, collective bargaining, grievance arbitration and pension bargaining, and on labor law.

One workshop, Advanced Leadership Skills, aims at personal development by helping participants sharpen their skills in rapid reading, clearer writing and effective speaking.

Special institutes and workshops are offered on computers for local unions, newswriting and editing for union publications, effective union action for civil rights, teaching techniques in labor education, occupational health and safety, television as the "cool medium" and union issues for union women.

Three courses will be given for the first time: Life without Arbitration, Curbing Corporate Power and The Changing Workplace.

Course descriptions appear on the next three pages. A registration form appears in this supplement.

In addition to these courses open to leaders of all AFL-CIO organizations, 16 affiliates will sponsor 28 training programs for their own staffs at the George Meany Center from January to June.

The American Institute for Free Labor Development has scheduled five programs for Latin American and Bermudian trade unionists.

The Center's facilities are booked almost solidly through June. However, cancellations sometimes free space. Any AFL-CIO organization interested in using the Center should get in touch with Fred K. Hoehler, Jr., executive director, or Janis Strange, registrar, George Meany Center, 10000 New Hampshire Avenue, Silver Spring, Maryland; telephone 301/431-6400.

George Meany Center Institutes January to June 1985

★ Television: The Cool Medium

Offered twice:

Jan. 9-11 and Apr. 8-11, 1985

This is a three-day workshop to coach union leaders who occasionally are confronted by television reporters and television cameras.

Participants will have three exercises facing video cameras: A hostile confrontation, a panel discussion and a studio interview.

One session focuses on controlling an interview, avoiding "no comment" and recognizing deadly questions. Another concentrates on relating to the camera: gesturing, posture, eye contact, hands and feet, dress and makeup, body language, relaxation techniques and visual aids.

The Labor Institute of Public Affairs assists in the coaching.

The workshop starts at 7 p.m. Monday evening, Apr. 8 and ends with lunch on Thursday, Apr. 11.
Coordinators: Gordon Cole and Gene Morrill

★ Teaching Techniques in Labor Education

Jan. 13-18, 1985

This institute explains and demonstrates the techniques most commonly used in labor education. It is designed for those who teach in union conferences, summer schools or night classes. Cosponsored with the AFL-CIO Department of Education, this is a basic institute for union staff members who want to upgrade their teaching skills.

Sessions will demonstrate techniques—lecture, discussion, buzz groups, role playing, films, and use of materials. Modern education theory stresses participation and involvement for adults to learn, so this institute will emphasize techniques to get students talking and hold their interest.

Practice teaching is part of the program. Each participant will teach two short sessions, in a small group with an expert instructor to critique.

In today's labor movement, many union staff members are teaching their specialty although they do not have "education" as part of their titles. Unions have experts in health and safety, women's concerns, legislative issues, grievance handling, communications, financial procedures, community services and other areas that members need to know about. This institute will help these staff members as well as traditional labor educators.

★ Contract Administration: Life without Arbitration

Jan. 20-24, 1985

The best arbitration case is the one that never takes place. The purpose of this course is to make arbitration unnecessary, or at least less common, by concentrating on efforts to reach settlements in the grievance process short of arbitration.

The course will use all the techniques of the arbitration course—careful preparation of evidence, case analysis, orderly presentation—applied in simulated cases.

Since there can be no final and binding "award," the presentations will have to be judged by the class, weighing the strong and weak points of the union's case as argued in the grievance hearing.

In some instances arbitration is inevitable: bad faith of management or union, politically sensitive issues where neither side wants to yield, etc.

The class, therefore, will explore alternatives to traditional arbitration designed to re-introduce promptness, clarity and low cost into a process that has become slow and expensive. In particular, grievance mediation will be discussed as a settlement device where grievances have piled up and in other special cases.

Participants will explore new approaches to the imposition of discipline in which the involved worker is kept on the job (and on the payroll) until after the hearing and the award. These clauses are sometimes referred to as "justice and dignity" provisions.
Coordinator: Russell Allen

★ Negotiating Techniques for Bargaining with State & Local Agencies

Jan. 20-25, 1985

This institute on collective bargaining techniques is limited to union officers who negotiate in the public sector, other than federal. One day will be spent on the basic principles and proper preparation, with emphasis on financial data including analyzing budgets, audits and the like, using real-life examples.

Participants will be assigned to union and management committees and will attempt to bargain out an agreement in a typical public sector situation. Experienced factfinder-mediators will be on hand and will be assigned to the simulations. They will be given the authority that such neutrals usually have.
Coordinator: William Gillen

★ Negotiating for Pensions

Offered twice:

Feb. 3-7, 1985 at the University of California, Berkeley and Apr. 8-12, 1985 at the George Meany Center

Pensions have become one of the most complicated areas of collective bargaining. This institute will draw upon outstanding union negotiators to train union staff members in the techniques of pension bargaining. Topics will include:

- A summary of recent pension negotiations;
- Collecting basic information and preparing for negotiations;
- Actual assumptions and considerations;
- Costing and bargaining for pension benefits;
- Investment considerations;
- The impact of NLRB, ERISA and the bankruptcy laws on pension bargaining.

Coordinator: Jeffrey MacDonald

★ Arbitration Techniques: Preparation & Presentation

Offered three times:

Jan. 20-25, 1985 at the University of Oregon, Eugene, and Feb. 3-8, and May 12-17, 1985 at the George Meany Center

The way to learn to prepare and present grievance cases to an arbitrator is to do it. That learning is best done at an institute such as this when a union member's future is not at stake.

This institute concentrates on the presentation of mock cases before professional arbitrators who are willing to share their knowledge.

There are practice sessions on the preparation of cases, the techniques of presentation with emphasis on two areas that union representatives find most difficult: opening statements and handling witnesses.

Participants tell us that the most helpful part of this week is the video taping of the mock arbitration proceeding, with the playbacks for analysis and discussion. The arbitrator who has heard the cases takes charge of this session.

Discussions focus on what matters can be arbitrated, the selection of arbitrators and the law of arbitration. Since discipline and discharge cases cause more than half of all grievance arbitrations, special attention is paid to the investigation of such cases and to the rules that arbitrators use in deciding them.

This institute is for union representatives newly assigned to arbitration, or who will have arbitration as part of their responsibility. It will help experienced representatives analyze and brush up on their techniques. Those who concentrate on the final steps in the grievance procedure will find it helpful.
Coordinator: David Alexander

★ Newswriting & Editing for Union Publications

Feb. 3-8, 1985

Here's an opportunity for a union editor to get some coaching on the basics of newswriting and editing and to pick up ideas from other union editors on how a publication might be made more effective. Classes will focus on newswriting, feature writing, headline writing, photo editing and makeup and layout.

Participants will hear from specialists on:

- How to make a union publication more readable, more credible and more useful to union members;
- How to cope with problems of delayed mail deliveries and skyrocketing postal rates;
- How to avoid suits for libel and slander, copyright infringement, and violations of the Landrum Griffin Act.

One session on editorial resources will let editors know where to find cartoons, photos and other feature material.

This workshop is co-sponsored by the International Labor Communications Association. It is open to any union editor or would-be editor of a local, district council or state publication.
Coordinator: Gordon Cole

★ Computers for Local Unions

Offered twice:

Feb. 18-22, and Apr. 21-25, 1985

Don't Come to this class if you can understand this ad for computers: "Receive free graphics board and 128K RAM with purchase of monochrome APC with one disk drive. Option with extra disk and color includes free business software: MS-DOS."

Do Come to this class if you want to make informed decisions about purchasing mini and micro computer systems for your organization. You won't become a computer expert or programmer in four days but you will learn the lingo so you can talk intelligently with vendors. You'll learn to assess the right size and type of computer system for your organization—or judge whether or not you really need a computer.

Union computer applications will be discussed along with suggestions for training your staff and for maintaining the computer once it is yours.

This information will be presented in plain, non-technical terms by teachers who are computer specialists and unionists as well. Several state-of-the-art mini-computers will be available for workshops.
Coordinator: David Alexander

★ Labor Law

Feb. 24-Mar. 1, 1985

Laws affecting staff responsibilities in bargaining, servicing and union administration will be the focus of the Labor Law Institute. Organizing law will not be covered; participants will concentrate on laws affecting internal union administration and collective bargaining, including the problems arising from bankruptcy and plant closings.

The instructors are labor lawyers with day-to-day union experience. Some work directly for unions; others for firms specializing in union work.

Major topics to be covered are:

Laws dealing with internal union affairs—Three aspects of Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act

(Landrum-Griffin): members' rights (Title I), election procedures (Title IV) and current enforcement practices under Title II, the reporting provisions.

The duty of fair representation—The union's obligation to represent fairly all workers in the bargaining unit on grievances, negotiations, and job rights.

Laws affecting bargaining—Basics of the Taft-Hartley provisions on exclusive representation, duty to bargain, access to information, the laws affecting strikes, lockouts, picketing and boycotts. New developments in the law affecting bankruptcy, plant closings and successorship will be emphasized.

Equal opportunity obligations—Laws, regulations and court rulings on what constitutes ''discrimination'' and their impact on contracts. Instructors will deal with issues such as discrimination, comparable worth, affirmative action and pregnancy disability.

Coordinators: Marjorie Rachlin & Lawrence Rogin

★ Negotiating Techniques for Private Sector Bargaining

Mar. 3-8, 1985

This institute will be limited to union officers concerned with bargaining in the private sector. It's intended to familiarize them with the actual conduct of labor-management negotiations at the bargaining table. It will help to sharpen the skills of those who have had negotiating experience.

After a full day's discussion of the basics of collective bargaining, participants will be divided into management and union committees. They then engage in a simulated bargaining session and try to negotiate an agreement within stipulated guidelines. A new simulation script has been prepared to replace the now-familiar Lastic Plastics. Federal mediators will be on hand in case their services are requested.

The entire exercise, including caucuses, is video taped and played back for comment from the federal mediators, Center staff members and the participants.

Considerable class time is devoted to methods of calculating the cost of vacations, holidays, disability, shift differentials and other union benefits. Participants learn the formulas that take some of the mystery out of the necessary arithmetic.

A method of instant recomputation on a computer of the costs of proposed non-wage benefits during negotiations will be demonstrated.

Coordinator: William Gillen

★ Curbing Corporate Power

Mar. 10-13, 1985

To deal effectively with a modern business corporation, union leaders need a thorough understanding of corporate structure, how rapidly it is changing and how profoundly.

Keen competition from abroad, extensive product diversification and shifts away from basic manufacturing have led many corporations to merge with giant conglomerates in completely different industries and/or radically revamp their own structure.

This institute will explore the extent and nature of these and related changes with emphasis on their impact on collective bargaining within major corporations and industries, worker participation and ownership, pricing policies, anti-trust and merger legislation and international trade.

This institute will benefit especially members of union headquarters staff with negotiating or research responsibilities.

★ Advanced Organizing Techniques

Mar. 11-21, 1985

This two-week workshop is co-sponsored by the AFL-CIO Department of Organization and Field Services. Those who want to participate should apply to their own union's Director of Organizing or to the international union officer in charge of organizing.

The international unions nominating individuals to attend this workshop will send those names to the AFL-CIO Department of Organization where a final selection will be made. Organizers, whatever their titles, who supervise and direct organizing staffs will be given priority.

In class, experienced organizers will present techniques that have succeeded for them. Organizing case studies will be treated as will ''issue organizing'' where the election itself is an incident in a long-range program.

Coordinator: Jeffrey MacDonald

★ Advanced Grievance Arbitration

Mar. 17-22, 1985

The advanced training for grievance arbitration will help participants polish their techniques when they present their cases to arbitrators. There will be special exercises in examination and cross examination of witnesses and in the preparation of briefs. Researching issues and using arbitration services will be discussed.

Participation in this institute is limited to those who have attended the basic arbitration class or who have presented grievance cases before an arbitrator.

Coordinator: Lawrence Rogin

★ Union Issues for Union Women

Apr. 14-19, 1985

The Center has offered this program for 10 years. It is open to women and men. This year's institute will focus on the ways that women's special concerns can be addressed through organizing and bargaining. All workers share the need for better wages and working conditions, but some issues are particularly important to women workers: pay equity, opportunities for training and promotion, sexual harassment, leave time and health and safety, to name a few. Knowing what can be done about these issues through the union contract is basic to negotiating and organizing strategy.

This institute will focus on:

Issues in organizing—What issues are likely to surface in a workplace with many women? How can more women become active and involved during the drive?

Bargaining—What issues vital to women need to be brought to the bargaining table? How do they get on the union's

Nondiscriminatory policy for students

The George Meany Center for Labor Studies, Inc. admits students of any sex, age, race, color, national and ethnic origin to all the rights, privileges, programs, and activities generally accorded or made available to students at the school. It does not discriminate on the basis of sex, age, race, color, national and ethnic origin in administration of its educational policies, scholarships and loan programs and athletic and other school administered programs.

Who Is Eligible, General Rules

Eligibility

To participate in labor studies institutes or programs at the George Meany Center, one must be a full-time officer, representative or staff employee of an AFL-CIO affiliate.

Registration

Early registration is advised. Labor studies institutes are limited to 25 participants, not more than three from the same union. The Center reserves the right to postpone or cancel any institute.

Hours

Registration for most labor studies institutes begins at 4 p.m. on Sundays with the first session at 7 p.m. Morning classes begin at 9 a.m. running until noon. They resume at 1:30 p.m. and run until 4:30 p.m. Advance notice will be given of evening events.

Accommodations

Unless their homes are within commuting distance, participants are expected to live on campus. The campus guest quarters can house 141. Most rooms are singles with queen-size beds; a few are doubles with twin beds. Each room has its own private bathroom and study desk. Maid service is furnished. The rooms are spacious and pleasant. Participants are invited to bring their spouses.

Meals

Meals are served cafeteria style in the Dining Hall. Breakfast is from 7:30-8:30 a.m.; lunch, 12-1; dinner 6-7 p.m. Wakeup calls are made at 7 a.m. for all students.

Costs

There is no tuition charge at the George Meany Center. Room and board charge for a student in residence is $70 a day, single occupancy; $50 a day, double. This includes three meals. Students who commute are charged $35 to cover lunches at the Center.

Deposit

A deposit is required with each application for registration in an institute, workshop or program at the George Meany Center. For students who do not live in the area, the deposit is $70 which will be credited to the final bill for room and board. For commuters living in the Washington, D.C. area, the deposit is $35. Those applying for the institute at the University of Oregon, Eugene, must enclose a deposit of $25.

The deposit is refundable if registration is cancelled and notice of cancellation is received by the Wednesday before the program. Please make check payable to the George Meany Center for Labor Studies.

The Center asks each participant to settle for the bill by cash, personal check, American Express, Master Charge, Visa or Bank Americard before leaving the campus.

Dress

Dress is informal at all times. Those who want to take part in athletic activities should bring sports clothes.

Discipline

A labor studies institute is no junket. All who come should do so with serious purpose. All sessions start on time. Participants are expected to be prompt. The Labor Studies Center is free to cancel anyone's registration at any time.

Certificates of Completion

Participants will be expected to attend all sessions. The Center will award certificates on the basis of full attendance.

agenda? What solutions and contract language are being tried?

Leadership—How can we build support for action on these issues? How can women gain influence and have a say in bargaining, organizing and all the day-to-day tasks of union leaders?

Women from blue collar, clerical, professional and service jobs—public sector and private sector—can benefit from comparing problems and discussing different approaches worked out by their unions. Sessions of this institute will promote this dialogue.

★ Effective Union Action for Civil Rights

Apr. 21-25, 1985

The AFL-CIO Civil Rights Department's annual conference on Effective Union Action for Civil Rights is planned especially for Civil Rights and Women's Rights Designees of AFL-CIO unions. The conference is useful as well for all union staff members and elected officers interested in this important subject.

The conference includes reports and discussion on current issues of civil rights activities and law. Participants have an opportunity to exchange ideas with government officials, with academics and leaders of organizations with a particular commitment to civil rights and equal opportunity.
Coordinator: Jacqueline Brophy

★ The Changing Workplace

Apr. 28-May 1, 1985

The workplace of the future will be vastly changed from that of the past. Not only will the physical aspect of the workplace be different, but the workers themselves will have different characteristics and the place will be managed differently.

The role of the union in this new workplace will also have to be different. These topics will be explored in this "look into the future."

★ Organizing Techniques I

May 12-17, 1985

This program is for full-time international or local union staff members who have responsibility for organizing.

Participants will discuss the changing nature of the work force. A simulated organizing exercise will teach the mechanics of an organizing campaign. The exercise will be video taped so participants can see themselves in action as organizers. You will work with prospective members, interviewing workers to determine interests and issues. You will discuss ways to develop leaders and make an organizing committee work effectively.

The course de-emphasizes the legalistic approach to organizing, but it will cover the law on organizing and Labor Board procedure—from the organizer's viewpoint.

Participants will study sophisticated anti-union techniques being used by employers and labor relations consultants to defeat workers' efforts to organize. Countervailing measures will be suggested.
Coordinators: Russell Allen & Harry Millstone

★ Advanced Editing Skills

May 19-24, 1985

This is a class for union editors who have completed the Newswriting and Editing workshop and are ready for more coaching. Instruction will focus on three editing skills:

Layout and Makeup—Type selection, making your layout more interesting, using boxes, the primary optical area and eye path, legibility, and copy fitting.

Picture Editing—Picture sources, posing pictures, cropping, reducing and enlarging, pairing pictures, picture series, picture pages, line art, screens.

Headline Writing—Headline type faces, headline type sizes, headline grammar and punctuation, character counting, news heads, feature heads, pitfalls and traps.

Thursday the class will divide into teams, each to produce its own newsletter. Those newsletters will be critiqued at the final session Friday by the President of the International Labor Communication Association.

The class will be limited to 20. Participants will be asked to bring copies of one recent issue for critiquing on layout, pictures and headlines.
Coordinator: Gordon Cole

★ Advanced Skills for Union Leaders

June 2-7, 1985

Successful union leaders have many abilities, a keen political sense and a knack for getting along with people. Strong personal skills are a useful supplement. This institute is offered to help you sharpen skills you need in union work. The program focuses on:

Public speaking—There'll be daily coaching sessions in speaking to groups. The classes will be video taped so you as well as the instructor can critique your presentation.

Faster reading—You can learn to read faster through the use of exercises and through practice on an automatic reading pacer. You'll be offered aids to concentration and comprehension.

Clearer writing—You'll be given guidelines to help you organize and write more persuasive letters, reports and articles.

Parliamentary procedure—You'll learn to chair meetings more effectively. Knowledge of proper procedure and confusion-free leadership will steer your group to sounder union decisions.

Dealing with anger and stress—Leaders are often confronted by anger and stress in themselves and others. In this institute you'll learn techniques for handling them.

Instructors are specialists from the labor movement who know what your work is like. The sessions will be heavy on participation and light on lectures.
Coordinator: Gene Morrill

★ Occupational Health & Safety

June 2-7, 1985

Every year hundreds of thousands of workers get sick and die as a result of exposure to toxic substances on their jobs. Thousands more are killed in the workplace because of hazardous conditions. And thousands are injured because of unhealthful or unsafe conditions that could have been prevented.

This institute is designed to provide union officials with a range of skills necessary to respond effectively to the complex problems relating to chemical and physical hazards in the workplace.

After this five-day program, a union representative should be able to use a mix of problem-solving approaches: contract negotiations, grievance procedure and arbitration, safety and health committees, OSHA inspections, the OSHA appeals process, other government safety and health agencies, and mobilizing community support around health and safety issues.

Participants will be coached in recognizing health and safety hazards, the nature and cause of occupational diseases, relating specific OSHA standards to workplace conditions, worker and union rights under OSHA, using the media for safety and health purposes; and dealing with occupational safety and health issues in negotiating and administering a union agreement. The subjects will be geared to the current public policy on occupational safety and health.
Coordinator: David G. Alexander

★ Plant Closings

June 9-12, 1985

This program seeks to define the union's role when the employer plans to close the plant. It will deal with legal, economic and social aspects of plant closings: how to prevent them, if possible, and how to cushion their impact. Discussion will center on what can be done to help workers tide over themselves and their families and their communities and make the transition to new jobs.

Participants will examine the bargaining rights of a union where a plant is closing, everything from transfer rights and relocation pay to severance pay and pension rights.

Proposed plant closing legislation will be examined. Case histories of plant closings will be the basis for discussion.

Programs available from the federal government to help workers, corporations and communities will be studied as well as the European experiences.
Coordinator: Jeffrey MacDonald

★ Fact Finding & Interest Arbitration

June 16-21, 1985

This institute will examine the experience of unions with both interest arbitration and fact finding. There is now considerable experience with the arbitration of contract terms, particularly in the public sector. Many states require interest arbitration of the protective services and a few require it for all public employee disputes. In other states it is offered as an alternative, or may be agreed to by the parties.

This institute will examine the variety of forms of interest arbitration, and the use of fact finding as a way of settling public employee contract impasses. It will analyze the impact on bargaining and the strategies that are effective with the various forms of interest arbitration. Attention will be paid to the preparation of both fact-finding and interest arbitration cases.

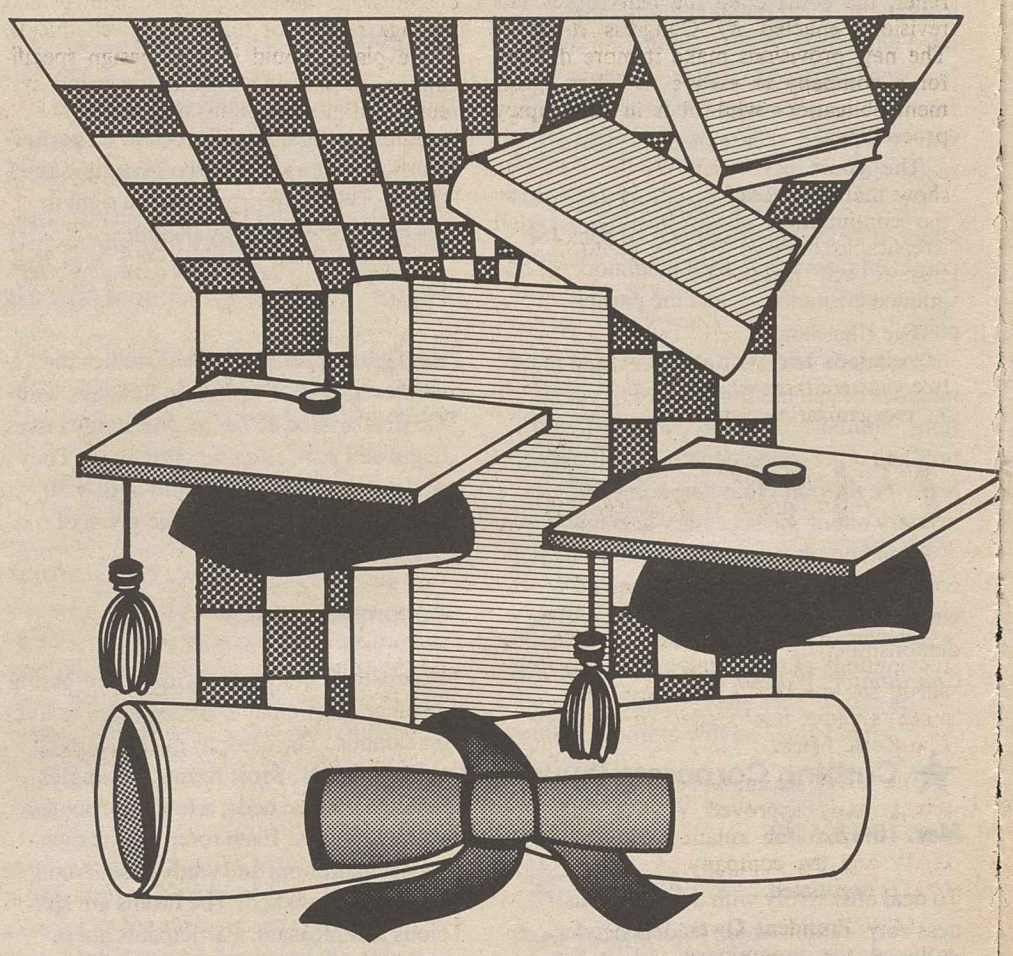
College degree candidates in for week-in-residence Jan. 27



More than 60 officers, staff, and other union activists of AFL-CIO unions will attend this year's first week-in-residence for students working for college degrees, Jan. 27 to Feb. 2, at the George Meany Center for Labor Studies.

The participants choose two courses to study during the next six months. Among the subjects offered this year are Collective Bargaining, Labor and the American Political System, Labor Movement Past and Present, Labor Law, Economic Policy Issues, Industrial Sociology, American Unions Face the Future, Understanding Economic Measures, and American Literature of Social Protest.

While they're on campus the students meet daily with two professors and do the first written assignments for their courses. At the end of the week they go home and complete their remaining assignments over the next five months, sending each to the instructors and getting back comments.

Since the program started eleven years ago, participants have come from 47 states including Alaska and Hawaii and from nearly as many AFL-CIO unions. The three who will receive their degrees on Jan. 30 bring to 73 those who have earned the Antioch University degree of Bachelor of Arts in Labor Studies.

The week-in-residence is held twice every year—in January and July. For more information write to College Degree Program, George Meany Center, 10000 New Hampshire Ave., Silver Spring, Md. 20903.

'It can happen here'

Toxic chemicals pose a worldwide hazard

The toxic gas leak that killed more than 2,000 people and injured tens of thousands more at Union Carbide's chemical plant in Bhopal, India, is stark evidence of a peril that exists worldwide, including the United States, according to AFL-CIO Occupational Safety & Health Director Margaret Seminario.

"So far, the United States has been spared wholesale disaster," she said, "but chemical accidents involving the deaths of dozens of workers and forcing the evacuation of up to 7,000 local residents at a time are ample proof that it can happen here. The Bhopal catastrophe highlights the need for government, industry and unions to work together to make sure it doesn't."

Since it is ignorance, not familiarity, that breeds negligence and complacency, she said, "America's first need is for strong federal, state and local right-to-know laws to arm workers and the public with knowledge about the dangers they face. Secondly, we need much stronger federal exposure standards and safety regulations and more effective in-plant and community-wide safety programs."

Along with the explosive and volatile methyl isocyanate that caused India's tragedy, a wide range of other toxic chemicals, such as chlorine, phosgene and hydrogen sulfide are in common use in the United States. Most exposures occur in the workplace, where these substances are used in the production of other chemicals, but since they are shipped by rail, truck and aircraft to plants all over the world, the potential for accidental emission exists virtually everywhere.

Yet, Seminario pointed out, "there are no federal regulations that deal specifically with prevention and management of chemical accidents in the workplace or in the community, nor are there adequate regulations dealing with the transport of highly toxic chemicals."

Under Reagan Administration policies, most of the chemical industry, including Union Carbide's methyl isocyanate plant in Institute, W.Va., has been exempted from routine OSHA inspections, and federal "right-to-know" regulations have been weakened and riddled with "trade-secret" loopholes. Right-to-know laws adopted by 20 states to fill the vacuum, largely at the behest of the labor movement, are under challenge by the chemical industry on the grounds that they are onerous and unnecessary.

More regulation

"America needs more, not less, regulation of hazardous chemicals," Seminario said. "Along with requiring full disclosure of chemical hazards, OSHA and the Environmental Protection Agency should require all manufacturers and users of toxic chemicals to develop plans to control and manage release of highly toxic chemicals. These plans should include design specifications, monitoring systems, warning systems, routine inspections and maintenance, backup systems, training, emergency response measures and evacuation plans for workers and communities."

If government fails to act, Seminario said, unions should try to strengthen health and safety provisions through collective bargaining, as the Steelworkers did in 1980 by negotiating comprehensive inspection, new technology and training programs to eliminate carbon monoxide hazards in the steel industry.

Bankruptcy court rules airline must honor pact

Cleveland—A federal bankruptcy court ruled that Wright Air Lines cannot abrogate its union contracts while undergoing reorganization.

In a Nov. 13 decision, the court denied the commuter line's request for immediate, interim relief from its agreement with the Air Line Pilots. ALPA represented about 110 Wright pilots at the time of the bankruptcy filing in September.

In turning down the request for interim relief, the court cited the bankruptcy law revisions enacted by Congress in June. The new provisions make it more difficult for a company to escape its labor agreement obligations while it is in bankruptcy proceedings.

The court held that Wright failed to show that "the relief sought is essential to the continuation of its business or that irreparable damage to the debtor-in-possession will result if the relief is not granted."

The Cleveland-based firm had just ended negotiations and was about to sign a new two-year contract when it filed for Chapter 11 reorganization bankruptcy.

United Negro College Fund opens the doors to higher education for thousands of young people through its financial support.

Kirkland leads labor's drive for support of black colleges

Among organized labor's proudest achievements is its historic role as a champion of the right of all Americans to education, and that philosophy translates into direct action in the AFL-CIO's long support of the United Negro College Fund.

This year AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, with the endorsement of the federation's Executive Council, is serving as UNCF's labor chairman for its nationwide fund-raising telethon to be broadcast in nearly 100 cities on Dec. 29.

The telethon, "Lou Rawls' Parade of Stars," is in its fifth year, and it is the first national telethon ever devoted to raising money for education. The 12-hour show will begin at noon.

Kirkland, in agreeing to lead this year's support effort by the AFL-CIO and its affiliates, stressed the crucial importance of higher education in fortifying Americans to deal with the most pressing problems while building a just and prosperous future.

"The black colleges were founded a century ago on such dreams of a bright, free future, and they continue today to satisfy the thirst of young people for knowledge and progress," Kirkland said.

Many of the schools that comprise the United Negro College Fund are in extreme financial difficulty, Kirkland observed in a letter to unionists urging support of the fund.

"If these institutions cease to exist, we will be denying countless numbers of black youngsters the equality of opportunity so vital to their futures and to the future of our nation," he said.

Significant role

Kirkland said the AFL-CIO, including its Departments of Education, Civil Rights and Community Services, will be playing a "significant role" in UNCF's programs "in keeping with the federation's long-standing commitment to higher education and the need to provide upward mobility for all of our youth." Kirkland recently hosted a Washington reception for fund officials to acquaint trade unionists with the UNCF's needs and programs.

The 42 private, predominantly black colleges of the United Negro College Fund enroll some 45,000 students annually. Although they make up less than 4 percent of American colleges, they enroll 35 percent of all black students attending four-year colleges and universities.

Many UNCF colleges are well over a century old, founded in the mid-1850s or after the Civil War to feed the hunger of young black Americans for education and a better life. Students at UNCF schools say they choose to attend them because they offer high academic standards, small classes and individualized attention and a unique environment available only at a predominantly black college.

Lower tuition is also an attraction, since the cost of attending a UNCF school is about two-thirds less than at comparable private colleges nationally. Most students at UNCF schools are the children of low-income families who can provide little or no financial help. The UNCF reports that 90 percent of all students in its affiliated colleges need scholarships and loans.

40-year effort

Under the motto, "A mind is a terrible thing to waste," the fund has raised more than $350 million for its member institutions since its founding in 1944.

The UNCF relies on contributions from business, labor, foundations, civic and other organizations, students and other individuals. The AFL-CIO has been a long-time supporter.

Among the graduates of UNCF colleges have been Martin Luther King, Jr., Olympic champion Edwin Moses, Metropolitan Opera soprano Leontyne Price, singer Lionel Ritchie, Mayors Andrew Young of Atlanta and Ernest Morial of New Orleans and the late Gen. Chappie James, first black four-star general in the Air Force.

The "Parade of Stars" telethon Dec. 29 will be hosted for the fifth year by singer Lou Rawls who helped begin it. More than 50 nationally known performers are scheduled to appear during the 12-hour broadcast that starts at noon.

UAW reaches accord with Mazda

Detroit—The Auto Workers and Mazda Motor Co. have reached preliminary agreement on a pact that provides for recognition of the union as bargaining agent for workers at the Japanese automaker's plant now under construction in Flat Rock, Mich.

The UAW international executive board unanimously approved a letter of intent with Mazda for relations between the UAW and the company until a full contract is negotiated.

UAW President Owen Bieber, who negotiated the preliminary agreement with UAW Vice President Stephen P. Yokich, said the letter of intent will help the union and the automaker "build a relationship on the strongest possible footing."

Bieber stressed that the UAW in the pact recognizes and makes allowances for "the huge investment Mazda is making and the importance of success in this venture to both Mazda and the union."

At the same time, it insures "that Mazda workers will enjoy the full benefits of UAW representation." An estimated 3,500 employees will work at the Flat Rock facility.

The Mazda plant is being built on the site of a former Ford Motor Co. plant. Ford owns 25 percent of Mazda.

Recognition provision

The UAW said the letter of intent provides for preferential hiring of qualified workers laid off when the Ford plant was closed as well as for other laid-off Ford workers. At least a majority of the Mazda workers will be former UAW-represented employees, and the union will be automatically recognized as bargaining agent.

The preliminary agreement calls for a temporary wage and benefit package, job probation and grievance procedures to be in place when the plant opens, with the stipulation that talks for a complete agreement will begin within three months of the start of car production at the plant. Negotiations will be concluded within six months of start-up.

The letter spells out some provisions that the parties have agreed will be part of the final agreement. Among them, base wage rates will be at 85 percent of then-current Ford rates, to be raised to full parity by the end of the three-year agreement.

Also, full cost-of-living adjustments will be provided, based on the U.S. consumer price index, and the company agreed that outside contracting will be discussed in collective bargaining.

The pact also provides for a major benefit package covering vacation, holidays and leave, retirement and insurance plans.

Health and safety committees and an employee involvement program are spelled out as are overtime and shift premiums, and a new-hire wage rate that starts workers at 85 percent of standard rates with a guarantee of full rates in 18 months.

The UAW said the letter also calls for "a blending of cultural approaches and operating flexibility" in the way the plant is run.

Meanwhile, UAW members at the joint General Motors Co. and Toyota Motor Corp. plant in Fremont, Calif. saw their first new car roll off the assembly line Dec. 10.

The UAW negotiated an agreement with the GM-Toyota venture after the companies agreed to cooperate on making cars at the plant once owned solely by GM. Most employees in the plant, known as New United Motor Mfg. Co., are workers laid off when GM shut it down in 1982.

Berge named chairman of railroad labor group

President Ole M. Berge of the Maintenance of Way Employes has been elected chairman of the Railway Labor Executives' Association to succeed President Fred A. Hardin of the United Transportation Union.

Also elected at the RLEA meeting were President Richard A. Kilroy of the Railway & Airline Clerks to continue as executive secretary-treasurer and President C. E. Wheeler of the Railway Carmen to serve as vice chairman.

Pay key issue in Chicago's school strike

Chicago—With other key issues settled, disagreement on the terms of a new wage package is keeping some 28,000 Chicago Teachers Union members on the picket line in the second week of their walkout that began Dec. 3.

Meanwhile, about 12,000 other non-teaching employees remain on strike while the 17 local unions that represent them bargain with the city's school board.

CTU President Jacqueline Vaughn said the union and the Chicago Board of Education "are close" to an agreement on a raise and a bonus, "but we sure need to get closer."

Although the school board had sought pay concessions, the union fought for a raise, insisting that the board had enough money in its current budget to pay for a fair increase.

The parties are still hammering out the size of the raise, the amount of a bonus payment, and how the package will be apportioned among the various teacher job classifications.

But Vaughn said that even if there is a settlement, the teachers won't go back to the classrooms with the city's 431,000 students until the school board reaches agreements with the other school unions.

Near agreement

Marathon bargaining sessions have produced agreement on most issues including the health plan, strengthened agency shop language and COPE check-off procedures.

The Teachers' affiliate scored a major victory over the concession-minded school board when it won restoration of fully paid health insurance program after the board unilaterally decided to start deducting part of the premiums from paychecks. CTU said the board has now agreed to work with the union on medical cost containment rather than cost shifting.

The teachers' contract expired Sept. 1, but the union's members voted in August to extend the old terms to December in hopes of reaching a settlement without a strike. Talks have been going on since last May, the union said.

Non-teaching employees on strike include building custodians, lunch room workers, skilled trades workers and others.

David Roe set to retire Jan. 1 as head of Minnesota labor

St. Paul, Minn.—David K. Roe, president of the Minnesota AFL-CIO, will retire on Jan. 1, 1985, and the state federation's executive board elected Sec.-Treas. Dan Gustafson as his successor.

Roe announced his retirement at the Nov. 30 meeting of the executive board. He was voted the status of president emeritus and will remain on the payroll of the State AFL-CIO as a legislative consultant through Apr. 30, 1985.

After joining the Railway Clerks in 1946, Roe became a member of Lathers Local 190 in 1947. He was elected local vice president in 1951, business agent in 1952, and business representative of the Minnesota State Building Trades Council in 1954. He became president of that council in 1956 and president of the State AFL-CIO in 1966, after having been a vice president for nine years.

During his 18 years as president of the state federation, Roe expanded its political and legislative activities. He considers his "greatest achievement" as getting major planks of labor's legislative agenda enacted by the state legislature.

He cited particularly the years between 1973 and 1978 when Minnesota passed its minimum wage law, upped weekly benefits for unemployment compensation and workers' compensation, enacted a public employee bargaining law, a prevailing wage law, a state safety and health program and a number of other labor-related laws.

Roe told the executive board members that his retirement is based on his desire to spend more time with his grandchildren, to be able to devote time to his post as a University of Minnesota regent and to actively lead the task force to create a national labor interpretative center in Minnesota. He was named to head the task force by Gov. Rudy Perpich.

New leader

Gustafson, 57, will fill out the remaining three years of Roe's presidential term. He noted that Minnesota's organized labor movement faces a different legislative scenario in 1985 with the House controlled by independent Republicans. But he said he is hopeful that "reasonable people can reach accommodations."

Gustafson has been secretary-treasurer of the state federation since 1978 and a vice president from 1966 to 1978. A member of the Plasterers, he previously headed the Minneapolis and Minnesota Building Trades Councils.

Executive Vice President Bernard Brommer was elected by the executive board to be the new secretary-treasurer in January. Brommer, 44, headed State, County & Municipal Employees Council 6 before being elected to the state federation post in 1979.

Retail hiring brings dip in jobless rate

Civilian unemployment last month fell two-tenths of 1 percent to 7.2 percent, largely due to Christmas hiring by retail stores, but manufacturing employment was at a virtual standstill, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

The official jobless rate of 7.2 percent for November still was historically high and failed to indicate the true extent of unemployment in America.

The Full Employment Action Council, a coalition of labor, religious, civil rights, and other groups, estimated the "real" rate last month was 12.8 percent. This covers not only those workers the government classifies as jobless but also 1.2-million "discouraged" workers who have stopped looking for work and 5.4-million others who can get only part-time work.

Nearly all the new jobs created in November were in service industries. BLS Commissioner Janet L. Norwood told a congressional panel that about 40 percent of the 286,000 rise in employment resulted from a larger-than-usual increase in retail trade jobs due to the holiday season.

Appearing before the Joint Economic Committee, Norwood said that while the service-producing sector continues to do well, the manufacturing sector continues to be "relatively flat."

No growth

"Indeed, there has been virtually no growth in factory jobs since summer," she said, adding that in the apparel, textile, shoe and leather industries "every month they seem to be losing more jobs."

Although the jobless rate improved in November, those people who lost their jobs faced a longer wait until their next job. The average time spent unemployed rose from 16.5 weeks in October to 17.5 weeks last month, BLS said.

The November rate compared with a rate of 7.5 percent in both July and August and 7.4 percent in September and October. By another measure that includes members of the armed forces stationed in the United States, the jobless rate declined by three-tenths of 1 percent to 7 percent.

Unemployment among black workers dropped to 15 percent from 15.4 percent last month, but for black teenagers joblessness was virtually unchanged at 40.8 percent. For workers of Hispanic origin, the rate fell from 10.9 percent to 10 percent.

The overall improvement did not affect adult men. Their jobless rate remained unchanged over the month at 6.3 percent. The rate for adult women, however, declined from 6.9 percent to 6.6 percent. The rate for teenagers was down substantially over the month to 17.5 percent from October's 18.8 percent.

New job protection rules sought by Flight Engineers

Orlando, Fla.—Regaining labor protection provisions for airline workers displaced by deregulation and retention of three-person cockpit crews for passenger aircraft headed the agenda for the Flight Engineers' 36th convention.

FEIA President William A. Gill, Jr., in his report to the 75 delegates from chapters around the world, noted that the U.S. Airline Deregulation Act of 1978 contained a provision that affected workers would be protected by having the "first right of hire" by another airline hiring employees in their class and craft, and they would be entitled to compensation for lost pay, up to a maximum amount.

The first-right-of-hire provision was made final by the Labor Dept. this year, and when the Civil Aeronautics Board began investigations to determine whether certain workers had been affected, the airlines went to court. The result, Gill noted, was a court ruling that the labor protective provisions were unconstitutional because the Act gave Congress veto power over the regulations adopted by the Labor Dept.

Gill's report stressed that the union is working for new legislation that would preserve the worker protections while eliminating the congressional veto.

On the continuing battle to retain three-person crews composed of two pilots and a flight engineer on most airline flights, the FEIA has lost some ground, Gill reported. A number of manufacturers of new twin-engine aircraft are proposing that their planes be flown by two-person crews.

Gill stressed, however, that the union maintains the right to negotiate for three-member crews on these newer twin-engine planes, as the Australian chapter has done. The French chapter has gained the right to have a flight engineer occupy the second seat in a newly certified license that allows for a flight engineer trained as a pilot.

The FEIA is also battling the Federal Aviation Administration's efforts to institute a 120-minute rule that would double the current length of time in which a twin-engine aircraft can fly on a single-engine at cruising speed in zero wind conditions in order to reach the nearest suitable airport.

85 percent of routes

Such a change in regulations, similar to one being proposed by the International Civil Aviation Organization, would affect some 85 percent of all world air routes, Gill pointed out.

The FEIA delegates pledged support for the efforts of unionized workers who were thrown out of their jobs in the bankruptcy action taken by Continental Airlines. The resolution saluted the "courage, strength and sacrifice" of the workers in maintaining their strike against the airline.

Jerry Austin, executive vice president and secretary-treasurer of FEIA, was re-elected to a second two-year term as was Charles L. Hunt, vice president-technical.

Democrats in House, Senate stay with leadership teams

Senate Democrats re-elected West Virginia's Robert C. Byrd minority leader, squelching by a 36-11 vote a late challenge from Lawton Chiles of Florida. California's Alan Cranston was unopposed for re-election as assistant leader.

Earlier, the House Democratic caucus had re-elected Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill, Jr. (Mass.) and Majority Leader Jim Wright (Tex.). Also elected without opposition were Richard A. Gephardt (Mo.) as chairman of the Democratic caucus and Mary Rose Oakar (Ohio) as secretary. Outgoing chairman Gillis W. Long (La.) had served the maximum two terms as chairman. Oakar succeeds Geraldine Ferraro, who gave up her House seat to run for vice president.

In both bodies, however, Democratic leadership battles are likely two years from now. O'Neill has served notice that he will retire after this Congress.

In the Senate, Chiles this year offered himself as a "new" and more telegenic face, but Byrd had already collected commitments from a majority of senators. Democrats see a good chance of winning a Senate majority in the 1986 elections, and the list of contenders for the more presigious post of majority leader is likely to be large.

The most contested issue in the House Democratic caucus was an unsuccessful attempt to change the rule barring anyone from serving for more than three consecutive two-year terms on the Budget Committee. Both outgoing Chairman James R. Jones (Okla.) and Leon E. Panetta (Calif.), who hoped to run against Jones for the chairmanship, supported a change.

The caucus voted 124-115 against the rules change, setting the stage for a battle for the chairmanship when the caucus reconvenes on Jan. 4. The announced contenders are Rep. William H. Gray, a liberal black congressman from Pennsylvania, and Martin Frost of Texas, who is campaigning as a centrist "who can unite all factions."

Shoot the Messenger?

THE ELECTION is more than a month over, and there is no point beating a dead horse. President Reagan won his second term by a convincing majority, and he is fully entitled to view the outcome as a vote of confidence.

But the President is reaching too far when he tries to interpret the vote as a blank-check mandate for the horrendous budget cuts he will seek from the next Congress.

Throughout the campaign, Mr. Reagan scoffed at the suggestion that he had some "secret plan" to deal with the federal deficit but didn't want to tell the voters about it in advance of the election.

Nonsense, the President assured us all. If the rise in federal spending is merely trimmed from 6 percent to 5 percent a year, continuing economic growth will bring in more revenue without a tax increase and the deficit will wither away.

It was a comforting message for most of the voters.

If we are to accept White House assurances at face value, Mr. Reagan was astounded to discover after the election that the deficit was more troublesome than he had realized. Suddenly, "draconian measures" are needed to bring it under control.

Some readers may recall that during the presidential campaign debates Walter Mondale challenged the President's easy assurance that the deficit could be overcome without new tax revenues.

"Your own Council of Economic Advisers," Mr. Mondale reminded the President, "are telling you that the deficit is ruining the long-term hopes for this economy."

President Reagan, it now turns out, did take that warning to heart.

One of his "deficit-reduction" proposals calls for abolishing the Council of Economic Advisers.

By all means, let's shoot the messenger who brings bad news.

Sto Lat, Solidarnosc!

JUST THREE YEARS ago, on Dec. 13, 1981, Poland's Communist government sought to crush Solidarnosc, the nation's 16-month-old experiment in free trade unionism.

Under the shield of martial law, the Jaruzelski regime followed the established pattern of totalitarian governments of all ideologies. There were pre-dawn raids on union offices across the country. Solidarnosc leaders and activists were imprisoned. Some would be beaten, some murdered, some put under house arrest or released under restrictions that would loosen or tighten as authorities played the carrot-and-stick game.

Once again, it appeared, the mailed fist had triumphed. The interlude of freedom, won by the shipyard workers at Gdansk under the leadership of a 37-year-old electrician, would be recalled only as a lost Camelot.

That didn't happen. Solidarnosc didn't die. At every opportunity, at every feasible public gathering, at church events, the Polish people have demonstrated their fidelity to its principles.

Nor has the world forgotten.

Not just the AFL-CIO but all the world's free unions have time and time again demonstrated their solidarity and pressed their governments to exert the maximum pressure on the Polish regime for the restoration of trade union rights.

In the International Labor Organization, the Soviet bloc could find no allies among the world's workers in its unsuccessful effort to prevent the investigation and condemnation of the suppression of Solidarnosc.

The trade union movement knows that the cause of freedom is indivisible and that its denial must be protested wherever it occurs —whether it be in South Africa, Poland or Chile.

The traditional Polish greeting, Sto Lat, is a wish for 100 years of a good life.

So to our union brothers and sisters in Solidarnosc, Sto Lat— with every confidence that the spirit of free trade unionism will still be alive and well a century from now.

South Africa oppression revives rights coalition

By Press Associates, Inc.

The world has been watching ever since Thanksgiving eve, when District of Columbia Congressional Delegate Walter Fauntroy and two other black leaders were arrested by Washington, D.C., police as they staged a sit-in at the South African embassy.

The results of that rather small beginning have been stunning as daily civil disobedience arrests of members of Congress, labor and civil rights leaders have been combined with mass picketing at the embassy and South African consulates in several cities.

These dramatic protests have activated the old coalition of civil rights, student, religious and labor activists which some shortsighted observers had been pronouncing old-fashioned and irrelevant.

It was that coalition for justice which in the 1960s focused national attention on the unfinished agenda of equal rights and opportunity and won landmark legislation from the Civil Rights Act of 1964 to extension of the Voting Rights Act in 1982.

The re-election of Ronald Reagan underscores the importance during the next four years of the vitality of that same coalition, whether on the streets of Washington and other cities or in the halls of Congress.

Key role in protests

Organized labor has been playing a key and visible role in the protests against the recent wave of brutal repression by the white-minority South African government against the black trade union movement, including the arrest without charge of 21 union leaders.

However, American labor's support for trade union and human rights in that country goes back a long way. In 1958, the AFL-CIO expressed its outrage at the arrest and indictment for treason of 91 union and other leaders for the "crime" of speaking out against the evil system of apartheid. The federation contributed to their legal defense fund and urged others to help.

By 1980, black workers in South Africa had finally won the legal right to belong to trade unions, largely due to international pressure, including that of U.S. unions.

In recent years, the AFL-CIO and the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions have undertaken a major program to assist the development of the embryonic black trade union movement under the harsh conditions of apartheid. This program includes financial and material aid, organizational training, education, and legal defense.

The only chance

In 1981, the AFL-CIO told the House subcommittee on Africa that it viewed "the development of a viable black labor movement as practically the only chance remaining to effect peaceful change in South Africa" and to avoid "a bloody race war."

The federation urged Congress to enact legislation to require U.S. corporations, which have about $2.3 billion invested in South Africa, to give their black workers equal pay and opportunity with whites. American labor also drew the connection between the profits corporations reap from apartheid and the flight of capital, plants and jobs from the United States to South Africa and other nations with a controlled labor force.

The 26-million blacks in South Africa receive subsistence wages, about a third those of white workers, and the pool of black unemployed is well over 20 percent. Yet five of every six South Africans is black.

At a recent Washington press conference at the headquarters of Electronics Workers, three South African union leaders expressed their deep appreciation for American labor's front-line support of the embassy protests.

Calvin Makgeleng, chairman of the Transvaal Branch of the 13,500-member Chemical Workers Industrial Union, described what it's like to be a black trade unionist in South Africa. "We are living in a world of rubber bullets and tear smoke," he said.

Board rejects demands

Canadian UAW wing moves to split away

Dearborn, Mich.—The Auto Workers' executive board turned down demands of the Canadian section of the union for a more independent role within the UAW, leaving the way open for the Canadians to withdraw from the union.

While rejecting the demands, the 25-member board urged the Canadian branch to reconsider its decision to leave. Canadian members account for about 10 percent of the 1.3 million total membership.

The action came during the board's quarterly meeting in Dearborn, Mich. UAW President Owen Bieber will appoint a panel of board members to work out details of the separation as expeditiously as possible.

"We are a democratic union, and if the members of the UAW in Canada are convinced that their future is best served by separation, they may elect to withdraw," the board said in a statement.

"But we urge them before doing so to consider our common history and our many common bonds and the enormous progress we have made for our membership in Canada and the United States under an international union structure. This is an issue not of personalities nor even of nations but of principles. We earnestly hope that international trade union principles will prevail."

A specific timetable and other details of the withdrawal remain to be worked out. Canadian Director Robert White said that completing the split would take at least a few months. Until the separation becomes final, White, a UAW vice president, will continue to attend executive board meetings.

Bieber said he believes the union will be able to effect the split "in an orderly and proper fashion. . . . We are friendly, and we'll continue to be friendly."

After the separation, the union's Canadian arm will be free to pursue its own course with the auto industry. About half the Canadian UAW membership works at General Motors, Ford or Chrysler plants. The rest work at aerospace, agricultural implement and other companies.

The move to withdraw from the union was unanimously authorized a week earlier by the UAW's 300-member Canada Council, which directed White to seek secession unless the Canadian section was permitted to manage its affairs without being accountable to the international.

Four demands

The Canadians made four specific demands, all of which were rejected by the executive board. These were complete control over Canadian bargaining and Canadian staff members, freedom to merge with other unions in Canada, and direct access to and control over UAW strike funds.

In response, the executive board pointed out that the set of demands conflicted with the letter and spirit of the UAW constitution and, if granted, "would cause the UAW to cease to exist as an international union in any meaningful way."

In addition, the board said:

"By definition, in an international union the international president's involvement in any set of negotiations cannot be construed as 'interference.' Similarly, demands for total Canadian control of union staff and operating funds and for direct, automatic access to the strike fund in Canada are demands which cannot be accommodated in our international union structure."

Two postal unions present case to arbitration panel

Arbitration hearings to determine pay and benefits for more than 500,000 U.S. Postal Service employees got under way in Washington Dec. 11 with opening arguments by attorneys for the workers.

John O'Donnell of the American Postal Workers Union and Keith Secular of the National Association of Letter Carriers told the five-member arbitration panel that USPS contracts proposals were inadequate in light of worker productivity increases and USPS's record profits over the past three years.

APWU and NALC bargain jointly with USPS. Contract talks broke down in July over economic issues after the previous three-year pact expired. Binding arbitration under the Postal Reorganization Act of 1970 was resorted to when the parties failed to reach agreement on new terms within 90 days.

The USPS was expected to respond to the unions' opening remarks by the end of the week. Panel Chairman Clark Kerr scheduled all-day sessions through the weekend and said he hoped to conclude the hearings next week.

3-year package

The two unions are seeking a total increase of 19 to 20 percent in wages and fringe benefits over three years. The USPS wants to freeze wages, end the roll-in of cost-of-living adjustments in basic wage rates, their use in calculating certain benefits, and a two-tier wage system for new employees.

As the hearings began, the USPS revealed it had modified its request for lower pay for new hires. Instead of paying new employees 23 percent less than current workers, the USPS now is seeking a 19-percent differential.

In his opening statement, O'Donnell told the arbitrators that postal workers have lost ground because of the meager terms of their 1981 agreement with the USPS.

"We come to you to ask you to fix the economic areas of our contract," he said. He pointed to USPS surpluses in each of the last three years and to postal employees' productivity boosts exceeding those in the private sector for seven of the last 10 years.

The NALC's Secular, noting that postal workers have been losing ground to inflation as well as to private-sector wages, declared:

"In the best of all possible times, the Postal Service is proposing the worst of all possible contracts."

Arbitration proceedings also are set to begin soon for two smaller unions negotiating separately with USPS—the Mail Handlers division of the Laborers and the unaffiliated National Rural Letter Carriers' Association. These unions, too, were unable to reach a negotiated agreement with the USPS.

Spirit of giving

Dozens of specially dressed dolls and stuffed Christmas stockings, all prepared by AFL-CIO headquarters employees, are readied for delivery to the Salvation Army as gifts for needy children. The federation staff coordinates its dress-a-doll program with the Operating Engineers, and the stocking program is organized by the members of Office & Professional Employees Local 2. From left are Debbie Perkins and Hazel Asbury, who supervises the collections, both of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization & Field Services.

AFL-CIO calls for reversal of noise standard decision

The AFL-CIO is backing efforts to overturn a recent U.S. appeals court decision invalidating the hearing conservation amendment to the federal occupational noise standard.

The federation's motion to intervene in the case cited its concern over the Nov. 7 ruling by the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals. The decision held, in effect, that an employer cannot be required to take any measures to protect workers from exposure to noise hazards unless it can be guaranteed that no non-occupational factors contributed to the workers' symptoms.

In a letter to Robert Rowland, administrator of the Occupational Safety & Health Administration, the AFL-CIO said the result of the court decision is that "there are no legal requirements for employers to monitor excessive noise levels, to provide hearing tests to workers exposed to these high noise levels, to train exposed workers . . . or to assure that when hearing protectors must be relied upon, the devices are properly selected and fit."

The letter notified Rowland of the AFL-CIO's intent to seek intervention in the case and stressed that the federation "has taken this action because we have been unable to gain assurances . . . that the department will continue to stand behind OSHA's Hearing Conservation Amendment and seek rehearing."

The intervention motion was filed with the appellate court on Dec. 11, the same day 14 consumer and professional groups petitioned President Reagan "to instruct OSHA . . . to move vigorously to protect this regulation and appeal this decision."

The following day, during hearings by the House subcommittee on health and safety, Rowland said the agency would appeal the court's noise standard ruling. OSHA spokesperson Chris Graybill later reported that the Labor Dept. probably will seek a full-court review of the decision rendered by a three-judge panel.

Action uncertain

The AFL-CIO motion to intervene in the case noted the uncertainty of the Labor Dept.'s action and stressed that even if it did seek a rehearing, "there is a substantial possibility that (the Secretary of Labor) will not assert the full range of available arguments supporting the amendment's legality."

The court's holding on the hearing conservation amendment, if generally followed, "could well threaten OSHA's authority to promulgate occupational health standards that provide covered workers the protections Congress intended in passing the OSH Act," the federation said.

Six unions ask court order for new benzene standard down by the Supreme Court in 1980 on the grounds the agency failed to show that the 10 ppm level posed a significant risk to workers.

Additional studies proved there is a significant risk to workers at the current 10 ppm level, but OSHA failed to initiate action on setting a standard. In April 1983, the AFL-CIO, four affiliate unions and the Industrial Union Dept. petitioned the agency for an emergency standard on benzene. The OSHA administator at that time, Thorne B. Auchter, responded in June 1983 that "it is our opinion that prompt agency action is warranted." Auchter pledged to adhere to a timetable for "expedited rulemaking," which would result in a final standard in June 1984.

The timetable called for publication in the Federal Register of a notice adding benzene to OSHA's regulatory agenda in June 1983, a proposed standard to be sent to the Office of Management & Budget by November 1983, publication of a proposed standard by December 1983, hearings by February 1984, ending with final action in June 1984.

One month later, Auchter denied the petition for an emergency standard, but reiterated the agency's timetable for setting a final standard.

OSHA subsequently set up a "benzene discussion group" made up of labor and industry representatives which sought to agree on a joint recommendation for a benzene standard. The group was formed with the understanding that OSHA would not delay its actions on promulgating a benzene rule.

Although the group worked together for nearly a year, it failed to reach a consensus on an adequate standard. On Oct. 11, R. Leonard Vance, director of OSHA Health Standards Programs, wrote the mediators for the discussion group that "no delays have occurred as a result of our waiting for a joint recommendation and, as you know, we are very close to having a proposal ready for OMB review. We anticipate publication of this proposal in the near future."

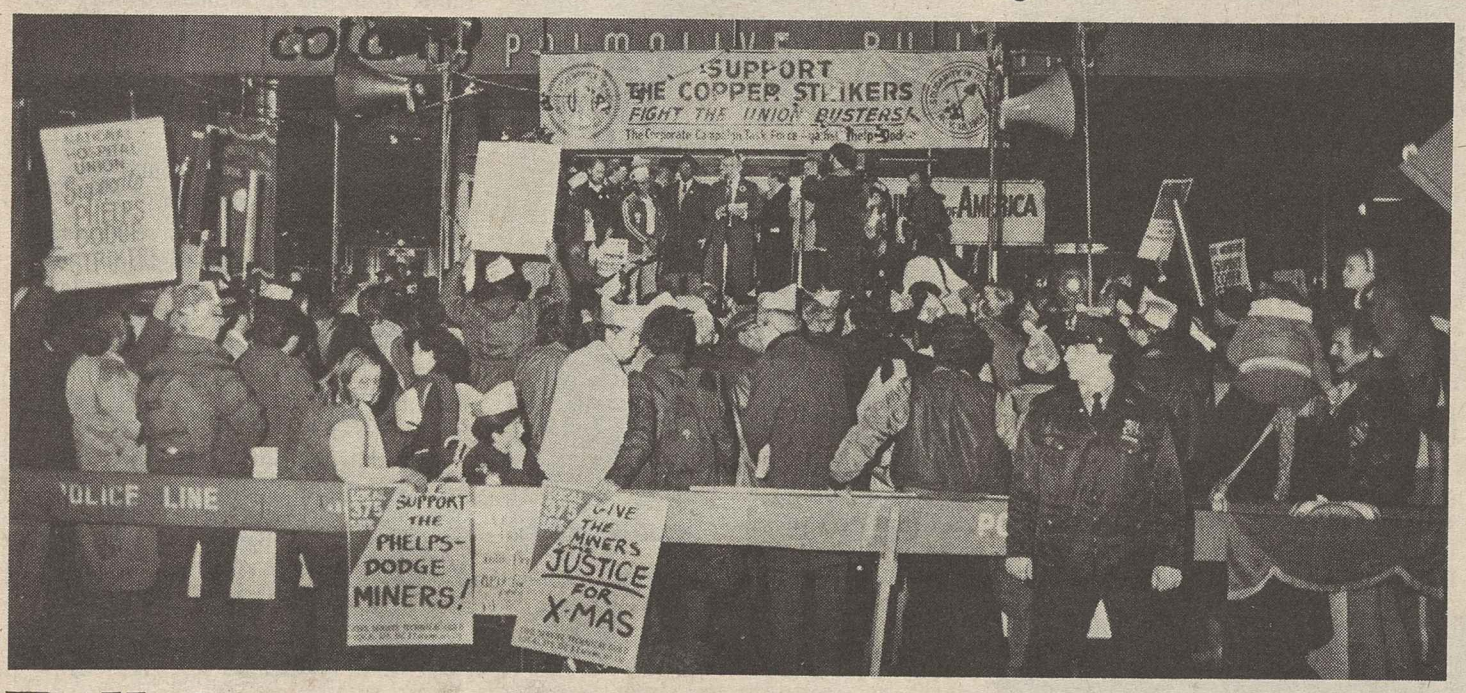
Worldwide safety codes pushed



Rallying copper strikers

Phelps Dodge Co. is a union-busting "corporate outlaw," Steelworkers President Lynn Williams tells demonstrators at a rally outside the company's New York offices. The rally was sponsored by the USWA and the New York City AFL-CIO to show support for 1,700 copper workers on strike for 17 months at Phelps Dodge facilities in Arizona and Texas. Food donations collected at the rally were sent to the strikers and their families. (Story, Page 2)

Union groups cite laxity at Bhopal plant

By Arlee C. Green

National and international labor groups are seeking more effective measures to prevent tragedies like the one in Bhopal, India, where toxic gas leaking from a Union Carbide plant killed more than 2,500 persons and injured about 100,000 others.

Several labor groups have asked for independent inquiries into the accident at Bhopal, stressing that apparent lax regulation of the chemical industry in that country allowed the multinational Union Carbide Corp. to operate its plant with major deficiencies.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland was at a Brussels meeting of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions when it called for "strengthened international standards on the prevention and control of such accidents in large-scale plants where dangerous chemical gases and liquids are used or stored."

The International Federation of Chemical, Energy & General Workers Union (ICEF), which represents some 6 million workers mainly in the chemical industry in 73 countries, called for "immediate action" to initiate an inquiry into the causes and effects of the accident in Bhopal, stressing that only the ILO and the World Health Organization are competent to do such an investigation.

Need for enforcement

In testimony before a House Labor Subcommittee on Health & Safety, Machinists Safety Director George Robinson stressed that American workers "need strong enforcement of safety and health environmental regulations."

Robinson noted that "chemical companies have for too long endeavored through the media to persuade communities of the absence of any real danger they might pose. That myth no longer exists."

The hearing centered on the accident in Bhopal and whether any such danger may exist at Union Carbide's plant in Institute, W.Va., where the firm produces methyl isocyanate (MIC), an extremely

Sluggish growth pace continues for economy

The continuing economic drag was confirmed by preliminary government figures showing the U.S. economy growing at a weak annual rate of 2.8 percent in the current quarter.

In its "flash" estimate of real gross national product, the Commerce Dept. reported that increased consumer demand in the October-December period is being balanced by slower business purchasing to restock inventories.

The sluggish fourth-quarter growth rate was little better than the 1.6-percent annual rate of the third quarter, which itself had been the slowest since 1982.

The flash report is the government's earliest estimate of economic growth. Economists generally believe that a real GNP growth rate of between 3 and 5 percent is necessary to keep up with an expanding workforce.

In a separate report, the Commerce Dept. said the nation's balance of payments deficit rose a record $32.9 billion in the third quarter, increasing the likelihood that the shortfall will exceed $100 billion for all of 1984.

That would be more than double last year's $41.6-billion total and a huge obstacle to a sound economy. Commerce Sec. Malcolm Baldrige said the deficit "probably will rise again next year."

The overvalued dollar is seriously hurting U.S. industry, he said. "To bring down the dollar and stem the trade deficit, we must lower the budget deficit."

Vicious cycle

Government borrowing to finance the budget deficit tends to push up U.S. interest rates which, in turn, attract foreign investors who bid up the price of the dollar relative to other currencies. That makes imports less expensive in the United States and American exports less competitive overseas.

In the third quarter, a 10.2-percent increase in imports swamped a modest 1.7-percent gain in exports. Merchandise imports rose to $88.63 billion from $80.41 billion in the second quarter, while exports inched up to $55.5 billion from $54.56 billion.

The third-quarter rise in the current account of the nation's balance of payments followed the previous record shortfall of $24.7 billion in the second quarter.

Meanwhile, the Commerce Dept. reported further gloomy economic news from the housing industry, which started seven-tenths of 1 percent fewer units last month in spite of good weather, lower interest rates, and increasing sales. November was the second consecutive monthly decline.

A survey by the National Association of Home Builders of December home construction activity already suggests this month will be weaker than last.

Unions win gains for 40,000 to end Chicago walkout

Chicago—More than 40,000 Chicago teachers and school employees ended a two-week strike after reaching settlements with the city school board that include pay raises, a bonus and other gains.

A tentative agreement was overwhelmingly approved by the Chicago Teachers Union's policy-making house of delegates. It provides for an immediate 4.5-percent pay increase and a one-time bonus of 2.5 percent to be paid in March. The CTU represents 28,000 teachers in the nation's third largest school district.

Agreements also were reached with 12,000 members of 17 unions representing non-teaching employees. All 18 unions struck Dec. 3, shutting down Chicago's 596 public schools. Classes were back in session Dec. 17 following the tentative settlements.

CTU negotiators won the pay raises in the face of attempts by the Chicago school

Zimmerman ties case backlog to NLRB's internal conflicts

By James M. Shevis

Blameshifting and lack of collegiality characterize the current National Labor Relations Board and combine with other factors to tie the agency into knots, a departing member of the panel charged.

In an interview with the AFL-CIO News, Don A. Zimmerman said much of the delay in decision-making that has marked the Reagan-dominated board springs from within. He attributed part of the slowdown to divisiveness between Chairman Donald Dotson and other members, infrequency of board meetings, and to fingerpointing.

Zimmerman, a political independent whose Dec. 16 departure reduced the five-member board's membership to three, urged quick action to restore confidence in the panel that is charged with administering and enforcing the nation's basic labor laws.

Board members have held only four meetings among themselves since the fall of 1983 and have had none since last May, said Zimmerman as he wound up his term. He contrasted the current pattern with previous boards which routinely met twice a week.

This has contributed to the staggering case backlog at the NLRB and has made it difficult to work out compromises to accommodate the views of individual members, Zimmerman observed.

"There might well have been more unanimity in board decisions over the last year and a half if there were more opportunities for board discussion of the merits of the cases," he said.

Departing member decries strife within NLRB

"It would also have been an opportunity to work for a consensus on the priority to be given particular cases. As it has been for many months, virtually all the work has been done on paper, with no contact among the board members at all."

The backlog of NLRB cases has shown a dramatic rise during the Reagan Administration, a situation that has drawn considerable attention from several congressional oversight hearings and a great deal of publicity in the press.

Zimmerman said the backlog is now over 1,200 in unfair labor practice charges alone, down from a peak of nearly 1,600.

"There were only about 400 at the time I became a member, which was considered a serious problem then," he said. These are cases involving appeals from decisions of NLRB administrative law judges that are awaiting board decisions.

Zimmerman criticized Dotson's attempts to put the blame on him and Member Patricia Diaz Dennis for the size of the backlog.

This sort of "fingerpointing" over which members were to blame for the backlog of cases has been divisive and reflects "the lack of the collegial process that used to exist at the NLRB," he said.

Looking back on four and a half years with the NLRB, Zimmerman said that it has suffered from three problems, "some of its own making, some not of its making."

First, he said, "it has had to deal with the consequences of a breakdown in the appointive process." The White House has not named a replacement for Zimmerman or for Howard Jenkins, who left the board in August 1983.

"I have had nine different colleagues in my short time on the board as compared to (former Member) John Fanning who, in his 25 years on the NLRB, only had 18."

A second major problem, related to the first, has been the sharp increase in the case backlog, and the third has been the increasing criticism of the board from the nation's 12 circuit courts of appeals.

Reasons for backlog

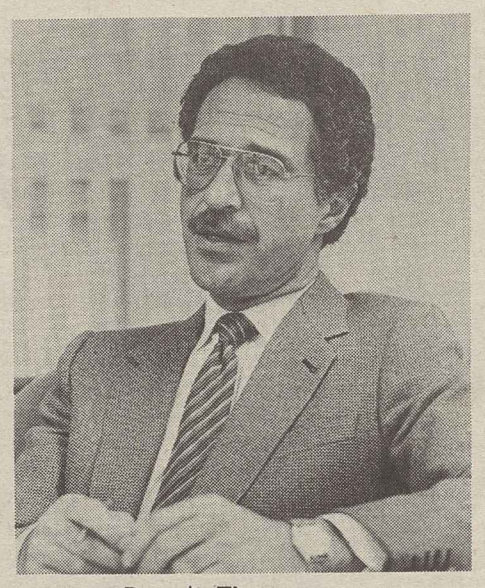
"The erratic changes in the composition of the board and the failure to have a five-member board for most of the five years (of Zimmerman's term) have been significant contributing causes to the backlog problem and the delay in deciding cases," he said.

He recommended that the White House make a greater attempt to achieve a consensus on board appointments and that individuals be selected who are perceived by both labor and employers as being capable of rendering neutral decisions.

"I think that broke down in both the Carter and Reagan Administrations," he said. "Both unions and employers depend on the processes of the National Labor Relations Act, and shouldn't have to wait months and years for decisions and in addition have to suffer the consequences of unexpected decisions in board law."

Zimmerman cited a number of other contributing factors to the case buildup.

One was a decision by the board's majority in early 1983 to "ice" all cases that involved a legal issue it wished to reconsider until a "lead" case arose on that issue.



Don A. Zimmerman

"I don't have an objection in principle to the board selectively holding up decisions in areas it expects to change the law, but I think the board should have been far more selective than it was," he said.

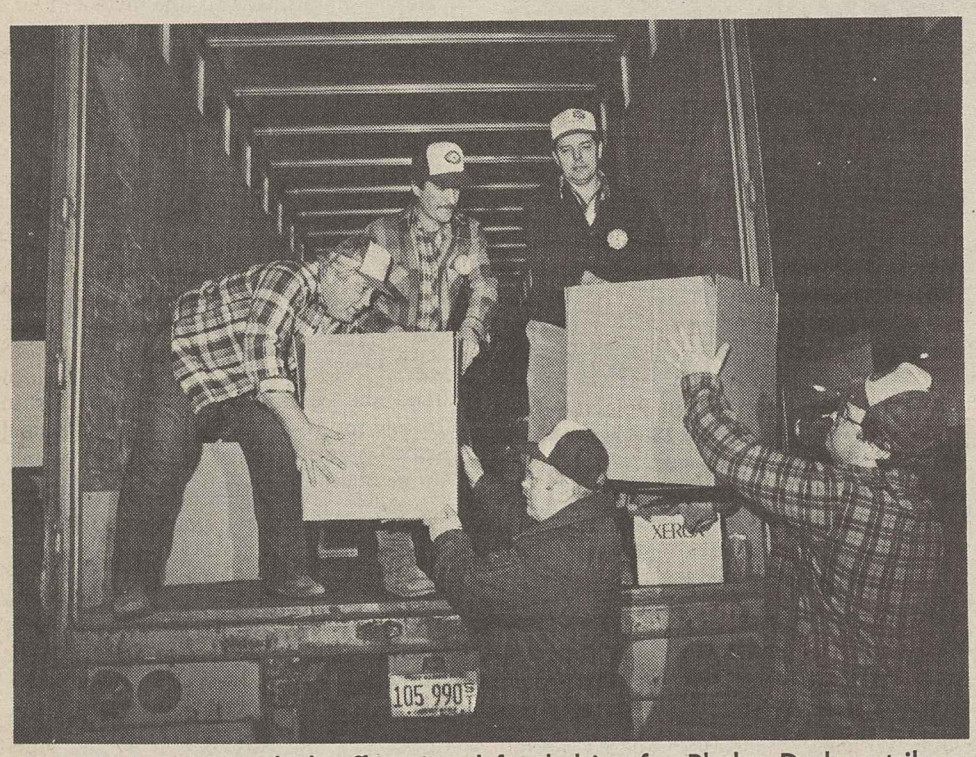
"The cases 'iced' amounted to approximately half the backlog. . . . It would have been preferable, in my judgment, to have selected fewer cases and to have decided the rest according to existing precedent rather than hold up as many as they did."

Court criticism

Criticism of the board from appellate courts is inevitable, Zimmerman said, but the NLRB in recent years has seemed mired in inertia when the courts have differed with its interpretations of law.

"The board has . . . not responded as quickly as it might to adverse decisions of courts of appeals. And in some instances it has gone on for years and years adhering to its interpretation of the (National Labor Relations) Act in the face of sometimes uniform rejection by a number of courts," he said.

Summing up, Zimmerman said he hoped the board would closely examine itself and once again "act in ways that will bring it the respect that it has to have if it is to be an effective public agency."



New York unionists kick off national food drive for Phelps Dodge strikers.

New Yorkers rally support for striking copper workers

New York—More help for beleaguered striking copper workers in Arizona and Texas was generated by the Steelworkers and the New York City AFL-CIO at a demonstration and holiday food collection outside the headquarters of the Phelps Dodge Co. here.

USWA President Lynn Williams told the demonstrators that the rally was intended "to protest union-busting" by Phelps Dodge, the nation's second largest copper producer.

Williams called the company, which has never settled a union contract without provoking a strike, "the premier corporate outlaw in North America."

Solidarity

Such rallies in support of the strikers, he pointed out, show them that the labor movement "has not forgotten their struggle" for a fair and decent contract.

Some 1,700 copper miners have been on strike for 17 months at Phelps Dodge facilities in Morenci, Ajo, Douglas and Bisbee, Ariz., and El Paso, Tex. The USWA is the largest of 13 labor organizitions representing copper miners, smelter workers and other employees.

At the Park Avenue rally, demonstrators helped load gifts of food donated by union members throughout the metropolitan area onto a tractor-trailer truck destined for a strikers' aid distribution center in Tucson.

The labor organizations were joined in the drive and demonstration by local community and religious groups.

In a separate effort to aid the strikers, the USWA is selling a 1985 "Copper Strike Calendar" that includes photographs of key events throughout the strike. Calendars are $3.50 each.

The USWA said the company's headquarters was chosen as the site for the rally to point up the activities of its Corporate Campaign Task Force formed to "expand the dispute from the picket lines to the corporate board room of Phelps Dodge, its bank creditors and Wall Street."

A key objective of the campaign is to inform other unions about the financial ties of several major banks that have made substantial loans to Phelps Dodge.

In October, the USWA withdrew $11.5 million of its strike fund investments from two New York banks that have made loans to Phelps Dodge.

In addition to the USWA, unions representing Phelps Dodge strikers are the Machinists, Electrical Workers, Boilermakers, Operating Engineers, Chemical Workers, United Transportation Union, Plumbers & Pipefitters, Carpenters, Railway Carmen, Painters, the Morenci-Clifton Metal Trades Council and the unaffiliated Teamsters.

Walter G. Davis dies at 64, headed Community Services

AFL-CIO Community Services Director Walter G. Davis died Dec. 18 at Holy Cross Hospital, Silver Spring, Md., at the age of 64. He had recently begun treatments for cancer.

Davis, who lived in Silver Spring, first joined the staff of the AFL-CIO in 1961 as an assistant director of the Dept. of Civil Rights. His career with the federation was interrupted in 1965 when he became the first Deputy Executive Director of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, a post he held for 13 months before returning to the AFL-CIO as Director of Education.

In 1969, Davis conducted a feasibility study for the AFL-CIO Executive Council that led to the establishment of the George Meany Center for Labor Studies. He was the assistant secretary of the center's board of trustees before his appointment as Community Services Director in 1980.

His extensive activities in civil rights included a key role in the initiation of the National Urban League's LEAP program, designed to increase black participation in the construction trades through apprenticeship outreach programs.

In a letter of condolence to Mrs. Davis, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue paid tribute to Davis's leadership as a local and national union officer in bringing "stability, dignity and a living wage to thousands of workers."

Career highlights

They cited his achievements as a civil rights strategist and leader in his work for the AFL-CIO and the EEOC, as a "superb educator" and as a "tireless lobbyist" for quality public education.

As Community Services Director "during the worst recession in a half-century," Kirkland and Donahue noted, Davis "threw himself into the task of rallying union volunteers and arousing the conscience of the nation to the plight of millions of unemployed workers."

In carrying out this last assignment, they said, "he gave the best that was in him and, as always, he made life better for others."

Davis was a native of New York City, where he joined the labor movement while working as a skycap at LaGuardia Airport in the 1940s. He was elected president of Local 290 of the United Transport Service Employees in 1952. Six years later he was elected national executive vice president in charge of all collective bargaining with railroads and airlines.

While working full time following Army service in World War II, Davis studied at Columbia University, where in 1956 he earned the degree of Bachelor of Science in Government and Public Law. He subsequently did graduate studies at Columbia's School of International Affairs and attended Brooklyn Law School. On May 25, 1980, Georgetown University conferred on him an honorary degree as Doctor of Humane Letters.

Public service

Davis's career was marked by extensive public service with volunteer agencies and advisory panels on education as well as civil rights.

At the time of his death he was a member of the boards of directors of United Way International and CARE, the international relief agency. He was a member of the advisory committee of the Community College of the United States Air Force, the long-range planning committee of the United Way of America and its subcommittee on the future world of work, the board of governors of the United Services Organization, the National Advisory Council on Alcohol Abuse and Alcoholism, the advisory board of the A. Philip Randolph Institute, and the advisory committee of the Robert Wood/Johnson Foundation on Health Care for the Homeless.

Survivors include his wife, Doris, of Silver Spring; a daughter, Allison J. Davis, of Teaneck, N.J., and two sons, Walter G. Davis, Jr., of Washington and Philip N. Davis, a graduate student at Yale University. The funeral service was to be held Dec. 22 in New York City.

In Poland, South Africa

World unions assail human rights abuses

Brussels—Leaders of the world's free trade unions reaffirmed their support of the emerging black trade union movement in South Africa, and demanded the immediate release of all trade unionists detained by that country's government in the wake of last month's strikes there.

During their three-day meeting, members of the executive board of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions also marked the third aniversary of the suppression of Poland's Solidarnosc labor union by the Jaruzelski regime with a protest.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland led other free trade union leaders in a march to the Polish embassy to present the ambassador with a copy of the board's resolution reaffirming the ICFTU's unconditional support of Solidarnosc. They were turned back at the gate.

The main focus of the meeting was on the recent events in South Africa where the government brutally put down black unionists demanding basic human rights.

The ICFTU adopted a resolution demanding that the Pretoria government meet with leaders of South Africa's black majority population to develop a constitutional proposal guaranteeing the principle of "one-man one-vote" as well as individual freedoms.

Calling for an end to the apartheid system of racial segregation, the ICFTU urged all of its affiliates to apply pressure on the South African authorities for the release of the jailed black unionists.

It also authorized Gen.-Sec. John Vanderveken to call an emergency conference of the ICFTU to plan further action to bring South Africa into line with internationally recognized labor standards.

One of those jailed last month, Gen.-Sec. Piroshaw Camay of the Council of Unions of South Africa, said there is a pressing need for an attack on South Africa's detention laws. Under the Internal Security Code, blacks have been routinely arrested and held without charge.

Commission of inquiry

Camay, a member of the ICFTU board, proposed that the International Labor Organization establish a commission of inquiry to look into the trade union situation in South Africa as well as the detention laws, and apartheid.

Camay said a policy of selective disinvestment by foreign companies in South Africa might help end the racial discrimination.

While blacks have reached a point of economic integration with white South Africans, they have yet to achieve recognition of their basic human rights. As Director Irving Brown of the AFL-CIO International Affairs Dept., noted:

"The economic integration is running into a head-on collision with the demands for political integration. Blacks aren't going to be satisfied with tidbits until they have secured their full rights."

Agnes Molefe, a director of the Council of Unions of South Africa, thanked the AFL-CIO for its active support of the black trade unions, saying labor demonstrations in Washington and other American cities helped in the release of seven trade unionists, including Camay.

Kirkland and Brown thanked her for recognizing the federation's efforts, but insisted that first and foremost it is the people in black South Africa who are carrying the fight and that they deserved the recognition.

In other action, the ICFTU board adopted a statement on the plant explosion disaster in Bhopal, and urged large-scale emergency and long-term relief to the city and its inhabitatnts.

R-Way Furniture accord resolves strike, boycott

Sheboygan, Wis.—Furniture Workers Local 800 negotiated a new three-year agreement after an 11-month dispute with R-Way Furniture Co. here.

The signing of the contract on Dec. 10 ended a national boycott of R-Way products, which had been on the AFL-CIO's "unfair" list since February 1984.

Some 140 UFWA members went on strike Jan. 11 after the company pressed for a package of givebacks, despite the firm's reporting that it was making profits.

The collective bargaining relationship between the local union and R-Way extended back to 1943. The company declared its initial proposal to be the final offer, thereby forcing an impasse. R-Way hired 135 scabs when the Local 800 members struck.

In June, the National Labor Relations Board ruled that an impasse had been reached and that the company had legally instituted its final offer. Local 800 members were given 60 days to return to work, but only 91 went back, local Business Rep. Harold Kober reported.

Key issues in the negotiations were wages and about 140 outstanding grievances.

The contract was ratified by a 54-20 vote on Sept. 20, but signing of the agreement was delayed until Dec. 10 as the local sought memoranda of understanding on vacation language and a new teamwork bonus system.

Bonus system

Under the bonus system, all full-time workers would receive a $100 bonus the first year of the contract, and all but probationary workers would get a $150 bonus the second year.

Nearly half the R-Way workforce is paid on a piece-rate basis, however, and reduction in those rates could mean a wage cut of up to $4 an hour for some workers, Kober said. The company also succeeded in eliminating two floating holidays and a fifth week of vacation for workers with 20 years of service.

On health insurance, a health maintenance plan was added as an option.

AFL-CIO reaffirms support for Solidarnosc's struggle

The AFL-CIO marked the third anniversary of the suppression of Poland's Solidarity free trade union with a reaffirmation of its dedication to the support of the now-outlawed labor movement.

"Clearly this is not an event to be celebrated," Federation Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue observed, "but it is an occasion to make known our support for the brave men and women of Poland who, guided by the irrepressible spirit of Solidarity, continue to struggle for an added measure of democracy, human rights, and free trade unionism. . . .

"For those who formulate the foreign policy of the United States government, the question of Poland may be fraught with ambiguity. But for the AFL-CIO, our task is clear:

"It is to respond as fully as we can to the needs of the workers of Poland — just as we seek to respond to the needs of the workers of South Africa, El Salvador and Chile."

Donahue's remarks came at a brief ceremony prior to the premiere of a 90-minute television drama about Solidarity written by British playwright Tom Stoppard. More than 300 persons attended the showing at federation headquarters.

Exactly three years ago to the day, on Dec. 13, 1981, the communist regime of Gen. Wojciech Jaruzelski imposed martial law on the Polish people, outlawed the 16-month-old Solidarity, and arrested thousands of trade unionists.

Repression persists

One of those detained, economist Waclaw Adamczak, said that even though martial law was formally lifted a year ago, the Jaruzelski regime persists in its economic and political repression of the Polish people.

In the last three years, more than 60 persons have been killed in Poland by security forces, said Adamczak, a member of Solidarity's national commission.

Adamczak, who co-authored Solidarity's economic program, thanked the American labor movement for its support of the independent union and for continuing to uphold the cause and ideals for which it stands.

Solidarnosc—the Polish word for Solidarity—was born in August 1980 at the sprawling Lenin shipyard in Gdansk. As Eastern Europe's first independent union, it gave rise to hopes that a spirit of renewal had come upon Polish society after a generation of communist rule.

Squaring the Circle

Stoppard's film, which premiered in Chicago the same day under the aegis of the Polish-American Congress, takes its title, "Squaring the Circle," from a speech in the play likening the geometric impossibility of squaring a circle within the same area to the impossible dream of a free trade union surviving in a totalitarian Marxist state.

Donahue told the gathering that Federation President Lane Kirkland could not attend the ceremony because he was in Brussels for a meeting of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions executive board where Poland was being discussed.

Kirkland led a delegation from the ICFTU to the Polish consulate in Brussels to protest the Jaruzelski regime's "Black December" clampdown three years ago and to demand restoration of trade union pluralism in Poland.

In Warsaw, Solidarity founder Lech Walesa said the suppression of the independent trade union had shown the "complete bankruptcy" of the Polish government's repressive policies.

"The last three years have left no doubt about the complete bankruptcy of those who imagined that it was possible to make changes in Poland without society's help or to introduce some kind of absolutist rule," he said.

Walesa and a group of 2,000 Solidarity supporters were turned back three days later by helmeted militiamen wielding truncheons when they attempted to lay a wreath at a monument in Gdansk memorializing workers killed 14 years ago while protesting food price increases.

Meanwhile, in Washington, the Reagan Administration seemed totally unaffected by the latest crackdown and announced it wouldn't oppose Poland's attempt to rejoin the International Monetary Fund.

The AFL-CIO has opposed Poland's return to the IMF on the grounds that the Jaruzelski regime should not be rewarded for violating trade union rights.

White House action

White House and State Dept. officials said the action was based on the Polish government's release of political prisoners, including Bogdan Lis, the former second-ranking member of the Solidarity underground, and Piotr Mierzewski, a former Solidarity union member, both of whom were charged with treason. The two were released on Dec. 15.

The IMF gives loans at favorable rates to member countries with balance-of-payment problems. Poland, which withdrew from the fund in 1950, hopes to rejoin it to lay the base for resumed borrowing from the West.

Bruce Springsteen at work.

Signing autographs at Steelworkers Local 1845 hall in Maywood, Calif.

Springsteen's actions speak louder than songs

By Susan Dunlop

To thousands of working people, Bruce Springsteen is a hero in more ways than one.

Springsteen's music and lyrics and their vibrant rock beat have caught the imagination of a young generation that has grown up learning to live with recession, unemployment, blighted hopes and lowered expectations.

But instead of just talking about the dreams and plights of working people, Springsteen has been energetically involved in efforts to aid jobless workers, strikers and their families.

Aiding food banks

He has been a generous contributor to union food banks across the country, and he has urged his fans to make donations as well.

For example, Springsteen recently presented a check for $10,000 to a food bank near Los Angeles run by Steelworkers Local 1845 and co-sponsored by the Los Angeles County AFL-CIO.

He has made similar contributions to union food banks nationwide including those in Pennsylvania, Colorado, Washington and more.

Springsteen donated $10,000 to a medical clinic in Clinton, Ariz., that serves copper workers and their families on strike against Phelps Dodge Co. who have been cut off from company medical benefits.

During his current "Born in the U.S.A." concert tour with his E Street Band, Springsteen donated $10,000 each to labor-supported community food banks in Texas cities including Austin, Dallas and Houston.

To the thousands of fans that pack his performances in the major arenas nationwide, Springsteen talks between songs about the needs of jobless workers and urges contributions to the aid efforts.

In many cities, he has permitted food bank organizers to set up tables wherever he is performing to accept donations.

The Los Angeles Steelworkers reported that the singer's efforts in that city alone brought in some $15,000 in additional contributions, and the Houston-Galveston Food Bank received an additional $2,000 in cash donations as well as offers to help from nearly 80 new and badly needed volunteer workers.

Springsteen has also donated many tickets to his concerts to food bank volunteers and laid-off workers.

One jobless worker, USWA Local 1845 member Jose Coborubio, was not sure he wanted to attend Springsteen's Los Angeles show, but came away with "a voice hoarse from shouting, my hands are sore from clapping and my feet are sore from jumping. If I could have been standing up the whole time, I would have."

Helping spirits

Springsteen has not stopped with financial contributions to laid-off workers, he has also made personal and direct contributions to their spirits.

He took time out during his Los Angeles stint to visit Local 1845's union hall to talk and sign autographs. He sat down with a group of the members who are part of Theater Workers, a program that helps workers express their feelings through storytelling and poetry.

The best song or poem, he said, is the one that is so personal nobody else could have written it, and he told the workers how deeply he had been moved by a poem given to him by one of the members of the group.

Springsteen's own lyrics have been called rock poetry, and he is clearly on the same emotional wave length as the people he writes about and attracts to his music.

One young Los Angeles steelworker described Springsteen's songs as "really hitting home," and another worker from New York pointed out that "he's able to say what we can't about growing up."

Springsteen, 35, was born and grew up in the blue-collar neighborhoods of Freehold, N.J. His family moved to San Mateo, Calif., where his father became a bus driver. But Bruce, still a teenager, stayed in New Jersey to finish high school and then spent some time in community college.

He had already begun performing with rock bands and writing songs, and in 1972 landed a recording contract with Columbia Records.

Springsteen polished his live performances, which were winning him a devoted following of fans, and worked hard on perfecting his subsequent albums.

His first national single record and album hit was "Born to Run" released in 1975. That success made him a household name, and there was even a grassroots movement to have "Born to Run"—a song about the dreams and frustrations of New Jersey's blue-collar youth—adopted as the state's official song.

Springsteen, in interviews, stresses that he wants two kinds of responses to his music either on records or in concerts. He wants to make people feel fired up and eager to dance, but he also wants them to pay close attention to the lyrics.

His goal

Springsteen told one interviewer that his goal on his tours is to come into a town, do his job and go away leaving people feeling good.

But at a time when even the best rock musicians are writing about falling in love, or the trials and tribulations of being a rock star, Springsteen's songs are about working at a deadend job, getting laid off, or raising kids without a husband.

Although music critics often describe his songs as "gritty," they also point out that they are full of humor and energy. The people Springsteen sings about face disillusionment and grapple with despair, but they take fun where they can find it—cruising in the back of a pink Cadillac or "at a dance down at the union hall"—and they have not by any means given up on all their dreams.

In 'My Hometown,' Springsteen sings:

I was eight years old and running with a dime in my hand into the bus stop to pick up a paper for my old man
I'd sit on his lap in that big old Buick and steer as we drove through town
He'd tousle my hair and say, son, take a good look around
this is your hometown . . .

Now Main Street's whitewashed windows and vacant stores seems like there ain't nobody wants to come down here anymore
They're closing down the textile mill across the railroad tracks
Foreman says these jobs are going boys and they ain't coming back to your hometown . . .

Last night me and Kate we laid in bed talking about getting out
Packing up our bags maybe heading south
I'm 35, we got a boy of our own now
Last night I sat him up, behind the wheel and said son, take a good look around
this is your hometown.

Chicago school strike settled with key gains for 18 unions board to cut pay and benefits. CTU members had been working without a contract since Sept. 1, when their previous pact expired, and had pressed the school board to negotiate to avoid a strike.

The union voted to walk out after no progress was made in talks, and after the board unilaterally began requiring employees to pay part of their health insurance premiums.

But once the strike began, the school board quickly rescinded its move, and the tentative settlement includes provisions for cost-containment programs rather than the cost-shifting the board had pressed.

COPE checkoff

Other key gains include a COPE checkoff provision and strengthened agency shop language. Also, five of the 10 strike days will be added to the school year.

Along with the general wage increases, the CTU also won improvements in starting pay for new teachers and salaries for senior teachers. Minimum pay for a newly hired teacher with a bachelor's degree and no previous experience goes from $15,471 to $16,167.

The maximum rate for a teacher with at least 15 years experience and a doctorate goes from $32,883 to $34,362.

The CTU has stressed that city teachers' salaries are still below rates paid to teachers in suburban school districts.

Pay in the Chicago system is calculated on a six-hour day, five-day week and 39-week year, plus two weeks' paid vacation.

Both the CTU membership and the Board of Education must formally ratify the agreement. The union was to vote Dec. 20, and the board will act in January.

Although terms of the agreements with each of the other 17 unions were not released, Operating Engineers Local 143 members unanimously ratified an agreement calling for the same wage and bonus as for the teachers, and the addition of five of the 10 strike days to the school year. The settlement came after the union and the school board agreed on an affirmative action policy.

While the key issue in the CTU walkout was wages, all 18 unions held firm to their mutual commitment not to return to work until everyone had a settlement.

CTU President Jacqueline Vaughn said the union agreed to the new terms at the point "we were convinced we had gotten the maximum amount that we possibly could."

The next issue of the AFL-CIO News will be published on Jan. 5, 1985, because of holiday schedules.

The staff of the AFL-CIO News wishes all readers a Happy New Year.

Labor seeks to purge toxic chemical threat toxic, colorless, heavier-than-air gas. It was this gas that killed and maimed the people of Bhopal.

Robinson testified that multinational corporations operating plants outside the United States often "take advantage of the lack of regulation over safety and health matters concerning both employees and communities." He warned that it could happen in this country.

Dick James, an IAM member who has worked 17 years at the plant in Institute, told the subcommittee that many of the workers feel "more inspections are needed in the chemical industry."

Under Reagan's Occupational Safety & Health Administration, industries with low injury rates, such as the chemical industry, are exempted from routine OSHA inspections. The Union Carbide plant at Institute was last inspected in 1982.

OSHA Administrator Robert Rowland, testifying before the subcommittee, noted that the Institute plant had a lost workday injury rate less than a third of the rate for the chemical industry as a whole. He said a team of OSHA compliance officers on Dec. 6 began inspecting the plant at Institute and another Union Carbide plant in Woodbine, Ga., where MIC is used in the manufacture of the pesticide Sevin.

The ICFTU said in a statement that the International Labor Organization should organize an international tripartite meeting of experts to examine special hazards that threaten workers and people living in communities adjacent to large-scale chemical and hydrocarbon plants.

The statement said the ICFTU is "convinced that the disaster clearly shows the need for effective worldwide codes of conduct on transnational corporations to prevent double standards in the practice of companies like Union Carbide between developing and industrial countries."

The ICFTU stressed that Union Carbide as a whole, and not just its Indian subsidiary, "is fully responsible for any failures in plant design or operating procedures which may have led to the disaster." It noted the local trade union in Bhopal had warned the company of the dangerous conditions in the plant and pressed for recruitment of skilled workers and supervisors. Yet no action was taken, despite a number of smaller accidents, including fatalities.

History of accidents

The statement by ICEF said Union Carbide has a history of "serious chemical plant accidents and at least one recent violation of U.S. laws regarding toxic chemicals." It referred to reports that the firm was recently found to have illegally burned toxic wastes at the chemical plant in Virginia.

The ICEF noted that a Union Carbide worker, familiar with the plants at Institute and Bhopal, had said the safety system of the Indian plant "had not been 'up to American standards' when he looked at it two years ago."

The New York Times reported that a May 1982 safety survey of the plant in Bhopal found 10 "major" deficiencies, several of which were later corrected. However, Hatim Mohammed Jariwala, leader of the union at the Bhopal plant, said two critical safety features at the plant were inoperative.

Jariwala said a waste scrubber, which neutralizes the gas with a spray of caustic soda and water, and a flare tower, which burns a flame to destroy escaping toxic gases, had not worked for a month. Further, the refrigerating unit which cools the plant and the MIC tanks where the gas leaked hasn't worked since 1982, he added.

U.S. economy continues to show sluggish growth

What happens in the housing industry generally affects the entire economy since construction draws materials from textiles to steel from other industries and employs a large segment of the nation's work force.

Additional signs that the economy is slowing down after a fragile recovery from the Reagan Recession appeared in a spate of other government reports:

- Industrial production rose a moderate four-tenths of 1 percent in November after a two-month slump, the Federal Reserve Board reported. Auto-making increased 7.5 percent during the month, while the output of home goods, business equipment, and construction supplies declined slightly.

In its report on production at the nation's factories, mines and utilities, the board revised downward its earlier estimates of output in September and October. It said production fell six-tenths of 1 percent in September and four-tenths of 1 percent in October rather than holding steady in October and dropping five-tenths of 1 percent in September as originally reported.

- Business inventories climbed eight-tenths of 1 percent in October, the Commerce Dept. said. Inventories have risen for 16 consecutive months, but have slowed from the rapid growth rates posted earlier in the recovery from the recession.

- The nation's factories, mines, and utilities operated at a seasonally adjusted 81.5 percent of total capacity in November, about unchanged from 81.4 percent in the previous month, the Federal Reserve said.

- Wholesale prices rose half a percentage point in November, the largest increase since last January, as beef prices soared at their steepest rate in five years and heating oil, gasoline and cars also registered sharp rises.

U.S., British actors' unions expand areas of cooperation

Top officers of the American and British stage actors unions are working to expand cooperation and communications between U.S. and British theatrical unions and their members.

In a statement issued after their joint meeting at AFL-CIO headquarters Actors' Equity and British Equity said both unions "favor the exchange of actors of our two countries, and both recognize the need for increased understanding and a greater sharing of information."

Both unions also realize, the statement said, that artists of both countries "must be fairly represented in such exchanges, taking into account the economic and professional conditions in our respective countries."

Actors' Equity President Ellen Burstyn and British Equity President Derek Bond participated in the three-day meeting along with AEA Executive Secretary Alan Eisenberg and Peter Plouviez, general secretary of British Equity. AFL-CIO participants included Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue and Jack Golodner, director of the federation's Dept. for Professional Employees.

Topics discussed included reciprocity agreements, immigration and taxation policies, salary structures and economic conditions in each country, cultural exchange programs administered by government and private organizations, and the concerns of each union's members.

The unions agreed to work together to provide their members with expanded information on immigration and tax laws of each country as well as other government regulations or policies that could affect the union members while working in each nation.

The participants also laid plans for additional meetings to monitor the exchange of American and British performers and provide for increased communications and cooperation between the unions.

Teamsters repudiate pledge, launch raids on ITU chapels

Teamsters President Jackie Presser flatly rejected a request from the Typographical Union that the IBT honor its oral no-raiding agreement with the ITU and pull out of elections in Cleveland, Columbus, Ohio, New Haven, Conn., and Toronto.

The result of the Teamster raids has been that the IBT was beaten on Dec. 3 in a 34 to 12 vote at a Toronto job shop. A week later, the ITU's Columbus Mailers Union members at the Dispatch and the Citizen-Journal voted 117 to 4 to switch to the IBT local, following the lead of printers' chapel at the Cleveland Plain Dealer where the IBT won by a 100 to 16 vote. The Cleveland Mailers Union also voted to affiliate with the IBT by a 122 to 9 vote.

A representation election was scheduled for Dec. 21 among the 52 members of the ITU printers' chapel at the New Haven Register and Courier-Journal.

ITU President Robert S. McMichen, in a Nov. 18 telegram to Presser noted that "our no-raiding agreement between the ITU and IBT, even though verbal, has always been respected. . . . In the spirit of that no-raiding agreement, I request you instruct your representatives in Cleveland and Columbus to withdraw from these actions."

At the ITU's 1983 Convention, Presser told the delegates, "I am not looking to raid anybody. . . . We will be with you whether you come with us or whether you do not come with us." It was at that convention the long-awaited merger agreement between the ITU and the Newspaper Guild was defeated after Presser offered to begin merger talks with the ITU.

Merger effect

In the stormy 16 months since that convention, the ITU had the election of its top five officers overturned and rerun by the Labor Dept., negotiated a merger document with the IBT under the leadership of past ITU President Joseph Bingel, and had its IBT-ITU merger referendum postponed first by a federal court and later by resolution of the ITU convention.

Under mandate of convention delegates, the ITU is negotiating a merger document with the Graphic Communications Union. Of those talks, McMichen said there is "every reason to think" a merger document can be worked out prior to the Jan. 7 deadline imposed under the unanimously adopted convention resolution.

If there is no agreement by that time, ITU members will vote on whether to accept the merger document with the Teamsters. Under that agreement, the ITU would become a division of the IBT.

The ITU Review reported that some of the dozen ITU representatives that were fired on charges of refusing to carry out the policies of the ITU executive council are now working for the Teamsters, actively pushing for decertification in various U.S. and Canadian cities.

U.S. to relay Kawasaki charges

The State Dept. has agreed to give the Japanese government a full report on an Auto Workers' presentation charging Kawasaki Motor Corp. with failure to live up to the code of conduct for multinational corporations promulgated by the Organization for Economic Cooperation & Development.

The union has charged that Kawasaki violated the OECD code, as well as American labor laws, on numerous occasions during the UAW's 1982 campaign to organize the company's motorcycle plant in Lincoln, Neb.

The OECD code, which both the United States and Japan subscribe to as members of the 24-nation organization, contains rules of behavior that multinational corporations, such as Kawasaki, are expected to follow.

Among other things, the code contains requirements that such firms "respect the right of their employees to be represented by trade unions" and that they "discharge, pay, promote, and train without discrimination."

Federal obligation

UAW President Owen Bieber said the union believes the U.S. government has an obligation to promote the OECD guidelines "and do everything necessary to see that corporations don't violate them as Kawasaki clearly has in Nebraska."

The union asked the State Dept. to urge the Japanese government to seek Kawasaki's adherence to the guidelines. The company already has been found to have violated U.S. labor law by administrative law judges of the National Labor Relations Board and by U.S. courts, including the Supreme Court.

The UAW was supported in its presentation to the advisory committee by the AFL-CIO, the Machinists, Clothing & Textile Workers, and the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers.

Earlier, the 14-million member International Metalworkers' Federation in Geneva supported the UAW charges against Kawasaki before the OECD.

In its presentation before the State Dept. panel, the UAW charged that strong union supporters at the Lincoln plant were fired, assigned to more difficult jobs, and disciplined more harshly than those who did not support the union. The UAW also submitted evidence that Kawasaki had threatened to close the Nebraska plant in violaiton of OECD guidelines.

ILO food panel urges planning for technology

Geneva — Workers and their unions should have a definite role in programming technological changes in the food and drink industries, delegates stressed at a 26-nation conference of the International Labor Organization.

"Carefully planned and balanced technological advance" is required if these industries are to meet their "economic, social and humanitarian responsibilities," the participants agreed. But they stressed in their conclusions that the "close collaboration" of workers and their unions, governments and employers is needed to assure the proper rate of technological progress.

Robert F. Harbrant, president of the AFL-CIO Food & Allied Service Trades Dept., was elected chairman by the worker delegates at the nine-day session, the first of the ILO's Food & Drink Industries Committee.

Harbrant pointed out that labor is not opposed to new technology. However, he emphasized that the workers and their unions stand "opposed with feet firmly planted to its introduction and implementation without the consent of the workers."

"New technology does not have to mean new job layoffs," Harbrant said, nor the exposure of workers to "new chemicals and hazards without knowledge and safeguards."

That is, he warned, "not unless employers desire it, governments condone it and workers accept it." As for the workers, he continued, "we respectfully decline to accept high technology job layoffs or new and additional exposure to chemicals and hazards."

Redoubled efforts

U.S. worker delegates Harbrant and Stanley A. Gacek of the Food & Commercial Workers commended the committee for its unanimous approval of a resolution calling on the ILO to redouble efforts to ensure that food and beverage workers in all member states enjoy the right to be represented by "freely elected, independent and democratic trade unions of their own choosing."

The ILO was urged to collect for the committee's next session "comprehensive information" on obstacles to the principle of freedom of association and to collective bargaining in the food and drink industries.

Harbrant and Gacek also praised the adoption of a resolution calling for multinationals in the food industry to meet the ILO's code of good conduct.

Gacek saw "very substantial progress for the workers in terms of language" in the committee recommendations on technological changes. Standards that he helped draft in a subcommittee provide basically for directly involving workers and their trade unions in the decision-making on technological changes and their effects.

At ILO conference, Stanley Gacek of the Food & Commercial Workers and AFL-CIO Food & Allied Service Trades President Robert A. Harbrant.

Florida unions shape goals for state legislature session

Hollywood, Fla. — Delegates to the 28th annual convention of the Florida AFL-CIO adopted a wide-ranging program for 1985 including key legislative goals, a plan to increase affiliations and new public relations programs.

State AFL-CIO President Daniel Miller told the 300 delegates that a change in leadership in both the state House and Senate raises hopes for a "year of progressive legislation that will continue to make our state a better place to work and live."

Florida is now the only southern state with a toxic substances "right-to-know" law protecting workers, Miller pointed out, citing labor gains in the last session.

The state's labor organizations also won unemployment compensation for farm workers left jobless after a hard freeze last winter destroyed citrus and other crops, Miller noted.

Looking ahead, the state federation president said the "positive spirit" among the delegates and membership already point to a "banner year" for political action in 1986 when a number of key Florida and national offices will be up for election.

No realignment

Rep. Claude Pepper (D-Fla.) told the delegates that the re-election of President Reagan should not be seen as a "voter realignment" since Reagan was largely unable to draw more Republicans into office.

"If there has been a re-alignment as some people suggest," Pepper asked, "then why wasn't Congress re-aligned?"

The veteran congressman, who has addressed every one of the state's conventions, said Reagan "has brought and paid for" today's relatively improved economic climate "by running up the deficits to $200 billion, which your sons and daughters are going to have to pay for for years."

The convention endorsed legislation to require agricultural employers to pay unemployment taxes for their workers and called for improvements in the state's workers' compensation system.

Convention resolutions

The delegates also voted to:

- Seek strengthening of the state's wage payment and collection laws.
- Support public employee bargaining legislation.
- Increase efforts to encourage all unions to affiliate with the federation.
- Publish a monthly newsletter and establish journalism awards for local union publications.

The delegates also endorsed consumer protection regulations, "look for the union label" consumer information programs and expanded voter registration efforts. They urged better teaching of labor history in Florida's schools and colleges.

During the convention, the delegates discussed and urged wider use of "job canvass" polling and communications techniques aimed at improving one-on-one contact between local union officers and members.

Jerry Thompson, projects coordinator for the Machinists, explained the program, which has been widely used among Canadian unions, and described its successful use in organizing, internal membership drives, expanding participation in political action campaigns and in heading off decertification elections.

An American Red Cross award cited labor's help in establishing emergency centers as part of the agency's disaster preparedness program.

EPA blasted for holdout on asbestos rules

The Environmental Protection Agency has rejected a petition by the Service Employees urging the EPA to issue rules covering inspections for and removal of asbestos materials in schools and other public buildings.

"The behavior of the EPA on this entire issue is absurd," SEIU President John J. Sweeney said. "They admit (asbestos) is highly toxic. They admit the problem is of immense proportions and yet they continue to delay or deny remedies.

"The ultimate absurdity is that EPA has created a high level of concern about asbestos, but refuses to tell anyone how to deal safely with the substance."

An SEIU study in 1982 showed that some 3.5 million school children along with 600,000 school workers and teachers were being exposed to dangerous friable (flaky) asbestos. When EPA failed to respond to the problem, the SEIU petitioned the agency for rules on inspections and clean-up activities.

"After months and months of promises and delays, we now learn about the post-election reality at the EPA," Sweeney said. "That reality is that the Reagan Administration does not consider the protection of school children, parents, teachers and school workers a federal responsibility—even though the problem of asbestos contamination is widespread and beyond the capabilities of most school systems."

In a letter to Sweeney, John A. Moore, assistant EPA administrator for pesticides and toxic substances, announced the agency was rejecting most of the union's request.

"We do not agree that federal regulation is the best approach for deciding whether to abate potential asbestos hazards in schools and other commercial and public buildings. We believe that abatement decisions are best made at the local level with EPA guidance and assistance and that these decisions are being made and implemented," Moore wrote.

Foot dragging

EPA's footdragging led the SEIU to file suit last September in an effort to force the agency to act.

The EPA claims that two-thirds of the 30,000 schools in the nation with asbestos problems have taken or are taking action to abate those hazards, Sweeney noted. He pointed out, however, that the agency's survey does not establish the quality of abatement efforts, and the testimony from EPA hearings shows that "abatement activities have been misguided in the absence of adequate standards."

When the schools that haven't completed clean-up or which are using inadequate maintenance programs are eliminated from the EPA survey, only about 26 percent of the schools have really addressed the asbestos problem, Sweeney charged.

School systems currently are required only to inspect for asbestos materials—with removal or abatement procedures left for local school systems to decide.

The EPA claims its voluntary abatement program is working. The effectiveness of that effort, however, will be the key issue in SEIU's suit against EPA, which is expected to go to trial next year.

Schedule of labor studies center courses

The George Meany Center for Labor Studies will offer eight institutes and workshops during January and February. The schedule:

TV: The Cool Medium, Jan. 9-11—A two-day workshop to coach state federation presidents on handling television interviews. Participants will have three exercises facing video cameras: A hostile confrontation, a panel discussion and a studio interview.

Teaching Techniques in Labor Education, Jan. 13-18—A class to demonstrate techniques commonly used in labor education for those who teach in union conferences, summer schools or night classes.

Contract Administration: Life Without Arbitration, Jan. 20-24—A program to explore alternatives to arbitration, to reintroduce promptness, clarity and lower costs. Grievance mediation will be discussed.

Negotiating Techniques: State & Local Agencies, Jan. 20-25—An exercise in bargaining out an agreement in a typical public sector situation with experienced fact-finder-mediators as coaches.

Arbitration: Preparation & Presentation, Feb. 3-8—An institute concentrating on the presentation of mock cases before professional arbitrators. The exercises are videotaped for self-criticism.

Newswriting & Editing, Feb. 3-8—A workshop for union editors seeking to make their publications more readable, credible and useful.

Computers for Local Unions, Feb. 18-22—A briefing on the use of computers for local union officers who need some knowledge before purchasing equipment.

Labor Law, Feb. 24-Mar. 1—A review of laws affecting staff responsibilities in bargaining, servicing and union administration, including problems arising from bankruptcy and plant closing.

Presidents of state federations will meet with AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and Sec.-Treas. Thomas Donahue Jan. 6-9. The AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education will hold a staff conference at the center Jan. 13-18.

Two affiliates will conduct training sessions for their own staffs on campus during January: Communications Workers, Jan. 6-25, and the Railway & Airline Clerks, Jan. 13-15.

The American Institute for Free Labor Development will conduct its 118th class for Latin American trade unionists, Jan. 20-Feb. 22.

Nearly 60 candidates for bachelor of arts degrees in labor studies enrolled in the George Meany Center/Antioch University college degree program will be on campus Jan. 27-Feb. 1 for their semi-annual week-in-residence.

Information about these or other labor studies is available from Fred K. Hoehler, Jr., executive director, George Meany Center, 10000 New Hampshire Ave., Silver Spring, Md. 20903; telephone 301/431-6400.

Edwin C. Brown retires from Rhode Island fed

Providence, R.I.—Edwin C. Brown, secretary-treasurer of the Rhode Island AFL-CIO for 26 years, has retired.

Brown, a member of Machinists Lodge 129 since 1934, was a jewelry toolmaker. He became president of his local in 1939, served as secretary-treasurer of IAM District Lodge 64 from 1938 to 1944, and secretary of the Providence central labor council from 1937 to 1944.

Prior to being elected to the number two post in the state federation in 1958, he had been secretary-treasurer of the Rhode Island AFL. Brown, 74, is spending part of his retirement writing a history of the labor movement in Rhode Island.

Christmas 1984

ON THIS Christmas 1984 the quest for peace continues in Southern Africa, Northern Ireland, Central America, the Middle East—wherever the whine of gunfire and the boom of bombs are taking lives and bringing death, fear and despair.

In the four decades since the holocaust of World War II, the striving for peace has continued unabated with but limited success. For there are nations to whom power and control are more important that peace—the nations that have refused to condemn terrorism or torture as political weapons.

Nevertheless, the struggle to establish peace and freedom on a lasting basis must continue without letup. For it is as clear as it was in 1945 that there is no alternative to peace in this age of missiles and satellites; peace today is a condition of survival.

The Free World has the resource, the manpower and the ability to rid the world of hunger and disease and to provide the basis of social justice so that all men can taste of bread and freedom.

Yet repression and dictatorship are still prevalent for most of the world's peoples, and the battle against hunger and disease and want goes slowly.

The struggle nevertheless goes on, because there is the eternal hope for a better tomorrow, another opportunity to try to bring to fruition the ancient message of peace and goodwill.

IN OUR OWN country, too many people this Christmas are hungry and homeless. There is a sense of unease and frustration as the problems of unemployment and inflation, poverty and discrimination and injustice persist, albeit in small measure when compared to the problems elsewhere in the world.

It is time, perhaps, to shed the self-indulgence, the hedonistic lifestyles, and turn with vigor and determination to solving the ills still besetting us, the problems still unsolved.

As we reach the midpoint of the 1980s, the trade union movement, operating as it has always as the people's lobby, will take up anew the battle to bring a sense of dignity and worth and well-being, a fair share of the wealth they produce, to America's workers and to the nation as a whole.

The issues change little: a good job, decent housing, proper health care, quality education, assistance against the hazards of unemployment, injury and old age, and above all an atmosphere in which freedom—civil rights, civil liberties—and peace can flourish.

UNIONS WILL continue as the instrument through which working people gain a voice in their own destinies. For more than a century, we have been struggling to construct, piece by piece, the elements of a more just society. We will never stop resisting the forces which would undermine what has so far been achieved.

A Greek philosopher said a long time ago, "what is honored in a country is cultivated there." Until just recently, America was a country where justice, fairness and compassion were honored and valued above all else and cultivated above all else.

Now, we have something different. For the moment, the upper hand is held by those who seem dedicated to the cultivation of avarice. They claim a mandate and pursue a program to turn America into a two-tier nation of haves and have-nots.

We are not dismayed or daunted for we know this, too, shall pass. We accept the challenge to carry on the battle as we have done for 103 years. This movement is built for the long haul.

Those who oppose us or oppose the values we espouse haven't changed or gone away. To maintain their privilege or preserve their dominance, they are working today as hard as they ever have to eliminate jobs, cut pay checks and bust unions.

They are as determined as ever to roll back the progress we have made toward full civil rights, toward insuring decent medical care, an adequate education, decent housing and a reasonable measure of social justice.

Peace and goodwill, bread and freedom—these are the goals that express the essence of the trade union movement and for which it will expend all its efforts and resources.

Coalition counters EPA in waste disposal battle

By Press Associates, Inc.

In December 1981, a small Gulf Coast town in Texas started a tug of war with the Environmental Protection Agency and a giant chemical waste company.

Members of the poor Latino community noticed an iem in a Brownsville newspaper. It said a large incinerator ship named the Vulcanus, owned by Chemical Waste Management, Inc., was loading up under EPA research authorization to burn off the coast 3.6 million gallons of cancer-causing polychlorinated biphenyls, or PCBs, mixed in oil.

Robin Alexander, an attorney in the farm worker health and safety unit of Texas Rural Legal Aid, Inc., was one of a small group of people who started asking questions.

Once those questions began, Alexander said, the tug of war escalated into a major battle between the EPA and on one side and, on the other, a coalition of more than 30 farmworker, farmer, shrimping, fishing, union, environmental and citizen groups plus local legislators and thousands of citizens in coastal communities.

Alexander was in Washington recently to accept the Philip A. Hart Award for environmental action from the Urban Environment Conference, a national coalition of union and environmental groups. Her story illustrates the powerful driving force of grassroots coalition-building that health and safety issues have precipitated.

Research results

After the first inquiries, the small group of citizens persuaded EPA to hold a public meeting and divulge its research results from that first burn. The 100 people attending the meeting learned basically two things that were to guide them during the next three years.

First, they got a taste of EPA's apparent unconcern for the safety of their communities—an attitude of arrogance that Alexander said substantially boosted their organizing power.

Second, they discovered EPA had granted the research permit without doing an environmental impact study or a research design and without having performed a worst case analysis in case of an accident or spill directly into the gulf. There had been major problems with the first burn, the citizens learned.

The group got out the facts and a coalition of some 30 groups formed. They held public meetings, erected billboards throughout the Rio Grande Valley and collected thousands of signatures on anti-incineration petitions forcing EPA into a second hearing that drew 1,000 people.

Burning problems

Meanwhile, they learned more about the problems of ocean incineration. For one thing, the chemicals do not burn completely and it is not known what effect the residues would have on marine life. In the case of PCBs, the chemical does not break down easily on its own once introduced into the environment and gets absorbed into marine life and possibly the food chain.

Also, incineration can produce byproducts that are just as toxic as the original chemicals. When burned, PCBs break down into the highly toxic herbicide dioxin, the same chemical that forced the evacuation of Times Beach, Mo., when it leached into soil and water there.

EPA ignored these problems and a rulemaking petition filed by the coalition and announced in October 1983 it intended to issue special three-year permits for CWMI to burn toxic waste in the gulf, waiving a number of safety requirements that CWMI could not meet.

The citizens coalition responded with a lawsuit, forcing the EPA into another hearing on the new permits. That Brownsville hearing drew more than 6,000 people. The only two people who spoke in favor of the permits were CWMI representatives.

Alexander said she expects EPA to issue permits again now that the election is over and before safety rules are in place. But, she vowed, her community and others like it all over the country will continue to fight.

MEMO FROM COPE

Odds 'n Ends

IT WAS BOUND TO HAPPEN sooner or later. A major figure in organizational growth of "new right" announces he's "seriously considering" running for office. The figure: Direct mail specialist Richard Viguerie, who practically built the "new right." He says he might seek GOP nomination for Virginia lieutenant governor in 1985. What's next? Terry Dolan for President?

SPEAKING OF 'NEW RIGHT,' it seeks permanence as "the right" by developing sophisticated farm system. It relied originally on Young Americans for Freedom to feed it committed conservatives at staff and leadership levels. Rightist leader Morton Blackwell, formerly on the Reagan White House staff, now runs training seminars for youthful ideologues and has set up a computerized job bank, which funnels these gee-whizzes into a variety of government agencies and congressional offices. There in the bureaucracy, as one young graduate of Blackwell's course describes it, they can "work from within."

'BACK-PAC' maybe should be the name of at least one of the two exotic political action committees recently announced in Washington, D.C. Both PACs—Franklin Square PAC and Democratic Freedoms PAC—are financed by massage parlors and are now registered with D.C. Office of Campaign Finance. PAC funds come from $35 charge for half-hour of "adult consentual behavior" in parlor. Owner says money will be used to help candidates sympathetic to "heterosexual liberation."

ON SAME DAY some folks in Washington were demonstrating at South African embassy against apartheid and jailing of trade union leaders, others were honoring Roberto D'Aubuisson, who has been linked often with death squads in El Salvador. More than a dozen right wing groups threw a bash, citing D'Aubuisson for what they called his message of "free enterprise, anti-communism, freedom of exports and imports." Among the sponsors: National Right to Work (for less) Committee, Free Congress Foundation, Conservative Caucus, Gun Owners of America, Moral Majority.

TO THEIR GREAT CREDIT, a group of 35 rightist House members of both parties signed a letter to the South African government protesting its apartheid policies and repression, pointing out that many conservatives find racist policies repugnant.

AVERAGE WINNERS' COST among candidates for U.S. House seats in 1984 was $325,000, according to New York Times estimates, up 23 percent from 1982. As expected, marginal seats cost more. Candidates winning by fewer than five points averaged $376,000. Winners of open seats—where no incumbent ran—spent $305,000. Even big winners—those with 60 percent or more of the vote—shelled out almost $200,000.

OTHER CAMPAIGN SPENDING figures come out of Common Cause study showing record $284 million raised by U.S. House and Senate candidates for period through mid-October. Almost 10 percent of that accounted for by North Carolina Senate candidates Jesse Helms and Jim Hunt, with $14.4 million and $8.6 million respectively. These and other totals will increase when end-of-the-year filings come in, but many are already record-breakers. Most spending for Senate race until this year was $7.17 million by Minnesota's Mark Dayton, who lost, in 1982. Helms, Hunt, Jay Rockefeller with $9.4 million in West Virginia, and Phil Gramm with $8.9 million in Texas all soared past that mark. Biggest fund-raiser among House candidates: Rep. James Jones (D-Okla.), $1,224,306.

One-Fifth of Planned Cuts Affect Poor

Half of Reductions Expected to Burden States and Municipalities

OPM Staff Considers Cutting 125,000 Federal Employes

Are these, and other proposals like them, what Americans voted for when they bestowed a landslide victory on President Reagan November 6?

- Elimination of the jobs of 125,000 federal employees, or, as an alternative, a five percent pay slash for all federal employees?
- Cumulative three-year cuts of $31.3 billion in programs that help the poor?

As Second Term Begins, or First One Ends

Clouds Cast Gloom on 'Morning in America'

It's no threat to anyone's happy holiday season to wonder whatever happened to "It's Morning in America," or "America is Back" or any of the other everything's-coming-up-roses platitudes of the Reagan re-election campaign.

All of a sudden, clouds cast gloom on the morning, folks aren't sure what America is back from or back to, and if anything's coming up roses it doesn't reflect in the daily stories coming out of the Administration.

One thing that's "back," so to speak, is that boring deficit problem. There was no deficit problem during the campaign, at least not on President Reagan's end of the campaign. Whatever little mischief record high deficits could cause would soon be put behind us, Reagan assured America, by economic growth.

The type on these assurances no sooner dried on his 3x5 cards than David Stockman, Bob Dole, Pete Domenici and other Republicans began correcting the President in public. No way, they said, can we "grow" out of debt of such dimension.

Okay, said the President, so we'll cut costs. Cap Weinberger over at Defense is willing to sacrifice the price of a catapult, a long bow and a quiver of arrows to help us out with our budget problems. Let's everybody else pitch in, too.

Let's, said the President, go after the real big-cost items, the programs for the needy. So he proposed three years of cumulative cuts of $31.3 billion in programs like Medicaid; legal services for the poor; Supplemental Security Income for the aged, blind and disabled; Head Start; housing and health programs; nutrition programs for poor children and pregnant women; aid to families with dependent children.

These cuts amount to one-fifth of all proposed savings.

Getting into the spirit of the thing, Reagan's White House said, hey, while we're at it, let's cram a five percent pay cut down the throat of federal employees. A variation on this theme was hummed by Reagan's Office of Personnel Management. It said look, if Congress won't buy a five percent pay cut for government workers, let's just dump 125,000 of them. That'll do the trick.

And so it's gone in the late stages of the first Reagan Administration or, if you prefer, the early stages of the second. The prime targets for sacrifice if budget cuts are to be made remain working people and needy people, which is just like it was four years ago when this Administration came to town.

May Tops December

The folks in Belen, N.M., chose May over December, youth over age, in voting for probate judge last month.

They elected 18-year-old Matt Otero, who hasn't had time to become a lawyer, let alone a judge. He defeated his 75-year-old opponent, 6,846-6,167.

Encouraged by his success, Otero laid out his plans for the future: "I plan to get a law degree and . . . become governor of New Mexico."

He's off to a good start.

Vote Counts . . . Recounts, Re-Recounts in Indiana

They still don't know who was elected to the U.S. House from Indiana's 8th Congressional District, incumbent Frank McCloskey (D) or his GOP challenger Richard McIntyre.

In the latest announcement, the Republican Indiana secretary of state certified McIntyre as the winner by 34 votes out of 233,000 votes cast. This reversed the results of a post-election day recount of one key county that had given McCloskey a 73-vote edge.

However, the certification occurred while recounts and re-recounts were being carried out in 14 other counties.

These are not expected to be completed until late January or early February. Who'll sit in the House representing the district when Congress convenes early next month is still anybody's guess.

One vote counts, recounts, re-recounts etc.

And Two Elections By Five Votes Each

Recounts in two state legislative contests in Montana resulted in five-vote victories.

Democrat R. J. Pinsoneault had trailed for the state senate by two votes in the election-day tally. A recount added five to his total and lopped off two from his opponent. Result, a 3,548-3,543 victory—five votes out of 7,091 votes cast.

In a race for the state house of representatives, Republican John Mercer came through with victory after a recount, also with just five votes—2,192-2,187.

34 Out of 39,058

People in the 15th state legislative district of Texas learned how much one vote counts.

Democrat Mike McKinney ran 100 votes behind his opponent November 6. He called for a recount.

He wound up a winner: 19,546 to 19,512—just 34 votes out of 39,058 votes cast.

One vote counts!
